forraine Souldiers; chiefly from the Flemings, whose mercenary swarmes most pestred the same, and had most infested him. And because Gouernment is the Soule of State, and Wisedome the Soule of Gouernment, he chooseth to himselfe a Body of Counsell out of the most eminent persons of both sorts: such was Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury; and for that selfe consideration, he laid the Chancellorship of England vpon Thomas Becket, and held in speciall fauour Iohn of Oxenford, with sundry other Prelates of chiefest note: of the Laity, he had Robert Earle of Leicester, chiefe Iusticiar of England, Richard de Luci, Iocelin de Bailull, Alan de Neuile and others: but for a Cabanet-Counsellour at all times, he had his owne mother, Matildis the Empresse, one of the most sage and experienced Ladies of the World. Thus then furnished, and assembling a Counsell at Wallingford, hee aswell for his owne securing, as for the assurance of his Children, sweares the Realme to the succession of his sonnes William and Henry, the one being in remainder to the other.

(4) But quiet consultation did not take vp the most of his time, euen in the daies of these Sun-shining beginnings: for the raign of Stephen, a most gentle Prince (who thought, out of the necessity of his owne estate, that it was not safe for him to bee seuere) hauing giuen way for many of the mighty, to maintaine sundrie insolencies; these now feeling a restraint, beganne not a little to repine: but Hugh de Mortimer, wanton with greatnes, and the most arrogant man aliue, stuft his Castles of Gloceſter, Wigmore, and Bridgenorth with rebellious Garrisons; which Henry notwithstanding reduced to subiection, though in the siege of the last-named, not without imminent perill of his person, had not Hubert de S. Clare, cast himselfe betweene death and the King, taking the arrow into his owne bosome to preserue his Soueraignes life. It bound Tiberius to Seianus most of all, when a part of the banquete ting Caue in which they were, suddenly falling, Seianus was found to haue borne the ruine from the Emperour, with the perill of his life: but Seianus suruiued that aduenture, which our Senelere did not, saue onely in the better renowne thereof, which deserues to bee immortall, being an Act of piety, worthy of a Statue, with Codrus, Curtius, Manlius, or whosoeuer else haue willingly sacrificed themselues for their Country, or for the Father of their Country, the King.

(5) Henrie thus hauing in some sort setled England, hasteth into France to King Lewis in the first yeere of his raigne, and there did homage vnto him for Normandy, Aquitane, Angiou, Main and Tourain, which partly were his patrimony, and partly the inheritance of Elianor his wife.

(6) His domesticke enemies being subdued or appeased, hee put his brother Geffrey by force to a pension, the summe whereof (if it be any thing to the purpose to know) was 1000. l. English, and 2000. l. Aniou by yeere, wringing out of his possession all such territories, as by their Fathers last Will and Testament, were bequeathed to him in France. But Geffrey did not long enioy the said annuity, or his brothers friendship: for in the third yeare, death brought a discharge, and Henry was disburdened of those paiments. For his violence in taking away those lands, King Henry might alledge he was eldest brother: but that allegation might bee auoided with his owne consent, which once hee gaue: but the great Elixar, called Reason of State, (though falsly so called, vnlesse it bee seasoned with Iustice, and Religion) hath so transmutatiue a faculty, as to make Copper seeme Gold, right wrong, and wrong right; yea, when all Pleas faile, it will stand for good, while there are forces to support it.

(7) This accord between the two brethren, being thus (howsoeuer) establisht, the King repaires into England, and at Chester enters amity with Malcolme King of Scots, on such termes, as his Grandfather had done, yet Saluis omnibus dignitatibus suis, sauing to himselfe all his dignities: and the said Malcolme restored to Henry the City of Karleol, Newcastle vpon Tyne, &c. and Henry restored to him the Earledome of Huntington in England. And, so iustly dreadfull did the growing puissance of this young Monarch appeare to his greatest enemies, that Hugh Bigod Earle of Norfolke, who had potent means to doe mischiefe, rendred his Castle to bee at his disposall.

(8) The Welsh notwithstanding forsooke not themselues, but did some memorable matters vnder conduct of the valiant Prince Owen against the English, in defence of North-Wales, and their Countries liberty, to the losse of the English, and extreame danger of the Kings owne person, whose Standard roiall was cowardly abandoned, and the King reported to be slaine: for which Henrie de Essex, the Kings Standard-Bearer at that conflict, was afterward accused by Robert de Montford his neere Kinsman, and in single battaile within lists was vanquished at Reading, where the said Henry de Essex was shorne a Monke, and died. Mathew Paris relates the whole voiage of King Henry summarily thus: That Henry prepared a very great Army against the Welsh, with full purpose to ouercom them both by land and sea; that hee cut vp the woods and forrests, and laid open a way; that hee recouered the Castle of Ruthlan and other fortresses taken from his Ancestors; that hee repaired the Castle of Basingwerke, and that hauing brought the Welsh to his will, hee returned with triumph into England.

(9) After this, himselfe and his wife Queene Elienor beeing openly crowned vpon Christmas day, (* some say Easter day) at the Citie of Worcester; they both at the Offertorie laid their Diademes vpon the high Altar, vowing neuer to weare them after; this beeing now the third time in which at three seuerall places, Westminster, Lincolne, and Worcester, he had beene crowned. This deuout act of his, did flow perhaps out of some such speculation as that of Canutus, who thought none truly worthy the name of King, but God alone; or that, vpon which Godfrey of Buillion, refused to weare a crowne of gold in Hierusalem, where our Lord and Sauiour had beene crowned with thornes. For this King had at times the pangs and symproms of mortification and piety, and did heerein acknowledge the onely giuer and taker-away of kingdoms God-almighty; putting himselfe and Realme, vnder the protection of that Maiestie of whom hee held paramount; and professing (as it were) that from thencefoorth hee would direct his actions to the glorie of his omnipotent Master, which is indeede the only finall cause of all true monarchie.

(10) Not long after, hauing establisht his affaires in England, hee croſt the Seas into Normandie: where succesiuely sundrie matters of importance fell out: as the seisure of the City of Nants in Britaine after his brother Geffreis death; his iourney to Paris, beeing inuited thither by Lewis and his wife the Queene; the vnprofitable siege of Tholouze laid by King Henrie, where Malcolme King of Scots was in companie with him; the vnripe marriage of his sonne Henrie to Margaret the French Kings daughter, whom Thomas Becket then Lord Chancellor had formerlie conducted with verie great State from Paris, by consent of parents for that purpose; the offence taken at those spousals by Lewis, for that the children were but infants, and that himselfe was a looser thereby; the warre heereupon attempted by Lewis, fortifying Chaumount, which (the French hauing quit the Field by flight) King Henrie recouered with aduantage; the Armies of both these great Kings, being afterward at point (as it were) to ioine, disperſed vpon reconciliation of the two Kings, by rea-reason of a marriage concluded vpon, betweene Richard, King Henries second son, and Alice the French Kings daughter: All which and some other, not drawing with them any extraordinarie sequell, nor affording much matter for ciuill document, must not preponderate the handling of things more rare and considerable.

(11) For after these accidents, beganne the famous controuersies betweene the King and his Arch-bishop Becket, a man of an inuincible stomack and resolution in his life, and after death reputed by some for a great Saint or Martyr; as is likewise noted of Henrie, * that he was the most politike, martiall, rich, and honoured Prince of all his time. This Prelate by birth a Londoner, (though his mother, a Sarazen, * say some) by profession a * Ciuilian, was by Theobald Arch-bishop of Canterburie, both made his Arch-deacon, and also placed about the person of Duke Henrie, who beeing now King, aduanced him in the verie first yeere of his raigne to bee Lord Chancellor of England, in which high honor he carried himselfe like another King, and afterward vpon the death of Theobald, though the * Monks obiected against Becket, that neither a Courtier nor a Souldier (as * hee had beene both) were fit to succeede in so high and sacred a function, yet the King gaue him that Arch-bishopricke, partly in reward, and partly in further hope of his ready and faithfull seruice. Which to be true, a Legender of his Miracles can best relate. Nonnullis tamen &c. Many (saith hee) iudged his promotion not Canonicall, because it was procured more by the importunity of the King, then by the voices of Clergie, or People; and it was noted as presumption and indiscretion in him, to take vpon him to guide the Sterne, who was scarce fit to handle an Oare, and that beeing skild onely in worldly affaires, hee did not tremble to ascend vnto that sacred top of so great dignitie. Whereto agreeth the reports of two learned Monks who then liued, (for such Authors onely wee will heerein follow, as shall bee vnpartiall) * one of which testifies, that the Pope about that time calling a Councell at Tours (and the King giuing Licence to his Arch-bishops and Bishops to goe thither) Becket secretlie surrendred his Arch-bishopricke, which hee had receiued from the Kings hand, into the Popes hands. The * other saith, Becket himselfe confessed, that, not Canonicall Election did call him, but publick power droue him in, nor the will of God, but mans pleasure, placed him in the roome. Howsoeuer, these beeing memorable arguments of the Kings exceeding loue; let vs now see how this great Prelate endeuoured to deserue it, or how hee chanced to lose it.

(12) Great and flourishing was the state of the English Church & Cõmon-wealth at this season; the quiet of both which, the King studied & hoped to establish by the vndoubted assistance of his great fauorite Becket, whose coũsel & authority he knew might much further his princely designs, especially touching affaires of the Church, and abuses of Church men, which then were grown to a dangerous height: wherof let vs heare the Monke of Nuborough speake: It was declared in the Kings presence, how that Clergy mẽ had cõmitted aboue a hundred murthers vnder his raign; wherewith the King highly offended, hee was in punishing of them somewhat too vehement; but the blame of the Kings too much earnestnes, must lie on the Prelates, in as much as they gaue the cause thereof: for, whereas sacred Canons ordaine, that Clerks found guilty, not onely of hainous and grieuous sinnes, but also of lesser, should bee degraded, and thousands of such were in the Church of England, like innumerable chaffe amongst a little good corne; yet very few such, for these many yeeres haue beene depriued. The Prelates forsooth, while they bestirre themselues rather to vphold the liberties & dignities of Clerks, then to chastice, and cut off their vices, thinke they doe God and his Church good seruice, in protecting from publike Discipline such hainous offenders, whom (by duty of their places) they ought to correct according to the Canons censure, whereby they through their impunity, hauing liberty to doe what they list, haue neither feare of God, (whose iudgement they thinke is farre off) neither of men in authority, sith on the one side their Prelates neglect to reforme them, and on the other side, they are thus exempt by their order from the temporall Iurisdiction.

(13) This being the state of the Church and Realme, wherein some were so iniured without remedy, and others so iniurious without coertion, as if neither sort were in condition of Subiects; the King (who was a man of excellent Wisedome, Constancy, and Zeale) tooke especiall care of quickning the publike Discipline, and the rigour of ancient lawes, which thus lay neglected; for which end hee had setled choise Ministers of Iustice through all parts of his land; and vpon complaints brought him by his Subiects of the remissenes, and other defects of his Iudges, hee accordingly by his princely prouidence applied remedies, and chastised the delinquents. The like remissenes (to censure it no harder) was complained of in his Spirituall Iudges, occasioned by a murther, committed by a Priest of Sarum Dioceese, whom the Archbishoppe commanded to be depriued, & put into an Abbey, whereby he was freed from sharper punishment, intended by the Kings Iusticiaries: with which (and some other like affronts of his Archbishop) the King conceiued no little displeasure, as requiring, that Iustice should be ministred to all alike without partiality, & seeing this apparantly to tend vnto the ruine of all roiall gouernment: the Archbishop on the other side, stood no lesse peremptory on the immunities of his Clergy and See: yea so farre, as that hee challenged from the Crown (to the Kings great offence) the custody of Rochester Castle and other Forts, which the King for securing his state had resumed into his owne hands.

(14) This maine controuersie betwixt Regnum, & Sacerdotium, the Crowne and the Mitre, Houeden (who then also liued) thus summarily deliuers: The King would that all such of the Clergy as were deprehended in any Robberie, Murther, Felonie, burning of houses, and the like, should bee tried and adiudged in his temporall Courts, as Lay-men were: against which, the Archbishops resolution was, that all Clergy men so offending should bee tried onely in the Spirituall Courts, and by men of their owne coate, who if they were conuict, should at first be onely depriued of their office and benefice: but if they should againe be guilty of the like, they should then bee adiudged at the Kings pleasure. The King finding himselfe to bee hereby but a Demi-King, depriued of all Soueraignety ouer one half-deale of his Kingdome, and perceiuing Beckets stiffenesse, in thus contesting with his Soueraigne, to bee no way mollifiable by whatsoeuer his old fauours, or fresh perswasions; notwithstanding resolued to put nothing in execution, which should not first bee ratified and strengthned with consent of his Bishops; of whose ready assent to so iust demands hee had no cause to doubt: who thereupon assembling at Westminster, the King, tooke both offence there, at the Archbishops thwarting his desires, and occasion also to establish sundry other Articles, which hee called his Grandfathers Customes, peremptorily vrging Becket to yeeld thereunto, without any such reseruation of sauing in all things his order, and right of the Church, wherewith he would haue limited his assent.

(15) The points in those Ordinances which the Archbishop principally stucke at, as * himselfe did set them downe in his letters to the Pope, and his owne Suffragan Bishops within the Dioceese of Canterbury, were principally these; 1. That none should appeale to the See of Rome for any cause whatsoeuer, without the Kings licence. 2. That it should not be lawful for any Archbishop or Bishop to depart the Realme, and repaire to the Pope vpon his summons, without the Kings licence. 3. That no Bishop should excõmunicate any one whomsoeuer, holding of the King in chiefe, or put any other of his officers vnder Interdict, without the Kings licence. 4. That Clerks criminous should bee tried

(30) Howbeit, by mediation at length, the two Kings were againe reconciled, and at their friendly * enteruiew, Beckets wel-willers aduised him to submit himselfe in the presence of both kings, * without any more reseruations; which he seeming to yeeld to, presented himselfe verie humbly, and referred the cause to the king, not now, Saluo ordine suo, but yet on a new point, Saluo honore Dei; wherewith the king exasperated, told the French king, such was the humor of the man, that whatsoeuer displiked him, he would say it was against Gods honor, and so would bee neuer the neerer to conformity; with which, and other speeches, King Lewis offended with Becket, asked him whether hee thought to bee greater or holier then Saint Peter? and the Peeres of both Nations accused him of much arrogancy, as being himselfe the wilfull hinderer of his own, and the Churches tranquility.

(31) Notwithstanding, the Pope forgot not his faithfull Thomas, and therefore after hee had graced him with a confirmation of all the Priuiledges, and powers, which any of his Predecessors in that See did enioy (to the daring and defiance as it were, of the kings vtmost indignation) the king sent a letter into Germany, declaring that hee would forsake Pope Alexander, and ioine with the Emperour, and Antipape. Whereupon, when the Bishop of Rome had commanded Gilbert Bishop of London to admonish the king to giue ouer his courses, and customes preiudicious to the Church, the said Bishop obeyed, and in his answere sought to perswade the Pope to a conniuencie, and forgets not to iustifie his Soueraigne, as That the King was ready to obey the sacred hests of the Church, sauing to himselfe his own & his Kingdomes dignity: That, as for Appeales, he claimed that honour, by the ancient institution of his Kingdome, that is to say, That no Clerke should for a ciuill action depart the same vntill right could not be had in his Courts at home, and then he would hinder no man. That hee did not banish the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, who might returne at his pleasure, so as he would obserue all those his Grandfathers customes, which once hee had giuen his faith to doe: That the King thinks himselfe greatly iustified, in that hee is willing to stand to the iudgement of the whole Church of his owne Kingdome, &c.

(34) Two Cardinals therefore, Gratian and Vivianus, comming into France to end the contention, returne notwithstanding without possibility of doing good; for that Becket would not yeeld in any point to those Customes, at which he had once excepted, but with his ordinary limitations. At last yet by the popes mediation, the two kings of England and of France met at Paris, whether the Archbishop repaired, and yet no peace ensued: for that the king refused the kisse of peace with him, and Becket would either haue a sound and full peace, or none at all; where, though the king of England refused to satisfie any thing vnder the name of restitution, as being against his honour (because all restitution implied a wrong) yet in the other maine matter of his Auitall Customes, offering to stand to the iudgement, not of his owne onely, but euen of the Parisian Diuines, and Church of France; hee came off from that conference with some aduantage & fauour, in the opinion of the hearers.

(35) King Henry (for all this) seeing no issue of his long disquietnes, and vnregall vsages, vnderstanding also that the Archbishop of Sens in person had solicited the Pope, to put the Kingdome of England vnder Interdict, (which is the prohibiting of the publike vse of Christs Religion, & Christian Burial throughout the whole land) hee beeing then in Normandy, sends forth his Edict: That if any man bring from the Pope or Becket, any letters of Interdict, he should presently suffer as a Traitour to the King and the State: That no Clerke whatsoeuer goe forth of the land without a Passe from his Iusticiaries, and none returne againe without letters of licence from the King himselfe. That none receiue any message from the Pope or Becket, nor make any appeale vnto them, nor hold any Plea by their mandates; That if any Prelate or Clerke, or Layman shall obey any sentence of Interdict, he and all his Kindred shall be forthwith expulsed the land, and all his goods escheated to the Crowne. That all Clerkes who haue rents in England, returne home within three Moneths, or else all their rents to fall to the King. That certaine Prelates specified, bee cited to answere in the Kings Courts for interdicting Earle Hughes lands. That Peter-pence be not paid to Rome, but reserued. Thus, (as Gervase the Monke lamentably complaineth) all from the eldest to the yongest throughout England were made to abiure obedience to Pope Alexander and Becket.

Math. Paris.

(36) After all this, it came into King Henries mind, to sweeten these his many cares with some solace, and to crowne his eldest sonne, yongue Henry, King of England, now in his owne life time: A counsell not more temerarious, then infortunate: but of which yet he did hope to reape this consolation, that it was done in contempt of Becket (whose office it was to haue crowned the King,) with some aduantage also toward the perpetuation of the Auitall Customes, and that also without scruple of conscience, his sonne receiuing the Crowne without caution, to preserue the Churches libertie, either by him put in, or by others exacted. Yea rather, an Oath ministred, and by the yongue King taken, to maintaine those Auitall Customes to the vttermost.

(37) This solemnitie was performed, at Henrie the fathers commandement, by Roger Arch-bishop of Yorke, (the anciently riuall See of Canterbury) contrarie to the Popes expresse Inhibition, the father himselfe King Henrie, being present thereat, though without any fortunate presage in comming, or cause of consolation in the action. For * he, in his inauspicious passage out of Normandy, arriuing not without very great perill, at Portsmouth, the best and neweſt ship he had was suncke in the stormes, and therein, besides Henrie de Agnellis and his two sonnes, Gilbert de Sullemni, M^r. Ralf de Bealmunt, the Kings physition and fauourit, with about foure hundred men and women more, were deuoured of the working waues. And at the feast, the ioifull father himselfe, carrying the first dish, and the Arch-bishop of Yorke saying in pleasance to the yongue King: Reioice my faire sonne, for their is no Prince in the world, hath such a seruitor attending at his table as you. The vnnaturall yongue man answered; why? wonder you at that? my father knowes hee doth nothing that misbecomes him, for so much as hee is roiall borne but of one side, but our-selfe are roiall borne both by father and mother.

(38) Adde heereunto, that this vnluckie Coronations triumphes, were celebrated with bon-fires kindled by the furies in Normandie; which Lewis the French King inuaded with fire and sword, because his daughter Margaret was not crowned aswell as the yongue King her husband: but the father speeding into those parts, quencht this flame with a promise to recrowne his sonne, and then his daughter

Mar-

Margaret should be honoured with like ceremonies. Thus the fathers patience was exercised on euerie hand, and worse things were feared.

(39) So now yet at last, in the seuenth yeere of Beckets banishment, another meeting was had at Sens, whither, the two great Kings, and the Archbishop of Sens, and Bishop of Neuers, beeing together, the Arch-bishop of Canterburie repaired, and the treatie of Peace was entred into, which at *Amb*ois, in an other meeting (at procurement of Rotrod Arch-bishop of Roan) was finished; and the Archbishop (knowing the King was terrified with the expectation of the foresaid imminent Interdiction) was restored to the Kings fauour, and permitted to haue full vse of his Metropolitane See, and all the profits thereof with the arrerages. Which conclusion, the King signifies to his sonne into England, whither the Arch-bishop returnes, and lands at Sandwich: And thus the controuersie betweene the King and his Arch-bishop seemed to bee ended.

(40) But the Arch-bishop had not beene long in England, before hee published the Popes letters, by which, Roger Arch-bishop of Yorke, and Hugh Bishop of Duresme, were suspended from the vse of their Episcopall function, for crowning the yongue King in preiudice of the See of Canterburie; and the Bishops of London, Exceter, and Salisburie, cut off from the Church by censure, for assisting the said Arch-bishop at that Coronation; whom Becket would not, but vnder conditions, at the yongue Kings request, absolue. Whereupon a great complaint was carried into Normandy, to the father King, * by some of the Bishops: and in the meane time, the Arch-bishoppe Thomas, putting himselfe vpon the way to visite the yongue King, at Woodstocke in Oxford-shire, was commanded not to approach.

(41) At the newes of these late censures, the father King was so sore displeased, that some words slipping from him, and arguing his great discontent, mooued Hugh Moruill, William Traci, Hugh Brito, and Richard Fitz-vrse, knights and courtiers, to poste into England, and there in a furie, (without either warrant, or priuitie of their Soueraigne) to murther the Arch-bishop (being then about * forty and eight yeers old) in his owne Church of Canterburie; which sacred Place, and Time, besides his high Calling, might haue pleaded for pittie, had not the men been wholly transported with barbarous rage. For howsoeuer we are farre from their fancies, who, for his zeale to the Popes Soueraignety, haue so mounted him to the top of Martyrs glory, that not onely the basest part of his Shrine was pure gold, and his * old Shoe was deuoutly kissed by all * passengers; but also shamelesse and numberlesse Miracles are blindly ascribed vnto him, and his * Bloud almost matched in vertue with our euer-blessed Sauiours: yet wee no lesse condemne their butcherly execution, who (how great so euer his offence was against the King and State) had no lawfull authoritie to beare them out, or acquit them, from the guilt of Bloud.

(42) To shut vp this long contention (which, as you see, would not be extinct but by bloud, nor take end but by his death,) because any censure of our owne will be said to sauour of Time-seruing, or State-pleasing, we will onely annexe the bare iudgement of the forecited learned Monke of that time, who thus speaks. *Indeed though most mens custõe is, in those, whom they loue and praise, to extoll whatsoeuer they haue done, (an argument of their great affection, but slender wisdom) yet in plain truth, those things, which the venerable Arch-bishop so acted, that no profit at all thence proceeded, but the Kings wrath onely was kindled (whereby so many mischiefes afterward arose) I doe not thinke to bee praise-worthy, though they sprang from a laudable zeale; as it was in the blessed Prince of the Apostles, who attaining the top of Apostolicall perfection, taught the Gentiles by his example to Iudaize; for which the Doctor of the Gentiles * declares that he deserued to be reprehended, though hee did it with a praise-worthy and pious intent.* And in another place. The Arch-bishop was hot in zeale of Iustice, but whither fully according to knowledge, God knoweth, (for it is not for a man of my meane quality, rashly to iudge of so great a mans actions,) but I thinke, the blessed Pope Gregorie would haue dealt more mildly, and winkt at those things which might haue beene borne, without any hazard of the Christian faith, &c. and then concludes: Therefore, that which the venerable Arch-bishop then did, I neither iudge that it is to bee commended, neither presume I to condemne it, &c. For good men are so to bee loued, or lauded by vs, that wee neither loue nor laud those acts wherein they shew themselues to be fraile men, but onely those things wherein without scruple we ought to imitate them: and therefore they are wiselie and warilie to be praised, that Gods prerogatiue may be reserued intire to himselfe.

(43) Some other learned men there were, who liued neere to that time, whose censure was farre sharper then that Monks: Such were some of those Diuines of Paris, mentioned by * Cæsarius the Monk, who saith, The Question was debated to & fro amongst the Doctors, in the vniuersitie of Paris, whether Thomas were damned or saued: amongst whom, Rogerius the Norman auowed, that hee deserued death and damnation, for his contumacie against his King, the Minister of God: but Petrus Cantor alleadged, that his Miracles were signes of his saluation, &c. An indeede if all bee true, which * one man hath written in fiue bookes, containing his 270. Miracles, wee cannot but acknowledge him, both the greatest Saint, and the merriest too, that euer gotte into heauen; so ridiculous are many things recorded of him. As that of Ailwardus, who for stealing of a great whetstone (which the Author that writes it, best deserued) beeing depriued of his Eies and * Virilities, by sentence of Law; vpon praier to S. Thomas he had all restored againe: Yea euen a * Bird, hauing beene taught to speake, flying out of her cage, and ready to be seized on by a Spar-Hauke, said onely, S. Thomas helpe mee, and her Enemie fell presently dead, and shee escaped, and (belike) reported it. Of which great power in this Saint, how canne wee doubt? sith wee read, that euen in his life time the * Virgin Marie her selfe was contented to bee his Semster, and sowed his shirt with red silke? Many of which kind of follies, (if that word be sharp enough) might bee heere inserted, were not our present argument more serious, and these forgeries fit onely for Monks to endite, children to read, and fooles to beleeue.

(44) The report of the tragicall outrage on the Arch-bishop, comming to the old King, at Argenton in Normandy; there was no kind of sorrow, into which, (without respect to Maiestie, or State) hee fell not; and not without cause, as knowing how plentifull an Hydra of mischiefes (vpon the opinion of his priuitie with the fact) would rise, if not preuented. But the murtherers, fearing least this their fact would displease the king, in whose reuenge they did it, fled into the North, and abode one whole yeere in the kings Castle of Knaresborough in Yorke-shire; perhaps by fauour of the yongue king: none of them dying for the fact, by way of iustice, because, the Clergie exẽpting themselues from the bonds of ciuill Laws, the punishment of a Priest-killer (as by some it appeareth) was not then the death of the Body by execution of capitall sentence, but of Soule by Excommunication, till about the twentie third yeer of this king, it was (at the instant suite of Richard Arch-bishop of Canterburie, and of the Bishops of Winchester, Elie, and Norwich) yeelded, that such persons should also suffer losse of life.

45 The king therefore, vpon protestation to submit himself, to the iudgement of such Cardinals, Legats, as the Pope should send to inquire of the fact, kept his Realme from Interdiction, though the king of France, the Archbishop of Sens, and Theobald Earle of Blois, had outgone his Embassadors with their inflaming letters, conteining the descripion of that Parricide.

King Henry ſ projects the cõqueſt of Ireland.

(46) Henry therefore, among ſo many perplexities riſing out of the Archbiſhops murther, ſaw no way ſo ready for the calming his owne perturbations, or for the auerting mens thoughts from the conſideration of that ſcandalous tragedie, as to vndertake ſome great and noble enterpriſe, which now offered it ſelfe very ſeaſonably. For Ireland, a verie ſpatious and plentifull Iland, and lying ſcommodiouſly for the vſes of the Engliſh, burned in it ſelf with ciuill diuiſions, kindled among the petty Kings and Princes thereof: while Rothericke the Great, called O Conor Dun, Prince of Connaught, abuſing his power and the aduantage of the times, to the oppreſsion of his Neighbours, ſought to make himſelfe the vniuerſall King thereof, hauing already inuaded the Title & Stile of KING AND MONARCH OF IRELAND. And this his purpoſe was much aduanced by the fatall and familiar errour of proceedings in like caſes: for the Iriſh Princes, either through diſtruſt or pride, forbearing to vnite their forces againſt the common enemy, while each prouides for one, they are all as it were, ouercome.

(48) The onely diſpoſer and tranſlator of Kingdomes is God; & in Ireland to moue him to offence (without which no Kingdom is transferred) againſt the people thereof, all ſuch ſinnes abounded, as commonly forgoe the greateſt changes: for not onely the manners of the Nation were extremely corrupted, but the Chriſtian faith it ſelfe decaied; barbariſme ouerrunning the one, and * more then ſuperſtitions the other. But it may ſeeme by ſome * Authors, that King Henries particular inducements to that Action, were both an ancient title vnto that Kingdome, deriued from his anceſtors (the kings of England) for many ages before him; and * many vnſufferable wrongs (by their Piracies) vnto the Engliſh Nation, buying and ſelling their Captiues, and vſing Turkiſh tyranny on their bodies: which made the Iriſh Clergy themſelues confeſſe, that they had deſerued no other, then that their land ſhould bee transferred to that Nation whom they had ſo cruelly handled. Notwithſtanding, king Henry, who knew how great and dangerous tumults the Popes had raiſed on ſmall occaſions, thought his way would bee much eaſier, if he went onward with the Popes good fauour, which hee eaſily obtained (ſo liberall is his holineſſe of that which is none of his) for a fee; viz. a penny yeerely to bee paid to Saint Peter of euery houſe in Ireland. Touching which point, Roſſus of Warwick (no Proteſtant, I aſſure you,) ſaith, That Englands King is not bound to rely on the Popes graunt for Ireland, nor yet to pay that taxe, becauſe hee had claime to that Kingdome by an hereditary right: and that the Pope had no temporall intereſt therein (as his fauorites pretend) the often-mentioned Monke of Newborough can tell vs, who ſaith, that Nunquam externa ſubiacuit ditioni, Ireland was neuer ſubiect to any forraine command.

(49) God Almighty therefore did now put it into the heart of Henry, for the reforming of that kingdome, to make a Conqueſt thereof, hauing in his infinite wiſedome before hand fitted all circumſtances needfull to concurre, for inducing ſo warie and frugal a Prince to ſuch an enterpriſe, which thus tooke beginning.

Gul. Nubrig l. 2. c. 26.

(50) Dermot Mac Murgh, beeing in poſſeſſion of his fatall Helen (the adulterous wife of Rothericke) was purſued ſo eagrely with the reuenging ſword of his enemie (who, howſoeuer wounded in heart with the abuſe of his Bed, reioiced in the colour and occaſion miniſtred therby, for him to ſeiſe vpon the flouriſhing Prouinces of Leinſter) as hee was driuen to flie from place to place, and at the length to quitte his kingdome alſo, the ſubiects whereof his tyrannie and vices had vnſetled, ſin their affections toward him. Thus deſperate of help at home, his laſt deliberations were to draw in forreine aides, the neceſſity of his caſe requiring it; and for that purpoſe, finally reſolues to repaire to the court of the wiſe and potent Henrie, King of England, beeing then in Aquitain: neither could Dermot but knowe, that it had heeretofore beene in Henries deſignes, at ſuch time as hee ment to ſubdue it for William of Angiou, his yongeſt brother, and alſo, becauſe his preſent Dominions did halfe (as it were) enuiron it. In which hopes he was not deceiued; for Henrie liſtened thereunto verie willinglie, as to a thing which hee had indeede * ſome yeeres before proiected.

(51) King Dermot therefore was heard in his ſuite. But, becauſe the thing, as at that time, neither ſeemed great enough, for ſuch a Prince as Henrie to vndertake directly, nor as yet was held ſufficiently diſcouered to his hand; that therefore the Ice might be broken by inferiour meanes, and aſwell the conueniences, as inconueniences, ſounded to the depth, (without engaging the roiall perſon, name, or power,) it was by the Kings letters permitted to Dermot (the exiled Prince) to draw what * aduenturers, or voluntaries, either the commiſeration of his eſtate, or other reſpects, of pietie, profit, or delight in armes, could allure to the action. Now whether it were, for that he, whoſe Countreis lay toward the coaſts of Wales, (and within ken vpon a cleere day) by commodity thereof might entertaine intelligence, aſwell as trafficke, with the inhabitants of thoſe parts; or, for that the fame of their Cheualrie did inuite; or, for that his acquaintance at his arriuall grew there firſt; or, for that theſe and many other circumſtances mette in this accident: ſure it is, that Dermot raiſed his firſt, and principall ſuccours from among the Engliſh Colonies there.

(52) The Welſh had then in their hands a valiant Gentleman of Norman race, one Robert * Fitz-Stephen, who by Gilbert de Clare was entruſted with the defence of the towne of Cardigan, but through * treachery the Towne being ſurpriſed, Robert was alſo deliuered vp to Rheſe ap Gruffin, Prince of South Wales, who would hearken to no other endentments of his liberty, but onely, that he ſhould for euer abandon his poſſeſsions in Wales. Whereupon (the oportunity of Dermots quarrel giuing hopes of new fortunes) immediately hee entred into contract with the Iriſh king, promiſing by a certaine day to come to his ſuccour, with as many Voluntaries, as his remaining fortunes, or the hope of the voiage could ſtirre: which he * did accordingly perſorme, leauing it very diſputable, whether with more ſucceſſe or courage. But Dermot well knowing that the fortunes of this Gentlemã (to whoſe valor nothing ſeemed impoſſible) were vnable to vndergo the whole weight of the vnknowne worke, had formerly dealt with that renowmed Lord, Richard of the houſe of Clare, * Earle of Pembrooke, ſurnamed Strong-bow: the man whom the Fate of Ireland did expect.

(53) Dermotes perſwaſions to the Earle were of "this kind: That the enterpriſe, beſides the faculty thereof, was full of pietie, honour, Iuſtice, "and commoditie: That it appeared ſo to King "Henry himſelfe, by whoſe leaue hee was free to "gather what forces he could: That hee was dri- "uen out by the cruell ambition of Neighbours, & "treacherie of wicked Subiects. That Leinſter "was a Kingdome, and though but a part, yet cleere- "ly the beſt and richeſt part of Ireland. That mul- "titudes offered themſelues to his aid; but his cares "were not onely for a Generall to lead them, but "for one to whom hee might leaue his kingdome alſo.

"alſo: That the Earle was he, as the onely man, in "whoſe perſon all the reſpects of birth, honour, "bounty, valour, youth and fortunes did happily "meete. That the Earle (in his conceit) did dwell "but narrowly (conſidering what hee was worthie "of) pent-vp in the ſtraights of an Earledomes ti-"tle, for whom a great Kingdome was not great. "That they who would not allow Leinſter for a "kingdome, did forget, that England once was bro-"ken into leſſer ſtates; and if Dermot were not a "King, neither then were Ella, Ciſſa, Vffa, Sigbert, "Crida, and the reſt in the Saxon ſeuen-headed go-"uernment: that the quantity of Dominion made "more or leſſe ſtrong, but not more or leſſe a "King. That he was rightfull King of Leinſter, as "Sonne and Heire to Murgh King of Leinſter: that "if hee muſt forgoe his inheritance, it ſhould be to "ſuch as had done him no wrong, and were wor-"thy of it; to Richard Strong-bow and his follow-"ers, and not to Rothericke and Rebels. That hee "was not vnking'd, though vnkingdom'd: that E-"ua his daughter (Eua the pearle and ſtarre of Ire-"land) ſhould indeed be Eua to his enemies to bring "vpon them death, and iuſt confuſion: that yet in "defeating the Tyrant Rotherick of his hopes by plā "ting Earle Richard and his Forces, hee ſhould pro-"uide for his Country, not deſtroy it. That if it did "fall out otherwiſe, yet his diſloiall people had "their iuſt deſerts, who obiecting vices to their So-"ueraigne, did themſelues commit vile treaſons. "Indeed (quoth he) I was neuer ſuch a King, as that "I was not alſo a Man. But for thoſe matters be-"tweene God and me, here is now no place to ac-"count, for though his iuſtice hath found me out, "yet his mercy hath left me more friends at home, "then the number & meaſure of my ſinnes deſerue: "My quarrell is moſt iuſt, as againſt moſt wicked re-"bels and vſurpers: Reſtore me then (my Lord) by "your puiſſance to my natiue ſoile, and my lawfull "rights therein: reſtore with me Religion and Diſ-"cipline to the ancient ſplendor thereof, which was "not greater in any Realme about vs then in Ireland; "reduce the ſtray, enlighten our ignorance, poliſh "our rudeneſſe, and let not ſuch abundant matter of "merite and immortall glory eſcape you. God him-"ſelfe will proſper the enterpriſe; holy Church hath "long ſince approued it: and vpon ſuch Authors "what can miſcarry? And though in thy noble and "Chriſtian courage nothing can weigh ſo much, "(and theſe I ſee work mightily) yet to ſatisfie all "reſpects, Thou ſhalt haue far larger territories then "here Thou canſt poſſeſſe, and goodly lands to di-"ſtribute for reward among thy friends and follow-"ers. My laſt offers now ſhall not ſhew a more de-"ſire to vſe thy forces, then a loue to thy perſon & "vertues. They are not trifles I propoſe, but that "of which God himſelfe doth ſeeme to me to haue "laid the ground; ſeeing it is his holy will that thou "at this time ſhouldſt bee without a wife. Know "thou then, that I haue that one daughter Eua, the "heire of my Crowne, and comfort of my age: let "thine owne eye tell thee how faire and worthy: "this I dare auouch, that thou wilt thinke far broa-"der ſeas wel croſt, for view of ſo honeſt beauty: ſhe "in the firſt bloſſome of her youth, a vertuous vir-"gine, and by both Parents borne of Princes, ſhall "at thine arriual, with this right hand, bee made "thine, and with her after my death, my whole "realme, and other my rights whatſoeuer: which "were they infinitely more; (deſpiſe not ſuch loue, "nor the alliance of one diſtreſſed, but neuertheleſſe "a King,) I would repute them farre too little for "ſuch a ſonne in law: who though thy ſelfe as yet "no King*, art come of Kings, and it is my whole "and laſt ambition, that I may liue to make thee "one. The Earle accepted the conditions, reſo-lute to ſet vp Dermot againe, and for that purpoſe bound himſelfe by ſolemne contract, to the full per-formance of his part within a certaine time.

(53) Dermot hauing thus negotiated his affaires and ſet it in ſo good forwardnes, while his friends in England prepared themſelues and their Forces, leſt hee ſhould ſeeme to relie vpon forraine aides, and ſo to diminiſh with them the reputation of his owne valour and alliances at home; hee ſailes backe into his Country; carrying with him the promiſes of confederates, and there both by his preſence and perſwaſions did the beſt hee could to facilitate the entrance of the Engliſh; whoſe honourable enter-tainements, deuotions, ciuility, riches, valours, wiſedome, and victorious greatneſſes he ſpared not to celebrate, as inſtruments aduancing his own de-ſignes: which raiſed no little expectation, mixt with contrary affections of deſire and feare.

(54) The next yeare, when the ſeaſon grew fit for an Army to take the field, Robert Fitz-Stephen accompanied with Maurice Fitz-Gerald his halfe brother by the ſurer ſide, & * a competent number of Souldiers, repoſing (vnder God) their chief hope in their ſwords and courages, ſet ſaile for Ireland; & in the beginning of May came on ſhore, at a place called by the Iriſh, Bann (by the Engliſh at this day commonly, Bagg and Bunn) which in our language ſignifies Sacred: a word which (ſo much as names may be preſages of things) did as it were hallow the attempt of the Engliſh with a lucky and gratious o-mination, whereof the Inhabitants at this preſent retaine this rime.

He marrieth the Lady Eua.

(57) But Dermot, Author of this calamity to his Nation, resolute in his purpose, in full complement of his Contract, doth openly in solemne maner bestow his promised daughter Eua, vpon the Conquerour in mariage, with his owne right hand giuing her in the Church: at which time, the famous Strong-bow did not celebrate his particular Wedding-day, but the indissoluble knot of the Irish allegiance to the English Soueraignetie, with the same Ring which circuled his Wiues finger, affiancing that Iland to this our Country.

Earle Richard marcheth to Dublin.

(58) The Marriage performed, it was far from the mind of the Earle to spend much time in reuels and feasts, but consults with his men of warre what was next to bee done for the setling his Father in law King Dermot, and for finishing the Conquest which was now so happily begunne, in two seuerall parts of Ireland at once. Leauing therfore a sufficient Garrison to make good the places already gaind, & to secure the lāding of fresh supplies, he sets forward with his selected Companies, to whose victorious weapons the whole Realme lay open, so farre forth, that Rotherick himself was very wel contented (notwithstanding his lately vsurped, & swelling title of Monarch of Ireland) to hold himselfe within the bogs and fastenesses of his peculiar Realme, the wild, and mountainous Connaught; meane while, Strongbow keepes on his way ouer the bosome of Ireland to the principall City therof, Dublin, taking in (as he marcheth) all the places about, and securing himselfe by pledges, of their loialty, or otherwise, as he saw most fitte. In which iourney, pleased with the delight and fertile situation of * Kildare, he resolued there to settle his abode, and to erect a seate to his posterity.

(59) The fame of these successes wafting ouer the Irish seas, and comming to the King, made him resolue to passe in person thither, that he might haue the honor of the Conquest: and not approuing such forwardnes in the Earle, who (as *some say) went against his expresse commandement, (and indeed * Giraldus, who liued at that time, cals his leaue no better then an Ironicall leaue) and for that hee knew not to what insolency such faire fortune might in time allure, as also for that they seemed to handle the Natiues too rigorously; * thereupon hee forbids by his Proclamations, any vessell to carry any thing out of his Dominions into Ireland, and commands all English to returne before Easter, and leaue off their attempts, or their estates in England should be seised for the King. By which Edict these affaires were brought into fearefull extremity, which was changed into better condition by the trauell of Herueius de Monte Marisco, on the behalfe of the Earle, and the aduenturers, who finding the King in Gloucestershire with an Army for Ireland, appeased his displeasure vpon these termes: That the King should haue the head City of the Kingdom, Dublin, with the adiacent Cantreds, with all the Coast townes and Castles, the rest to remaine to the Conquerours to hold of the King, and of his Heires, and so to bee vnder his protection, as Subiects ought, and as they were before; which subiection it seemed to the King they ment to haue renounced.

(60) The Kings goodly Nauy lay in Milford hauen, to which as hee iournied, hee thundred against the Welsh Nobility, comming to entertaine him, for suffering Strongbow to depart: At last being imbarkt, he had a faire Gale which set him safe in Ireland with all his Forces at Waterford, where first hee commits to prison Robert Fitz-Stephen, whom the Citizens presented bound, hauing held him in custody, vnder color of doing good seruice, because hee had entred Ireland without the Kings particular leaue; yet soon after the King released him, but depriued him of Weisford and the territories. Then takes he the homages of such petty Kings, and principall persons of the Irish as repaired, dismissing them in honourable sort, meaning to winne them by gentle, and not exasperating courses; and marching through Ossyrie to Dublin, he takes ô Rotherick the King of Connaughts homage by Hugh Lacie, and William Fitz-Aldelm: lastly, at Dublin he kept his Christmas in Royall state, which to behold, very many of the Irish Princes came thither.

(61) Mindfull now of his duty to God, the Iland being calme, and silent through the presence of such a mighty Monarch, the most noble King of England, and triumphator of Ireland (as* mine Author stileth him) causeth a Synode to be holden at Cassils for reformation of the Irish Church, where amongst sundry other constitutions, to which the Irish Clergy did willingly submit, it was decreed, That all the Church-lands, and their possessions should be altogether free from the exaction of secular men, & that from thenceforth, all Diuine things should be handled in euery part of Ireland in such sort, as the Church of Eng-

(62) The King continuing his politicke iealousies, and thinking Strongbow to be as yet too great, draws from his dependency Raimund, Milo Cogan, William Makarel, and other of the best Captaines, & makes them his owne by bounty. But before hee could fully establish that Kingdome (the inseparable euil fate thereof, which would neuer suffer it to enioy the blessed benefite of exact ciuility) other affaires which he esteemed more necessary, call him away, and therefore hauing left Hugh Lacie at Dublin, hee sets saile for England vpon Easter* Monday, and landed happily at Saint Dauids in Pembrokeshire, from whence with all speed hee posteth into Normandie.

The condition of his absolutions were, That hee should at his owne charge maintaine two hundreth Souldiers for an whole yeere for defence of the holy land. That he should suffer Appeales to be made freely. That hee should reuoke all customes introduced to the preiudice of the Churches liberty. That he should restore and make vp the possessions of the Church of Canterbury. That hee should freely receiue all such as were in banishment for Beckets cause, &c. Not long after Thomas was canonized by Pope Alexander, and so not onely the victorie clearely giuen him against King Henry, but a triumph also.

(64) Now beganne the wombe of rebellion, and vnnaturall conspiracies to disclose the mischiefes which were ordained to exercise this right redoubted King and Warriour, hatched here at home by the malice (some say) of Eleanor his Queene, at such time as hee was absent in Ireland, so that as * one writes writes, God ſtirred vp the Kings owne bowells againſt himſelfe. Cauſes of this vnhappie diſſention, there were many: Firſt a Queene and Wife, violentlie vindicatiue for wrong done vnto her Bed by the King, who was immoderatlie addicted to varietie of loues: then Ambition in an euill-naturd Child, and laſtlie, pernicious Actors and inſtruments, who, for their owne ends, nouriſhed this curſed miſchiefe; ſo as if we ſhould out of our ſtories recapitulate the ſeuerall occaſions taken by the ſonne againſt the father, wee ſhould rather ſhew you the colours, then the cauſes: For none of thoſe cauſes which his Son pretended, ſeemed great enough with men that feare God, to beare out ſuch continuall diuiſions as followed.

(65) The head of this conſpiracy was verie great, and iuſtly verie terrible: for on the ſide of King Henry the ſonne, there were the Kings of France and Scotland, * Richard and Geffrey, two yonger ſonnes of the King of England, whom by their mothers perſwaſions they forſooke, to follow the yongue King; Dauid the Scotiſh Kings brother, Philip Earle of Flanders, (a Peere of France, and a potent Prince,) Matthew Earle of Boloigne, Theobald Earle of Blois, Hugh Earle of Cheſter, Robert Earle of Leiceſter, Hugh Bigot Earle of Norfolke, Roger Mowbray, and other great ones, in great numbers, ſo as nothing ſeemed wanting, but onely a good cauſe, which (ſuch as it was) Queene Elianor, like an Alecto, kept aliue, ſo much as lay in her, with perpetuall fomentations. And indeed the ſcope of theſe confederats did require no leſſe a combination, it beeing to depoſe the Father, whom it pleaſed them (for countenance of their vngodly armes) to repute no King, becauſe hee had crowned his ſonne.

(66) Though nothing then could come more greeuous, to the bleeding heart of a moſt louing father, then ſuch a warre; yet not to bee vnprouided, hee (like a ſouldier) prepares himſelfe, when faire meanes faild, and found multitudes readie to liue, and die with him; the indignitie of the vnnaturall reuolt, did ſo much inflame all honeſt courages, which acknowledged him their Soueraigne.

(67) The particular accidents of the wars would fill a volume. At one time Normandie, Guien, and Britane were inuaded by the confederats in France, and at the ſame time Cumberland by the Scots. But the King of England had friends in all thoſe parts, and himſelfe hearing that Vernuil was * beſieged by the French King in perſon, hee beganne at laſt to kindle, hauing, like a ſleeping Lion, ſitten ſtill all that while, and (for that the place had, vpon parlea, agreed to render if aid came not by a day) hee arriued to their ſuccour within the time, * ſending King Lewis word that hee ſhould gette him foorth of Normandie with ſpeed, or he would without faile, come, and ſee how hee did vpon that verie day. Lewis, meaning nothing leſſe then to put his owne Crowne in danger, while he ſought one for his ſonne in law, (and therefore in all the warre-time, would neuer ſet vp his reſt vpon a battell,) but willing otherwiſe to doe to King Henrie the father, all the harme hee could, by countenancing the faction, and ſupporting the reuolted malecontents with his beſt meanes, and knowing King Henry was a ſower and terrible Prince when he came indeede to fight, immediatelie raiſed his ſiege, and with as much haſt as hee might, abandoned the place * leauing his Camp, tents, and warlike prouiſions behind, and retired into France.

(68) And though King Henrie, beginning now indeede to ſhake his dreadfull ſword, had many faire daies of his enemies, mixt with ſome loſſes both of men and other ſtrengths, though not great, nor many, in regard of the ouerthrowes which on his behalfe were giuen: For that in Britane his forces had in battell vanquiſhed Hugh Earle of Cheſter, & Ralph de Foulgiers, and ſlaine about one thouſand and fiue hundred of their army; & in England, Reignald Earle of Cornwall, and Richard de Lucie, had in bloudie battell * ouerthrowne the inſolent Earle of Leiceſter, and *entred the towne of Leiceſter by force; and that he had the perſons of the ſaid * Hugh Lupus Earle of Cheſter, Ralph de Fulgiers, and verie many other priſoners of eſpeciall note and Nobility; yet Lewis the French King mouing a parlea, the father deſirous to vſe the good fortune of war, to reclaime his rebells, was ſo willing to make peace, that hee might ſeeme to haue outgone expectation in the qualitie of his offers, but through ſuch wicked perſwaſions, as were vſed, preuailed not.

(69) A violent firebrand in this diuiſion, was Robert Earle of Leiceſter, beeing matched with a Ladie no leſſe proud, and ſtomachous then himſelfe; who at this meeting, was not contented to haue affronted King Henrie the father, on the behalfe of his yongue Lord, and Maſter the ſonne, but (after many words of reproach) is ſaid to haue laid his daring hand vpon his ſword, with purpoſe to haue ſtrucken the King, had he not been with-holden: (and where ſuch ſpirits had to doe, it is eaſie to geſſe what kinds of counſell were like to be embraced and purſued;) hauing forſaken the father, not for that the others cauſe was more honeſt, but for that (ſaith Thomas Walſingham) the father King, labouring to enlarge the regall power, ſought to ſet his foote vpon the neckes of the proud and haughtie.

(70) But God, who ment to chaſtiſe the King, and not to deliuer him vp into his enemies hands, deſtroied thoſe hopes, that mooued the ſonnes to their vnnaturall attempts; for it was not long after, when newes came into Normandy, that his faithfull friends and ſeruants, * Richard de Lucie and Humphrey de Bohun high Conſtable of England, together with the powers of Reignald Earle of Cornwall the Kings vncle, Robert Earle of Gloceſter, and William Earle of Arundell, not farre from Burie, couragiouſlie encountred with the Earle of Leiceſter, and his * Flemings, of whom aboue * fiue thouſand were ſlaine, or taken, and among the priſoners was the Earle himſelf, and * his Amazonian Counteſſe, whoſe perſons at his commandement were not long after, brought ouer into Normandie.

(71) This * great victorie and other good ſucceſſe, did ſo much aduantage the King, that Lewis beginning to diſtruſt the enterprize, ſought for ſixe monethes truce for himſelfe, and had it granted: but becauſe there were yet in England, two principall men, * the Earle of Norfolke, and Roger Mowbray, which held out; hauing Leiceſter for their Randeuou, and ſeat of warre, with no ſmall numbers of partakers, notwithſtanding that Geffrey (the Elect of Lincolne, the Kings baſe ſonne) had taken two of Mowbraies Caſtles, and done other good ſeruice for his Lord and Father, the truce ſerued the enemie for no other purpoſe but to breath, and to repaire himſelfe.

(72) The father (of whom Lewis ſaid, that, hee ſeemed not to goe, but to flie, he went with ſuch celerity from one place and Kingdome to another) in the meane while, recouers Xaintis from Richard his violent ſonne, weakning that partie by ſo much, and would haue weakned it farre more, but that aduertiſments came poſt, declaring ſuch matter, as made him ſpeede into Normandie.

(73) Thither * came vnto him out of England, Richard (the Elect of Wincheſter) ſent with all haſt by the Kings Iuſtitiaries, to lay open vnto him, the dangerous eſtate wherin the Realme at that time ſtood. For after that Philip Earle of Flanders had ſolemnelie ſworne to inuade England, in ſupportation of yongue Henries quarrell, ſundrie forces arriuing and ioining with Hugh Bigot Earle of Norfolke, had taken and ſpoiled the Citie of Norwich, and done otherwiſe much harme, whereby the yongue King and his faction had taken great encouragement, as if the die of warre were turned, and aſwell the yongue King as the Earle of Flanders, were come with forces to the Coaſts, there to tranſport for England: * Moreouer, Robert Earle Ferrers of Derby (who was faine from from the father) had ſuddenly entred vpon Nottingham, burnt the towne, beaten out the Kings Garriſon, ſlaine the people, and (enricht with ſpoile) retired to Leiceſter, whether about the ſame time, Anketill Malorie (Conſtable thereof) had alſo brought about two hundred priſoners taken at Northampton, which he (with ſlaughter of the like number of the Towns-men) had alſo ſuddenly ſurpriſed and taken: ſo that the Realme ſtood doubtfull, and in extreame perill; to the encreaſe whereof, William King of Scots (being deepe in the confederacy) inuaded England, diuiding his Forces, himſelfe with part waſting Northumberland, and Duncan (a very cruell Captaine) with the other deſtroying the weſterne Borderers.

(74) The Father wonderfully ſtirred herewith, leaues Normandy in as good aſſurance as the time would permit, and ſends before him to the Ships, Eleanor his owne Queene, and Queene Margaret his ſonnes wife, his ſonne Iohn, &c. the Earle of Leiceſter and his Counteſſe, with many other priſoners, and a mighty Armie; but the winde changing, and hee compelled to ſtay in harbour at Barbefleet in Normandy, where hee had taken ſhipping, he is ſaid (God touching his heart) to haue vttered theſe words with much remorſe, in the preſence of al; If my purpoſe in this voiage be for the peace of the Clergy and people, and if the King of heauen ſhall vouchſafe to quiet and calme theſe troubles at my arriuall, then for his mercies ſake wee beſeech him to ſend vs a proſperous winde: But if he be againſt it, and hath reſolued to viſit the Kingdome of England with the rod of his fury, let him graunt mee neuer to touch the ſhore of that Country more. His Praier thus vttred from the depth of ſoule, was ſecunded with a freſh perie of wind: whereupon ſetting ſaile, hee arriued ſafe the ſame day with all his Nauie at the Port of Hampton in England.

King Henry ſailes into Normandy.

(75) The next day he took his iourney towards Canterbury, where (as it appeareth) the reſidue of his penance enioined him at his Abſolution, was to bee performed. For, beſides the fore-mentioned conditions, the Legates enioined him (ſaith the * Author of Beckets life) ſome other thing ſecretly, which came not to our knowledge; yea the * Legates themſelues wrote in their owne letters, that hee then promiſed to do (voluntarily, if yee liſt to beleeue it) ſome things which was not fit for them to lay open in writing. And well might they be aſhamed thereof; but if it were ſo vnfit to bee written, how vnfit was it to be impoſed on ſuch a Soueraigne Prince? what it was, let * Houeden report. The King comming towards the Church, where the late Archbiſhop was buried, clad all in wollen, went three miles barefooted, inſomuch, that the very ground where hee went, was bloody, as was euidently ſeene, much bloud running from his tender feet which were cut with the hard ſtones. Neither yet was this the worſt; for after all this, He receiued Diſcipline at the hands of the Biſhops, of a great many Prieſts, and of the Monks. Geruaſius names Abbots alſo, wherby appears, that euery ſeuerall ſort were to haue a hand in that ſeruice. Mathew Paris can tell you more plainly what that Diſcipling was: viz. he receiued the Diſcipline of rods on his bare fleſh, receiuing of euery religious man, (a great multitude of them being there gathered) 3. or 5 ierkes a peece: whence we may eaſily beleeue, Baronius and his * Author ſpake within compaſſe, who acknowledge hee receiued 80. laſhes. To ſuch height was the Papall tyranny and pride grown towards thoſe, of whom God had ſaid expreſſly, Touch not mine Annointed.

(76) Yet ſome Monkes of that age, attribute the happy and great ſucceſſe which enſued, to the reconcilement which King Henry thus made with God for the bloud of Thomas, becauſe it pleaſed God to deliuer his enemy William King of Scots into the hands of his ſouldiers about that very time, & did alſo with ſtormes beat backe into France his diſobedient ſonne the young King, being now vnder ſaile for England, ſcattering the whole Fleet, and almoſt ſinking it with tempeſt.

(77) The Kings other actions till his next returne into Normandy, which was not long after, (becauſe Lewis King of France, and his ſonne in law the young King Henry, the head to which all this putrified humour drew, with the Earle of Flanders had laid a ſtrong ſiege to the City of Roan) * Thomas Walſingham comprehends in theſe few wordes; He tamed his Rebels, put his enemies to flight, ſeized on their fortreſſes. And ſo hauing in a manner miraculouſly quieted the Realme, hee takes with him the King of Scotland, the Earles of Leiceſter and Cheſter, with other his chiefe Priſoners * (whom hee afterwards firſt impriſoned at Caen in Normandy, & then at Faleis) but leauing his ſeditious wife behind him vnder ſtraight cuſtody, hee arriues with his puiſſance in Normandy, which being vnderſtoode in the Confederates Campe, the ſame * brake vp, and firſt ſetting fire on all the engines of warre, retreated into France in ſuch ſort, that the Engliſh ſouldiers laid hold vpon much munition and warlike furniture. Roger Houeden (a very ſure Author) ſaith * that the confederates had onely beſieged Roan vpon one ſide, and that Lewis hearing that the victorious King Henry was within Roan, did firſt ſend away the weake, and worſt of his Armie, and then deceiuing the Engliſh with a ſolemne promiſe of returning the next day, to enter into a conference with the King about making a finall agreement, did depart; ſo that Houeden aggrauates the diſhonour of the retreat, with the note of faith-breach.

(78) Let the greatneſſe and felicity of this King bee now but ſleightly looked vpon, and it will appeare, that no Prince of thoſe times was hitherto ſo much bound to God for manifold fauours as hee. The King and power of France, after ſo many attempts with the young King of England, and all their forces, flying at his preſence without any ſtroke ſtrucken, the valiant king of Scotland priſoner, and the chiefeſt of his Rebels vnder his foote, England aſſured, Scotland diſmaied, Ireland retained, Wales miniſtring ſouldiers, Normandy in poſſeſſion, and all the coaſting Regions, Britaine, Angiou, Poictou, Main, Tourain, Limoſin, Gaſcoign, Guien, &c. from thence as farre as the Mountaines which ſeparate Spaine from France, vnder his dominion; and the bleſſing of Peace ſhortly after enſuing, vpon ſuch termes as himſelf could reaſonably wiſh, made him like another Salomon to bee ſought vnto: his Wiſedome and Magnificence being in ſuch high credite through the Chriſtian World, that the Kings of Caſtile and Nauarre choſe him ſole Arbiter in their debate, which to both their contentment he moſt wiſely determined; and then * at one time in his Palace at Weſtminſter were ſeene together, the Ambaſſadors of Manuel Emperour of Conſtantinople, of Fredericke Emperour of Romans, of * William Archbiſhop of Triers in Germany, (a mighty Prince) of the Duke of Saxonie, and of Philip Earle of Flanders. Moreouer he had the gouernment of France for a time, the Kingdome of Ieruſalem offered him, but refuſed, and two of his daughters married to the two Kings * of Caſtile and Sicilie.

(79) There was firſt therefore a truce taken betwixt the three Kings, Lewis and the two Henries; wherein Richard (who ſtood out) was left to his Fathers proſecution, who ſeeing himſelfe thus deſtitute after many flaſhes of preparation to reſiſt, and great conflicts with himſelfe, put himſelfe moſt humbly into his Fathers mercy, and throwing himſelfe * with teares at his feet, obtained the pardon hee begd, and a full reſtitution to his moſt inward grace and fauour. A moſt chriſtan, fatherly, wiſe & happy Act; for Richard ouercome with this vnexpected and incredible goodnes, neuer deſiſted till hee had brought the young King to a finall attonement, armes being laid apart vpon all hands. The chief points of that wiſhed peace were: 1. That Henry the yong King with Richard and Geffrey his brethren ſhould returne, freed from all oathes of confederation, to the King their Fathers obedience, as to their Lord and Father. 2. That Priſoners ſhould be ſet at large without ranſome on all hands. 3. That William King of Scots, the Earle of Leiceſter and Cheſter, Ralph de Fulgiers, & other, who had compounded for their ranſome, before this concluſion, ſhould haue no benefite of this exemption. 4. That King Henry the Father ſhould take aſſurance of loialty toward him by hoſtage, or oath of ſuch as were enlarged. 5. That King Henry the ſon ſhould ratifie that Grant which his Father the King had made to his ſon Iohn, of ſome Caſtles, & yerely rents in England, &c. The Seale it ſelfe, wherwith the yong king made this mentioned Ratification, we haue here annexed.

(80) Touching King William of Scotland, his fore-mentioned compounding: our Hiſtorians all agree not, * ſome ſaying more, * ſome leſſe: but * Hector Boetius (a Scotiſh Hiſtorian of ſome credit with that Nation) writes 1. That King William was to pay 100000. l. Striueling for his ranſome, the one half in preſent coin, the other 50000 l. vpon time. 2. That for aſſurance of that ſumme the Earledomes of Northumberland, Cumberland & Huntington ſhould reſt in morgage 3. That K. William ſhould moue no warre againſt England for the retention of thoſe lands. 4. That, for the more ſecurity of the premiſſes, the Caſtles of Berwick, Edenbrough, Roxbrough & Striueling ſhould bee deliuered to the Engliſh.

(81) In the meane while, King Henry according to Couenants, diſchargeth out of captiuity nine hundred ſixty and nine men of Arms, taken in thoſe late warres; and King Henry the ſonne diſcharged aboue one hundreth; and hauing accompliſhed whatſoeuer might content or ſecure his Father, they prepared for England, where the ioious letters of their comming written by the Father, had begotten great and longing expectations in the ſubiects; which hee did, (ſaith Paris) That whom the generall danger of warre had afflicted, the common gladneſſe might recomfort. In their trauaile thitherward the confidence was ſuch vpon this freſh reconcilement, that one Chamber and table ſerued both, for whom before one Kingdome was not wide enough. They landed at * Portſmouth vpon Friday, 20. Maij, 1175.

(82) The face of England at this preſent, was like that of a quiet skie and ſea, no blaſt, no billow, no appearing ſigne of diſcontentment; which the better to continue, King Henry the Father accompanied with the King his ſonne, omitted no office of a iuſt and prudent Gouernour, viſiting a great part of his Realme in perſon, conſulting, ordering and enacting ſuch lawes and courſes, as might moſt eſtabliſh the good of Peace. Hence it came, that at London both the Kings were preſent in a Synode, in which Richard lately choſen Archbiſhop of Canterbury, did publiſh (* with the Kings aſſent) certain Canons for the better gouernment of the Church of England, beginning thus; At the true fountaine of all happy rule, that is to ſay, at the honour of God, and eſtabliſhment of Religion & Diſciplyne, &c. & amongſt the reſt, this one Canon in eſpecial words is enacted, both by authority of the King & Synode, (and indeed worthy for euer to bee in force) That euery Patrone taking reward for any preſentation, ſhould for euer looſe the Patronage thereof. And the ſame Kings not long after being at Woodſtocke, in accompliſhment of ſuch holy purpoſes, by aduiſe of the Clergy prouided men to ſuch Biſhopricks, Abbacies, and principall cures as were vacant, where King Henry the Father forgat not his true friend Iohn of Oxenford, whom he preferred to the See of Norwich.

(83) From hence comming to Yorke, he ſet thoſe parts in peace; whither William King of Scots * repairing, ſundry matters of importance were handled betweene the two Kings: as likewiſe afterward at Windſor (where the King had called a great aſſembly of the Lords Spirituall and Temporall) Rotherick King of Connaught in Ireland (at the ſuite of his Ambaſſadors, the Archbiſhop of Thuamon and Toomund, & others of that nation, ſubiects to Rotherick) was receiued into protection & fauour, and became Tributarie: K. Henry being vnwilling * to fiſh with an hooke of gold, which in warring vpon Ireland hee ſhould ſeem to do. In an other Parliament, not long after at Northampton, he cauſed England to be diuided into ſix circuits, & to each Circuit three Iuſticiars Itinerants deputed; and aſwell to giue his lawes more free paſſage, as alſo the better to ſecure himſelf he threw to the earth ſundry * Caſtles which had bin formerly kept againſt him, as Leiceſter, Huntington, Walton, Groby, Stutesbury, &c. and had the reſt both in his Engliſh and in his French Dominions committed to his diſpoſition.

(84) The young King * about theſe times diſcouered freſh alienations in his mind againſt his Father; who yet diſſembling all, did arme notwithanding vpon the defenſiue, and repleniſhed both England and Normandie with Garriſons, which drew the ſonne the ſooner to come in.

(85) But the old King not vnwilling perhaps (leſt the Brethrens concord might proue no better then a conſpiracy againſt the Father) that his warlike Children ſhould contend, * did nouriſh debate among them: Certaine it is, that to diuert the warre from himſelfe, he appeaſed his ſonne the King with an encreaſe of maintenance for himſelfe, amounting in the whole to an hundreth pounds Aniouin by the day, and ten pounds of the ſame money for his wife the Queene: and whereas Alice (daughter of Lewis then King of France, who was maried at three yeares of age to Richard (ſecond ſonne of King Henry) when hee was but ſeuen, and now demanded of King Henry the Father, to the intent that Richard her husband might enioy her, the old King who was * ſuſpected

(89) Neuertheleſſe, (the King hauing, at leſtwiſe formally, adiured the Lords to aduiſe him, that which ſhould bee moſt for his ſoules health) it was thought fit, to aid the cauſe with money, but not to emploie his perſon, nor the perſon of any child hee had, which was the Patriarcks laſt requeſt; and therupon (to the vnſpeakable griefe of the ſaid Patriarcke, and of the whole Chriſtianitie of the Eaſt) hee refuſed the ſaid Kingdome, and abandoned as noble an occaſion of immortall renowne, as euer any King of England had beene offered; but gaue leaue * to all ſuch as would, to take vpon them the Croſſe and ſerue. This Heraclius is hee who dedicated the Temple Church in London, as by this Inſcription ouer the Church doore in the Stone-worke doth appeare.

(90) Thus the ſorrowfull Patriarcke being diſmiſſed (not forgetting as * ſome doe write, to thunder againſt the King for abandoning the cauſe) brought back nothing but diſcomfort and deſpaire, the Weſterne Princes (by the Diuels malicious Arts) beeing wrapt and knotted in mutuall ſuſpitions and quarrells indetermined, whereupon ſhortly after, enſued, with the loſſe of Ieruſalem, the captiuity of Guido King thereof, and of innumerable Chriſtians beſides; whom Sultan Saladin, Prince of the Muſulmans or Saracens, to the griefe and diſgrace of all the Chriſtian world, did vanquiſh.

(91) But, King Henries mind was more fixed on ſetling the ſtate of his already-poſſeſſed Kingdomes, and therefore in a great Parlament, held at Oxford, (vnto which came Rheſus and Dauid, Kings of South-Wales and North-Wales, with other their chiefe Nobles, which al did there ſweare fealtie to the King) he beeing deſirous to aduance his ſonne Iohn (whom he exceedingly loued, and commonly in ſport, hee called Sans-terre) hauing aſſured vpon him certaine Lands and Rents in England and Normandie, did there verie ſolemnly giue him alſo the title & Kingdome of Ireland; for, (beſides the foreſaid Bull of Pope Adrian the fourth, who for ſigne of inueſtiture had alſo ſent a * ring of gold, which were laid vp in the Records at Wincheſter) Giraldus (who liued in that age) tells vs (to omitte what hee writes of one Gurguntius) that Guillomar King of Ireland, was tributarie to the famous Arthur: that Baion (whence (ſaith hee) the Iriſh came) was at that preſent vnder King Henrie the ſecond; and that the Iriſh Princes had voluntarily ſubmitted themſelues, as vnto him who by the * Law of a Seciall warre, was become their Soueraigne. But that Author had not ſeene belike, or did not remember (when thus he went about to prooue a legall right in the King) what others write of * Egfrides vngodly ſpoiles in Ireland, or of * Edgars Charter, in which is ſaid to bee contained, that he had vnder his rule the chiefe City of Ireland Dublin, and the greateſt part of the kingdome alſo. But King Henrie ſtrengthening his other rights with Grants of the Popes, Adrian, and Alexander, obtained alſo of Vrban the third (for Lucius the third, who was Alexanders ſucceſſor, would not gratifie the the King therein) that it ſhould bee lawfull for him, to crowne which of his ſonnes hee would, King of Ireland, to whom hee ſent a crowne of Feathers wouen with gold, in all their Grants reſeruing to the Ro- man See, the Peters pence, and rights; whereupon the King gaue the ſame to his ſonne Iohn, whoſe Coronation (ſtung with the like before) his father onely did delay, at ſuch time as two Cardinales offered to celebrate that ſolemnitie.

(92) At Windſor, therefore his father giuing him the * Order of knight-hood (at which time hee was about * twelue yeeres old) ſent him foorthwith into Ireland, where the Arch-biſhop of Dublin and the State, entertained him, but (by reaſon of ſuch parſimonie toward his ſouldiers as was vſed) hee returned the ſame yeere without doing much, but not without hauing waſted the moſt part of his Armie, in skirmiſhes with the Iriſh. His Stile in his ſeale of Ireland (though Houeden ſaith, his father made him Regem, a king) was onely, Sigillum Iohannis filij regis Angliæ Domini Hibernia, Lord of Ireland.

(93) King Henrie, hearing now that his martiall ſonne, Earle Richard, had fortified in Poictou againſt him, and vanquiſhed Geffrey Earle of Britane, * prepares a puiſſant armie, vpon terror whereof, Richard came in, rendring vp Poictou to his mother Elienor, (whoſe inheritance it was) at his fathers commandement. The ſame yeere wherein the Weſt was thus defiled with vnnaturall diuiſions, the Eaſt was likewiſe polluted with the curſed Apoſtaſie of one Richard de S. Albane (whom wee ſhame to thinke, was Engliſh) who renouncing the Chriſtian beleefe (vpon the Patriarcks diſcomfortable returne) became a principall Commander vnder the Sultan of Babilon, Salandine, whom the Chriſtians draue, with loſſe and ſlaughter of his armie, from Hieruſalem. But on the other ſide, reuenge of diſobedience ſtill purſued Geffrey, ſonne of King Henrie, who was in a * Torneament at Paris troden to death vnder the horſe feete. A miſerable end, and a fearefull.

(94) About which times, betweene the French and Engliſh all things ſtoode vnſure, now warre, then peace, and warre againe, by reaſon that Philip (who had been crowned King ſome yeeres before, during the life of Lewis) challenging the cuſtodie of Arthur, the Poſthumus ſonne, and heire of Geffrey Earle of Britane, and ſometimes one thing, and ſometime another, could not haue his will: Whiles Earle Richard turning to Philip againſt his Father, but obtaining a truce for two yeeres, ſuch amity (if there be any amity among mighty Princes) grew between king Philip and Earle Richard, Heire apparant of England and Normandy, &c. that one bed and boord ſerued both. The Father perplexed, cals his ſonne home, who pretending many griefes, as the detention of Alice his Spouſe, the doubt of diſinheriſon, and other things, ſtood out againe; and againe after a while ſubmits to his Father. Then burſts forth Philip into Armes; and things ſo ſtanding, the heauy newes of Ieruſalem loſt, flew into Chriſtendom. When this City was formerly recouered by Godfrey of Bolein, an Vrban was Pope, a Fredericke was Emperour, an Heraclius Patriarch; ſo now when it was loſt, an Vrban was Pope, a Fredericke was Emperor, and an Heraclius Patriarch.

(95) Vpon theſe news Henry and Philip meet, and for the honour of God, laying downe diſpleaſure, in preſence of William Archbiſhop of Tyre, at which time ſome ſay a Croſſe appeared in the aire, take vpon them, as Souldiers of Chriſt, the badge of the Croſſe, and there the better to diſtinguiſh themſelues, it was agreed that the * French ſhould weare read Croſſes, the Engliſh White, and the Flemiſh Greene. And this determination was ſeconded with warlike preparations, leuies of money, and inſtitution of martiall Diſcipline: all which notwithſtanding nothing went forward.

(96) At Richard began the breach of this honourable confederation, who taking reuenge vpon certaine Rebels of his in Poictou, who brooked not his hard hand; one miſchiefe drew another, and at the laſt both the Kings of England and France became parties to the quarrell, greatly againſt the minde of K. Henry, whoſe heart was firmely ſetled (as it ſeems) to reuenge the cauſe of Chriſt vpon Sultan Saladine: for that in his * anſwere to the Patriarch of Antioch, "imploring aide, he concludes, That among o-"ther Princes himſelfe; and ſonne, reiecting this "worlds glory, and deſpiſing all pleaſures whatſoe-"uer, and ſetting behind, all things which were of "this World, would in their owne perſon with "their whole Forces by the fauour of the Lord "ſpeedily viſite him. And ſure the ſtate of thoſe parts required it, Saladine hauing ſlaine many of the Knights Templars, and Nobles, and aboue thirty thouſand footmen, with innumerable other in Cities and Townes by him ſubdued. Among all which grieuous accidents, we cannot (to ſeaſon ſower therby with ſweet) omit one noble proteſtation made by the chiefe croſſed Lords, Philip Earle of Flanders, the Earle of Bloys and other, who being required to "take parts, made anſwere; That they would not "contrary to their promiſe to God, put armour on, "againſt any Chriſtian, till they had done their de-"uoire againſt Saladine.

(97) In the treaties therefore between Henry and Philip; the demaunds of Philip on the behalfe of Richard were ſuch, and ſo vnſafe for the King (as that all his ſubiects ſhould ſweare fealty to Richard during the Fathers life; but yet reſeruing their allegiance to the Father) that Richard apparantly fell off, and became Liegeman for Normandy, &c. to Philip King of France; and at a new Treaty (by mediation of a Cardinall Legate) the demaunds of Philip being more hard then before, as that King Henry ſhould not onely ſettle the Kingdome vpon Richard, but take Iohn alſo with him into Paleſtine, or that otherwiſe Richard would not goe (being iealous of his brothers grace with his Father): Henrie would conſent to none of thoſe inſolent propoſitions, but diſdaining to ſeeme to be enforced, they betooke them ſelues on all ſides to their ſwords.

(98) The effect whereof was, that former good fortunes forſaking King Henry, hee ſuſtained many loſſes by the Armies of King Philip and Richard, & was driuen out of Mentz in Main; (the city where he was born, & which he loued aboue all other places) by firing of the Suburbes before the enemy came, being caſually conſumed, hee was glad to yeeld to ſuch conditions as it pleaſed Philip to preſcribe. It is written * that at the meeting of theſe two Kings, the skie being cleare, a thunderbolt ſtroke betweene them, and after a little pauſe comming together againe, it thundered more terribly, ſo that Henry had falne off his horſe, but that his people ſuſtained him; whereupon hee came preſently to an end, though it were to his vnſpeakable griefe; his Kingly heart being vſed to giue, and not to take conditions.

(99) Fearefull was the ſpeech which King Henrie, when hee abandoned Mentz by reaſon of the fire, "vttered againſt Richard; which was, That ſith he "had taken from him that day the thing that hee "moſt loued in this world, he would requite him, "for after that day hee would depriue him of that "thing which in him ſhould beſt pleaſe a Child, to "wit, his Heart. But after the peace concluded, (vpon mediation) between the ſides, another thing ſtrucke neerer; for finding the name of his ſonne Iohn firſt in the Catalogue of the Conſpirators againſt him in that action, hee bitterly curſed the howre of his birth, laying Gods curſe and his vpon his ſonnes, which hee would neuer recall, for any perſwaſion of the Biſhoppes and others: but comming to Chinon fell there grieuouſly ſicke, and feeling death approch, hee cauſed himſelfe to be borne into the Church before the Altar, where after humble confeſſion, and ſorrow for his ſinnes, hee departed this life.

(100) It ſhal not (in contempt of humane glory) be forgotten, that this puiſſant Monarch being dead his people preſently left him, and fell to ſpoile all he had, leauing him naked; of whom * one ſaith trulie "and

Neither muſt it be vnremembred, that the fierce and violent Richard (now heire of all) comming to meete his Fathers body, roially adorned for the buriall according to the Maieſtie of his eſtate; the very Corſe (as it were abhorring and accuſing him for his vnnaturall behauiours) guſhed forth bloud; whereat Richard pierced with remorſe, melted into flouds of teares in moſt humble and repentant maner, attending vpon the remaines of his vnfortunate Father to the Graue.

He was buried at Fontencrard.

His Wife.

(101) Eleanor, the Wife of King Henry, was the eldeſt of the two Daughters, and the ſole Heire of William Duke of Aquitaine, the fift of that name, & the ninth in ſucceſsion, ſonne of Duke William the fourth, her Mother was Daughter to Raimund Earle of Tholouſe, and her great Dowrie was motiue firſt to King Lewis, (who had two daughters by her, Mary and Alice) and after to King Henry, to marry her. There are of the * French Hiſtorians who report that king Henry had a former wife, and that ſhee bare vnto him Prince Henry: but Writers of our owne affaires (and * ſome alſo of the French,) acknowledge but onely Eleanor for his Wife. Certain it is, that king Henries times were much famouſed by two Women of much differing qualities; the one was his renowmed Mother Matildis, whoſe Epitaph thus compriſed part of her glory:

* Serres in Lewis the yonger.

* Paulus Aemylius in Ludouic. 7. who calls her Leonora,

Ortu magna, viro maior, ſed maxima prole:
Hic iacet Henrici Filia, Sponſa, Parens.

Here Henries Mother, Daughter, wife doth reſt:
By Birth, much; more, by Spouſe; by Child, moſt bleſt.

The other was this Eleanor his Wife; the firſt cauſe of theſe bloudie Warres, which long after continued as hereditary betwixt England and France, yea and the bellows of that vnnaturall diſcord, betwixt her husband and his ſonnes. Shee much out-liued her husband (as a bad thing ſtickes longeſt) beeing ſo happie as to ſee three of her ſonnes, aduanced to the Crowne, and ſo vnhappie as to ſee two of them in their graues: for ſhe liued till King Iohns time.

His Iſſue.

(102) William, the eldeſt ſonne and firſt child of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor his wife, was borne before his father was King, and while hee was but Duke of Normandy, in the eighteenth yeere of the raigne of King Stephen, 1152. and the fourth yeere after, (his father beeing then King, and in the ſecond yeere of his raigne) the Nobilitie of England ſware vnto him their fealtie, as to the heire apparant of the Kingdome, at the Caſtle of Wallingford in Barkeſhire; but he deceaſed the yeere following, being the third of his fathers raigne, and the fift of his owne age 1156. He was buried in the Monaſtery of Reading at the feete of his great Grandfather, King Henrie the firſt.

(103) Henrie, the ſecond ſonne of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor, beeing borne the laſt of Februarie 1156. was their heire apparant, after the death of his brother William; was Duke of Normandie, Earle of Anion and Maigne; and was crowned King of England, at Weſtminſter, by Roger Arch-biſhop of Yorke, the fifteenth of Iulie 1170. His wife was Margaret, daughter of Lewis the Yonger, King of France, married to him at Nuburgh in Normandy, the ſecond of Nouember 1160. crowned Quene at Wincheſter, by Rotrocke of Warwicke Arch-biſhop of Roan, the 21. of Nouember 1163. and ſuruiuing him was remarried to Bela, King of Hungarie: He died without iſſue, before his father, at Marcell in Touraine, the eleuenth of Iulie, the twentie ſixe yeere of his fathers raigne 1182. and was buried in the Church of our Lady at Roan.

(104) Richard, the third ſonne of King Henrie, and Queen Eleanor, was born at Oxford, (in the Kings Pallace there, called Beau-Mount,) in September the fourth yeere of his fathers raigne 1157. He proued a Prince of great valor, and was therefore ſurnamed in French Cuer-de-Lion; in Engliſh Lions-Heart: hee was created Earle of Poytou, and had the whole Dutchie of Aquitaine, for which he did his homage to King Lewis the Yonger of France, in the eighteenth yeere of his fathers raigne 1170. yet afterward he conceiued ſome diſcontentment againſt his father, and maintained warres vpon him, but was reconciled againe into his loue, and ſucceeded him in his Kingdome.

Reſus w... alij.

(105) Geffrey, the fourth ſonne of King Henrie, and of Queene Eleanor, was borne the twentie third of September, in the fifth yeere of his fathers raigne 1159. Hee married Conſtance daughter and heire of Conan Duke of Britane, and in her right was Duke of Britane, and did his homage to his brother Henry for the ſame Dutchie, and receiued the homages of the Barrons of the ſame: hee died at Paris, in the thirtie two yeere of his fathers raigne 1186. the nineteenth of Auguſt, and is buried in the quire of our Ladies Church there: hee had iſſue Arthur Duke of Britane, borne after his fathers deceaſe, the heire apparant of King Richard, and by ſome ſuppoſed to bee made away by King Iohn; and alſo Eleanor called the Damſell of Britane, who died in priſon in the raigne of King Henrie the third.

(106) Philip, the fifth ſonne of King Henrie, and Queene Eleanor, may bee miſtruſted, to be miſtaken by Antiquaries of our time, as miſunder-ſtanding the ancient writers, who mentioning the birth of Philip the Kings ſonne, might by good likelihood, be thought to meane, Philip ſonne of Lewis the Yonger King of France, who was borne about this time, and was after King of the ſame Countrey. But M^r Thomas Talbot, an exact trauailer in genealogies, hath not onely ſet him downe in this place, amongſt the children of this King, but alſo warranteth the ſame, to bee done with good authoritie: howſoeuer, it is apparant, his life was verie ſhort.

(107) Iohn, the ſixth and yongeſt ſonne of King Henrie, and Queene Eleanor, was borne in the thirteenth yeere of his fathers raigne, in Anno 1166. hee was ieſtinglie ſurnamed by his father Sans-terre, in Engliſh without Land, becauſe hee was borne laſt, as if there had beene nothing left for him: Notwithſtanding ſoone after, hee was created Earle of Mortaigne, and had more-ouer by degrees, the Earledomes of Cornwall, and Gloceſter, the Counties of Derby and Lancaſter, the Honors of Wallinford and Nottingham, the Caſtles of Tikhill, Marlborow, and Ludgarſall, with many other great Seigniories, and (aboue them all) was alſo Lord of Ireland, and at the laſt ſucceeded his brother Richard in all his Dominions and was King of England.

(108) Maud, the eldeſt daughter of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor, borne in the third yeere of her fathers raigne, married to Henrie, ſurnamed the Lion Duke of Saxonie; Lothar that died yong, Otho the fourth German Emperour, and William borne at Wincheſter, progenitor of the Dukes of Brunſwicke, who bare for their Armes, the Coat of England, with the two Lions, as King Henrie his Grandfather bare, before the match with Queene Eleanor, and Maud married to Geffrey Earle of Perch: Shee ſuruiued him, and died in the firſt yeere of the raigne of her brother King Richard, and was buried by her husband, in the Church of S. Blaſe at Brunſwicke.

(109) Eleanor, the ſecond daughter of King Henrie, and Queene Eleanor, was borne at Roan in Normandy, in the eight yeere of her fathers raigne, 1162. She was married to Alfonſe, the ninth of that name, ſurnamed the Good, King of Caſtile in Spaine, and had iſſue by him Sanches, that died in his infancie: Ferdinando dinando that died in his youth, Henry King of Castile after his Father, Blaunch Queene of France, wife to King Lewis the 8. and mother of Saint Lewis. Berengar married to Alfonso king of Lion: Vrraca Queene of Portugall, and Eleanor wife of Iames king of Arragon.

(110) Ioane, the third and yongest daughter of king Henry, and Queene Eleanor his wife, was born at the City of Angiers in France, in the moneth of October, the 13. yeare of her Fathers raigne, which was the yeere of our Lord, 1166. when shee was eleuen yeeres of age; shee was with great honour conueied to the City of Palermo, and there married to William the second of that name, king of Sicil, Duke of Apulia, and Prince of Capua, vpon Sunday the 13. day of Februarie, 1177. and was crowned Queene the same day at the same place. Shee had a sonne by him named Boamund, whom his Father when hee was returned from his Christning, created Duke of Apulia: but the child died first, and the Father after, leauing no issue. And she suruiuing, married againe, and was the third wife of Raimund the fourth of that name, Earle of Tholouz, by him shee had Issue Raimund the last Earle of that house, Bertrand Lord of Branquell, Montelore, and Saluiac, and a daughter married to Berald of Elbeine, Prince of Orenge.

His Naturall Issue.

(111) William the Naturall sonne of king Henry, born of Rosamund, the daughter of Walter Lord Clifford; which Lady for her incomparable beauty was reputed (with allusion to her name) Rosa-mundi, the Rose of the world: the deare affection the king bare her, caused both burning iealousie in the Queene, and fatall ruine to her selfe, albeit the amorous king, for her secresie and security, (but what walles will not a iealous eye pierce through?) had built for her a most artificiall Labyrinth at Woodstocke in Oxfordshire, with such cunning windings and intricate passages, as had not Fate, and Heauens reuenge on Adultery, shewed the way, the enraged Queen had not so soone beene rid of her Riuall, nor that wanton Dame of her life. Shee was buried in the Nunnery of Godstow by Oxford with this Epitaph.

Hac iacet in Tumba Rosa mundi, non Rosa munda;
Non redolet, sed olet, quæ redolere solet.
(Rose,
This Tombe doth here enclose the Worlds most beauteous Rose, passing sweet ere while, Now nought but odour vile.

But Hugh (called the Saint) Bishop of Lincolne, thought the Hearse of a Harlot no fit spectacle for a Quire of Virgins to contemplate, & therefore himselfe in person caused her bones to be cast foorth of the Church; which yet those chast sisters afterward recollected, and placed there againe with much honour, erecting a goodly Crosse, thus inscribed to the honour of her memory:

Qui meat hac, oret, Signumque salutis adoret,
Vtq; tibi detur requies Rosamunda, precetur.

All you which passe this way, This Crosse adore, and pray,
That Rosamunds Soule may True rest possesse for aye.

The first Sonne which by her King Henry had, was the said William, surnamed in French, Longespee, in English, Long-Sword. He was Earle of Salisburie, in right of Ela his Wife, Daughter and heire of William Earle of that County, son of Earle Patrick, by whom hee had Issue William Earle of Salisbury, Stephen Earle of Vlster, Ela Countesse of Warwicke, Ida Lady Beucham of Bedford, and Isabell Lady Vescie: his sonne Earle William the second, had Earle William the third, Father of Margaret, Wife of Henry Lacie Earle of Lincolne: hee died in the Castle of old Salisbury, and was buried in the Cathedrall Church of the New City, in the ninth yeare of the raigne of king Henry the third.

(112) Geffrey an other Naturall sonne of king Henry, was borne of the Lady Rosamund aforesaid: This man in his tender youth, was (by his Fathers procurement) made Archdeacon of Lincolne, and after Bishop of that See, which hee held aboue seauen yeeres without consecration: and then resigning it, in the yeare, 1181. into the hands of Richard Archbishop of Canterbury, and his Father; hee was made Chancellour of England, and afterward by his brother king Richard, hee was aduanced to the Archbishopricke of Yorke, (being consecrated at Tours in France, An. 1191.) which See he gouerned with good approbation. But in the time of his Brother King Iohn, hee vnderwent many difficulties, by opposing the Kings purposes, who therefore made seisure of his whole state, and An. 1207. he left the Land and after fiue yeeres banishment, died, viz. Ann. 1213.

(113) Morgan, an other Naturall sonne of King Henry, is thought by * some (because so small mention is made of him) to haue beene of no long life after his birth, and to haue beene borne of some woman in Wales, where this Christian name is most commonly vsed, and whither this King vpon many occasions, sometimes resorted. But * some others (whose studious paines, deserue much thankes of posteritie) report, that hee was gotten on the wife of one Rodulph Bloeth (or Blewet) a knight, and liued both to bee Prouost of Beuerley, and to be elected to the Bishopricke of Durham, when comming to Rome for a dispensation (because his Bastardie made him otherwise vncapable) the Pope willed him to professe himselfe Blewets lawfull son, and not the Kings Naturall, promising to consecrate him on that condition: but he, vsing the aduise of one William Lane his Clerke, told the Pope, that for no worldly promotion, he would renounce his father, or deny himselfe to bee of roiall bloud: so blind were some Prelats of those times, who esteemed spirituall functions, to be but worldly promotions.

CHAPTER VI.

An.D.1199 King Richard orders his estate.

RICHARD succeeding to his deceased Father Henrie, brought forth that wonder, which a Writer ofthat age thus celebrated,

Mira cano; Sol occubuit, Nox nulla secuta est.

A Wonder strange I write, the Sundid set, yet was no Night.

Meaning, that though Henry were dead, yet the glory and happinesse of the land was not thereby clouded, for that Richard was another Sunne, and in some respects farre the more bright, and farther shining of the two; as hauing for honour of Christian Chealrie, wholy consecrated his warlike minde and actions to the seruice of God, and readuancement of the Crosse of Christ, dishonoured by the Infidels in Asia: in which enterprise hee was so feruently zealous, that from the time of his Fathers death (in whose vowes it had beene) hee meditated scarse any thing else, disposing the affaires of his Estate (but not * carelesly, as some would impose) as of things which did but onely vnder-serue, and conduce to the maine and principall end of aduancing his Sauiours glory, whereunto hee iudged that action did tend.

(3) And though before his Coronation, most Writers doe not call him a King; yet sure it is, that he

he and others did immediately, and vnqueſtionably, vpon the firſt accruement of the intereſt, (which was at his Fathers laſt gaſpe) exerciſe all the offices of the roiall power; for ſo hee reſtored Robert Earle of Leiceſter to his whole eſtate: So plaine it is, that our Gouernment allowes not the dangerous conuulſions, & emptie ſpaces of an Interregnum, ſuch as in meer electiue States are cõmon, if not continual.

(4) But in nothing more could this noble Prince ſhew his iudgement (though he were otherwiſe * Sagacis ingenij, of a ſharpe and ſearching wit) then in this: That hee baniſhed from his familiarity, & (as my Author ſaith) hated all thoſe of what profeſſion ſo euer they were, who had forſaken his Father, and both retained, and enricht thoſe other, who had loially ſtood for him againſt himſelfe in al aſſaies.

(5) At his Coronation, which was moſt magnificently performed at Weſtminſter, by * Baldwyne Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the pointes of the Oath which hee made to God, and the Kingdom of England, at the Altar vpon the holy Euangeliſts, before the Prelates, Nobles, and whole people, * were theſe: 1. That all the daies of life he would beare peace, honour, and reuerence to God, and holy Church and the Ordinances thereof: 2 That in the people to him committed, hee would exerciſe right, iuſtice, and equitie. 3. That hee would blot forth naughty lawes, and peruerſe cuſtomes, if any were brought vpon his Kingdome; and would enact good lawes, and the ſame in good faith keepe, and without mal-Engyn. Which oath being moſt ſolemnly taken, and the ſacred vnction performed; the Archbiſhop ſtanding at the Altar forbad him, on the behalfe of Almighty God, to aſſume that honour, vnleſſe hee had a full purpoſe to keepe what hee had ſworne: whereto Richard aſſenting, and with his owne hands, humbly taking the ponderous Crowne Imperiall from off the Altar, in ſignification, as is probable, that hee held it onely from God; hee deliuers it to the Archbiſhop, who thereupon accompliſhed all the Ceremonies of Coronation.

(6) Which Act was accidently hanſeld, and auſpicated with the bloud of many Iewes (though vterly againſt the Kings will) who in a tumult (raiſed by the * Ocean) were furiouſlie murthered, which (though it were afterward puniſhed by the Lawes) might ſeeme a preſage, that this Lion-hearted King (as his by-name Ceur-de-Lion did import) ſhould bee a ſpeciall deſtroier of the Enemies of our Sauiour.

(7) After counſell therefore (firſt moouer in all worthy enterpriſes) Money was in his firſt, and chiefeſt cares; for raiſing whereof, to furniſh the intended pilgrimage, he ſold, morgaged, eſtated, and (by a thouſand princely skills) as if he ſhould neuer haue come againe, added incredible heapes to thoſe huge ſums, which hee had ſcruzed out of Stephen de Turpham, his fathers Treaſurer (amounting to eleuen hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, if ſome ſay true) all hoorded by King Henry. What could indeed be ſaid enough for ſuch a voiage? and it was a cogitation woorthy ſo glorious a purpoſe, ſo to order his eſtate, as if hee were not to returne at all; becauſe, looking-backe doth vnbend and ſoften reſolutions.

(8) As for men and ſoldiers, the Prelats, Friars, and other Preachers, had ſtirred vp innumerable, by their manifold exhortations (the Arch-biſhoppe of Canterburie hauing * trauailed through Wales in perſon for that purpoſe, going afterward with the King to Paleſtine, where alſo * he died) in pulpits and priuate conferences, ſounding nothing but the Croſſe and Paſſion of Chriſt, calling the world to reuenge his cauſe vpon the Pagans, and ſetting ſoules on fire with vehement geſtures, actions, and perſwaſions. But the kingdome of England he ordered thus.

(9) The onely maine danger of the State in his abſence, was in his brother Iohn Earle of Mortone, of whoſe ambition hee was ſomewhat iealous, as * knowing that King Henrie, not long before his death, had intended the Crowne to him: to conquer therefore his appetites, with bountie, and munificence; and to take away all murmuration in him, for want of Princelie competencies, King Richard did as it were ſhare the Realm with him, giuing him ſixe Earledomes, Cornwall, Dorſet, Sommerſette, Nottingham, Derby, and Lancaſter, beſides Caſtles, Honors, Manors, Foreſts, and much other riches, and finallie, the Earledome of Gloſter, with the Heire of that Countie to bee his Wife, though the Arch-biſhop of Canterburie forbad the Nuptialls, alledging ſhee was within degrees of conſanguinitie.

(10) But leſt, through euill nature or aduiſe, Earle Iohn ſhould conuert thoſe ſo great gifts to the ſubuerſion of the beſtower, Hee entruſted him with no part of the Regall power, as the Key, and ſecret of his proper ſafetie: but laide the maine burthen of Gouernment vpõ William Longchamp Biſhop of Ely, * chiefe Iuſtitiar, and Lord Chancellor of England, and Papall Legate, (a perſon out of all ſuſpition for aſpiring to the Crowne) whereby was conferred vpon him, whatſoeuer either King or Pope could grant, for accompliſhment of his authoritie; ſo that he might well be ſtiled * Prince and Prieſt of England; as hee was one, the moſt powerfull ſubiect for the time, that perhaps this Realme hath had: for, though the King had (as it were) ioined with him in Commiſsion, one Hugh Biſhop of Durham, for the parts of England beyond Humber; yet, as it * happned in the Conſulſhip of Caſar and Bibulus, that nothing was reported of Bibulus, but all of Caſar, ſo did Longchamp in a ſhort time eaſilie make himſelfe ſole and abſolute, his ſway burying in ſilence, the name, and endeauours, of his Colleague.

(11) Thus the ſumme of commaund, or the Souereigne power it ſelfe, was in the Chancellor as Viceroy, but for defence and preſeruation of his iuſtice, hee * did ſubordinate or aſſociate to thoſe Biſhops, William Earle of Arundell, Hugh Bardolfe, William Marſhall, Geffrey Fitz-Peter, William Bruuer, Robert de Whitfield, Roger Fitz-Remfrey, wherein hee did ſhew his loue and care of the Engliſh Nation, as alſo of Iuſtice it ſelfe: for that many of theſe, were of the moſt honourable Peeres of the Land (and not men bred-vp or formerly enured to make Iuſtice, or their owne Tongues venall, for a fee:) honour beeing the rule of their proceedings, and ſtrength of priuate fortunes, with their Princes fauour, the pillar to ſuſteine that honor.

(12) There remained to prouide for (before hee left England) the neighbour-hood of Scotland and Wales, which might otherwiſe make vſe of his abſence to his preiudice: But Rheſe ap Gruffith (of whom there is extant a ſhort but elegant Panegyris) Prince of South-Wales (beeing already in amitie) came as farre as Oxford toward him; but becauſe the King (who was there) came not in perſon to meete him (as his father King Henrie had done) the Prince (notwithſtanding Earle Iohn the Kings only brother, had conducted him from the Marches with ſpeciall honor) tooke it in ſo high ſcorne and indignation, (for euen the meaneſt, from whom ſeruice or loue is expected, will againe expect regard) that hee foorthwith returned into his Countrey, without once ſaluting the King; who by this neglect, loſt Rheſes loue, as, vpon the like omiſſion, and vnreſpectiueneſſe, Auguſtine (the too ſupercilious Monke) did leeſe the affections of the Monkes of Bangor, Rheſes owne countrie-men, in another part of Wales.

(13) As for william King of Scots (a verie worthie Prince) hee iourneied hither to King Richard into England, and heere concluded a firme friendſhip, which hee kept verie religiouſly, euen in the greateſt troubles of King Richard, to the glorie of himſelfe and his Nation, and as ſome write, ſent his Brother Dauid with 5000. Scots, to ſerue him in the ſacred warres. The chiefe points of their conuention were. 1. That for ten thouſand Markes Sterling, (then paid

(14) The State of England being thus in the maine, and other meane points eſtabliſhed, King Richard croſt the Seas into France to Philip king therof, according to appointment, that from thence, with minds & forces vnited, they might ſet forward vnder the Enſigne of the Croſſe; which after ſome ſtay (occaſioned by the* death of the French Queen) they did, vpon theſe Chriſtian and friendly termes; 1. That each of them preſerue the others honour, and beare faith to him for life, and member, and earthly dignity. 2. That neither of them ſhall faile the other in their affaires; but that the King of France ſhall helpe the King of England to defend his land, euen as hee would defend the City of Paris, if it were beſieged; and Richard King of England, ſhall helpe the King of France to defend his land, euen as he would defend his City Roan if it were beſieged. This * being fairely engroſt, and afterward ratified with oath, and ſent by the kings themſelues in perſon, the Earles and Barons ſware in ſolemne manner, that they would not treſpaſſe againſt their fealty, nor ſtirre any warre in either of the kings Dominions, ſo long as they were in that pilgrimage: on the other ſide, the * Archbiſhops and Biſhops did firmly promiſe (in verbo veritatis, in the word of truth) that they would accurſe and excommunicate al ſuch as did tranſgreſſe this agreement.

(15) Thus (after ſome neceſſary ſtaies) theſe two the greateſt Monarks of the Weſt, ſet forward ouer land (toward the publike ſeruice of Chriſtianity) with ſuch numbers as thēſelues thought beſt; which were ſo great, that hauing aduanced (not without ſome little loſſe of people by the * fall of the Bridge ouer the riuer Rhene at Lions, which brake by reaſon of the throng) beyond the ſaid violent ſtreame, they parted company; Philip paſſing ouer the Alpes into Italy, and Richard to the Sea-ſide at Marſilia, there to meete with his Nauie, which being compact of all the chiefe Ships in England, Normandy, and other his French Dominions, was there appointed to attend.

(16) But the voiage being very long, and King Richard comming to the Port before his Fleet, after eight daies expectation there, waxing impatient of delay, embarkt himſelfe * in twenty hired Gallyes, and ten great hulkes or Buſſes (a kind of ſhipping as it ſeemes peculiar then to the Mediterranean ſeas) and ſet ſaile toward Meſſana in Sicilia, the Rendeuow of both the kings and of their Armies: in which paſſage, lying at Anchor (on occaſion,) in the mouth of the riuer Tyber not far from Rome, * Octauianus, the Biſhoppe of Hoſtia repaired vnto him, deſiring him in the Popes name, that hee would viſite his Holineſſe; which the King denied to do, laying to the Popes charge many ſhamefull matters touching the Romiſh Simony, and Couetouſneſſe, with many other reproaches, alleadging that they tooke 700. Markes for conſecration of the Biſhoppe of Mains, 1500. Markes for the Legatiue power of William Biſhop of Ely; but of the Archbiſhop of Burdeaux an infinite ſumme of money: whereupon hee refuſed to ſee Rome. Thus (after ſundry accidents and commings on land) hearing that his Nauy was ſafe, he *ſtaied for them by the way, and then came to anchor not long after (to wit, 23. of September) before the City of Meſſana, with ſo great a ſhew of power, and ſound of Warlike Inſtruments, and other ſignes of Maieſty, in the ſight of Philip and his French, and of many other Nations there aſſembled, that it ſtroke horror into the Inhabitants, (ſaith Houeden) and moued no ſmall enuy in the hearts of his confederates.

(17) From this time forward, as it may ſeem (the Enemy of Concord feeding the maleuolent paſſions of men with perpetuall matter of debate) the king of France was neuer truly king Richards friend in heart, but vpon the ſame day (whither ſtreightned in prouiſions or otherwiſe) hee left the king of England; but by contrary wind was driuen backe before night, where (after many troubles and quarrels betweene the Engliſh and Sicilians) the two kings peaced againe, and ſetled a new & as firme a league, as they could, during that martiall pilgrimage.

(18) Tancred was at that time king of Sicilia by vſurpation, after the death of William, who had married Ioan ſiſter of king Richard, whom (at that time vpon diſpleaſure and quarrell being priſoner) Tancred ſet at liberty, ſending her in honourable manner to her brother, and did yeeld to ſundry Articles, and alſo preſent paiments of ample ſummes. Feare wrought on both parts; for Richard being among ſtrangers, and not very ſure of the French, ſeiſed vpon a ſtrength of the Griffons (people much redoubted in thoſe parts, till the arriuall * of the Engliſh) & in a tumult tooke the City of Meſſana it ſelfe, where he diſplaied his Enſignes, till for the French Kings loue hee was content to diſaduance them, and to entruſt the City to the Knights Templars and Hoſpitalers, vntill Tancred had fulfilled all ſuch things as Richard did challenge to bee due, being many.

(19) Vpon great deliberation therefore, the Sicilan King made anſwere, that hee had already paide to his ſiſter, late Queene of that Iland, a very great quantity of coine in recompence of her Dowry or Ioincture, and would ſatiſfie all his other demands (concerning the Legacies intended by his Predeceſſor king William, to the Father of king Richard) as far as hee ought] according to the cuſtome of that kingdome, and thereupon gaue vnto him for the quitclaime of his ſiſters Ioincture, twenty thouſand ounces of gold: and farther to bee acquitted of all other claims & pretences, as alſo in conſideration that Arthur Duke of Britain, nephew & next heire of king Richard (if Richard died without iſſue) ſhold take towife the daughter of K. Tancred, he paid him other twenty thouſand ounces of gold; and of his owne accord, and for King Richards loue, and for the loue of the Engliſh Nation (which, ſaith our * Author, was then in greateſt reputation through the kingdome of Sicilie) as alſo to bee the more aſſured of performance, he gaue him other twenty thouſand ounces of gold, beſides afterward foure great Ships, called Vrſers, and fifteene Gallies.

(20) King Richard on the other ſide, not to bee wanting to any matter, which in honor and equitie might bee expected of him, beſides letters Patents, hee put in vpon their Oaths for his ſureties, two Arch-biſhops, and two Biſhops of his owne there preſent, and twentie great Lords, and principall men his ſubiects, whoſe names (becauſe many of their poſterities doe yet ſtand) are heere inſerted out of the ſaide letters Patents, as they are vpon record in Houeden.

Iordanus de Humez his Conſtable, Wilielmus de Curci, Richardus de Camuilla, Girardus de Talebot, Robertus Sabluil, Guido de Croun, Guarinus filius Geroldi, Bertramus de Verdun, W. Chamberlangus de Tankeruile, Robertus de Nouo-burgo, Hugo Bardolf, Wigain de Cheresburg, Gilbertus de Waſcuil, Hugo le Bruin, Iohannes de Piller, Amauri de Muntford, Andreas de Chauenni, Wilielmus de Forz, Gaufridus de Rancune, Amauri Torell, and other not named.

(21) Moreouer for finall aſſurance, he offereth that Pope Clemēt ſhould vndertake for performance of his part in the ſaid agreement; and that the ſaid Clement would accordingly vndertake, hee requeſts him by moſt officious letters, giuing him leaue without out any reluctation) to put his dominions (vpon any his breach) vnder seuerest censures.

(22) This peace and accord being happily thus concluded, King Tancred (hauing most roially and louingly feasted the King of England for three daies and three nights in a Castle of his) discouered, vpon the way at Tauernium in his returne, a foule and vnprincely conspiracie of Philip (whome one of our Writers cals the vain-glorious King) against the head and safety of King Richard; which comming to bee scanned betweene the two Kings, the French charged the English with picking of quarrels; and added, that vnlesse Richard maried his sister Alice, according as hee ought, hauing beene contracted long before together, he would be his enemy while he breathed; whereunto King Richard (being pressed) did replie: That his * sister during the time of her abode in England, had a child by his Father Henry King of England, which he was ready to proue by many witnesses there present: so that King Richard had farre more cause then a suspition of dishonesty (which *some write) to refuse the marriage. This falling out so shamefully, Philip (vpon certaine conditions betweene Richard and him) left him at liberty to take a wife where he thought good, but neuer (as it may seeme) forgaue him his euill will while they two liued together.

(23) And because acts of Christian remorse and humility are too rare among the Great ones of this vaine world, it were a crime to pretermit the exemplar humiliation of this famous General K. Richard, at this time, who (to vse my * Authors words) inspired with diuine grace, and studying to fitte himselfe for the great attempt he had in hand, was stung at the soule with so iust compunction for his sinnes, that calling before him his Archbishoppes and Bishoppes into a Chappell, at the house where he was lodged without the walles of Messana; hee blushed not to make a penitent confession of his manifolde excesses, humbly praying God of mercy, and them (as his subordinate Ministers) of Absolution; & God (saith Houeden) respected him with eies of Mercy, and gaue him a penitent heart, so that from thenceforth hee proued a man fearing God, eschuing euil, and doing good. "* O felicem illum, &c. O happie he, who so fals, that "he may rise more strong: O happy he, who after peni-"tence, relapseth not into fault and ruine.

(24) Wherupon addicting his mind to diuine contemplations, & meditation of the christian Church, whose Champion now he was; hee desired conference of one Ioachim (a Cisterciã Abbot) whose great learning and deepe vnderstanding in the Scriptures, with an opinion of a Propheticall inspiration, made him so famous ouer the world, that King Richard sent for him, being thẽ in Calabria neer Sicilie, whom at his comming he heard preaching and expounding the Apocalypse of S. Iohn, touching the afflictions of the Church, and of Antichrist, which (saith hee) was then borne, and in the City of Rome, and shall bee aduanced in the See Apostolicke, of whom the Apostle said, he should extoll himselfe aboue all that is called God; and that the seuen Crownes were the Kings and Princes of the earth which obeyed him. Surely, neere about this very time hapned that in Rome, which might seeme to giue great probability to that Abbots opinion, especially, if Emperours and Kings bee truely called *Gods, ouer whom Antichrist also should extol himself: for in the same moneth that Richard left Messana, was the Coronation of Henry the Emperour, and his Empresse Constantia, in S. Peters Church; where Pope Celestine, the very next day after his own consecration to the Papacie, sate in his Pontificall chaire, holding the Emperiall golden Crowne betwixt his feete and the Emperour (as likewise the Empresse) stooping low, receiued on his head the Diadem from the Popes feet; and presently against the Pope strake the Emperors crowne with his foot, and dasht it to the ground; signifying that hee had power to throw him (vpon his demerites) out of his Empire: but the Cardinals catching vp the crowne, put it againe on the Emperours head.

(25) The same day in which Philip & his French Forces set saile out of the Hauen of Messana, arriued Alienor King Richards mother, accompanied with Berengaria his new intended Spouse, daughter to* Sanctius King of Nauarre, whome afterward he tooke to wife in Cyprus; but his Mother after a short stay returned by Rome into England, leauing the young Lady with Ioan Queene Dowager of Sicilie, both which accompanied the King toward the holy Land, his whole Nauie being one hundred and fifty great ships, and fifty three Gallies well appointed for the warre, and many other Sailes and Vessels: and (not to omit the same because it is recorded as a singularity) he had among all these,* thirteen Buces or Buscies, which had each of them three course of Sailes to saile with: but no Writer (so farre as we yet find) declares what numbers of Souldiers were in the English Armie.

(26) This Nauie roiall betweene the Isles of Rhodes and Cyprus, (for the honor and good of King Richard) was scatterd by God with a terrible tempest, some one or two of which suffered wreack vpon the Isle of Cyprus, whom* Cursac (or as other call him Isakius, Emperour of the Griffons) being a * tyrant did spoile, and contrary to Christian Religion, (which was his profession, though some mistake) and all honour and humanity, he would not (among other his vnprincely, or rather barbarous behauiours) suffer the Kings sister, and Lady Berengaria, with other of that tender societie, to come into harbour, to their great discontentment and perill, a * Shippe or two sinking there: but neither would God, nor King Richard forgiue it him.

(27) For the said vnworthy Prince hauing thrice refused to make restitution of his vnlawfull seisures and prisoners, was entred vpon by the English, driuen from the shoares with great dishonour and slaughter; the City Limesium left for a prey to the victors, and himselfe beaten againe out of his Campe, and taken, and after an escape made by him, his onelie daughter and heire yeelding her selfe, and her Father lastly comming againe of his owne accord (as despairing to lie hid) vnder custodie, and thrust into fetters of gold and siluer, the whole Iland (with all the people, strength, and riches thereof) became subiect to the King of England, and both Father and Daughter led away into captiuity.

(28) There arriued at Limesium, to salute and honour King Richard within three dayes after his first victory, Guido King of Ierusalem, Geofrey de * Lenizant his brother, Raimund Prince of Antioch, Earle Boemond his sonne, &c. offering their seruices, and swearing to bee his against all men; with whose priuity King Richard seised the flourishing and spatious Iland of Cyprus, by antiquity celebrated as the very seate of Venus, which that it might so proue to himselfe, in the ioyous moneth, he solemnly took to wife his beloued Lady Berengaria.

(29) The person of the Emperour (for by that lofty title Writers call him,) was sent to Tripolis in Syria, vnder the custody of Ralph Fitz Godfrey, Lord *Chamberlaine to King Richard: his daughter was committed to the two Queenes Berengaria and Ioan: the Iland it selfe was entrusted to Richard de Camuile, and Robert de Turnham his Viceroyes, with competent force and prouisions, and the Ilanders suffered to enioy all such lawes and liberties, as they held in the time of Manuel the Emperour of Constantinople, or (as now they call it) of Stamboli.

(30) This fame of Richard was much enlarged by his conquering a mighty * Argosie, called a Dromond, wherein were aboord one thousand and fiue hundreth Sarazens (though disguised vnder French Flagges) furnished, besides all other prouisions, with fire-workes, barrelles or cages of venemous serpents, and the like, for the vse of the Sarazens at Acon, (anciently called Ptolomais, to the siege whereof he was then sailing,) thirteene hun-perour, but ean is more probable with relation to Coronam.

(31) Philip King of France, (in hope perhaps to conquere Acon before the Engliſh could arriue, and to winne thereby that glory intire) came ſafe before that City in Eaſter weeke; but as yet had not forced the ſame: at which time (that the Reader may obſerue the generall diſpoſition of the weſtern Chriſtians in thoſe dayes) there engirded Accon (omitting the many great Prelates, Princes, Earles, and Honourable Cheifes) theſe Nations following; the Genowayes and Florentines, the Engliſh vnder Hubert Biſhop of Salisbury, afterward * Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Flemings, Almaines, Danes, Dutch, Friſelanders, Piſans, Lombardes, beſides the Knights Templars (collected out of all Nations) and beſide the aides of the Aſians: all which lay quartered at the Seige in order, as here they are placed, at that time in which the King of France arriued. But Richard King of England with his victorious and triumphant Nauie (which when it went out of Cyprus, being much belike augmented * did containe 254. tall ſhippes, and aboue 60. Galliots) brought terrour & diſmay to the beſieged, and comfort to the Chriſtians, * vpon the Sunday after Pentecoſt, being about the middeſt of Iune.

(32) The ſiege was ſo vehemently plied, that (notwithſtanding ſundry diſſentions between Philip and Richard, the two competitors of glorie in this voiage) after ſeuerall breaches and aſſaults, the laſt whereof was made by the Piſans and Engliſh, vpon the twelfth of Iuly following, many offers of compoſition made by the Saladine, being vtterly refuſed, the City of Accon was rendred to the Chriſtians vpon theſe conditions. 1 That Saladine (Prince of Miſcreants) ſhould by a certaine day reſtore the holy Croſſe. 2 That he ſhould ſet at liberty fifteen hundreth Chriſtian Captiues. 3. That the City with all the things contained therein ſhould remain and be to the Chriſtians. 4. That the Turks or Sarazens ſhould haue their liues onely ſaued, if theſe conditions were performed. 5. That they ſhould pay twenty thouſand Bizants, (peeces of gold) toward the charges of the Kings. To take poſſeſsion for the French, there was ſent in Drogon de Merlou, and one hundreth men of Armes, and for the Engliſh, Hugo de Gurnay with the like number, who equally parted the City, goods, and people, betweene them.

(33) And euen now Philip King of France, aſwell becauſe the Earle of Flanders died at the ſiege without iſſue, whoſe countries hee long had coueted, as for euill will to Richard, whoſe noble Acts ſo farre outwent his, and becauſe, as ſome * write, hee had taken bribes of Saladine, meditates nothing but return, asking licence of King Richard to depart, being then but the tenth day after the Cities ſurrender; ſo badly his enuious eyes could, as it ſeemed, endure the ſplendor of his companions glory. The chiefe commanders of his Army hearing this, ſhewing themſelues true French-men, and ſenſible of their obligation to God, and honour, with many teares beſought him not to forſake that holy affaire, ita impudenter, ſo ſhameleſly. In what Prince would not this haue kindled a deſire of a better reſolution? But impotent paſſions carrying him, and miſcarrying him, he perſiſted to get leaue of Richard, who but two dayes before, would haue had him ſweare to a ſtay of three yeeres longer in that ſeruice; but hee who had other cogitations farre more vnworthy of a King, would needes depart, giuing his oath vpon the holy Goſpels, without which oath King Richard would not grant his good will. That he would well and faithfully keepe the lands and ſubiects of the King of England, and neither doe dammage nor grieuance to them by himſelf, nor ſuffer it to be done by others * till his returne.

(34) The King of France thus leauing Accon, in the Caſtle whereof King Richard, his Queene and Siſter were lodged, and the Duke of Burgundie remaining behind with the French hoaſt, (to whome King Philip, not without ſundry ſecret inſtructions, had with it committed a great part of his treaſure) king Richard in the ſame day ſet forward vpon a new enterprize; but it is true which one writes, * that by reaſon of the diſſention betweene the Kings, which of them ſhould ſeeme the greater, little or nothing proſpered; & iuſt cauſe had King Richard to complaine in * his letters, that Philip to the eternall reproch of himſelfe and Kingdome, had fouly forſaken his purpoſe and vow vnto God.

(35) But when the Saladine could not by any means obtaine a longer day for performance of the ſaid Articles of compoſition, hee cut off the heads of all his Chriſtian Captiues; in reuenge whereof King Richard brought out his Turkiſh Captiues, (being about two thouſand and fiue hundreth) and in the ſight of the Saladines hoaſt cauſed their heads to be chopt off; the Duke of Burgundie doing the ſame to the like number, neere vnto the walles of Acon, ſeuen onelie being kept aliue by the Chriſtian Generals, whereof Karakeys Salaadines * foſter Father was chiefe. But Richard proceeding in his vndertaken action, and in his march to Ioppa, being ſet vpon by Sultan Salaadine (who had put the Duke of Burgundie to flight, and ſlaine the valiant Iaques de Auennis, who onely with a few in the Reregard made reſiſtance) ſo couragiouſly encountred him, that the Salaadine with the loſſe of three thouſand his choiſeſt Souldiers was glad to turn his back and flie: whiles therefore this Champion is thus imploied in the Holy-land, let vs looke backe a litle how the affaires of his Kingdome are managed at home.

(36) Iohn the Kings brother, making vſe in England of ſuch diſcontentments, as the incredible inſolencies, and intollerable tyrannies of the Chancellour (who carried himſelfe both like a Pope and a King) had bred among the Nobility and people, to aduance thereby his owne deſignes, ſtirred againſt him (though ſtrengthning himſelfe like a Generall in the field,) ſo powerfull oppoſition, that in the end, (vpon warrant of a new * Commiſſion ſent from the King his Brother) hee with the reſt of the Peeres ſuddenlie thruſt him out of all commaund, and ſhortly after moſt reprochfully (as it happened, for he fled, and was taken in a Curteſans attire, ill beſeeming a Popes Legate) out of the Kingdome alſo, vpon occaſion, as of other foule demerites, ſo particularly of a ſacrilegious and barbarous outrage, committed by the Chancellours commaund, vpon the perſon of Geffrey Elect Archbiſhop of Yorke (naturall brother to King Richard and the Earle) on pretence that he entred England contrarie to his oath giuen to his brother King Richard, where as he then came to take poſſeſsion of his See, to which hee was aduanced by the * Kings owne procurement, and by Queene Eleanors owne trauaile to Rome in his behalfe. And albeit this puniſhment & ſhame deſeruedly followed the Chancellors pride and oppreſſion, yet in one maine point of oppoſing the Earles Ambition; (who ſought to aſſure to himſelfe the remainder of the Crowne, which in right of bloud belonged to his Nephew Arthur) his ſeruice to the State had beene very commendable, if it had proceeded from loialty of affection, and not from a ſwelling deſire of greatneſſe, which he hoped ſtill to enioy, if Arthur (a child) ſhould ſucceed in the kingdome, whereas he knew Earle Iohns aduancement could not be without his apparant ruine.

(37) But Philip King of France in all places labouring by * wrongfull and vnprincely aſperſions to deface the renowne of King Richard, though finding ſmall credite to his words (becauſe the man had done nothing himſelfe) deuiſed after his return how to trouble and endammage his friends dominions; and had effected it, if the Lordes of France whom he ſollicited to that wicked worke, vpon pretence

tence of the compoſition made with King Richard at Meſſana, had not (to their immortal glory) *refuſed to aſsiſt him therein, till Richards returne, aſwel in regard of their owne oathes, as becauſe the ſentence of excommunication was denounced againſt all ſuch as did attempt to endammage him in his abſence.

(38) King Richard notwithſtanding that the relation of theſe things greatly troubled him, gaue not ouer as yet, but after ſundry other matters of importance performed, did march vp within the ſight of Ieruſalem, where he skirmiſhed with the enemie, & ouerthrew the Conuoy or Carauan of the Salaadine, which came laden from Babylon, guarded with ten thouſand men; whom King Richard valiantlie encountring with fiue thouſand ſelected ſouldiers, put moſt of them to the ſword, and took three thouſand Camels, and four thouſand Horſes and Mules, beſides thoſe that were ſlaine, and ſo gained the rich ſpoile of all the Carriages.

(39) After this, and many other worthy thinges done, as the reſcue of Ioppa, and repulſe of Saladine from thence, &c. the King indefatigable in his braue attempts, deſirous to regaine Ieruſalem, and the City Baruck, was abandoned in that enterpriſe by the Duke of Burgundie (who is ⁎ ſaid to haue beene apparently corrupted with gifts from Saladine, and the regiments of French vnder his conduct;) wherupon he was the rather perſwaded by the Knights Templars, and chiefes of the Chriſtian hoaſt, not to refuſe Saladines offers for a ſurceaſance from hoſtility, conſidering that hee had a purpoſe to returne with reenforced numbers and meanes; that his preſent powers by diuiſions, by ſickneſſe, by battales were waſted, and that the dangerous eſtate of his owne Dominions did require his preſence, (the greateſt motiue, for he had ſupplies of money for his Souldiers wages from Pope Celeſtine) by reaſon of ſome vndue practiſes at home, and the rancour of King Philip his vnreconcilable aduerſary abroad. Wherupō a truce was taken for three yeers, and Saladine repaid ſuch charges as Richard had been at in fortifying Askalon, which was brought to the ſame eſtate, as in which King Richard found it.

(40) But the King of England, though hee had very far excelled all the Chriſtian Princes in great exploites at that iourney, becauſe * he had neither conquered Salaadine, nor Ieruſalem, did mourne, and parted penſiue. In the holy-land hee left Henry Earle of Champaine, (who vpon taking the ſaid Baruck was to haue beene crowned King of Ieruſalem, which Guido had reſigned) and hee left Guydo de Luſignian (the late King of Ieruſalem in Cyprus, to whom hee had paſſed it, in exchange for the other, to aduance his Kinſeman the ſaid Earle of Champain; which, vpon that Title, the familie of Luſinian for * many deſcents after did poſſeſſe and enioy. Thus Richard hauing ordered his affairs in the Eaſt parts, ſets ſaile homeward. The Queenes Berengaria his wife, and Ioan his ſiſter, with the Captiue Lady, Daughter of the Cypriot Emperour, vnder the conduct of Stephen de Turnham (hearing of the Kings moſt heauie fortune) ſoiourned at Rome about ſixe moneths, for feare of Richards enemies, & afterward came ſafe by Marſilia in Poicton.

(41) God, whoſe cauſe was onely pretended in this voyage of the Chriſtians, did not ſeeme to approue the ſaid truce; for hee ⁎ſcattered the Engliſh with a terrible tempeſt, and the ⁎ opportunity of Conqueſt was ſo loſt, that hitherto it could neuer bee regained, and the King of England letting it ſlippe when God had almoſt put the ſame into his hands, did miſerably fall into his enemies hands. Certainelie, the name of Richard was at that time growne terrible to Saladine, who had receiued diuers loſſes, foiles and ouerthrowes at his handes: Moreouer, the Saladines whole eſtate being endangered by ſuch of his own ſect as reputed him a meer vſurper, hee could not long withſtand the double impreſſion of the Chriſtian Cheualrie, and of his owne Allies and Countrimen; as indeed not long after* he died, leauing his Empire fowly, but iuſtly, diſtracted by ciuill confuſions: whereas by this Truce the crafty Turke made the world ſee, that the powers of two ſo potent Monarkes had in a manner effected nothing; & Richard could neuer haue time to return for accōpliſhment of his deſigns; for which all Chriſtendome hath at this howre reaſon to bee ſorrowfull, and hereof himſelfe* was very ſenſible, ſo that hee would oftentimes crie out, that hee was not alwayes wiſe, alluding to this occaſion loſt.

On the contrary, Earle Iohn being (by the cunning inueigling and suggestions of his brothers professed foes) not onely put out of all hope of his releasement, but also incensed against him for intending the Crowne to his Nephew Arthur, entred into an vnbrotherly attempt against his Soueraigne Lord; the summe whereof, take in the words of Thomas Walsingham, who saith, that Iohn with promises allured many to him through the whole Kingdom, did carefully and speedily fortifie his holds in England, and passing the seas, entred into league with the King of the French, that he might vtterly put his Nephew Arthur, Duke of Britaine from that hope, which the Britaines had conceiued of his promotion. (45) In this most perilous time the valour and loyalty of the City of Roan (the choisest of Normandy) did most clearely shew themselues to the euerlasting commendation thereof: for Philip comming before it with a puissant Army solicited thē to reuolt, promising mountaines. In stead of answere* they set open the gates, telling him that hee might enter if he would, for no man hindred him: but the* vaine-glorious King being better aduised, (for the inhabitants, yea & the damsels of the City, whose heads were polde like as mens, powred molten pitch, and such like matter vpon the besiegers) retreated from the walles, and marcht away confounded: and being certainely aduertized that the Emperour and King Richard were agreed, hee sends ouer to Earle * Iohn, bidding him looke to himselfe, for the Diuell was now let loose. Hee thereupon crost ouer the seas to Philip, who *excited him to vsurpe the Kingdome of England.

(46) Neuertheless by Queene Elianors negotiation (who in person trauelled to the Emperour) the King her sonne was come to be assured of his liberty vpon these conditions. 1. That hee should pay to the Emperour one hundreth thousand Markes sterling. 2. That he should pay fifty thousand Markes of like money to the Emperour and Duke. 3. That he should marry his Neece, (sister to Arthur Duke of Britaine) to Duke Leopolds sonne. 4. That the Emperour should secure him, till he were vnder saile with a fore-wind. 5. That hee should set the Cypriots person at liberty, and deliuer his daughter to the Duke of Austria, who was her vncle, and should deliuer 67. hostages for assurance of all.

The Articles of King Richards liberty.

(47) But to colour this vnreasonable and vnprincelie extortion, the Emperour by his Imperiall Charter giues vnto King Richard, Prouince, and sundry other ample territories, containing 5. Archbishoprickes, and thirty three Bishoprickes (sometime parcell of the Empire, but both then and a long time before out of possession) & therof crowns him King, writing magnificent letters into England, with such like offices.

King Richard crowned King of Prouince, &c.

(48) Now when King Richard (who had wonne to himselfe wonderfull honour and respect, euen of the couetous Emperour, by the proofe of his innocency, and by his most noble and constant carriage) did expect his liberty at an assembly or diet, where the greatest Princes and States of the Empire were in person, to wit, The three Archbishops of Mentz, Colen and Saltzburg; The three Bishops of wormes, Spire, and Leiges; The three Dukes of Swane (the Emperours brother) Austrich, and Luuain; The Count Palatine of Rhene, &c. which had vndertaken for the Emperour, whose officers had already receiued the greater part of the ransome: behold euē then the Emperour shewes a willingnesse to breake off, producing the letters of Philip King of France, and of Iohn Earle of Morton, in which they offer an huge summe &c. too impious and diuelish to speak of: but the Princes who had vndertaken to King Richard for good dealing, went to the Emperour reprouing him for his auarice, who would so dishonourably trauerse and start backe from the agreement: * vpon the fourth of Februarie therefore being Friday, the Archbishoppes of Mentz and Coleine restore him * after fifteene moneths imprisonment, to Queene Alienor his mother, free from the Emperour, all that were present weeping thereat for ioy.

A new and foule treason of Earle Iohn discouered.

(49) This Archbishop of Coleine was hee, who entertaining the King in the Dominions of his Archbishopricke; with great ioy for his deliuerance did celebrate diuine seruice in this manner: Now know I truely that the Lord hath sent his Angell and taken me out of the hand of Herode, and the expectation of the common people of the Iewes, &c.

(50) And indeed it was Gods Angell did it: for after all this, whiles the King staied for a wind, and other preparations at the Sea-shore, the Emperour repenting him of his release, sent speedy guarders to apprehend him againe, vowing hee should neuer bee freede from bonds whiles he liued; but some secrete message (as Princes Courts neuer want Spials) speedily premonished him, and so by a verie little time he preuented his surprisers, landing happily at Sandwich, in April the Sunday after Saint Georges day: where in stead of all other triumphes, or particulars of ioy for his returne, wee will content our selues with onely one, as signe of the rest. When the King drew neere to Rochester, the venerable new Archbishop of Canterbury Hubert (who had beene with him at Accon in the Holy-land) went ioyously foorth to meet him; whom when the King saw, he dismounted from his horse, and hauing bowed his knee, fell vpon the earth, in like sort the Archbishoppe lay right against him; at the last both of them rising from the ground, they ranne into each others arms, comforting themselues with mutuall embraces & weeping with ioy.

(51) The iustice of a true history will not suffer vs here to forget, in what sort the iniustice of this vnnoble captiuation of Richard King of England, was punished by God, and on Gods behalfe. The Duke of Austrias Country, and people, being visited with these fiue plagues, Fire, Water, Barrennes, Worms, & Pestilence: the Fire, casually burning his Towns; the Riuer of Danubius drowning ten thousand of his Subiects, in an ouerflow; the earth waxing drie and sear; the Wormes destroying such fruit and graine as grew; and the stroke of Pestilence killing the principall Nobles and Gentlemen of his Dominions: The Duke for all this continued obstinate like another Pharao, swearing to cut off the heads of K. Richards Hostages, vnlesse all Couenants (though extorted by cruell Duresse) were exactly and speedily performed. Baldwin de Betun (one of the Hostages) is sent to the King with this bloodie message; but before his return, vpon S. Stephens day in Christmas, the Duke* spurring his horse in sport vpon a Castle of snow among youthes, which were counterfeiting a siege, and an assault, with the slip of his horse, brake his foot in such sort, as it came to be* cut off, and within a while feeling himselfe perishing vpward, so that his death was certaine, could not bee absolued of his Bishops from the sentence of Excommu- communication which had by the Pope bin denounced, till hee and his Lords had sworne to release all the said matters betweene the King of England and him; but his sonne after his death refusing the performance, his Fathers body lay stinking aboue ground eight daies, for that no clergy man durst burie it, being but conditionally absolued, till the son did yeeld to the performance; yet (if * some may be credited vpon his bare word) the sonne did voluntarily condiscend, and not vpon this compulsion.

(53) But albeit the Emperour * to declare himselfe wounded with some remorse for his vngodlie violence, or to engage others in the impietie, gaue three thousand Markes of King Richards ransome to make siluer Censers through all the Cistercian order, who generally refused the gift, as parcell of an accursed spoile (for as for those * seuenty thousand marks, which hee forgaue to King Richard, with as bad a purpose (being to hinder peace betweene him, and the French) as he had taken the other vniustly, they are not to be accounted as restitution, but as the wages of sinne); reuenge forsooke him not, being pursued by his owne wife (the Heire of the Crowne of Sicilia) in reuenge of some crueltie done to her Countrimen; and after reconcilement with her, falling dangerously sicke, he died at Messana, excommunicated for King Richards cause. And albeit hee had in his life time sent his Chancellour out of Burgundie, of purpose to offer King Richard recompence for the iniuries he had sustained, and although Constantia the Empresse had sent the Archbishoppe of Messana (while the Emperours body lay aboue ground without buriall) to Pope Celestine in humble manner, praying Christian buriall, yet * vnlesse the mony which hee had extorted from the King of England were restored, hee could by no entreaties obtaine it: which accordingly was promised.

(54) Neither were the King of Englands afflictions vnprofitable vnto him, for they gaue him occasion to reforme his life, taking home to him his Queene Berengaria, whose society for a long time he had neglected, though she were a roiall, eloquent, & beauteous Lady, and for his loue had ventured with him through the world.

(55) King Richard after his ioyous returne into England, hauing at the Abbey of Saint Edmunds, in performance of his vow (as may seeme) offered vp the rich Imperiall Standard of Cursac, Emperour of Cyprus, which hee tooke among the spoiles of the Griffons Campe: thence he marched, and tooke in by surrender such Castles as the seruants of his brother Iohn (beleeuing that the King was not returned) held against him; but Henry de Pumeray, who had fortified Saint Michaels Mount in Cornwall, hearing for certaine that King Richard was come, died for very feare. And now, forty daies of summons being exspired, which were allowed to Earle Iohn, & Hugh Bishop of Couentry, for making their appearance, to answere to such heinous matter as was prepared, and they not appearing, Iohn was adiudged by the Peeres and States of England, to haue forfeited all that hee might forfeit in the Realme, and the Bishop to be punishable by the Ecclesiasticall censures, as hee was a Bishop, and likewise as an Officer of the King, by the Laitie. Richard afterwarde bestirres himselfe to draw in money more greedilie, then did become so great a Maiesty, wherein yet (saith * one) he was rather to be pardoned then accused, for that hee was presently to lead a mightie Armie against the French.

(56) But first of all, to wipe away both the sadnes and contumelie of his late restraint, for a better fortunes beginning, he caused himselfe to be crowned againe at the City of Winchester; which celebritie was honoured with the presence of William king of Scotland, who bare a sword before * King Richard: betweene which two Princes, there * followed great amity and tendernesse of loue; then beeing granted to him, and his successors Kings of Scotland, a certaine pension, with sundry other allowances, and princelie attendances, from the first day of their friendlie entrances at any time into England, til their returne.

(57) The King likewise caused a new broad Seale to bee made, requiring that all Charters granted vnder his former, should be confirmed vnder this, whereby he drew a great masse of money to his Treasurie, subscribing such renued Charters thus: This was the tenor of our Charter vnder our first Seale, which because it was lost, and in the time of our beeing captiue in Almaine was in the power of another, wee caused to bee changed, &c. Some haue obserued, that as this Richard was the first of the English Kinges who bare Armes on his Seales, as appeareth by the * former: so was hee the first who carried in his shield, three Lions passant, borne euer after for the Regal Arms of England. And whereas we see heere the Moone in her full, which in the other was but a Crescent, (which is the Turkish Ensigne,) it may seeme to be done Emblematically, in that sence, as wee read of another Prince (who going against the Turkes) gaue a Crescent with this word, Plenior redibo, I will returne more full. The true draught of this second Seale we haue here annexed.

(58) A good * Author reports, that after this, the King being at dinner at Westminster, and receiuing aduertisement of the siege laid to Vernoil, by his restlesse enemie Philip of France; sware that hee would neuer turne his face, till hee had gotten thither with his Armie to fight with the French; whereupon hee caused the wall to be cut through, (the signe of which breach appeared * aboue two hundred yeares after) neuer resting, till with an hundred great Shippes hee had crost the seas from Portsi-

(60) There were after this sundry skirmishes, takings of Prisoners and Townes, and conferences betweene the French and English, moued belike, by such as religiously tendered the effusion of Christian bloud, so as no great matter was yet effected; that which was, being rather by * Stratagems and starts, then by battle; but within *thirty seuen daies after the French mens flight from Vernuil, King Richard (in reuenge of that desolation which the French King had brought vpon the City of Eureux, where he neither spared age, sexe, nor Church) comming to Vendome, with purpose to surprise the King of France, had the spoile of the French Campe, their King (a thing almost incredible) now the second time flying without battle. Many of the French were slaine, and taken, together with *much treasure, the Chappell roiall, the Indentures of such as had left Richard to serue King Philip, and all the * tents, carriages, and other furnitures for warre: and from hence marching in Poictou and Engolisme, hee had such successes (howsoeuer the silent partialities of forrain Writers smoother them) that * himself wrote ouer to his deerest Hubert Archbishoppe of Canterburie, That by Gods fauour, who in all things considers the right, hee had taken Tailburg, Marsiliac, and all the other Castles of Geofrey de Rancune, the City of Engolisme, and all the Castles and Territories of the Earle thereof, and almost three hundreth Knights, or men of Armes, and about forty thousand armed Souldiers.

(61) We will not here ouerpasse, that which Houeden reports, (being an example of Christian repentance in Princes) of a poore Hermits comming to this noble Monarch, and preaching to him the words of eternall life; and bad him bee mindfull of the subuersion of Sodom, and to abstaine from things vnlawfull, otherwise (saith he) the deserued vengeance of God will come vpon thee: The Hermit being gone, the King neglected his words: but not long after falling sicke, hee more seriously bethought himselfe, and afterward waxing sound in soule, as well as body: his daily exercise was to rise earely, & not to depart from the Church till diuine seruice "were finished: whereupon (saith Houeden) how "glorious it is for a Prince to beginne and end his actions "in him, who is beginning without beginning, and iud- "geth the ends of the earth. Moreouer, hee bountifully releeued euery day much poore both in his Court and Townes about: and restored gold and siluer vessels to such Churches, from which to pay his ransome they had beene taken away.

King Richards amendment of life and dayly exercise.

(62) After this passed sundry interchanges betwixt the French and English, sometimes of warres, with wasts and spoiles, sometimes of truces with interuiewes and Parlies; in one of which, the Lady Alice, (cause of much mischiefe) K. Philips sister, was restored (according to the contract of Messana) to her brother, who forthwith bestowed her in mariage, vpon Iohn Earle of Pontif. In the mean while the Kings sought to make friends vpon all sides; but King Richard by his munificence, and other means, drew from King Philip a mighty party of his neerest neighbours: * Baldwin Earle of Flanders, Raimund Earle of Tholose (to whom also King Richard gaue in * marriage, his sister Ioan Queen of Sicilia) the * Champanois and others: so that Philip was faine to trust wholy vpon himselfe: for whereas hee had latelie married the sister of the King of Denmarke, of purpose to vse the Danish shipping against the English, that affinity proued enmity: for the * next day after his wedding, hee put her away, pretending (besides * other things) that shee was of too neere a propinquity of bloud; albeit most vntrulie, as her brother, the King of Denmarke proued before the Pope, though he could not be heard, the King of France more preuailing, either by feare or fauour.

(63) About this time, Iohn the Kings brother & Markadey Captaine of the Brabanters, called the * Rowtes, had made an incursion vp to Beauois, where the Bishoppe, being also an Earle of the Roiall Bloud, and the eleuenth Peere of France, valiantly fighting, was * taken in the skirmish, armed at all points, and brauely mounted; on whose behalfe the Pope (vpon the Bishops humble suite, * pleading the Clergies immunity) wrote somewhat earnestlie to King Richard, to set his verie deare sonne, for so he called the Bishop, at liberty; The King in a kind of pleasant earnestnesse, caused the Habergeon and Curaces of the Bishop to be presented to the Pope, with this question (alluding to that of * Iacobs children to their father, concerning Iosephs garment,) * Vide an tunica filii tui sit an non, See whether it bee thy sonnes coat or no. Whereupon the Pope replied, that "he was neither his sonne, nor the sonne of the Church, "and therefore should be ransomed at the Kings will, be- "cause hee was rather iudged to be a seruitor of Mars, "then a Souldier of Christ. Whom the King of England (in * reuenge of many euill offices, especiallie in the time of his captiuity with the Emperour) handled sharpely. The Bishop at length waxing impatient, writes a passionate letter to the Pope; whose answere in part is here set downe, for that it "notably defends the King of England. If (saith "the Pope) thou hast had ill successe, it is no mar- "uaile, for putting off the peaceable Prelate, thou "didst put on the warlike Souldier, and rashly too- "kest a shield in stead of a cope, a sword for a Stole, "a Curace for an Albe, an Helmet for a Miter, a "Lance for a Bishops staffe, peruerting the order, "& course of things: neither meant you (as you al- "ledge) to repell violence but vertue, nor did you "fight for your Country, but against it: for of your "France we can now publikely pronounce; woe to "*that land whose King is a * Child.* For your King "was strictly bound by corporall oath to the King "of England, not to damnifie his territories, &c. "at least wise till his returne from the iourney of his "Pilgrimage: neuertheless, contrary to his faith "and oath, hee without all shame seised by force "the good townes of the said King, and cruellie "wasted his Dominions with hostile hand: but "that King returning at last out of captiuity, man- "fully encountred your King, not reposing his hope "in multitude, but in Almighty God, &c. Humili- "ty therefore against pride, right and equity against "wrong, measure and modesty against intempe- "rance and arrogancy, haue certainely hitherto "fought for the King of England, &c. Wee haue "notwithstanding directed our supplicatorie let- "ters to him on thy behalfe, &c. for in such a case "we neither can nor ought commaund, &c. Meane "while beare your bands and sorrowes patientlie, &c.

(64) While thus sundry warlike matters passed betweene the English and French, the King of England encreaseth his side with new associates, Arthur Duke of Britaine, the Duke of Luuain, the Earles of Gynes, Boloine, Pereh and Blois with others: and * Houeden recites three seuerall times within a short space, in which the King of France was driuen with losse losse and dishonour out of the field by King Richard, beside the losse of Saint Omers, of Air, and of other Townes wonne by Baldwin Earle of Flanders, and besides the wast of the French Dominions by many inuasions. But the greatest of the three victories was the second, which King Richard gained at the battaile betweene Curceles and Gysors, where the K. of France himselfe fell into the riuer of Ethe, the bridge breaking vnder him, with the throng of people which fled for their liues before the English Lion: neither was hee easily saued (twenty of his men of Armes being drowned by that ruine) but before he could be drawne out, water had gotten into his belly.

(65) This was a famous victory; for besides a long Catalogue of great names extant in Authors; there were taken by the Kings Armie, 100. Knights and Seruitours on horse-backe, and footmen without number, besides thirty men of Armes, and other inferiour Souldiers not countable, which Markadey (Generall of the Rowtes) had for prisoners. There were also taken 200. great horse, whereof seuenscore had barbs, and caparisons armed with yron. King Richard in his owne person did most nobly, for with one speare he threw to the earth Mathew de Mummerancie, Alan de Ruſci, and Fulke de Giseruall, & took "them. So haue we vanquished the King of France "at Gysors (saith the King) howbeit wee haue not "done the same, but * God and our right by vs: and "in this fact we did put our owne head and king-"dome in hazard aboue the counsell of all that were "ours. Howsoeuer therefore the French or others may slubber ouer such a noble Iourney, wee haue not doubted vpon so good warrant to record the same.

(66) The warre continuing still, many vertuous men laboured to make a finall accord; and the new Pope Innocentius the third, hauing proclaimed a new vndertaking of the Holy-warre * sends a Cardinall Deacon to attone the two mighty Kings of France and England. At length Articles of peace were drawne; but Richard (being farre before hand) was nothing hastie to conclude, and therefore put it off, till his returne from Poictou, whether hee went to chastice his rebels, though * some say, hee did then conclude the peace.

(67) At this enteruiew or treatie, Philip King of France, * (the sower of strife, though he sought peace) shewed to King Richard a deed, in which Earle Iohn newly yeelds himselfe Liegeman to King Philip, against his brother. A wonderfull thing (saith Houeden) that Richard should beleeue it (being perhaps but a Copie of that deuice or tricke, if it were a deuice which they once had iointly put vpon the same Iohn, as in the end of King Henry the second you heard) who thereupon forthwith disseised the Earle his brother euery where. But the Earle hauing searched and learned the cause of the Kings sudden displeasures, (whose loue hee had before redeemed with many loiall seruices) Hee sends two men of Arms to the French Court, who should on his behalf, in what sort soeuer, defend his honour and innocency, against any his accusers: but there was no man found in that Court, neither King nor any other, who would vndertake the proofe or maintenance thereof; whereupon euer afterward Richard held his brother more deare, and gaue lesse credite to King Philips words.

(68) But now ensued the fatall accident, which drew the blacke cloud of death ouer this triumphall and bright shining starre of Cheualrie, the vnworthy occasion of which misaduenture makes it the more lamentable; which notwithstanding, for a document to the Great ones, against the outrage of Auarice and Cruelty, God suffered thus to fal on him. Widomare, Vicount of Limoges hauing found a great * horde of gold and siluer, sent no small portion thereof to King Richard, as chiefe Lord, with which being not contented (as pretending that treasure troue, was wholy his by vertue of his prerogatiue royall, or else misliking that the Vicount should make the partition) came with a power to a Castle of the Vicounts called * Chaluz, where hee supposed the Riches were; the Garrison of which place offered to yeeld the same, and all therein, if onelie their liues and limbs might be saued: but hee would not accept of any conditions, bidding them defend themselues as they could, for he would enter by the sword and hang them all. It grieues me to thinke that such a Prince should so forget himselfe: but behold the seuerity of Gods iudgement. An Arbalaster (or Archibalista) standing vpon the wall, & seeing his time, charged his steele bow with a square arrow or quarrell, * making first his praier to God, That hee would direct that shot, and deliuer the innocency of the besieged from oppression. Whereupon discharging it, as the King was * taking a view of the Castle within the danger and distance of such an Engin, & the King (* vpon hearing the bow goe off) stooping with his head, was mortally wounded in the left shoulder; the anguish & perill wherof was extremely augmented by the butcherly and vnskilfull hand of the Surgeon, who hauing drawne out the wood and not the * enuenomed yron, * mangled the arme with cruell incisions before hee could preuaile; the paine whereof hastned his end.

(69) Concerning the name of this tragicall Archer, there is so much variety, as that we could willingly take that vncertainety for a warrant to silence it: being loth to ennoble him with our pen, it being a thing worthily punishable with vter obliuiō, to haue shed (though defensiuely or but casually) the bloud of such a King. Mathew Paris * in calling him Peter Basilij, seemes to allude to some ominous conceit in Basilii (which with the Greeks signifies a King;) him Thomas Walsingham followes therein, as Mathew Paris followed * another: there want not * some who also giue him a third name; but Houeden who deliuers this accident, as all the rest of this Kings life, in the most probable and fullest manner, cals him Bertram de Gurdonn, applying vnto him certaine * verses of Lucan, in commendation of his vnapalled constācy, when he came before King Richard: where thou maist perhaps (for satisfaction of thy mind, with beholding some reuenge) desire to know what became of the Actor. After that the Castle by continuall assaults was taken; and (by the Kings command) none left aliue but he (as being reserued * perhaps to some more shamefull death) the king (vpon a christian magnanimity) forgaue him the fact, which the party (without shew of dismay) did neither deny nor excuse, but alledged the necessity of his case, and the iustice of Gods worke in it, for that the king had slaine his Father and two Brothers with his owne hand: being hereupon set at liberty, and one hundred shillings sterling giuen him by the king: Markadey (Captain of the Mercenarie Rowtes) after the king was dead, tooke him, flead him quicke, & then by hanging ended his life.

(70) There hath been an opinion, or fancy, that this King was called Cordelyon, becauſe hee encountred a Lyon in priſon at the Emperours Court: but (ſaith *one very truly) theſe are fables imagined by Engliſh tale-tellers to aduance their King Richard, as the Britaines, by the like, aduanced their King Arthur. CHAPTER VIII.

THe lustre of Diadems, and Soueraignety, so dazeleth the eyes, and bewitcheth the hearts of ambitious beholders, that whiles they fondlie deeme the greatest content to bee in highest Titles, running after a seeming Happines, they often cast themselues headlong, and whole Kingdoms, into irrepairable ruine; as the calamities, which after the death of the noble Cœur-de-Lyon, lighted on the Pretenders to his Crowne, and on this miserably distracted State, will yeeld vs too ruful a President. To the full acting of which Tragedy (for such it was, and so we must now present it in this our Theatre) concurred as principall Actors, the two (though these Patients rather, as the issue proued) vnfortunate Corriuals for the Crowne, Iohn Earle of Moreton Brother to the late King, and his Nephew Arthur, the [a] Posthumous sonne of Geoffry Duke of Britaine, the Earles eldest Brother: their two Female (and therefore more emulous and restlesse) Solicitors, Queen Eleanor and Lady Constance, each ambitious of their owne, in their Sonnes aduancements: their two reuengefull Abettors, Otho the Emperour for Iohn, and Philip King of France for Arthur: thereupon, the two vniust Intruders on the Crowne; Lewis the French Kings Sonne, and Innocentius the Pope, the one by vnprincely forces, the other by vnpriestlie fraud: and lastly, their two sorts of treacherous Instruments, of the Laitie for the one, and Clergie for the other; all which, like so many Tragicke fire-breathing Furies, set this State in so horrible combustion, as that the [b] smoake is not as yet, so many ages after, quite allayed.

[k] Propinquity of Blood pleaded for Iohn, as [l] Lineall descent for Arthur, the Kings Brother being neerer then his Brothers sonne; but Iohn, who knew that the weaker vse to argue their Titles, whiles the stronger hold the possession, resolued to trie the strength of his claime by no other Law then of Armes; and therefore, being at time of King Richards death in those forraine parts, hee makes it his first care to fasten to himselfe, by present [m] largesse, and large promises of future fauours, (the vsuall Rhetoricke of Competitours) all the Stipendiary Souldiers, and other Seruitours of his deceased Brother. To winne himselfe the like assurance of loue at home, and [n] to settle (if it might be) an vniuersall quiet, he [o] forthwith despeeded into England (there to concurre with Queene Eleanor, his experienced mother) three of the choisest men of the State, Hubert Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, William Marshall a potent Peere, and Geoffry Fitz-Peter the great Iusticiar, by whose seuerall interests, the three States of Clergy, Chiualry, and Commonalty, might best bee eyther allured to him by fauours, or awed by feare; himselfe, the whiles [p] posting to Chinon, where King Richards great Treasure was kept; as knowing that hee should hardly get or keepe a Crowne by Forces or Friends, if hee wanted Coine & Crowns, to winne and hold such needfull Ayders.

(3) The Treasurer, though [q] himselfe with his Store, Castles, and Fidelity, thus assured to the Earle, had yet a powerfull [*] Nephew, the Castellan of Angiers, wholy [r] deuoted to Duke Arthur, to whose vse hee yeelded vp that City and Castle, with whom also [s] sided the Nobility of Anion, Maine, and Turaine, surrendring those large Territories, as to [t] their liege Lord, iointly auowing it to be the [u] Law and Custom of those Signiories, that the heritage which was to accrew to the elder Brother, if hee had suruiued, should descend vnto his Sonne. But Constance Arthurs mother, no lesse [x] desirous to be Regent to a King (for her son was but [y] twelue yeeres young) then Queene Eleanor [z] disdainefull to goe below a Dutchesse, did not dare to build her high hopes on so low grounds, for that such subordinate Princes as fauoured her cause, might easily be corrupted by faire meanes, or crushed by foule: and therefore vpon newes of King Iohns successes in England (for with general applause and [a] homages hee was now proclaimed King,) distracted with violent and Woman-like Passions, Ambition of her sonnes Right, Rage for his Wrong, Feare of his Safety, and (not the least) Emulation that Queene Eleanor (whose Prudence and Grace with the English, had [b] swayed exceedinglie) should effect more in a wrong, then her selfe in a iust cause; [c] shee flies to Turon to the French King Philip, (to seeke a Wolfe to whom shee might commit her Lambe,) to whose Protection shee wholy surrenders his Person, his Cause, his Countries. Philip [*] pretending (as Princes vse) a tender care of his Neighbour Princes state, but [d] meaning indeede out of so wished a prize,: to raise aduantage to his owne, forthwith ([e] without regard of Truth, or Truce sworne to King Richard) reenforceth all Arthurs Cities and Castles with his French Garrisons; some of which had scarse put their foot into Maunz, but [f] King Iohn was at their heeles, to prouide them their last lodging, sacking that Citie, and demolishing it to the ground, for a terror to all others, which after fealty once sworne vnto him, (as they had done) should dare to reuolt.

(4) Queene Eleanor, who hauing setled England in Peace, was now come ouer to forward her sonne in the Warres, and was [h] present at the surprising of Maunz, is [i] censured to haue too much sharpened his edge against her Nephew Arthur and his friends, out of her implacable disdaine, and Enuie towards Constance her Daughter in-Law, and appears no lesse; for the King passing thence into Anion, left there his [k] Captaines and Forces with his mother, who made Angiers participate the Fortunes of Maunz, the City ruined, the Citizens captiuated; whiles himselfe comming to Roan, [l] was there by the hands of Walter the Archbishop, in the Cathedrall Church with great pompe on Saint Marks Festiual, girt with the [m] Ducall Sword of Normandy, and crowned [n] with a Coronet of Golden Roses, (taking his Oath for faithfull administration in that Dukedome) which was the pledge or earnest of his vnquestionable admittance to the Englisb Diademe, which euery day now expected him. Neither yet may wee thinke, albeit King Iohns [l] mature & experienced age, his home-bred, and well knowne education, his reannexing of Irelands Kingdom to Englands, made his person more gracious then Arthurs, that yet his Agents all this while in England found no rubbs in their way, before [m] all the Earles, Barons, Burgesses & Free-holders could bee induced to disclaime Arthurs apparant Right, and to sweare fealty to King Iohn against al men liuing: yea, many of the [*] Englisb Peeres (who through their last Kings absence, and others conniuences, had habituated in them a conceit of vncontrouled Greatnes, which they miscalled Liberties and Rights, vnder vayle whereof, they after drew, not onely vndue restraints vpon the Regaltie, but also infinite calamities and massacres on the people, whose good they pretended,) in the great Assembly at Northampton, yeelded onely to sweare a [x] Conditionall Fealty, to keepe [n] Faith and Peace to King Iohn, if hee would restore to euery of them their Rights: which was the first seed of disloyalties, which after grew to so great a height. Thus howsoeuer, all domesticke difficulties ouerblowne, and Queene Eleanor [o] left in Aquitane to prouide against Forraigne, King Iohn arriued at [p] Shoreham, and the next day comes to London, preparing for his Coronation to bee at Westminster, the morrow following being Assention day.

(5) Strange it was to consider, (if ought bee strange in State-plots) how men, otherwise very prudent, transported once with Worldly, and seeming-politicke respects, can so wilfullie cloud their Reason, as to attempt those things, which leaue both a present staine on their Soules, and a lasting disreputation both of their Integrity and wisedome, wherein so much they glory. For what else did Hubert Archbishoppe of Canterbury, the man so [q] famoused as the [r] Pillar of the Common-wealthes stabilitie, & [s] incomparable for deepe-reaching wisedome, when in that sacred and celebrious Assembly of [t] all the States, addressing for the roiall Inauguration, hee added to those Lay-Peeres Conditionals, his Clergy-Sophismes, and [u] second Seede-plot of Treasons; perswading them by a cunning, but disloyall speech (which yet [x] some by transforming, haue more deformed) that the Englisb Crowne was meerely Arbitrary and Elective at the peoples deuotion? That [y] they all in discretion were to know, how that no man hath Right or any other fore-Title to succeed another in a Kingdom, vnlesse first (with inuocation for Grace and Guidance of Gods Holy Spirite) hee be by the Body of the Kingdome thereunto chosen, and be indeed some choice man, & picked out for eminencie of his vertues; by the President of Saul, the first Annointed King, whom God made Ruler ouer his owne people, though neither the Sonne of a King, nor nor yet of any Regall descent. So after him likewise Dauid the Sonne of [a] Ishai: the one for being valourous, and a Personage fitting royall dignity, the other for being Holy and Humble minded. To shew that so he, whosoeuer in a Kingdome excelleth all in Valour and Vertue, ought to surmount all in Rule and Authority: yet so, as that, if any of the Offspring of a deceased King surpasseth others, it is fitte iointly to consent in election of such a one. Thus hee spake (as hee professed) in fauour of Iohn, who then was present, whose most illustrious Brother King Richard dying without any Heire from him descending, Him they had all (first imploring the [b] Holy Ghosts assistance) as being a Prouident, Valiant, and [c] vndoubtedly-Noble Prince, vnanimiously Elected, as wel in regard of his Merites, as of his Royall Bloud. So vniust a speech from so great a Person, could not but moue both Offence and Wonder to many, euen to Iohn himselfe, who doubtlesse meant to stand to [d] his right of proximity by bloude: [e] but they durst not then and there moue Questions thereof, as afterward [f] some did, to whom he gaue a reason of it, as strange as the speech it selfe; saying, [g] that he was assured by some diuining foresight, that King Iohn would work the ruine of the Kingdome, and that therefore, to [h] bridle him from so doing, hee had affirmed his Admission was to be by Choice, and not Hereditary Succession: implying that as by Election he got the Crowne, so by Eiection on demerite hee might as iustly loose it. But for that present, the Ceremonies all pompously accomplished, (where [i] three Oaths were ministred to him; To loue Holy Church, and preserue it from all oppressors; To gouerne the State in Iustice, and aboiish bad Lawes; Not to assume this Royall honour but with full purpose to performe that he had sworne:) the first act and bounty of his kingly Power, was to reward those, whose hands had lifted him to it, making William Marshall and Fitz-Peter, Earles of Pembrooke and Essex, and the Archbishoppe, Lord high Chancellour; who seeming [l] to glory in that addition of honour, was told by the Lord Bardolf, that the height of Archiepiscopall dignity was such, as it was euer reputed a great aduancement for a Chancelor to be made Archbishoppe, but none for an Archbishop to be made a Chancellour.

(6) The Kings Enemies, [m] who kept their heads in, whiles hee was there in Armes, founde opportunities to impeach him, while hee was here setling his Peace: the [n] French King in Normandy surpriseth the City Eureux, & recouers the County of Main; the Britaines regaine the City Angiers with other strong holds: the newes whereof caused King Iohn with all speed [o] to passe the Seas, to giue stoppage to that current; where on his arriuall, his Army of [p] Friends and Voluntaries was so encreased, that King Philip was soone content to take [q] truce for fiftie dayes; on expiration whereof, an Enteruiew was agreed on to establish a lasting Peace. But Philip a [r] long time noted of dubling, (ill beseeming any, but chiefly a Prince) the [s] very day before the two Kings should meet, giuing Duke Arthur the [t] Belt of Knighthood, and taking of him Homage for the Signiories of Anion, Poyton, Turaine, Mayne, Britanny, and Normandy, hee made him faithful vow, to yeeld him powerfull helpes, for acquiring those possessions. Neither was King Iohn behind him in that kind of preuention, when Philip Earle of Flanders, the French Philips professed Enemie, [u] comming to Roan, and disswading King Iohn from trusting anie French friendship, did there sweare vnto him both faithfull Helpe and Homage. Yet the two Kings keeping touch for the day, though not for the purpose of amitie (and yet making faire shew of that too) held Parley betwixt Butauant and [y] Guletun, [z] two dayes by Commissioners inter-current, the third by presence and priuatie, that not one of their Nobles or Attendants (who on each side lay farre aloofe for the space of an houre) vnderstood any passages betwixt them. This much yet came to notice by after-relation, that [a] King Philip then required for Himselfe the large Country of [b] Vengessine, pretending that Geffry Earle of Anion graunted it to Lewis le Grosse, for aiding his Sonne King Henrie the second against King Stephen: and for Arthur, all Poyton, Anion, Maine and Turayne: both which immoderate demaunds with others, King Iohn (conceiuing with [l] Salomon, Why doth he not also aske for Adoniah the Kingdome?) [m] neither would nor ought to graunt vnto him; whereby their amities intended, ended in more hostile defiances. But Philips capitulating then for Arthur, was onely perfunctorie and complementall, as his owne words, (and afterward his actions) bewraied: when being questioned by his Fauourites of his implacable [n] hatred against King Iohn, who had neuer harmed him, professed it was onely, for that hee had (not, defeated Arthur, but) possessed himselfe of Normandie, and the other Demaines, without asking him leaue, or offering him Homage.

(7) The flames thus on all sides breaking forth the stronger, by how much the more they had been for a time kept in, [o] many Earles and Barons of Fraunce (who formerly adhered to King Richard) became Homagers to King Iohn, they swearing, neuer without his assent to reuert to Philip, and hee, neuer to make Peace with Philip, but they therein to bee concluded. In the heate of which tidings (if not before) a [p] chiefe adherent of the foresaid Earle [q] of Flanders (now col-leagued with King Iohn) being the Bishop Elect of Cambray, fell into the hands of the French, at which time also [q] Philip Bishop of Beauois, (a great French Peer) was held in prison by King Iohn; and neither of them willing to forgoe their mitred Champions, [r] Petrus de Capua, the Legat, interdicted France for the one, and Normandy for the other, till they, as persons sacred & inuiolable, should bee dismissed: yet King Iohn (whose Person and Title the Pope and Papals as yet much tendred) had the fauour to wring out of his prize, [s] sixe thousand Markes for his release, and an Oth, neuer whiles he breathed to beare Armes against any Christian. [t] This Legat in King Richards time, had made agreement with King Philip for a fiue yeeres Truce, which expiring with Richards last breath, hee still laboured to establish it betwixt the now-Kings: but King Philips great heart would not so come downe, which was likely to haue cost him deere. For pursuing whither his Furie (a bad guide) did lead him, after his siege of Luuardin ([u] Whence vpon King Iohns approach with his Army hee fled to Maunz, and thence again fled, King Iohn comming thither;) seized the Castle of Balun (which belonged to Arthur) and to preuent his enemy (as is likely) [x] he leuelled it vnto the very grounds; which fact Duke Arthurs [y] Generall, William de Rupibus wrathfully expostulating with King Philip, as hauing done therein contrarie to Couenants with his Lord Arthur, hee as scornfully answered, that hee would not for his Lord Arthures pleasure, forbeare his owne, in doing as himselfe listed, with such forts as hee tooke. The Generall seeing Arthur was but the outward maske, vnder which Philip reuelld for his hidden ends, [z] seriously perswaded his Lord to reconcilement with his vncle King Iohn, and rather to hazard his hopes on the clemency of a Generous Foe, then on the guiles of a false hearted Friend: & so making his peace with King Iohn, hee presentlie yeelded vp to him both Maunz, & (with Lady Constance) the young Duke also, the important matter of so great contentions. But Heauens were not so propitious to these Reconciliats, as so to hold them long: some Philippines buzzing such needlesse [a] terrors of Imprisonment into the Noble Childs eares, that the next night, Feare giuing wings to his flight, as Loue did to his Mothers, (for leauing her husband [b] Ranulph Earle of Chester, shee was amorous of, and married Guido a gallant Gentleman, who thē fled with her,) they escaped into Angiers. Arthur neither sure of K. Philip, nor sure to K. Iohn, had now cast himselfe betwixt two Milstones; but (howsoeuer) Philip ment the greist in the end should be his.

(8) The breach betwixt these two great Kings, was the more irreconcileable, by reason of the hatred betwixt King Philip and the Emperour [c] Otho, King Iohns Nephew, whose aduancement to the Empire (himselfe perhaps [d] aiming to it) Philip still endeauoured to impeach, [e] not regarding that the Pope (whose power Kings then regarded only, while it made for their purpose) had thundered his Anathema against all his Opposers: and Otho in [f] gratitude to King Richard, who [g] procured him the Diadem Imperiall, and in tender regard of his vncles honour, sent him aduise, [h] not to hasten any finall attonement with the French King, for that himselfe would bring him his vtmost Imperiall assistance. Notwithstanding, by the Cardinall-Legates assiduous interceding, a Truce was concluded till the [i] Feast of Saint Hilary: at which time, the Kings comming to a Treaty betwixt Wailun and Butauant Castles, [k] it was agreed: that Lewis the Heyre of France should marry King Iohns Neece, Blanch, Daughter of Alfonsus King of Castile; that King Iohn should giue for Dowry the City and County of Eureux, with sundry Forts in Normandy, and thirty thousand Markes in siluer; vowing also not to aide his Nephew Otho with men or means to attain the Empire: & further, [l] promising to leaue (if he died without Issue) vnto Lewis al the Territories he held in France; all which Articles were [m] formerly engrossed, but finally cõcluded betwixt Butauant, & Guletun (the * one, K. Iohns, the other, King Philips Castle) the [n] Octaues of Saint Iohn Baptist, when, these Counties were actually surrendred to Philip; the Lady Blanch [o] espoused to Lewis his son; Duke Arthur (Philips once vowed, but now vnualued charge,) yeelded ouer, and made [p] Seruant and [q] Homager to K. Iohn for his own Dukedom; whom yet his vncle was content to leaue with King Philip, who had now so left him, and erst had vpheld him, onely as the baite of his owne aduantage. If Princes can bee thus vnprincely degenerous, what trust can men repose in baser vassals? King Iohn hereupon proued much more stedfast to Philip, then either Philip was to him, or himselfe to Otho the Emperor, who sending his two Brethren Henry Duke of Saxony, and William (surnamed of [r] Winton) to demand the Counties of [s] Yorke and Poictou, with the Treasure and Iewels which [t] King Richard bequeathed him: King Iohn denied to yeeld thereunto, [u] only in regard of his Oath which hee had passed to Philip, to yeelde no kind of aide to the Emperour. And further to testifie, (yea further then he ought) his faithfull meaning to preserue intire this amity with Philip, [x] by his aduise he diuorced [y] Hawisia his wife, as too [z] neere of Bloud, by sentence of the Archbishop, and Bishops of Burdeaux, Poictoirs, and Xanton, and by the Archbishops hands espoused Isabell, [a] Heiretrice of Ailmar Earle of Angolisme, a faire yong Lady, but [b] dedestined to another bed.

(9) This Finall Concord (so [c] called, but not prouing so) with Philip, who now acknowledged Iohn the [d] rightfull Heire of King Richards Crowne, gaue him more leasur, to receiue peaceably all [e] Submitties, and bring in forceably all [f] out-standers of those his transmarine Dominions, and after to look home to the affaires of his Kingdome, from which hee had beene (and we there following him,) too long absent. Yet in the heate of those forrain imploiments, hee on occasions had his recourses hither to settle his State-affaires, and [g] Crowne-Reuenewes; to enact wholesome [h] lawes for forraine and domesticke Commerce; to collect an [i] Ayde for his Neeces great Dowry, and Martiall vses; which later (being three shillinges on euery [k] Carrucata,) though his first and onely Subsidie since his comming to the Crowne, caused much heart-burning; especially by meanes of his [l] owne brother Geffry Archbishoppe of Yorke (touching whom the King was [m] forewarned, that hee would bring a Sword, & not Peace into England) who bearing himselfe too bold on his bloud and place, [n] forbad the Collectours of that Aide in his precincts (though it were [o] granted to the King generally for all England) and also being required by the King to attend him into France, to conclude the Peace, and his Neeces Espousall, he very vndutifully denied his seruice. The King [p] iustly moued with those his disloyalties, caused all his Temporalities to bee seized on by his Sheriffe; whom therefore Geffry (adding fresh fuel to the fire) did solemnly excommunicate, caused the Kings Officers to beare blowes, and interdicted the whole Prouince of Yorke. So partiall, and vnhistoricall, is the report of [q] one; (a Stranger by birth, but more strange for bold vntruthes) who faines the onely incentiue of such indignation in the King, was that Prelates reprehension of his Rapines on the people. For (to giue a further taste of that Authors [r] vehement fond malice, iustly so taxed) what ancient Iudicious Writers call an [s] Aid necessarie for Warres, that he enstileth Rapines and Spoiles; where they make Iohn his Brothers Heyre by Will, hee makes Arthur; they say hee was a [t] valiant man, hee saith he was a Coward; where they make him [u] pursuing, and Philip flying, hee chargeth him to haue made onely plaints, when he should haue drawne swords; where they charge the Peeres for [x] drawing backe from his Warres, hee makes them the onely Hasteings, and Iohn the Hinderer; briefly, if a [y] fire-shooting Meteor appeare aboue, it portends Heauens fury on Iohn; if the [z] watry Element ouerflow, it bodes Iohns fury on his Land. But surely that part thereof, which fell on Geoffry, it was (you see) not vndeserued: notwithstanding, vpon the Kings * returne into England, and Geoffreys to his more loyall carriage & submission, his Peace was made, at the very time, & for the more celebrity, of Queen Isabels * Coronation, with whom the King himselfe was * again crowned at Westminster by Archbishop Hubert.

(10) The Pompe of that solemnitie ended, the King resolued of ending a long depending controuersie with King William of Scotland, who formerlie (before Iohn was proclaimed King) had challenged, as [a] his patrimoniall Right, the Counties of Northumberland, and Cumberland; and afterward seeing he got but words and delaies, was ready, (King Iohn being then in France) with an hotter and more forceable argument, to winne, what hee could not craue: but being in dark [b] deuotion all Night at Saint Margarets Hearse, the still true [c] English-hearted Queen perswaded him by a Dreame (for certainely it was no other) not to infest England her natiue soile; who thereupon sent backe his Army. But now he commeth with a more friendly traine, vpon King Iohns sending to him, in Honourable [d] Embassage, the Earles of Huntingdon and Hereford, King Williams Brother and Nephew, his three Sonnes in Law, Lacy, Vescy and Ros with others, to desire him to giue him meeting at [e] Lincolne, where accordingly they both [f] meet with kingly curtesies; and the next day, King Iohn to auspicate his Temporall affaires with Spirituall deuotions, (and yet to shew what hee thought of some superstitious follies of those times) went [g] vndauntedly into the Cathedrall Church, being much disswaded by many, (for Monkish Impostures perswaded many it was very ominous for a King to enter that, and certaine [h] other places) and there offered a golden Chalice on Saint Iohns Altar, which [i] no King before him durst doe. Where his Deuotions performed, the two Kings (in presence of * three Archbishops, thirteene Bishops, the King of South-Wales, with a multitude of English, Scottish, French, and Irish Princes and Peeres,) ascending the toppe of that conspicuous & high * hill, on the North side of the Citie, did there in a glorious solemnity, sweare amitie and faithfull loue, [k] vpon the Crosier of Archbishop Hubert.

(11) That Spectacle so roial to the beholders, was seconded with another no lesse Honourable to K. Iohn, (for Humility in such great ones is more glorious then their glory,) when the King hauing latelie left left Hugh Bishoppe of Lincolne (called the Saint, for the opinion of vnfained integrity, though [1] blemished with some obstinacies, and surcharged with Legends of [m] fained Miracles) at London very sicke, (where himselfe with gracious care [n] went to visite him, and both confirmed his Testament and promised the like for other Bishoppes after,) now hearing hee was [*] dead, and his Corpes then bringing into the gates of Lincolne, hee, with all that princely Traine, went forth to meete it; the [o] three Kings (though the Scottish was to depart that very day) with their roiall Allyes, carrying the Hearse on those shoulders, accustomed to vphold the weight of whole kingdomes: from whom the Great Peeres receiued the same, and bare it to the Church Porch, whence the three Archbishops and Bishops conuaied it to the Quier, and the next day (it there lying the meane time [p] open faced, mitred, and in all Pontificall Ornamentes, with Gloues on his hands, and a Ring on his finger) interred it with all solemnities answerable. Yet here the King rested not to giue proofe, in so great a height, of his lowly mind, and then benigne (how euer afterward auerted) to the Clergy; when twelue Abbots of the Cisteaux Habit (whose [q] whole Order had displeased him, by refusing to giue Aid towardes his great payment of thirtie thousand pounds) [r] came now to Lincolne, and all prostrate at his feet, craued his gracious fauour, for that his Forresters had driuen out (for so the King had giuen commaund) of his Pastures and Forrests all their Cattle, wherewith themselues, and Christs Poore were sustained. The King touched with remorse on so venerable a troope of Suppliants, (though so great offenders) commaunded them to rise, who were no sooner vp, but the King [s] inspired with diuine Grace, fell flat on the ground before them, desiring pardon; adding, that hee not onely admitted them to his loue, & their [*] beasts to his Pastures, (a speciall fauour which Kings had graunted that Order,) but would also build an Abbey for men of their sort, (if they would designe some choice seat) wherein himselfe meant to bee enshrined. Neither did he promise then more then hee performed, nor were those wylie Humiliates regardlesse of choosing a delicate plotte for the purpose, where hee built a goodlie Abbey of their Order, deseruedly for the pleasance of the place, named [t] Beaulieu, and of [u] rich Reuenue, and exceslliue Priuiledge; continuing long of great renowne, as a Castle of refuge inuiolable; our Auncestors thinking it most hainous sacrilege, thence to draw any, though wilfull Murderers or Traitors: wherein the Founders of such vnsanctified [x] Sanctuaries, & Temples of Mercy (so they called thē) throughout this Kingdom, seemed rather to take Romulus for their President, thē Moses, who granting fauor to casuall Manslaughters, yet [y] commanded wilfull Murderers to bee drawn from the Altar to the slaughter.

(12) By what degrees, men not onely of such reputed-religious habit, but also of the Secular-Clergy, fell afterward more and more from such fauours of the King, and hee from theirs, a man that will not purposely winke, may easily behold, both sorts standing so stiffe on their persons, and their possessions Exemption from Regall commaund, that whiles the [z] Pope could haue all for any superfluous imploiment, the King could get nothing, though his Kingdome were in hazard, as you heard by the disloyall obstinacies both of the Archbishop of Yorke, who denied the King his personall attendance, and those Cisteaux Monkes, whose Coffers were thus lockt against him. The like pretended Exemptions of their Clergie-Prelacies (as well as of their Persons and Purses) wrought also like offences, both with former Kinges, and now with King Iohn, who on the death of Bishop Hugh, resoluing to conferre by gift, (as his [b] Ancestors did, and [c] himselfe elsewhere lately had) that See, on some whom either merite or affection had endeared to him, (the rather, because [d] men of those places, in those dayes, were vsually their Soueraignes bosom-Counsellors) [*] hee was with peremptory affronts withstood by the Cannons there, who very bolde on the Popes vpbearing, reckt very slenderly their Princes displeasing. It is not vnlikely that Archbishop Hubert (lest Canterbury might be thought inferior to Yorke in daring boldnes,) as being Papal Legate, in secret bolstring them had a hand, though closely carried in a gloue: for that the man, who lately, [f] gloried the King was wholy his, now finding hee had not the sway hee expected, and thought hee deserued (by obligement of his first Agency about the Crowne,) not onely studied to make vpp that by his Legatine Glory which hee wanted by his Princes countenance, but further, (as [g] one who thinkes hee extolles his vertue, paints forth his disloyalty) hee repented now, more then any thing in all his life, that hee had so aduanced King Iohn to the Crowne. Certes, about this time, hee shewed slender respect to his Soueraigne, (for as God is in his, so are Kings dishonoured in their Ministers disgraces) when being prohibited by Fitz-Peter, the Kings great Iustitiar and Minister (in the Kings absence) of regall commaund, [h] from holding a General Councell of his Prouince, (neuer vsed to bee held, but by Soueraigne permittance) his pleasure scornde to take any countermaund, but from him especiallie, who, in [i] calling his inferior, by [*] ioynt deserts towards the King, but his Equall, was now, in neerenesse and fastnesse to the King, become farre his Superiour. But what speake I of confronting a subordinate power? did hee spare to out-beard his Soueraigne himselfe? It seemes no. For hauing notice, the Feast of the Natiuity now approaching, that the King intended with his Queene, at Guilford to keepe that feastiuity with great magnificence; he whose Pallace ordinarily, for Splendour, multitude of Attendants, and sumptuous intertainements did striue with the Kings (as one of his own [k] Successors auows) thought this a fitting time, to shew, both his great state, and little regard of his Princes discountenance, by [l] paraleling to the Kings, his owne sumptuous preparations, [m] with rich attires, and costly gifts for his Attendants at Canterbury. The King (as Kings brooke not to bee braued by Subiects, nor is it wisedome for disfauourites to doe it,) moued [n] with great indignation, thought the man had too much riches, & too little Discretion (which seldome lodgeth in the braine, where Pride dwels in the Heart,) and therefore to abate somewhat the one, and learne him more of the other, hauing first beene in the [o] North parts to gather money for his better vses, hee meant not to lauish it in keeping his Easter, which he chose rather to doe at the cost of Hubert the [p] Rich; & not to spare him, who spared not himselfe, he there increast that great expense with a greater, of His, and his Queenes solemne [q] crowning againe on Easter day, in the Cathedrall Church; where, in lieu of his expence, Hubert had the formall honour to set on their Crownes, but yet not the grace to sit neere the Kings Heart.

(13) Such being the first ouertures of hart-burnings betwixt the King and his Clergy, which after by additament of dayly fuelling, brast forth into a more fearefull flame; the Lay-Peeres were so farre from labouring to quench it, that they made it the fiercer: for these Bellowes of Rebellion, which before their Homages did condition for their Rights & Liberties, were not all this while sparing of their breath, to inflame other Nobles with the like heat of fury. Hell it selfe (whence al Rebellions spring, and thither fall againe) could not wish a fitter occasion to broach and actuate such a mischiefe. For the [r] Poytouins with King Philips conniuence, (taking aduantage of King Iohns absence, and Springs approach) were vp in Armes, dislodged his Garrisons, beleagured his Castles; tidings whereof recalled King Iohns thoughtes from his Domesticke Pompes, to his Transmarine Affaires; for the present, he gaue commaund to his [*] Seneschall of Normandy, mandy to attempt on them ſome Counter-ſeruices, to withdraw the Seigers, (whom alſo King Philip, [f] hearing King Iohn was in perſon comming ouer with an Army, forthwith recalled,) and publiſhed his generall [t] ſummons, that his Earles, Barons, and all that held by Knights-ſeruice, ſhould bee ready at Portſmouth with Horſe and Armes, on Whitſonday then inſtant, to croſſe the ſeas with him. The tumultuous Earles knowing, that the King then needed their preſent helpes, and therefore might bee forced to any Capitulations, in a conuenticle held at Leyceſter, by a [u] ioint conſpiring, ſent an audacious meſſage to the King, that they would not attend him, vnleſſe hee would firſt reſtore their rightes; with which diſloiall refuſall, the King iuſtly incenſed, [*] by ſome mens too precipitate aduiſe, (conſidering the hazardous time which needed a ſalue rather then a coraſiue) ſeized into his hands ſome of their Caſtles, to preuent their further attempts, of ſome he tooke their children for pledges, and others, whoſe Purſes were likely to doe him truer ſeruice then their owners, hee [x] releaſed vpon payments. At which prefixed time, he diſpatched before him william Earle of Pembrooke, and Lord Roger Lacie with [y] two regiments to ioyne with Normandies Seneſhall. What a [*] graue Author iudged of thoſe bold Barrons here, and other turbulent Great-ones then abroad, may bee gathered by this; that aſſoone as mention fell in of thoſe refractary Lords, he ſtreight fell off, to ſhew how in that very yeare, Pope Innocent then raigning in Rome, Saffadine the Turke in Ieruſalem, [*] Alexander the [z] Fatricide in Conſtantinople, (for ſo he yoketh thoſe three together, with ſome others following them;) the great Doctors preached, that then was the time ([a] propheſied by Saint Iohn) when after a thouſand yeers reſtraint, the Diuell was let looſe, to ſeduce the Nations like a [b] Serpent, and trouble the world like a [c] Dragon: which how true it proued in this our Nation and little-World, (in whoſe Tragedy the Diuell alſo, amongſt the [d] firſt named Actors, comes now to play his part,) the Diabolicall enſuing practiſes, both of fraud and fury, will hereafter demonſtrate.

(14) The King, though thus diſfurniſhed of his principall home-helpes, yet [e] entruſting the cuſtodie of the land, eſpecially thoſe Southern parts, with [f] Hubert de Burgo Lord Chamberlaine, and receiuing to [g] full reconcilement (for more ſecurity of the Northerne,) Geffrey Archbiſhop of Yorke, whoſe [h] Churches large Priuiledges then he ratified; without delay at Porteſmouth hee put forth to ſea, with Iſabel his Queene, though in ſundry Bottomes, and with differing ſucceſſe, a [i] ſudden guſt diſparting the Fleet, whereby the King was driuen backe on the Iſle of Wight, but the Queene [k] with much adoe, arriued ſafe in Normandy, whom ſoon after the King followed thither. Vpon whoſe arriuall, the French King [l] perceiuing the power of his aduerſary, preſently condiſcended to another perſonall (but very [m] priuate) Parley; wherein each gaue and receiued ſuch reciprocall ſatisfaction in their deſires, that thereupon, not onely the former bonds of Amity ſeemed to cõtinue ſtrong, but were alſo more ſtrengthned with a new knot of [n] Aſſociation, wherein ſundry great Lords of either ſide were by indentment of Writing, made ſuerties to the counter-part, with condition, that whither of the two Kings did firſt violate the Couenants, all his cautionary Lords ſhould bee releaſed of their alleagiance to him, and become Leegemen and Aſſiſtants to the Prince offended. And that the world might take more notice of their combined loues, they [o] both agreede to contribute to the Holy-Warres, (which now beganne to bee on foot) the fortieth part of the whole Reuenewes of their Crownes; ſending their [p] letters abroad into their Dominions, to encourage all their Nobles & people, by their examples to doe the like. With which intercourſes, & other cõplements, three daies being ſpent betwixt them, King Philip the deeper to ſerue himſelfe into King Iohns good opinion, (the [*] ſureſt way to ouerreach another in any commerce) by intreaty obtained his company, firſt to S. Denyſes Pallace, [q] where hee entred with a pompous Proceſſion of the Clergy, and lodged with royall entertainment by the King; and the next day, to Paris, where hee was receiued with [r] very rich Preſents of the City, and great applauſe of all ſorts, to ſee ſo noble arguments of affection betwixt two ſo great princes, lately ſo mortall enemies: where the French King betaking himſelfe to a more priuate manſion, left his owne pallace to accommodate and honor Englands King. After ſome dayes there beſtowed in princely delights, and entertainements, King Iohn conducted forth of the City by King Philip, and parting with mutuall atteſtations of loue neuer to bee parted, tooke his iourney towards Normandy, in ful hope to enioy thence forward the contentment of quiet to himſelfe, and peace to his Dominions: but thoſe windy hopes ſoone changed with his change of the aire.

(15) For whiles at Chinon hee was roially entertaining Queene Berengaria his [a] ſiſter (whom [b] hee there alſo bounteouſly ſatisfied in performing the Ioynture promiſed her by King Richard, giuing her the [c] City and Signiory of Baion, two Caſtles, and their Demaines in Anion, with a thouſand Markes yeerelie for tearme of life,) and at [c] Argenton in Normandy, where hee kept his Chriſtmas, was ſolacing himſelfe with his faire Queen Iſabel; the Earle of March, Hugh, ſurnamed Le-Brun, a [d] Peere of great power and alliance, to whom Iſabel was firſt promiſed (though for her [e] vnripe yeares he neuer bedded her) enflamed with loue of her, who was now thought worthy to bee a Queene, [f] drew on other Poictouine Nobles, to thinke that hee was vnworthy to bee a King, who wrongfully had taken her [g] from him, and would, if not preuented, do the like in time with them. So, [h] once againe young Arthur, whoſe former hopes were all cold, is re-kindled by theſe fire-brands, and ſet vp by their malice, to ſupplant his vncle, but by Heauens Decree, to ouerthrow himſelfe; howſoeuer the [i] Britaines, then faſcinated with his ominous Name, dreamed that the ancient Great Arthur was riſen againe in him, and that the Tranſlation of the Engliſh Kingdom was now by him to be effected. Neither was the [k] French King, for all his late painted pretenſions of loue, deafe to their ſuggeſtions, who laboured to incenſe his hatred againſt Iohn; whereto hee had theſe further inducements; that King Iohn might quicklie waxe too potent a Neighbour in that Continent, if his quiet and power were not timely rebated; that now the meanes to worke it, were more then before, the [l] Engliſh Peeres being alienated in affection from him, for denying their claimed Liberties; but chiefly, that the [m] profite (ſuch baſe ends can ſome propoſe of ſo Noble a Band) which hee hoped for by his amity (being the [n] enioying of thoſe Signiories in the Continent, if hee died ſans Iſſue) was now in a manner cut off. Queene Iſabel beginning to giue apparant hopes of ſome faire fruite from ſo faire a ſtemme. Thus whiles Earle Hugh out of his loue, Duke Arthur out of Ambition, King Philip out of Auarice, (ah that the nobleſt perſon ſhould haue the baſeſt end,) but all out of Hatred, were contriuing King Iohns ruine; hee was fartheſt from ſuſpition, when neereſt his danger, and yet they, who thus were forwardeſt to vndermine his Greatnes, were themſelues formoſt to bee cruſht with the weight thereof.

(16) But theſe ſlie Serpents ſhrowded in ſecret their enuenomed heades, till the warmth of the [o] Spring (a time ſuiting for martiall miſchiefes) called them forth; when King Philip (hauing newly caſt his skinne, and as moſt able, ſo was [p] moſt willing to break the way) deſired another enterview with King Iohn: who comming thither (the [q] place was twixt Vernon and Liſle Dandale) vvith expectation

tion of ſome fruits of thoſe louely courteſies which their laſt meeting ſeemed to haue engrafted; he there found that this laſt winter had nipt all thoſe faire bloſſomes. For Philip, [r] forgetfull of all former Compacts, and [s] pretending ſome imaginary wrongs, in outragious manner [t] required him without delay to redeliuer into Arthurs hands, all his Tranſmarine dominions, Normandy, Turayne, Anion, Poictou; or otherwiſe as Lord Paramount of thoſe Countries, which Iohn held by Homage, he peremptorily [u] cited him perſonally to appeare in [x] Eaſter Terme at Paris, there to [x] anſwere what ſhould bee laide to his charge, and to abide the Arreſt of his Court of Iuſtice. The colour on which hee thus did cite him, was (ſay [y] ſome) King Iohns ſharpe repreſſing of ſome rebellious attempts of Hugh le brun the former yeer, whereof the Earle complained to King Philip, as to the chiefe Lord. King Iohn much amaſed to ſee, not onely hony ſo ſoone diſtempered into gall, but the French King alſo turned into an Apparatour, [z] diſdained both his Citation and Commaunds, as very vnnoble for Englands King to accept, or the French to offer; neither indeed did Philip thus put the matter to daying, as intending any ſuch legitimate proceeding, but onely to make his aduerſary ſecure of any other aſſaults, then by Petty-foggers. For whether it be true or no, [a] that King Iohn for his non-appearance, was by ſentence of the French Peeres adiudged to looſe all his Territories in the Continent: certaine it is, that [b] no ſooner was the Conference with indignation broken off, but Philip (hee had before prepared to effect what hee had proiected) with power and fury aſſailes Butauant Caſtle, whoſe Turrets (high-reared by [c] King Richard) hee [d] leuelled with the Foundations, and thence ſodainely like a flaſh of lightning, beganne to inuolue the [e] neighbouring partes with ranſakings and ruines, till giuing an aſſault, (which had held him eight dayes) to the Caſtle of Radepont, King Iohn comming to the reſcue, forced him with ſhame to ſpeed away. To repaire which diſhonour, and to empaire the Engliſh forces by diſtraction of imploiments, returning to Paris, hee there [f] appoints for Arthur (to [g] whom hee had now affianced his yonger daughter) both certaine ſelected Nobles to bee protectors to ſecure and guard his perſon, & alſo bands of Souldiers to attend his commaund, amongſt which were 200. the [h] choice Knights of France; all which in [i] very pompous Troupes followed him, (with Philips [k] directions, and alſo ſupply of [l] great ſummes of money) into Poictou, to reduce thoſe partes to his Allegiance; which was no hard matter to effect; the greater part of Commaunders there (being fore-wrought) expecting nothing more, and the better part ſuſpecting nothing leſſe, then theſe perfidious aſſaults.

(17) Queene Eleanor Regent of thoſe prouinces, attended with a [k] very ſlender guard, yet ſtrong inough for daies of quiet, (which both her [l] Age did now deſire, and her [m] Homage done to Philip, and Philips faire ſhewes to her did promiſe;) hauing no ſpeedier notice of thoſe incurſions, then the vnpleaſing effects thereof, (for on Arthurs good ſucceſſes, [n] K. Philip proclaimed him Lord of thoſe Dominions) betooke her ſelfe into Mirabeau, one of the moſt tenable townes in [o] Poictou, ſending to King Iohn, (whoſe forces were then in [p] Normandy and [q] Mayne, repreſſing or preuenting Philips attempts) for preſent aids. Which yet could not ſo ſpeedily come, but Arthur (who knew that vpon ſeiſure of ſuch a prize as Eleanour, hee might draw her ſonne to any conditions) had preuented them, beſieged her, and [r] poſſeſſed himſelfe of her towne, though not of her perſon, as [s] ſome by miſ-underſtanding haue miſ-related. For ſhe [t] retiring into the Caſtle, made it good againſt her Grandchilds inceſſant batterie; about which, whiles he, with his [x] continuall ſupplies of Poitouine and [y] Aniouine princes, was [z] indefatigably buſied, King Iohns Army neere at hand (for his expedition both by day and night to his mothers reſcue, is recorded as [a] admirable) brought the newes of their owne approch; which cauſed [b] the great Army of the Leagers ſo induſtrious before to impeach others, no leſſe ſollicitous now to defend themſelues. Both Armies [c] martially ranged, & Arthurs Battalions not onely [d] vndaunted-ly, but alſo very [e] pompouſly comming on to the ſhocke, the fight proued [f] moſt fierce and terrible, each ſide reſoluing, by reaſon of both the Competitors preſence in the field, that the End and vpſhot of all their deſignes, depended on that dayes ſucceſſe: which in the end by the fortunate [g] proweſſe of King Iohn and his Engliſh, fell diſaſtrouſlie on Arthur, his French, and other Aſſiſtants, who after a [h] great ſlaughter made amongſt them, [i] turning their backs to him, from whom they had before turned their Faithes, tooke their flight [k] towards the Towne, to ſhelter their liues within thoſe walles, which ſo late the Seat of their triumphes, became now the cage of their captiuation, and the Toombe of all Arthurs ambitious hopes, though himſelfe ſo vnhappy as to ſuruiue them: for [l] together with the tumultuary flyers, the victorious King & his Armie entred, renued a [m] moſt bloudy fight, repoſſeſſed the Town, freed his mother, enthralled his Enemies, and recouered all the prouinces which had reuolted.

(18) This victory was ſo glorious to King Iohn, and ſo dreadful to his Enemies, (for King Philips two chiefe confederates, [n] Arthur and Hugh Brun, [o] Raymund, Father to Guido the husband of Conſtancia, [p] all the Peeres of Poictou and Anion, [q] aboue 200. French Knights and others of command, beſides the vulgar multitudes were taken priſoners) that both then King Philip, though very hote in the ſiege of Argues in Normandy, preſently cooled and [r] confounded with newes thereof, brake vppe his fortnights ſiege, and returned home; and ſince, the French fawning fauourites, and King Iohns maligners haue ſought to extenuate the matter, auerring againſt [s] all truth of record, that it was exploited [t] before the French were come to Arthurs aide, and [u] when all his Souldiers were both vnarmed and vnordered. But, as others highly extolling king Iohns valour herein, [x] interprete thoſe fore-doomes of Merlin to haue beene ment of him, [y] that hee ſhould hee crowned with the head of a Lion, ſhould cut out the tongues of Bulles, and lay yron chaines on the backes of roring Beaſts (and indeed hee [z] chained them hand and foot, and ſo conuayed them away in Carts, a kind of riding till then vnuſuall with them,) ſo King Iohn himſelfe, [a] duely acknowledging the greatneſſe of Gods goodneſſe therein, ſent his Letters to all his Barons whereſoeuer (thereby to encourage the loiall, and hold in awe the tomultuous) inciting them to render all prayſe vnto God for ſo admirable a worke, and ſo gratious aſſiſtance: and ſoone after [b] hee diſperſed his nobleſt Captiues into ſundrie Caſtles in Normandy and England; Arthurs ſiſter Eleanor, called the Damoſell of Britaine, being [c] committed to Briſtow Caſtle, where ſhee [d] long liued with [e] very honourable vſage. And though the kings diſpleaſure was iuſtly incenſed againſt her brother Arthur, for ſo frequent wauering in his faith, yet meaning to trie all meanes of winning him who had thus loſt himſelfe, [f] hee ſent for him (being then at Falaiſe in the cuſtody of [g] Hubert L. Chamberlain) and entreated him very gently, promiſing him all honourable reſpects, if (as yet) he would reſolue to forſake the French kings amity, and frame both his mind for hearty loue, and his Actions for peaceable obſeruance towardes him, his vncle and Leege Lord. Which exceeding clemency, the ill-aduiſed young Gentleman (for what wiſedome is it to ſhew pride where wee neede mercy, and to giue threates beyond poſsibility of performance?) [h] requited onely with arrogant and vndutifull Language, furiouſly obraiding the king with violent and fraudulent detention of the Engliſh Crowne, which menacingly he there required of him, and all other King Richards Countries, as his lawfull inheritance, (19) The Britaines fury and conſpiracies, which King Iohn hoped to abate by this their Princes durance, [l] were thereby much more augmented; like Serpents, moſt ſtrugling with their traines, when they feele their head in preſſure. Which moued the King, who was now returned into England, (and in triumph of his late victory, [m] wore his crowne againe at Canterbury at the coſt of his former hoſt) to take aduiſe of his Councell touching his troubled affaires, whoſe ſentence was (if wee will credite the [o] reporter) that Arthur ſhould looſe his eyes. But the eſcaping of ſuch tortures, is by [p] ſome aſcribed to the commiſeration of Lord Hubert; by [q] others, to the mediation of Queene Eleanor, who interceded with her Sonne for her Grandchild as long as ſhe liued, which was not long; Deathes vnpartiall hand (and [r] griefe of heart, ſome ſay) laying that great & prudent Queen, (the wife of * two mighty Kings, and mother of * three) where Princes and Peſants are all equals. Her Nephew much behind her in age, ſoon ouertook her (if not [s] outwent her) in deſtiny; whoſe death diuulged on King Iohns returne from England, [t] gaue his maligners freſh coloured occaſion, both to moleſt his quiet, and to diſtaine his eſtimation, as if hee had not onely beene the Cauſer, but alſo the executor of it with his owne hands.

(20) As the Tongues of Paraſites are no true ſcales to weigh the worth and vertues of Great men; ſo neither ought we to iudge of their (or any mans) blemiſhes, by the deforming pencils of Enuy or Rancour; with one of which, no eminency, either of place or of vertue, was euer vnattended. And that this bloody aſperſion on the King, came from no other fountaine but malignity; ſuch as then liued, and might therefore beſt know the truth, and were alſo (as Monkes gnerally were) his moſt bitter Taxers, and therefore farre from ſaluing his infamy with partiall falſhood, can beſt witneſſe. It was (ſaith [u] one) by certaine perſons auowed that Arthur attempting to eſcape ſecretly out of hold, was by caſualty drowned in the Riuer Seyne (on which the Caſtle of Roan is ſeated;) and yet the Frenchmen, the Kings mortall enemies (and therefore plenary credite not to bee giuen them) giue it out, that hee was murthered by the Kings command, yea and by his owne hands: thus by the malice of ſlanderers, Englands King became not a little defamed. With whom other the approuedſt Authors accord (thogh differing in the * manner of his death) that this imputation ſprang onely from the [x] French emulation, as ſince it hath beene kept on foot, onely by [y] French, or Italianate ſpirits; [z] one of which hath not bluſhed to charge King Iohn with murdering of his owne Brother King Richard, and [b] another with killing Arthurs ſiſter, who yet outliued him 24. yeeres; ſo ſhameleſly will the penne blur the truth of Actions, where its once dipped in gall againſt the perſon. But ſharper ſhowers then of tongues (which being vndeſerued, are to bee vnregarded) were ſequels of Arthurs death: it ſeeming to giue new life to King Iohns troubles, & King Philips hatred, which yet once againe muſt go masked vnder the roabe of Iuſtice. For Philip cites Iohn as Duke of Normandy, to appeare at a ſet day, to bee tried vpon point of [c] Treaſon by his Peeres; Conſtance Arthurs mother (well brooking her name for her immutable hatred to King Iohn) is made the [d] plantiffe, requiring iuſtice of Philip, as both their Soueraigne; King Iohn not appearing, is condemned [c] of a traiterous outrage, for that careleſſe of his oath made to the French, he though an vncle, had murthered his elder brothers ſonne, being an Homager to the French, and that within the French Territories; without any legall courſe, nor by cognizance of thoſe to whom it appertained; whereupon hee is adiudged to bee held an enemie to the French State, to forfeit all his Signories which by Homage he held of the French, and thoſe to reuert to the Crowne of France, and a re-entry to bee made by force of Armes, if any deny poſſeſſion. Thus now the ſecond time, by ſolemne ſentence the King & Peeres of France diſherited and condemned King Iohn, though abſent, vnheard, neither confeſſing, nor conuicted of the Action; albeit at that time [f] hee ſent them his royall promiſe to come, (if they would giue him publike faith and ſafe conduct for his comming & returning) and anſwere at Paris touching the death of Arthur, though hee was his Leegeman, had ſworne him fealty, had violated the ſame, had raiſed a rebellion, and was taken in battle. Vpon which grounds, if King Iohn had cauſed the pretended execution on ſo capitall a Complotter both againſt his Life & Crown; and one, who had cauſed ſo much bloudſhed of his people, and more would if he had eſcaped; in [g] which caſes Princes are and ought to be very iealous; what vnderſtanding Statiſt can iuſtly condemne him, or iuſtifie the French iniuſtice? Eſpecially it being queſtionable, and euen then [h] much debated, Whether the Peeres of France were competent Iudges on a King annointed, and ſo their ſuperiour, the King of England and Duke of Normandy being but one perſon, & maior dignitas abſorbet minorem, the greater dignity was to ſwallow vp the leſſe. But when the will of a Ruler, is a rule, or ruled-caſe to his Iudges, no other could bee expected then by theſe Peeres was performed.

(21) Neither did they here ſtay; but (as in moſt States, the Acts and Decrees aduantageous to the Princes, are carefully purſued, though others ſeldome or coldly executed) that heady ſentence was [i] ſeconded with as haſty force, on Philips part, and on Iohns (if ſome Authors ſay true) as much neglected. It is no rare thing to ſee Princes (becauſe on their ſafety depends the State of their Kingdomes) often ſuſpitious of dangers where there is no cauſe; but it is vnexcuſable in them, vnder a ſhew of reſolution to bee ſecure, where they ſee their Perſon or State may bee neere vnto hazard. An intelligent man would thinke, that whiles ſo vaſte indignities were in hatching (yea and now on wing) by ſo inſatiate enemies, King Iohn had beene whetting his reuenge, leuying his forces, ſtrengthning his confines, combining his friends and Allies, ſo to regret their pride and malice, who thus proceeded to vnſtate him of that [k] goodlieſt portion of France, [l] part wherof for aboue three hundred yeers had been the inheritance of his Anceſtors. But whether it were the * bewitching dalliances of his faire Iſabel, with whom hee was in armes, when hee ſhould haue been in Armes, as [m] ſome Authors taxe him; or his deceiued expectation of Aides from his Barons, as [n] himſelfe alleadged; or promiſed redreſſe by the Pope, as the [o] ſequele ſhewed: too true it ſeemeth, that beginning his Chriſtmas at Cane in Normandy with feſtiuall pleaſures not vnfitting the ſeaſon, hee continued them ſo vnſeaſonably and vnreaſonably too, that he gaue both to the [p] French leaſure to execute their Peeres ſentence, and [q] to the Brittons and Poytouins, an edge to proſecute their old rebellions, now newquickned with the loſſe of their young maſter: whereby his ſtrongeſt Towns and Caſtles dayly fell away, either by force of Aſſailants, or treachery in defendants, or on diſpaire of needfull aides.

But ſuch a death (though of all other moſt diſgracefull) is not ſo hatefull to a Spirit truly enobled, as is the ſtaine of diſhonour, eſpecially for Treachery or Cowardize: from either of which I wiſh I could with truth acquite [s] thoſe two great Barons (whoſe names wee will here forget) to whom King Iohn entruſted the defence of the [t] famous Caſtle called Vall-de Ruill Ruill; who no ſooner ſaw King Philip [a] engirding it with his great hoaſt, and mounting his Engines of battery againſt it, but eftſoones, before one ſtone of the wals was ſhaken, or any one of their men had loſt the leaſt haire of their heads, they diſhonourably ſurrendred the Fort (a matter of very great conſequence) to King Philips pleaſure: who though abundantly pleaſed with the deed, yet ſo [x] contumeliouſly (but moſt iuſtly, and prince-like) recompenſed the Doers, for Traytors alwayes become odious, though the Treaſon be commodious,) that, for ſo baſe a part he commanded them to be fettered in chaines, and baſely intreated in cloſe priſon, till they had deerely redeemed their liberty, though they could hardly their reputation. Another noble Baron, * Captaine of Caſtle Galliard (which being built on a very high Rocke ouer Seyne, [y] King Richard had made impregnable) by his vndaunted prowеſſe, and [z] great ſlaughter made vpon Philips hoaſt, lying [a] 6. moneths in ſiege about him, was far from any ſuſpition of daſtardie; but yet [b] eſcaped not the blemiſh both of ingratitude and infidelity, in that at length hee not onely yeelded vp that Caſtle to the enemies, but alſo [c] ſecretly by night brought them into the Caſtle of Montfort, which hee betraied vnto them, not weighing his faith to his Leege Lord, who had beſtowed on him that Caſtle, with all the honour and demaines thereto belonging. Otherwiſe for his firſt ſurrender, his caſe had beene more excuſable, the famine (an vnreſiſtable enemy) in the Caſtle being ſo great, that, as the [d] French Recorders themſelues confeſſe, when the Women and others of the vnſeruiceable ſort were put forth for ſparing of prouant, and being betwixt the Caſtle and the Enemies, found pitty and releeſe of neither, in the ſight of them all a Woman great with Child was deliuered, and her infant preſently eaten vp. Amongſt thoſe, and other of King Iohns reuolting Barons, like ſo many falling Starres, if we ſhould pretermit that fixed and bright Starre of vnmoueable fidelity and reſolution, the Lord * Robert de Lacy, wee ſhould bee guilty of high offence againſt true honour; who hauing receiued of his Prince the cuſtody of the goodly Caſtle Rocke-Andely ([e] which was builded alſo by King Richard) [f] did brauely beare of the ſiege and power of King Philip and his hoaſt almoſt a whole yeere; in which ſpace, though by their continuall batteries and vnderminings [g] a great part of the walles were flatted, yet they could neuer make entry vpon him, but were repulſed with ſlaughter, till his prouiſion of victuals being now ſpent to the laſt howre, he called "his Souldiers together, encouraging them, after ſo "long proofe of their Manhood not to faint now in the "laſt Act; but to conſider, that though it were better "for them to die by famine, then to liue with reproch of "falſe or faint-harttedneſſe, yet it is more noble for ſoul-"diers to die fighting, then famiſhing, and together with "their owne liues, to ſacrifice to their Countries honour "the bloud of their ſlaughtered enemies. Whereupon fiercely * ſallying forth with his Reſolutes, after a bloody ſhambles made in the middeſt of his beleaguers, hee was by multitude ouerborne and taken; but [h] in regard of his exemplary faith and prowеſſe, in maintaining his charge by King Philips expreſſe command, (a ſecond princely and prudent fact, to diſcipline his Subiects by thus entreating his foes,) hee was honourably vſed, and * without reſtraint of a priſoner.

(23) But as the fact of this Peere was peereleſſe, ſo was this Clemency in that King, but rare and vnaccuſtomed towards ſuch Cheiftains as ſtifly out-ſtood his aſſaultes; [i] ſome of whom formerly hee had cauſed to bee diſpiteouſly dragged at horſe-heeles, for the terrour of others. Of which indignities, & other irkeſome extremities, (the inſeparable companions of warre) indured by his people, when King Iohn had notice by Meſſengers ſent vnto him for reliefe and aides, no maruaile is it, if [k] his griefe were aboue beleefe or meaſure, finding himſelfe vtterly deſtitute of meanes to relieue their wants, or his owne loſſes; albeit for the time hee bare it out with a manly ſhew, ſaying, [l] that theſe were but the French pilferings, of which he meant in due time to exact an account with intereſt. For what elſe could hee doe? The Normans (to omit thoſe others in open Rebellion) [m] either wholy fallen away from him, or but diſſemblingly adhering to him; his [n] Barons from home, failing him at his need; his [o] Nobles there about him, being vnder pretext of a ſpeedy comming againe, returned into England: by which meanes the King [p] was left very diſpeopled, hauing onely a ſmall traine, which could in ſo great a need doe him but very ſmall ſeruice: but that theſe important and vnportable matters [q] did no whit moue him, nor could retriue him [r] from the boſome of his too-dear Enchantreſſe, (which occaſioned ſome to think him infatuated with * ſorcery) is a thing paſt capability of beleefe.

(24) The King thus diſfurniſhed of all helps, Innocentius, the ſtirring Biſhoppe of Rome, made fayre ſhew to ſalue theſe temporall wounds with a ſpirituall playſter; which doubtleſſe made King Iohn more ſecure then ſtood with his good: for, as in ſo great diſtreſſes, there was no forraine Prince fitter for the King to conbine with, then Otho the Emperor, his owne Nephew, and Philips profeſſed enemy: ſo the Pope on the one ſide beginning to bee iealous of Otho's greatneſſe, miſtruſted the concurrence of two ſuch great friends, and therefore vndertooke to vmpeere the debates betwixt thoſe two great Enemies: and King Iohn on the other ſide, willing to make vſe of the Popes fauour, durſt not yet comply with any, whom his Sanctitude any whit diſfauoured. His Legates for this buſineſſe, were the Abbots [t] of Caſmer and Troiſſons: his motiue, [u] that [x] theſe diſſentions of Chriſtendom weakned the wars againſt Turky: his colour, [x] that this contention being a matter of faith-breach (as of Leagues, Oath and Couenants) the cognizance thereof did properly appertaine to his ſacred iudicature; whereof hee made ſo little doubt, as that the [y] very letter then ſent to the French Peeres, is to this day regiſtred for [z] a pontificall decree: and this audacious Law then by Innocentius firſt brought to the world for current, * That whenſoeuer one Prince is delinquent againſt another, the correction thereof appertaines to the Pope. Their Commiſſion was, [a] to call the Biſhops and Princes of both Kingdoms, for ſetling a Peace; to inhibite all hoſtility; to reſerue the further triall of the Right to the Pope as [b] Soueraigne Iudge; [c] to enioyne that all Religious places by the warres deſtroied, or empoueriſhed, ſhould be reſtored to their due State; [d] if either of the Kinges ſhould bee refractary, his whole Kingdom preſently to bee put vnder Interdict. Philip, albeit the Pope was then offended with him vpon other terms, (for that hee [e] impoſed towards his warres a taxe of certaine Tenthes vpon his Clergy, (againſt the Popes will) alleadging it was neceſſary that out of their priuate abundance, they ſhould beare a charge in the common preſeruation,) yet knowing the Pope had need of his friendſhip about ſetling the Empire, he ment ſo long to ſide with the Popes authority, as the Pope would ſtand with his commodity, & repining to haue ſo faire a prey taken out of his talents, made bold [f] to deſpiſe both the commands and the curſes: yet this hee did in ſmoother faſhion then hee had done once before, when he rigourouſly puniſhed all the [g] Biſhops and Prelates, whom, for conſenting to ſuch a Papall cenſure, hee turned out of their Sees and dignities; for now, he [h] appealed from the ſentence for a faſhions ſake, [i] but yet violently proceeded with his warres, and [k] did ſwimme with the full current of his victories. The waues whereof ſo faſt ſurrounded King Iohn, that * fearing alſo further treaſon of his owne men, hee thought good, till ſome better daies would ſhine vpon him, (eſpecially winter ſeaſon enforcing ſurceaſſe of warres) to abandon the place of his iniurious foes, to expoſtulate in England with his perfidious friends.

his arriuall, ([l] which was at Portſmouth on Saint Nicholas day in December) when [m] laying to the charge of his Earles and Barons, that in his warres they ſuffered him to be deſtitute of requiſite aides, and [n] had left him in the middeſt of his enemies, by which their defaults, hee was thus deſpoiled of his Caſtles and Countries; thereuppon, by [o] aduiſe of Hubert Lord Archbiſhoppe, and Lord Fitz-Peter Chief Iuſtitiar (who knew theſe were no [p] forged cauillations) he put them and other delinquents to their Fines, (for his Warres made him deſire their mony more then their liues) wherein theſe two great Counſellors were [q] ouerſeers for the receits, the one for the Clergy, the other for the Laity) of both whom they receiued no leſſe ſummes of curſes, then of Coine. The like repining among the people, (who iudge of the goodneſſe of a King only by ſparing their purſes) enſued on the grant of a large Subſidie (two Marks and halfe of euerie Knights Fee) in a Parliament* preſently after held at Oxford, where the King & Peeres conuening about redreſſe of thoſe remediles miſchiefs, the iſſue ([r] as ſeemeth) was, that Ambaſſages ſhould bee addreſſed into France, two Prelates, Canterbury and Norwich, with two Earles Marſhall and Leiceſter, to treat from the Body of the Kingdome, touching thoſe Prouinces, which being incorporated with Englands Soueraignety, could not without apparant iniuſtice bee abſtracted from a Nations common intereſt, vpon coloured pretences againſt any particular. Philip, hauing [s] vpon King Iohns departure thence vſed his whole Forces and wittes, to weary, or to winne diuers other Cities & Forts; which had till then ſtood faithfull (for which purpoſe hee alſo imployed ſundry [t] inſtruments, themſelues firſt corrupted, that they might corrupt others to defection, with great rewards and greater promiſes,) hee meant not now to re-commence Queſtions of Right, hauing already neere decided that point by the point of his ſword: yet becauſe hee was to deale with a mighty Nation, hee would not abruptly refuſe to capitulate, and yet againe by propoſall of [u] conditions exceeding either Reaſon or Poſſibility, hee dammed vp all paſſages to peaceable agreement: [x] his demaunds were to haue either Arthur, whom hee knew to bee dead, redeliuered into his hands aliue, or elſe, his Siſter Eleanor in marriage with all thoſe Countries in that Continent: but thoſe Stateſmen eaſily perceiued that Philips heart, aimed farther then his tongue, and that with Eleanor hee hoped to purchaſe a higher dowry, euen the Engliſh Diadem, whoſe claim glided down from her brother to her; which perchance was the ſecret ground of his [y] Oth, that he would neuer linne to purſue that quarrell, till hee had depriued King Iohn of his Kingdome.

(26) This Ambaſſage was not onely thus iſſueleſſe, but produced alſo effects tending to further irritation: for this ſeemeth to bee the time when [a] Philip ſent a brauing Champion, to iuſtifie by Duel before the States here in England, what his Maſter had done in France againſt their King in open warre; and [b] though it was not deemed expedient to iopard a Title of ſuch weight on the Armes and Fortune of one man; yet it was reſolued the Challenger ſhould not paſſe vnanſwered, whereto none was held fitter then Iohn Curcy Earle of Vlſter, (for [c] rebellion and denying his homage to the King, condemned to perpetuall impriſonment in the Towre,) a man of Giantlike limme and ſtrength, and of ſome diſpoſitions not deſpicable, if they had not beene ſauaged with a too careleſſe rudeneſſe: which appeared not onely in his [d] wild ſpeeches, touching the Kings miſuſage of his Nephew Arthur (which [e] ſome by errour alledge as cauſe of his indurant durance,) but euen now, when the king demanding him, whether hee would combate in his quarrell? [f] No, (quoth he) not in thy quarrell, nor for thy ſake, but for the Kingdomes right I will fight to the death. Againſt which day, whiles hee repaired with large diet his impayred limmes and ſinewes, the Frenchman hearing of his exceſſiue feeding, and ſtrength anſwerable thereto, thereby fearing he had been ſome Monſter of Nature, rather then a man, hee ſecretly ſneaked away [g] into Spaine aſhamed to ſhew his face in France againe. Curcy finding the King gracious, was hereupon releaſed, and [h] is ſaid (if this bee not to digreſſe) to haue croſſed the ſeas for Ireland fifteen times, and euermore beaten backe to the ſhore: [i] (acknowledged himſelfe herein iuſtly puniſhed of God, neuer againe to ſee his owne ſeat, for diſplacing God out of his, when he conuerted the Church of Prebendaries in Doan conſecrated to the bleſſed Trinity, into an Abbey of Monkes, to the honour & name of Saint Patrick, [k] whoſe Image was erected in a ſtately ſeat, wherein before the Trinitie was depor-tracted, which was thence reiected into a priuate Chappell. The [l] Iriſh relate, that the two Kinges being afterward together (belike when they made the next truce in Erance) King Philip hearing Curcy to bee in the Engliſh Campe, intreated to ſee ſome experience of his ſo much feared and reported ſtrength: where a Helmet of excellent proofe full farced with Mayle, being ſet vpon a great wooden blocke, the Earle lifting his truſty Skeyne, firſt louring round about him with a dreadfull aſpect, cleft ſo deepe quite through the ſteely reſiſtance, into the knotty wood, that none there could draw it out but himſelfe, who did it with eaſe, and being asked by the Kings, why hee frowned ſo irefully before the ſtroke; hee told them, that hee then intended if hee had failed of his blow, to haue killed them all, both Kings and others the lookers on.

(27) But what Philip could not in England by one Champion, he accompliſhed in Normandy by many; where hauing a [m] mighty power attending him frō City to City, yet hee thought faire wordes would bee for himſelfe both cheaper and ſafer, and with the Prouincials more forceable then force it ſelfe; eſpecially, where ſuch troupes of armed Orators were at hand, and where golden preparatiues had made way with the chiefeſt. Philip tolde them, [n] "their late "Lord had quite forſaken them, and that therefore "himſelfe, as their ſupreme Liege came to prouide "that his owne Countries might bee indemnified, "deſiring, them loungly to admit and embrace "him as their Lord, ſith now they had no o-"ther to protect them from ſkath; but menacing "withall, that if they forced him to vſe force, they "ſhould die no other death then hanging, or to be "ſlead aliue: with which fawnings and feares, though many well munified places were fetched off without any reſiſtance, [o] their Captaines violating their faith to curry fauour with the French; yet Roan, the [p] place euer honoured for fidelity to the Engliſh Crowne (and [q] therefore worthily ſelected by King Richard to bee the Shrine of his Leonine Heart,) was better fortified both in affection and munition, then to waue vpon parties. Which neglect incenſed Philip to turne his Oratory into Battery, (it being the chiefeſt City, and therefore of greateſt conſequence for conſūmating his victories,) which he continued in a moſt fierce & [r] horrid manner of ſiege, the ſpace of two monethes; but finding it to be with ſmall aduantage, hee fell againe to [s] golden Eloquence, attracting ſome in ſpeciall with preſent pay, and all in generall with [t] promiſes of future inioying all their wonted lawes, and liberties without impairement of any their commodities whatſoeuer: aduiſing them [u] not to reiect thoſe profered conditions, which ere long they would gladly get, when they ſhould not be granted. The Roaniſts, ſeeing their dangers, feeling their wants, fearing their ruines, yet deſired reſpite till King Iohn might know their State: who finding himſelfe at home as ill beſtedde as theirs abroad, his Barons [x] refuſing to follow the warres, returned them anſwere, he could not preſently releeue them. ſwaded them to weigh, that in truth they were all originally Frenchmen, though now called Normans, of that nobleſt and richeſt part of all France, and the French king being Supreme Lord thereof, there was no cauſe at all of continuing this new hoſtility, but very many of renuing that antique amity.

(28) The [r] Head, yea and Heart of all Normandy thus fainting; who can expect that thoſe few inferiour members, yet vntainted ſhould ſo continue long? neither did they. So as eſtſoones all that Dukedome, one of the goodlieſt gemmes in the Engliſh Diademe, and disbranched from France [a] ſince the yeare eight hundred eighty fiue, was againe rent away, ingloriouſly for them who loſt it, iniuſtlie by them who got it, but perfidiouſly by ſuch as ſhould, and might haue kept it. For whatſoeuer neceſſity then, or malice ſince hath laid on the King; this Eulogie, and memoriall thereof, written by [a] vnpartiall pennes, will ſtand indelible on his Subiects, A rege Angliæ, Normanniæ fraudibus ſuorum alienata, Englands King loſt Normandy by treachery of his owne people. And no leſſe treacherouſly dealt Philip with them, when hee had caught them with the trappe of his gloſing proffers (as ſuch Princes more vſually then princely, ſquare their promiſes to others liking, their performances to their owne) cauſing without delay their Cities goodly wals [b] to be vtterly demoliſhed, and giuing ſtrict charge that they ſhould neuer bee built vp againe. The other neighbouring Countries, Main, Turaine, Poictou, who were all forerunners in the rebellion, would not be now behind in the finall reuolt; Angiers in this more happy, that ſhee fell away by others falſhood, not her owne, when ſtanding on her guard, [c] William de Rupibus cladde his choice Souldiers vpon their armour in the habite and other furniture of market-men, who ſo getting acceſſe into the City gates, made eaſie entrance for a greater hoaſt; which ſoone after became abſolute Lords of all Anion.

(29) Wofull experience had now taught King Iohn a leſſon fitte to be learned of all Princes, whom the fawning world enſtyleth moſt Mighty, that this their might is not onely lyable to the checke and diſpoſe of that Higheſt all-ruling power, who vnthrones them at his will; but euen depends of the wauing humors, and wils of thoſe * inferiour vaſſels, of whom they thinke themſelues vnreſiſtable Commaunders. But King Iohn was not vnſenſible eyther of his forraine diſhonours, (though as [d] often as hee endeauoured to redeeme it, by leuying any Army, ſuteable to ſo great a deſigne; ſo often was hee croſſed by his owne Nobles) or of thoſe his domeſticke affronts; which notwithſtanding, by counſell and aſſiſtance of his better affected, & truer hearted friendes and ſubiects: at length [e] hee gathered a Royall Hoaſt and a mighty Nauy, (therein 14000. Mariners [f] ſome ſay) with full reſolue to reuenge his wrongs, and repaire his loſſes. Which great enterprize managed with vnmoueable determination (for now with full ſayles, and fuller heartes at Portſmouth they were ready to embarke) brought to the Kings further knowledge, and to the worlds, who had beene all this while the ſecret vnderminers of his fortunes, and hinderers of his imployments. For Hubert [z] the Archbiſhop, and Papall Legate with many others, (amongſt whom, [h] ſome find William Marſhall Earle of Pembroke numbred) thither comes vnto the King, and flatly [i] forbids him to proceede in the voyage. Some [k] Writers haue laboured to coniect the true cauſe and reaſons of this audacious Prohibition; but if wee conſider on the one ſide the Popes vſe of Philips Forces, to counter-ballance if need were Othos greatneſſe; on the other, the intereſt which both the Pope and * Philip had in Huberts affection: wee may without Huberts [l] diuining Spirit prie into the myſtery of his ſecret workings, as an Archbiſhop, and now open commaund as a Legate to hinder King Iohn, for feare of hindring King Philip.

(30) But whatſoeuer was the reaſon, Hubert was the Inſtrument that ſo reſolute proiects, ſo [m] ineſtimable charges, ſo neceſſary an action fell ſodainely to the ground, whereby, beſides the ſelfe miſchiefe which therewith fell on the King, many freſh grudgings accrewed vnto him, for ſuffering himſelfe to bee thus violently repulſed from ſo behouefull a purpoſe. The Archbiſhoppe and Marſhall as principals were rewarded with the [n] curſes of the diſmiſſed multitudes, as the iuſt fee for their vniuſt counſell; and the King himſelfe was ſo little pleaſed with ſo vnexpected a countermaund, that albeit at the preſent, (either awed with the authority of the Papall Legate, or with the weight of his coloured motiues, or with hazard which hee might leaue behind him) hee durſt not withſtand it; yet [o] the very next day, checking himſelfe for ouerprizing the commaund of any man, aboue the value of his kingly honour and ſtate, hee [p] reſolued to recollect his diſparkeled troupes, and to * put forth to Sea. To which end, taking order for his Nobles to follow, they gaue him leaue [q] with a ſmall company to waffe vp and downe two daies in expectance of their attendance, till ſeeing them more obſequious to Huberts commaund then his, ([r] the Archbiſhoppe alſo ſending his Inhibition after them on the ſea) hee was forced to come againe to land. How a King of any royall ſparkle, could brooke ſuch Sea-and land-Tempeſts, without diſgorging his Kingdom of the cauſers therof, I cannot conceiue; and yet ſo vneuenly doth ſome mens iudgement poyſe, whoſe affection guides the Beame, that this defeating of the Kings weightieſt affaires, is cenſured as [s] too light to deſerue the puniſhment which inſued, when the King put many of his Earles, Barons, Knights, yea and Clergymen to a grieuous pecuniary redemption for thus refuſing to follow him for recouerie of his Inheritance.

(31) The Archbiſhop though their Ringleader, might well haue beene exempted from this iudgement, by his paſſage to a higher, dying, (if [t] ſome erre not) the very ſame weeke, eyther of [u] griefe, or of a [x] feuer, which killed him in foure dayes: but the [y] king forthwith in perſon at Canterbury ſeized vpon all his wealth and poſſeſſions, ſhewing himſelfe [z] right ioyfull, that now hee was rid of him, whom men ſuſpected of too familiar practiſing with the French King; & ſaying, [a] hee was neuer a King till now, by reaſon of Huberts too preſumptuous daring to croſſe his royall reſolutions as late hee did. But this ioy and hope of happier daies, was ſoone choked and buried in the ſame Toombe with Hubert; out of whoſe Aſhes ſprang vp a roote yeelding more, and more bitter fruites, then King Iohn had as yet taſted, by how much more lamentable are the wounds which are in the bowels and heart of a State, then thoſe which onely light on the skirtes or more remot members. The firſt ſeedes of which faſt growing miſchiefes, were to the eye, (as are the beginnings of all Kingdomes ruine) very ſmall and contemptible, and the Sowers of little better regard, being but Cloiſtered monkes, who craftily factious to aduance a priuat friend, (which once mounted into Hubers chaire, might befriend them againe,) they gaue a deadly blow, both to themſelues, their Soueraigne, and the State in generall. The * yonger heads amongſt them (whoſe vnexperience makes them in acts of Societies more foreward and daring) hauing ſecret notice of Huberts death, [c] meant by a ſlight (whereunto they doubted not to find the Popes furtherance) to defeat their Soueraignes intereſt in that Election, (and perchance in all other, euer after) of a Primate for the See of Canterburie, the moſt important place of his Kingdome. * Reginald, the Sub-prior of their Couent, One (as you ſhall heare) fitter for their proiects, then for that place, was the man they choſe, and that at [d] midnight, when ſinging Te Deum, they lifted him firſt vpon the High Altar, and after into the Metropolitan chaire. They ought to haue firſt obtained the Kings

Kings assent, and leaue to elect, and therefore to preuent both his [e] interposing and displeasure, till it were too late for him to redresse the wrong; the same night they caused their Elect to enter caution by oath, neuer to carry himselfe as Archbishop, nor to make it knowne to any man liuing, till he had further especiall warrant from them, vpon proofe of the successe it might find at Rome, whither forthwith they sent him for his dispatch.

(31) Reginald taking Flaunders in his way, was both so [f] proud, [g] periurious, and [h] impudent, (the vertues of their most choice man) that he could neuer conceale the purpose of his iourney, and boast of his dignity from any mans Eares, nor from their Eyes the Conuentuall letters ratifying the same. Wherof when the Couent had notice, vehemently incensed against him who had thus diuulged their secret, and prouidently casting how to euade the Kings offence, [i] out of hand they despeeded certaine of their Crue, to craue both [k] pardon of their fact, and licence for choice of some worthier Primate. There was then in high grace and imploiment about the King, Iohn Gray Bishoppe of Norwich, a [l] man of great wisdom, learning, and Integrity, (qualities truely befitting that high place) whom the King much desired to aduance, commending him, as one [m] most deare vnto him, and of his secreteſt Counsels (of [n] which, some say, hee was President) most behouefull for the Commonwealth, for Himselfe, and them: which message from the King faithfully deliuered, [o] all of them glad thus to redeeme the fauour, which they had hazarded, with vnanimous consent elected him; and sending for him from Yorke (where hee was in the Kings affaires) the [p] King himselfe graced his entrance into Canterbury with his presence in great pompe; and the next day, the King with a multitude of People assembling in the Metropolitane Church, the Prior did there publish his Election solemnly, and in due forme performed; where the Monkes carrying him with Te Deum to the high Altar, did forthwith enthronize him in the Chaire of his Primacie; The King there in presence of them all, giueing him actuall possession of his Temporalities. This louing correspondence betwixt the King and his Clergy, gaue great hope of more blissefull fortunes henceforward vnto them both; but the Infernall Author of debate, and his chiefe Agent, tooke a hint hereby to intrude a Tyranny both vpon Clergy, King and all.

(32) Little thought false Reyner what was doing at Canterbury, whiles hee was trotting to Rome; whither when hee came, and shewed his letters of Ratification to his Holinesse and his Cardinals, [q] hee receiued this short answere, that it was a businesse which asked mature deliberation and better informations; the Pope soon finding, that the Sub-prior was too sleight an instrument for him to worke with, and for King Iohn to bee wrought with, and therefore bethought him of some fitter hammer for so hard an Anuile. But sundry stoppes were in the way, which wisely and by degrees were to bee remoued. The first was (which Reginald in likehood had imparted to hasten his owne dispatch) that the Bishoppes of the Prouince claimed a ioint interest with the Monkes, in choice of their Primate: a point which could no way suite with the Popes aduantage, because Bishoppes were generally much obliged to their Soueraignes, and so likely still to Elect a Royalist, whereas Cloyster-men, professing ignorance of worldly affaires, and obedience to one Superior, might more facilly bee swayed to bend as the Pope would bow them, in preferring his creatures. Which was the Motiue (we may suppose) of the Popes * letters, soone after sent to the Suffragane Bishops, exhorting them by [r] sacred example, and precept of filiall obedience, to desist from vexing, like vndutifull sonnes, their Mother Church with such vndue claimes. The Bishops notwithstanding, who knew themselues in sacred writ to be styled Fathers, would not thus acknowledge the Monkes for their Mothers, till Innocentius to his light Reasons added the weight of his Eyes, and by his power swept both that and other rubs out of his intended way. For the King keeping his Christmas at Oxford, (attended as it seemeth by his Bishoppes) meaning not to pretermit any faire means to worke the Popes inclination towards the new Elect, he sent for [t] twelue of the Monkes, whom with some other of his owne Clerks (which carried his letters to the Pope) he put in trust for transacting this businesse at Rome; allotting them very bountifull expenses out of his Exchequer for their whole iourney. They to leaue with the King (who knew well the traines of Rome, and the ouer-reaching fetches of Innocentius,) a pledge of their duty, and assurance of his hopes, [u] entred with him [x] a couenant by oath, that no man, nor meanes should remoue them from him, whom the King & themselues had already appointed. The Bishops sent [y] the same time their Procurators also, to plead their right of Co-election; so as, foure obstacles stood at once in the Popes way, (the two elections of the Monkes, and the two claims of the King and Prelates, hee for his Royall assent, they for their ioynt consent, in the choice) which all must be done and voided before the Pope can haue his full forth.

But because these will aske long time for contriuing, (which moued his Holinesse to adiourne the hearing to the very [z] end of the yeare,) wee will see the while how the King and State of England is imployed.

(33) The dorre, which deceased Hubert did put vpon K. Iohn and his late design, gaue both K. Philip aduantage, to take surer footing in his new possessions, and King Iohn greater stomacke and edge to recouer his old. The last taske (almost) of the one, and hold of the other, was Chinon a place of great strength, but in nothing more, then in the euer-trusty valour of her Captain, Roger Lacy; who (if [a] some mistake him not in steed of [b] Hubert de Burgo) being redeemed from the French, resolued here to giue Philip another taste of his prowesse, and King Iohn of his fidelitie; had not others faithlesse feare defeated his braue resolution. For the besieged hauing [c] no rest night or day, from a long and incessant batterie, their Commaunders inuinceable constancy against yeelding, which enheartned the better sort, dismayed the baser, as more prizing their ease, then their faith or fame; some of which by night slipping ouer the walles, so instructed the enemy of all secret aduantages to possesse the towne, that by a sodaine assault, both it and Lacy (more worth then it,) was againe surprized. Here seemed to haue beene the Garland of Philips conquest; had not newes beene thither brought vnto him of some new risings in Brittaine, where Guido, the husband of Constantia, Arthurs Mother, (sensible belike of the false-grounded wronges offered to King Iohn, vnder pretence of Arthur,) [d] returned gladly both into Amity and a strong league with the English: and with him also Sauary Malleon, and Almerick Lusignian, [e] two Peeres of heroicke valour and great commaund, whom King Iohn of his * prisoners, had made by prudent and louely vsage his trusty friends. The French King fuming to see his vniust intrusions thus preiudiced, (especially by Arthurs owne father in law) was hastning from Chinon into Britaine, to worke reuenge on them, whose exemplar equitie should haue beene his mirrour of amendment; Englands King on the other side, was no lesse heartned with this new confideration, [g] leuying once again a puissant Army, which he [*] landed at Rochel, being the onely noted place, which in all these turmoiles and mutabilities of Fortunes, kept her selfe entire from entrance either of enemy, or of disloiall thought.

(34) The King hauing his Army much augmented [h] with great concurses of his best-affected Prouincials, marching confidently forward, subdued a great portion of that Country; till comming to Mount-Alban, a [i] Castle of much renowne, (as being reputed puted[k] inexpugnable, and now the Rende-vow of his most potent enemies, and all their flower of Chiualry, hee gaue a terrible assault thereto for 15. dayes together; where at last his[l] Englishmens valour was so aduenturous in scaling the walles, and both giuing and taking blowes vnportable, that in those few dayes hee entred Conquerour into that very place,[m] which Charles the great, could not get with his seuen yeers siedge. The[a] multitude of Nobles therin taken was so great, that hee sent into England a bedroll of their names, for a memoriall of so great a victory. Which auspicious beginnings he seconded with no lesse expedition, prouidence, and prowesse, in the siege of Angiers, where on his first approch, hee[o] gaue present instructions to his maine Army, suddenly to enuiron the whole City, & by assault to seeke entrance at the walles on euery side, whiles himselfe and his selected band, with fire and Engines would assaile the Gates; where with great celerity, and no lesse hazard then hardinesse, breaking through, he became Lord of his owne. But whatsoeuer were the Citizens demerites, pittious it was, that their offences, and the Conquerours wrath, lay so heauy on those stately walles, as[p] to throw them flatte to the ground; which hasty doome, (it being the[q] cradle of his birth, and City of his chiefe delight,) hee as hastily (and very deerly too) repented, when with excessiue expenses hee encircled it againe with a beautie farre beyond the former. These faire successes, humbling all the Country before him, cleared his passage into Picardy, whither King Philip was now conuerting all his power to oppose himselfe against the violence of this Torrent: which[r] now more facilly hee might stoppe, hauing in his way by laying secret ambushments, laid hands vpon Duke Guido, Sauary, and Almericke, King Iohns principall hopes, as they were busily aduancing his present affaires: by which surprize, though the English forces missing their Prouincial aids, were greatly impayred, yet their * great hearts were not much amated, as the Frenchmen[s] found, when both the Armies neere approaching ouer night, the next morning alacriously they addressed to the fight, and with great spirits on each side expected the Signall. Notwithstanding, the day likely to proue dreadfull with expence of bloud, vpon earnest interceeding of[t] forraine Prelates and religious persons, who vndertook equably to compose all things; both Kinges condescended to a two-yeeres * Truce, King Iohn chiefly out of affection to his Captiue friends, whose liberty was formost in the conditions.

(35) Hauing thus setled those Countries in farre better termes then last hee found them, he embarked for England; where hee laid not aside a carefull (though distastfull) prouidence, for still bettering those his successes: for which ends, whiles from his Subiects (both Lay and Clergy) he[u] gathered money, the Sinewes of warre, he lost their affections, the ioints of Peace; whereof Geffry Archbishoppe of Yorke (his Naturall and vnnaturall brother) was a principal incentiue; who[x] solemnly cursing all the Kinges receiuers within his Prouince, fled secretly out of the land. Which peruicacie,* a bitter enemie of K. Iohn, yet bitterly taxeth, saying,[y] the English Bishops were farre from that dutifull obseruance towards their Soueraigne, which the French Bishops performed to theirs, at whose commaund they maintained Souldiers in his warres against King Iohn, acknowledging they were so bound to doe, as often as the King pursued the warres in person; though now also they did it, where hee was not in person. And indeed how hollow-hearted to the State those money-murmurers were, their * owne friend bewraieth, shewing, how with curses they wished, and prayed to God, that these exactions might neuer haue any good successe, though they knew it was purposelie for preseruing a maine part of the Kingdome. A disloyalty the more vnsufferable by the King, knowing that but a* very little before, the Popes Legate, Io. * Fiorentinus, nick-named * Ferentinus, for bearing away so much money,) had[z] gathered of the Clergy a huge masse of money which in full chests hee conueyed to Rome. Yet all these domesticke grudges abated not the Kings due care, nor yet his good hopes, which were soone after much augmented by the encouragements of Othoes Imperiall presence,[b] who in person arriuing here in England, to proiect for his owne and his vncles warres, was with great ioyes met by the King, and conducted through London by night, where all the City was seene in her glory, & all the streetes adorned with richest hangings, beautified all along with the lustre of pendant Crownes, and burning lampes: who after some dayes of royall entertainements, hence departed not vnfurnished with helpes to defray his warres.

(36) Whiles King Iohn is thus busied about his open hostilities, Pope Innocentius is plotting his secret Stratagemes against him at Rome: where, like vnto that * other old Roman, who, being chosen vmpere touching some march-lands betwixt two neighbour Nations, vnpartiall to either,[c] adiudged it from them both to the Romane State; so hee now, being Arbiter betwixt the King, Bishops, & Monks, concerning their choice, hee means to defeat them all, and * adiudge the right of disposing thereof to his Romish See. Therfore, at the * fore-limited day of hearing, his first care was, that the[d] Bishops lippes for euer should bee sealed vp, (notwithstanding their * allegations of Law, Reason, Decrees, and Practise,) frō intermedling in choice of their own Primate. Wil you heare the maine reason? because himselfe, and some other Popes would haue it so. Which definitiue sentence being[f] sent to the Prelates into England, it was thought a point of prudence also, to[g] prepare the King and worke him pliable before hand, to entertaine that which was to follow: which must be done by amiable lines, and gemmes, wherewith he knew the King was much delighted. His Present, being 4. gold Rings, with foure precious stones, an Emrauld, Saphire, Ruby, & Topaze, he so vainely & childishly (though * ignorance enstile it eloquence) celebrateth in his * Epistle, for their number, forme, and colour, that no man will question whether it were dictated with an Apostolicke Spirite. The Rings Roundnesse must remember the King of Eternity; the Quadrat number of Constancy, and of the foure Cardinall vertues, Iustice, Fortitude, Prudence, Temperance; the Golds price, of wisedome; the Emraulds greenenesse, of Faith; the Saphires brightnesse, of Hope; the Rubies readnesse, of Charity; the Topazes clearenesse, of operatiue Sanctitie &c. Which, though toyes, were yet accepted as pledges of loue for a while, till at last, the King finding by the sequele, they were but baites to beguile him, esteemed the Popes Gold as drosse, his Iewels as * Iewish fraudes, and his loue as most rancored hatred. For shortly after came to his notice, the most indignious iniurie, which the Pope meant to obtrude vpon him and his Kingdome, hauing not onely hunted both Reynard and Gray out of their holdes, but also imposed vpon him, for the chiefe place and managing of his State, one whome hee reputed a chiefe and dangerous Enemy to himselfe and it: which thus was fetcht about.

(37) The Monkes freed from the Bishops impugning, were hote now in the strife amongst themselues; the[s] one side against Reyners election vrged, it wanted Royall assent, the greater and sounder part of Electors, due solemnities, due * time: the other, against Norwich, that no second election could be validous, vnlesse the former were first annulled. Both their Reasons pleased well the Pope; who (as pre-possessed Iudges often vse) made shew of[h] great diligence in pondering the Pleadings, whereas himselfe long before had resolued on his Sentence; which was, that by Apostolicall definitiue dome, neyther of the Elect's should euer bee capable of that See. So great rubbes hath the Pope with so little breath blowne out of his way. The man whose aduancement al this while hee had aimed at, was now commended to them them, who must be there presently chosen for their Primate, Stephen de Langton, a Cardinall, English by birth, [i] French by education and affection, one of so [k] transcendent power in the Romane Court, that the Pope was thought not for loue, but for enuy, (as being himselfe eclypsed by his neerenesse) to haue wished his seruice in some remoter dignity. But the Monks ill apaide with what was done already, and very tremulous to enter[l] matter of new intrications, alleadged against all further courses, that [l] no Canonicall Election could be there made, they hauing consent neither of King nor Couent; at which word the Pope snapping them vp, bad them know, that [*] he had there plenitude of power ouer the Church of Canterbury; and besides, that no consent of Princes vsed to bee expected in Elections celebrated where the Pope was: hee therefore charged them vnder paine of his high curse, (a terrible bug-bear in those daies) there presently to choose him for their Primate, whom himselfe thought good to nominate vnto them. Thus trembling vnder the cracke of his Thunderbolt, they (all [m] excepting one Helias de Brantfield (whose constancy shall perpetuate his memory,) durst not for feare but elect him, though very vnwillingly, and with murmurations: whose [*] Consecration followed by the Popes owne handes at Viterbium, and his earnest recommendation by the Popes [n] flattering letters, to the Kings fauourable acceptance. And this was the vnblessed beginning of those new miseries which brought the King to his ending, and his Kingdome to vn-reportable calamities, all which, little did his Holinesse or his Charity reckon of, so his desperate Policie might take effect. Yet not vnduely fell those iudgements on manie Princes of those times, who neglecting the domesticke execution of Supreme iustice, suffered their Subiects, at so high a rate both of expence and trauels, to buy such arbitrary and dangerous formes of a forraine, and falsly-named Iustice.

(38) Two very presumptuous Lawes hath [o] one obserued to haue beene first hatched by this lawlesse Pope, the one occasioned by King Iohns and Philips former strife, that Princes delinquent must bee lyable to correction from the Pope; the other, vpon the choice of the Emperour, that where in elections voices are equall, or concord wanting, the Pope may gratifie whome hee please: vnto which wee now may adde a third no lesse arduous & insolent, that the Pope may strike vp Elections, both where, and of whom, and with, and without what consent him listeth. Which lewd obtrusion, that it galled the King to the quicke, wee need not maruaile, if wee ballance in one scale, the Popes meere will and pleasure; in the other, the dishonour to the King (thus to be triced out of that, which so vehemently, and with his owne presence hee took care to see effected;) the preiudice to his Crowne, to be defeated of Soueraigne assent; the hazard to the State, to haue his [*] Enemy (a Phillippine, and French fauourite) the [*] chiefe man ouer his English: besides wrongs more particular; as both the disgrace to his best-deseruing Counsellour, the disloyalty of the Monks, first, to choose without his licence, then to mocke him with a second choice, next, to beguile him with oaths, after to trauaile vpon his excessiue charge, and lastly to doe, and vndoe all, with their periurie. With all which so farre the Kings patience surfetted, that he beganne on them to disgorge his wrath, who with him beganne these affronts; proscribing first all those Monkes as [p] Traytors, and afterward writing "his [q] letters to the Pope, with relation of those "great wrongs to Himselfe, and exceptions to "Langton; vowing immutably to stand for his own "Elect, and to die in defence of the Liberties of his "Crowne; putting the Pope in mind, that Rome "reapt more gaine from England, then from all "the Transalpine Regions; threatning also, if he "were now crossed in this, hee would stoppe all "from crossing the Seas to Rome, nor would any "longer emendicate their forraine Iustice, sith "his owne Kingdomes, so abounded with Bishoppes "and learned men of most accomplished perfection "in all professions.

(39) If, when this Kings Father vttered some such threats to Gratian the Popes vassall, hee then replyed [r] Sir doe not threaten vs, for wee feare no menaces, because wee are of such a Court as vseth to be imperious ouer Emperours and Kings, (which as a remarkable Apothegme, [s] Baronius sets forth in greater letters;) we may then guesse, how this great Lord of that Court did himselfe brooke such tart salutations. Nay the effects bewray it: when in his sublimed [t] Reply, hee snebs the King for comminatory "obraydings, and contumacious malepartnesse; and "threatens him, that if he do not, by referring him- "selfe wholy to his good pleasure, seeke to deserue his "Grace, hee should plunge into those difficulties, "whence hee should hardly euer get forth; intima- "ting, that himselfe (being vnworthy vicegerent to "him, vnto whom euery knee in Heauen, Earth, & "Hell must bow,) must in the end needs haue the "vpper hand; and that to resist him is to oppugne "God himselfe and his Church, for which glorious "Becket spilt his bloud. These were indeed bloody words; to affright the King with expectance of more such blowes, and bloody stripes from Rome, as had lighted on his Father. And hee threatned no more then he acted; for thereupon, hee [u] sent his doubled Apostolicall command, the one general to all the Prelates, for submitting and adhering resolutely to Langton, the other, to some [*] particular Bishops, for [x] conuenting the King, and Interdicting his whole Kingdome, if him they found still contumaciously rebelling. Neither was hee more insolent in the command, then they in the execution, whereby (on [y] a day ill suiting so vnchristian an Action) this flourishing Church (though the King had sworne their banishment, and confiscation if they did it) was depriued of the very face of Christianity for many ensuing yeeres; as if, not Innocentius Christs Vicar, but Iulian his professed Enemy, had mured vp the doores of the Christians Temples for despight of their God.

(40) But this High-Priest had forgotten what another [*] taught him, and [x] he himsefe sometimes thought, about interdicting France for their Kinges offence; that better it was one should suffer then a whole Nation perish: whereas now, for the Kings only crossing the Popes good pleasure, God is censured to loose his worshippe, and all the People to hazard their soules, [a] liuing almost like Infidels, without Gods seruice and blessed Sacrament, yea and dying [*] like dogges tumbled into euery ditch. But what? did such wofull effects fasten onely on the Layty? The Clergy bare their part too; whom the flames of the Kings iustly incensed wrath did so scorch, that his Dominions were too hote for their abode: for, their [b] persons hee proscribed and sent packing to the Pope, their reuenewes, hee confiscated, their Bishoprickes, Abbeyes and Priories; hee deputed to Laymens custody: their women (for such as had not wiues, had Lemmans) were dearely ransomed: and euery where they suffered wrongs without ordinary protection of Iustice. Whereof, though our [*] vulgar perfunctary Writers produce no other reason, but the onely ouerflowing of the Kings gall, as if first stirred by some few delinquent Bishops, through furious reuenge it ouer-whelmed the whole Clergy; yet indeed these were but the due chasticements of their generally disloyall hearts. As (to instance) when the King sent his [c] mandate to S. Albans, that not regarding the Popes commaund in the Interdict, they should continue the celebration of Gods seruice; the Abbot calling his Monkes into the Chapter-house, perswaded them to obey God rather then Man (meaning the Pope rather then the King) and to beare resolutely the Kings anger, [*] whom God in due time would bring to an end. What maruaile then, if the Clergy carried so generally with this streame of a forraine vsurped power, against Gods seruice, and their Soueraignes god-godly desire, and due authority, were likewise generally involued in that reward of their disloialty. And yet, euen in the Clergy, many of eminencie detested these cruell and irreligious courses of the Pope; [d] Philip the Bishoppe of Duresme, and his Successor, with the Bishops of Norwich and Winchester, heartned the King to contemne the Papall curse; the [e] Cisestertian Abbots (neglecting the Interdict) continued their diuine celebrations, till the Pope suspended them for their contempt; Alexander * Abbot of the Benedictines, a Diuine of * exquisite learning [f] published in his Sermons, that their present calamities were no reproch to their Soueraignes proceedings, but due rewards of the Subiects hainous trespasses, because kings ought to gouerne, yea and strongly bridle all disobedient Subiects whomsoeuer; but as for Popes they ought not to intermedle in the ciuill affaires, and regiment of any Princes ouer their vassals, seeing Peter himselfe receiued no power, but onely in matters appertaining to the Church. And though the *Pope were reuenged on him for his plaine truth, and some Monkish humors haue aspersed other such men with bitter reproches, yet what may bee thought both of these the Popes courses, & of such his opposers, a late Iesuite (no partiall man to Princes) sheweth, saying, [g] that many, and godly wise men at that time did wish, that Pope Innocentius had not stood so hard with King Iohn in such a point as this was, for contenting him with a person gratefull vnto him in that See. And no maruaile they so wished, seeing that was the graund cause of such infinite confusions, factions, and wrongs, hurrying so indignely the Prince, Peeres, Clergy & Commons; the very contemplation whereof to all godly wise men must needes bee gastly and rufull: yet welfare those Anathematizing Bishops, the Instruments of al these euils, who patiently endured vnder the name of Exile, [h] to liue the while abroad in all varietie of delights.

(41) Such perplexities in the People could not but breed as great hatred and hazards to the King; who therefore to preuent the issue of such discontents, (which though causelesse, yet kindling in the multitude proue often vnquenchable,) hee [i] required of his Nobles new Oathes of allegiance, pledges of such as hee most suspected, and homage of all Freeholders, [k] euen of twelue yeers old, whom he dismissed with a kisse of peace. Misdoubting also the Popes further intent to absolue his Subiects from their due allegiance, hee gathered about him (by * example of his Father Henry on the like ground) a mighty Armie for all occurrents. The terrour whereof hee first displayed in the North, offended (saith [l] one) with * William King of Scotland, for marrying his daughter to the Earle of Bulloigne; for receiuing (saith [m] another) Fugitiues, and enemies of his State: for throwing down (saith a [n] third) a Castle built by King Iohn against Barwicke: but whatsoeuer were the breach, the cloze was amiable, each accompanying other to York, where King Williams * two daughters were promised to King Iohns two sonnes, and [p] deliuered as pledges of vnited loue, with a [q] gift of nine thousand markes. The dread of this his power so glyded out of the North into the West, that vpon his return, the [r] Princes of Wales, and others rich & poor came to him at Woodstocke (the like thing neuer heard of before) to doe him homage. But all these linkes of allegiance were soone crackt by another thunderclap (from Rome) of Anathema on the King by Name, with strict iniunction for all men to abandon his presence: [s] which sentence being sent to bee diuulged by the Bishoppes and Prelates in England, al of them for feare or fauour of the King, were content to neglect the Popes commaund, and let the Apostolike processe escape without execution. The fame yet thereof was in all mens mouthes, but came first (as seemeth) to the Kings Eares, [t] by a seruant of his owne Exchequer. Geffry Arch-Deacon of Norwich, who secretly perswading his fellow-officers, that they were bound in conscience to relinquish the Kings seruice, gaue them example himselfe by leauing his duty and charge; for which hote-braine tricke; hee was put in a * Coole of lead, the weight whereof (as a punishment of his leuitie) soone hastned his end in prison: but the greater and wiser sort, both of *Nobles and others, continued their due attendance on their Soueraigns Court and person, without * regard of the censure.*

(42) Those Romish furies thus infesting all at home, gaue also courage & oportunity to il-affected mẽbers further off; some of which in Ireland hauing forfeited long of the Kings Indulgence or absence, [x] beganne now to play the Kings themselues. The noble spirite of this Prince in his tender yeeres [y] made choice (on bended knees to his Father, in presence of Heraclius Patriarke of Ierusalem) rather in deuotion to conduct an Army against the Turks, then in Ambition to take possession of that goodly Kingdome. But being now possessed thereof, and intending (by a kind of compensation for his losses in France) to annexe and assure that Kingdome to the English Crowne, hee resolues with a powerfull Army to quell the disturbers, and reforme the disorders, of his first, and long vnuisited charge. Whose approach such fame and dread did forerunne, that * more then twenty Petty Kings of that nation hastened to Dublin, there to honour his * arriuall with their submissiue attendance, homage and oath of allegiance; others, eyther vpon confidence of their good holds, or diffidence for their ill desertes, flying his presence, and some of them, the Country. The * two Lacies (whose onely prayse was, that they were the sonnes of a nobly-deseruing Father) hauing beene, through ambition of Soueraignety, the fountaine of dangerous garboyles, ([a] tyrannizing ouer the Commons, and making away such of the Nobles, as stood eyther in their light, or in the Kings fauour) fled into France, where they liued in * an Abbey as poore Gardinars, vntill the Abbot descrying by their deportment some state aboue their habite, vpon penitent humility reconciled them to the King. The Lord William de Breuse, (a* Baron lately of great commaund and wealth in the Marches of Wales,) shewed not the like penitence, nor found the like grace; who, vpon * refusall to deliuer his sonne as a pledge of his fidelitie, spedde into Ireland to flie the Kinges wrath, and now, to auoid his pursuit, fledde also into France, then the common Sanctuary of all trayterous fugitiues; but * sharpe reuenge ouertooke both his Sonne and his Lady (taken in a strong Castle of Meth) whose virulent and rayling * tongue had more exasperated the fury of the King (whom shee immodestly reuiled as a Tyrant and Murtherer,) then could be pacified by her strange present, [z] * (foure hundred Kine, and one Bull, all milke-white, except onelie the eares, which were redde,) sent vnto the Queene.

(43) But [b] Catalus, the vnquiet King of Connaught, trusting to his owne Forces, King Iohn subdued by strong pursuit: [c] and after all carried him captiued in triumph, imprisoned the English Fugitiues, tooke pledges both of English and Irish Inhabitants, punished by death malefactors, turbulent persons by ransomes, established all their Lawes, Coines, and Officers, to the English forme, and deputed (which was worth all) a wise, stout and vpright *Gouernour ouer them, the Bishoppe of Norwich, Langtons competitor: thus setling on that barbarous Iland so noble and ordered a face of gouernement, as was the stay thereof in those tumultuous times, and a patterne euen to more peacefull ages to imitate. By which both glorious and * speedy conqueſt and reformation, hee better merited that Style of Irelands Lord, then when it was confirmed to him by a Crowne of * Peacockes feathers from the Pope, at what time (long before) hee inioyed it by his Fathers gift, as his Broad-Seale (here not vnfitte to bee annexed) will shew.

An. 1211. King Iohn ſubdueth Wales,

(44) The Bankes of King Iohns eſtate, were not vnlike to thoſe in Grounds ill-neighboured with an encroching Sea, where before one breach is well made vp, another no leſſe dangerous is laid open: which endles turmoils kept his Body ſtill in Action, his Minde in paſſions, and his Proweſſe in vre. The vaſte expenſes of his Iriſh expedition were no ſooner repayred (by a *great taxe charged on all the Conuentuall houſes) but Lewylin Prince of North-Wales, with his great ſpoiles on the Engliſh Marchers, made new matter of charge and exploit for the King; [d] hauing, to preuent due reuenge, cauſed his Wallians to conuey all their cattell and better ſubſtance to the ſcarce-acceſsible refuges of Snowdowne Hill. Theſe difficulties much more whetted and excited the Kings reſolution; neither had the vertuall power of the Popes fulmination as yet ſo blaſted his good fortunes, but that hence alſo hee [e] returned in great Triumph, as Conquerour of all Wales, where, with wonderfull celerity and valour, hee [f] ſubdued all their Princes and Cheefes, whom hee receiued vpon Oath, homage, and hoſtages, with an abſolute [g] graunt of all their Inland vnto the King for euer. Notwithſtanding, perceiuing that [h] very many ſlipt away for dread (at leaſt for colour) of the Popes curſe, from thoſe his martiall and other ciuill ſeruices, (though [i] hee puniſhed by fine all ſuch Reuolters) whereby his perſon could neuer bee free from danger, nor his State from trouble; hee reſolues (ſeeing the Pope vnflexible, & vnſenſible of ſo many Chriſtians calamitie) at length to relent from his vowed ſtiffenes againſt the Popes Elect, in hope ſo to ſettle his owne and his Subiects tranquility, though with vnſufferable indignity to himſelfe. In his [k] returne from Wales, two Nunces from the Pope, Randulph a Subdeacon, and Durand a Knight Templar, meete him at Northampton to make the attonement: [l] whereto he was ſo propenſe, that hee accorded to aſſure vnder his Seale, that Archbiſhoppe Langton with the Biſhoppes, Monkes, and others, ſhould bee reſtored both to his fauour, and to their poſſeſsions; that, holy Church ſhould haue all the Franchiſes, as in Edward the Confeſſors time: that hee would neuer take any thing of holy Church againſt the owners will: but, becauſe hee [m] would not alſo make full ſatisfaction for all confiſcations, and other emoluments receiued of the Clergie, (nay, hee could not hauing expended all his treaſure in his continuall warres,) the Cleargy and their Factors (the Legates) more prizing their priuate gaine, then the weale publike of their Natiue Country, contemned the ſweet proffer of peace, & expoſed all to the bane of a reuengeful contention. For hereupon they did not onely [n] denounce the curſe vpon the King by name (which the Prelates before durſt not doe) and vpon all other who conuerſed with him; but, as if hee had moſt [o] contumaciouſly contemned quietneſſe, by their relations they incenſed the Pope (too prone of himſelf to ſet forth his own greatneſſe) to put on him a farre more indignous wrong and contumely then Interdiction, by [p] abſoluing all Kings and People, poore and rich, hauing dependance on him, from all Fealty and Subiection to him.

(45) This being the third ſteppe, whereby both the Pope aſcended to the height of his vſurped power, and mercileſſe reuenge, and the Subiects * daylie deſcended from their loyall obſeruance, made king Iohn more circumſpect to ſtrengthen himſelfe, both with an Army no leſſe faithfull then powerfull, & alſo with the loue of his Neighbour-Princes. King William of Scotland, [q] at this time infeſted with a dangerous rebellion, (ſtirred vp within his Kingdom by one Gothred, [r] laying claime, vnder color of ſome antiquated title, to his Crowne) being himſelfe infirme with age, ſent his ſonne Prince Alexander into England, to craue aſſiſtance of King Iohn, who (by his owne princely loue and readineſſe, to demerite theirs,) reſoluing with his Army in perſon to chaſtice the diſturbers of his truſty Confederate, before his ſetting forth, did [s] on the Table in a ſolemne feaſt, (which hee kept in the Hoſpitall of Clerken-well) adorn Prince Alexander with the belt & Order of Knighthood; and [t] afterward with his hoaſt vanquiſhing the Rebels, aduanced their Chiefe-leader farre higher then his owne Ambition expected, and left that Kingdome in a ſetled peace. But whiles he is thus kindly carefull in ſuppreſsion of anothers Rebelles, his owne at home are as vnkindly vigilant to vndermine his State; the Popes Abſolution, like magicke ſpelles, hauing let looſe many tumultuating Spirits, which will not eaſily be laid again. For the * Chiefes among the Wallians, whom neither breach of their Oathes, nor loſſe of their noble hoſtages, (*which ſoone after periſhed for their parents ſinnes) could deterre, ſuddenly fell off from the King, and fell on his Subiectes with [u] much ſlaughter of men, burning of Townes, and ſurprizall of Caſtles: whereof, whiles the King meaning to take ſharpe reuenge, was on his way at Nottingham with an vnreſiſtable Armie, letters of great ſpeed and ſecreſie were deliuered to him (as hee ſate at meate) from his faithfull and gratefull friend the Scottiſh King, & inſtantly others from his daughter Ioan, Prince Lewylins Lady, both giuing him intelligence of imminent Treaſons * plotted by ſundry of his Peeres, who meant eyther to murther him, or betray him to the butchery of his foes. Which dreadfull notices from ſo true-harted Informers, could not yet affright his manlie heart, till comming to Cheſter, hee there vnderſtood by ſundry other Intelligencers, that his Nobles held themſelues quite diſcharged from his allegiance; and knowing that they wanting fidelity, he him-himselfe could not but want security, hee dismissed his hoast, tooke hostages of his Barons, pursued the detected Conspirators, and * the three principal of them flying the land, he prosecuted their persons, demolished their Castles, and confiscated their possessions. But many of as vile and virulent affections they left behind them, as that * trayterous Act of those Nobles bewrayed, who sent to Philip of France their sealed Charter, promising to settle on his head the Crowne of England, if hee would come to receiue it. And that the mindes of the vulgar should not bee vnpossessed with like expectation of Iohns vn-crowning, the propheſies of an * Heremiticall wisard (foretelling, that on the day of Ascension, King Iohn should bee no King) were buzzed into their eares. Whether by Gods inspiring, or the Diuelles, these were reuealed, * some doe doubt; but hee that considers the quotidian impostures of these times, and the secret machinations of the Pope, the French King, and the English Barons, all for diuers ends, complotting against King Iohn, will easily perceiue both what vse there was of suborning such a Prophet, to deterre the popular maynie, from sticking to the King, and to beguile their credulity, as if the thing were to be done, by Gods fore-appointment, and ordinance, and also * that his punishment by death as a Traiterous Impostor, was no other then he deserued.

(46) Neither is the Popes reuenge thus appeased, some higher greeces yet remaine, on which his Greatnesse, and greatnesse of his holy rage must display it selfe: the vnderprops whereof (a thing almost incredible) were not onely Englishmen, but English Bishops also. For Stephen Langton with the BB. of London and Ely (thirsting after reuenge though with the destruction of their Country, & blood-shed of innumerable their Compatriots) going to Rome with complaints on the King, [y] made humble supplications to the Lord Pope, that hee would vouchsafe in a touch of pious compassion, to support the English Church, being at the point of ruine. At whose earnest sollicitation, the tender-hearted Pope (grieuously lamenting the desolation of the Kingdome of England,) decreed by solemne sentence: That King Iohn should bee deposed from his Kingdome, and that the Pope should prouide some other, who should bee deemed worthyer to succeed. To effectuate the former clause, Innocentius eagerly pursued the latter, sending speedy letters to (whom but King Iohns most mortall enemy?) Philip King of France; [z] requiring him to vndertake the labour of the dethroning King Iohn, with no lesse reward then pardon for all his sins, and enioying of the English Crowne to him, and his heires for euer. A goodly large patent both for a Spiritual and Temporall Kingdome, which (more like Mars his Priest, then Christs Vicar) he meanes to seale, with a deluge of Christians bloud. For not thus yet satiated, hee transmits his Letters generall: [a] To all Potentates, Souldiers, men of warre of all nations, to signe themselues with the Crosse, and to follow their Captaine Philip for the deiection of King Iohn, assuring all that their assistance (whether in Person or Contribution) shall bee no lesse meritorious, then if they visited our Sauiours Sepulchre. That this Pope vnder colour of such Crusadoes, did formerly cloake his own Auarice, his [b] owne Monkes auerre; but here hee cloakes therewith both his Pride, and a far more sauage vice, the thirst, not of mens gold but of their bloud. In which seruice with King Philip, hee vsed the same English Prelates for his Negotiators, which were before his Solicitors thereunto; with whom also he sent his Factour Pandulph; [c] giuing him in priuate, secret instructions how to manage euery particular of the whole designe, to the most behoofe of the holy See.

(47) The French King likewise receiuing * from the Archbishoppe and his Associates (in a [d] councel) the Apostolike sentence; was very apprehensiue of that imployment, whereto not so much the Papall commaund, as his [e] owne ancient malignity, and the English Barons traiterous requests, had prepared him; both which he was now [f] willing to maske with the speous pretext of iustice and deuotion. Vnder which colors hee had * speedily marshalled an immense Army at Roan, & drew a mighty Nauy richly furnished to the mouth of Seyn, * al his Dukes, Earls, Barons, Knights, & Souldiers being summoned to the exploit vnder paine of hie Treason and disherizing, who therfore both in feare & hope of spoile came flocking without number.

(48) A preparation of so great importance, that all Christendom tooke notice of, could not long be hidden from King Iohn; whose care, by reason of his now doubled opposition (forrain & domestick) could be no lesse for his owne and his Kingdoms safety, then was his Enemies for impugning both. Wherfore his Summons being * sent to all his officers both for Sea and land, for speedy furnishing both of a Nauie, & an Army, equiualent to encounter so powerfull an Inuasion, such [g] innumerable multitudes swarmed to Douer, and other harbours for landing, that the Chiefe-leaders for want of prouision, dismissing the rest, [h] encamped at Barham-Downes, onely with 60000. choice, valiant, and well appointed men, who, if they had carried all one mind, and true affection towards their King, and safegard of their Country, there breathed not any Prince vnder heauen, whose assault England had not beene able to repell. And being no worse appointed for a Sea-fight, his intent was to graple first with the French Fleet, * making no doubt of sinking them all: so secure and confident was he in expectation of all Inuaders. In which braue addresse, whiles both shores of the Sea are thus belaid with both those Kings puissant Armies, the one waiting for the Enemy, the other for faire windes, and more forces, behold Pandulphus (the Popes Pragmaticke) hauing first desired safe conduct of King Iohn, arriues at Douer, to put in execution those [i] secret Instructions which his Lord (who made his aduantage of the Foxe-skinne, as well as of the Lions) * had expresly prescribed. He there vnfoldes to the King, the innume- "rable multitude both of King Philips shippes, and of "his Souldiers Horse and Foote, (all in readinesse to "passe, and yet more expected to follow) to be-
"reaue him of his Kingdome by Apostolicall autho"rity, and to enioy it himselfe with his Heires for "euer. That with him were also comming all the "English Exiles, both Clergy and Lay, they, by his "forces to repossesse their estates (maugre the king)
"and hee from them to receiue allegiance, as from "his sworne Subiects. That hee had the fealty of "almost all the English Peeres obliged to him by "their owne Charters; which made him distrustlesse
"of attayning easily his wished successe: which ca"lamities (the more vnsufferable, because imposed "by his insulting enemie, and his owne Subiects) he "might yet euade and retaine his Crowne, which
"by Sentence hee had already lost, if penitently hee
"would submit himselfe to the Churches iudge-ment. Doubtlesse the straites whereinto the King saw himselfe plunged, were very dreadfull; so many deadly enemies abroad to assault him, so few trustie friends at home to guard him: which droue him into this sad cogitation [k] that those his perfidious Peeres would now with their followers abandon him in the field, or betray him ouer to the Sword of his Enemies. Yet not vnlikely other motiues also might forcibly perswade him to relent: the remembrance of the Emperour Otho whom this very Pope (not without foule blot of [l] Iniustice and [m] Lenity) had both eagerly aduanced, and furiously dis-empyred; the boundlesse furies of the Crusado promulged against him, wherewith this Pope [n] vsed to ouerflow, as with a merciless Ocean, all such Princes as withstood his will, which once broken in would neuer end, but with the end and ruine of all. Thus thinking it better to yeeld to the time, with assurance both [o] of his Crowne, and of the [p] Popes fauour, then desperatelie to hazard Life, Crowne and all, to his immortall foes; hee redeemes his safety on such conditions, as Neceſſity and the Pope (both which haue no law) liſted to impoſe; and ſo preſently ſwore to ſubmit in all things * to the iudgement of the Church. By vertue of which farre-ſtretching Oath, Pandulphus afterwards exacteth his ſubſcription to a * Forme of Peace preſcribed by the Pope, wherein King Iohn, though q with an vnwilling, yea a bleeding heart, and weeping eyes, yet will he, nill he, muſt acknowledge r that touching all thinges for which hee was excommunicated, hee had abſolutely ſworn x to ſtand to whatſoeuer the Pope ſhould command. Secondly, that the Archbiſhop, Biſhoppes and Monkes, with all the reſt of that liſt, ſhould (with ſatisfaction alſo for all damages) bee reſtored both to their poſſeſſions and the Kings fauour, ſo that they alſo would ſweare not to attempt any thing againſt the Kings Perſon and Crowne. Wherein wee ſee that King Iohn in ſwearing to obey the iudgement of the Church, was concluded to haue ſworne performance of whatſoeuer the Pope commanded; and how great matters the Pope can commaund, King Iohn, with much more * bleeding amaritude of ſpirit, ſhall quicklie ſee and feele. For two dayes after (being the * period of the Hermits propheſie) the King at the houſe of the Knights Templars, in Douer, [f] by the Popes commaund in his [t] preordination at Rome, taking off his Crowne from his head, ſurrendred it into the Popes handes by his Atturney Pandulphus (at whoſe feet hee [u] alſo laid his Scepter, Robe, Sword and Ring, the Royall Enſignes;) ſubſcribed alſo to another x Charter, whereby hee reſigned his Kingdomes to the Pope, profeſſing hee did it * neither for feare, nor force, but of his owne free will, and in the common Councell of his Barons, as hauing no other way to make ſatisfaction to God and the Church for his offence, and that thence-forward he would hold his Crown as Feodary to the Pope, paying a penſion annuall of 1000. Marks for both the Kingdoms of England & Ireland: whereupon doing homage and ſwearing fealty to the Pope, hee did withall deliuer ſome money (as the earneſt of his ſubiection) vnto Pandulph, y who throwing it to the ground, did thereon trample with his feet, to manifeſt his Maſters greatneſſe. That theſe things were done in preſence of ſome Peeres, who gaue no conſent thereto, appeares by Henry Archbiſhoppe of Dublin (the very principall man in that Aſſembly) who [z] both inwardly grieued thereat, and openly diſclaimed and gaine-ſayed it.

(49) The Pope formerly pretended he ſought [a] nothing more then Iohns repentance, and [b] grieued at nothing ſo much as Englands deſolation: but theſe his circumuentions bewray he ſought ſomewhat elſe, which bred both repentance and deſolation to King Iohn and his Succeſſors long after. Which fact cannot bee liuelyer paralleled, then by another doleful accident of the former yeare, [c] when a dreadfull fire in Southwarke, conſuming the Church & buildings neere London Bridge, ſuddenly (whiles numberles people flockt on the Bridge, either to bring ſuccour or ſeeke ſafetie) the fire by a wind ſeized alſo on the hither end of the Bridge; wherewith * multitudes thus encompaſſed on both ſides, miſerably periſhed; where at length ſome bringing their Barges to ſaue the reſt, their crowde was ſo great, that the veſſels ſinking, more periſhed in the water, then by fire. King Iohn, like thoſe, was in the middeſt of two ineuitable flames, on this ſide, his faithleſſe Nobles, on that, his mercileſſe foes; when the Pope thus proffering him S. Peters Boat, for a ſafegard frō both, drencht him into as great miſery, certainly greater Ignominy then both the other. Wherin yet the Pope doth not want his ſhare and ſhame; amongſt his owne fauourites, ſome accurſing that his preſcribed Charter, as [d] lamentable and deteſtable; [e] ſome, denying it was of the Popes procuring, but that K. Iohn had long before made a vow of deuotion, that if God ſetled him in thoſe Kingdomes he would dedicate them both, and make them tributary to the See Apoſtolicke. But ſome other (great pillars of the Papacy) ſtepping further, [f] auow it to be vtterly vntrue, that King Iohn did make his Realmes thus tributary to the Pope; or [g] that euer ſuch penſions were paide to Rome; or [h] if hee ſo did, or any other Engliſh King ſhould ſo doe, ſuch an Act to bee of no validity at all; or if it were of any force; [i] it ought onely to lie on King Iohn, who ſo offended, and not on any his Succeſſors. Doubtleſſe, if the Papall Sword had power to cut off King Iohns regality for any offence, his Crowne was to haue deſcended to the next Heire (whether Henry his ſonne, or Eleanour Arthurs ſiſter, then a liue) who, as they were not guilty of the fault, ſo neither conſenting to the reſignement. Some therefore haue imagined, that [k] ſuch Inſtruments might happily then bee motioned and drawne, and yet die vnratified, though the copies ſtand recorded; but whatſoeuer were then done, that the Pope himſelfe (not onelie thoſe his friends) were thereof aſhamed will hereafter appeare.

(50) Whiles Pandulphus is thus chaffering about the Crowne for his Maſter the Pope, Philip is fitting his head to weare it, and was now ſetting forth his Nauy to winne it, for himſelfe; which made the Legate (hauing after [l] fiue dayes ſeyſin redeliuered the Crowne, but [m] not yet releaſed the Cenſures, till conditions were performed) to haſten into France, carrying with him eight thouſand pound, as part of reſtitution to the exiled Biſhops; where, comming to King Philip, hee aduiſed him to diſmiſſe his hoaſt, & enterpriſe againſt King Iohn, as being now an obedient and reconciled Sonne to the Church. But Philip who was of the Popes mind, not caring for Iohns repentance, but for his Kingdome, which now hee loſt before he had gotten it, [n] fretting exceedingly to ſee himſelfe not onely ſet vp for a ſtale, and made to the World an obiect of ſcoffe, by the Nunces guilefull colluſions, but alſo by the [o] Popes owne inticements, plunged into ſo exceſſiue a dammage, (hauing ſpent, beſide his great trauaile in this preparation, 60000. Crowns, wherewith hee purchaſed nought but ſcoffes; reſolued, and profeſſed, that ſith the Pope himſelfe, had ſo farre thruſt him on, his Legates ſuggeſtions ([p] no nor his threats of excommunication,) ſhould not draw him backe from his intendment. In which reſolution [q] calling his Peeres and Nobles into a conſultation at Sueſſouns, all the reſt approuing the courſe, Ferdinand Earle of Flaunders (part of whoſe Country Philip by force detained) told him tartly, that [r] as the attempt was both vniuſt, and impoſsible, ſo [ſ] it was fitter, euery mans right ſhould at home be reſtored, and iuſtice imbraced, before they attempted to teach duties of piety to others abroad. And, that he [t] ought rather to thinke, of making reſtitution to King Iohn of thoſe tranſmarine Countries, which hee withheld vniuſtly, then of inuading his Realm, wherto hee had no right at all. With which vnexpected reclamation, [u] the chiefe Peeres beganne to wauer, & Philip enraged, bidding him defiance, forbad him his Court. The like rough vſage (not * long before) found [x] Reginald the moſt valorous Earle of Bulloigne (though his daughter was married to Philips younger ſonne,) whom the French King perceiuing to wiſh well to King Iohn, [y] droue him vniuſtly out of his Earledome; but King Iohn, receiuing him with honourable compenſation of [x] fayre reuenewes in England, held both with him and Earle Ferdinand, a ſure (though ſecret) confederacy: So that now Philips rage, and feare to hazard his owne Crowne, if ſeeking anothers, hee ſhould leaue ſo neere an Enemy at his backe, diuerts the courſe of his Ambition into the ſtreame of his Reuenge, and reſoluing firſt to ſubdue the Earle, (after which ſucceſſe hee might more ſafelie paſſe into England,) hee commands his mighty prepared Nauy to ſet foorth from the mouth of Seyne towards Flaunders, where himſelfe with his forces (meaning to ſubdue the country in their way) would meet them by land. Whereof King Iohn hauing ſpeedy intelligence from the Earle (who, knowing his meanes too ſlender to beare off the Kinges ſo long prepared power, deſired his preſent aide) without delay diſpatched his * Fleet, to purſue them who intended to purſue him, vnder the conduct of [a] three King Philip great Nauy ſcatred by Engliſh.

* Of ſome Mat. Par.

[a] three braue Generals, his brother William Earle of Saresbury, William Duke of Holland, and Reginald Earle of Bulloigne; [b] who with happy gales surprizing the French Navy at the port of Damme, (whiles most of the French Souldiers were on land, dispoiling the Earles Country,) seized on them all; [c] three hundred of which Shippes, laden with prouision, Armes, and other costly fraught (for whatsoeuer the King and all his Nobles held dearest was therein,) they sent for England (whither at first they were bound) and aboue one hundreth other they burnt, or sunke for France.

(51) This Nauall victory produced effectes in the two Kings so opposite as were their affections; the [d] one, with anguish of his irreparable losse and ignominy, hasting backe into France, to preuent further danger; and [e] the other (ioyfull of his own successe and his confederates) dismissing his power, as secure of any French attempts in haste. Wherefore now, with full purpose to find him worke at home, who so busily sought it abroad, hee forthwith sent (with large rewards to hir Flaunders Army) [f] instructions also to the Earles, how to infest Philip on that side of France, whiles himself entring Poictou, would the like on the contrary side, and Otho the Emperour on a third part. A dangerous plot and league, if the issue had beene answerable to the designes. For prosecution whereof, [g] King Iohn attending at Portsmouth with a noble Army, in hope now that all true English, would gladly embrace so fayre an opportunity, to recouer their hereditary Prouinces from the false French; his Barons restles themselues in procuring his vnrest, and enuying that his forrain vexations being thus passed, he should want domesticke, flatly oppose themselues both to his commaund and their Countries good, [h] denying him (vntill hee were assoyled of his excommunication,) their attendance in so behouefull a seruice. Those men in the heate of his former troubles with the Pope, thinking such troubled waters most aduantageous for their fishing, [i] recommenced their contention with the King for their long-desired Liberties, wherin because they found him still as immoueable, as themselues were immoderate, it seemeth, though the cloake of their now-refusall were Religion, yet their spurre was Reuenge; hauing withall an eye to the good of the king of France, whom so well they had before loued, as to wish him King of England. But King Iohn, being no lesse earnest to further the present generall cause, then they their particular ends, delayed not their desires; and [k] despeeding his Charters and safe-conducts to the Archbishop and his fellow-Exiles, hee as speedily [*] arriued: [l] at whose presence the earth is said to haue trembled; but (doubtlesse) King Iohn did; who hearing of his comming towardes him (then at Winchester) went to meete him and those other Bishops; at whose sight [m] hee fell downe at their feet with flouds of teares, intreating them to commiserate His, and his Kingdomes miseries. Vpon which [n] great humility in a King (mouing them likewise to bedew their eyes,) they lifted him from the ground, and leading him by each Arme to the dore of the Cathedrall Church (where, at rehearsall of the 50. psalme, all his Nobles and others wept for ioy,) after in the Chapter-house they did absolue him; but with such guilefull Appendices of Oathes imposed on him, that this assoilement was not so much the Epilogue of his old, as the Prologue of his new Tragicall vexations.

(52) For the Prelates, whose best abettors the disloyall Barons had formerlie beene, meaning now to bee the like to them, amongst other Oathes then taken of the king (to [o] defend holy Church & Churchmen; to make due restitutions to the Clergy; to beare fealty to the See of Rome,) cunningly also inserted this, [p] to establish the good Lawes of his Predecessors, & to abolish all bad, proceeding with all his Subiects according to the iust iudgements of his Courts: out of which generalities, what good stuffe the Prelates & Barons can picke, sequels will shew. Now all exceptions seeming to bee taken away, which might hinder the Kings designe for France, hee once againe at Portsmouth hastens to embarke his hoast; where, at the point of passage new impediments are pretended, [q] that the people hauing spent their money with long attendance could not be fitted for the seruice except the King would doe it out of his Treasure; which moued the King in anger, with a small traine of his owne attendants, to set forth to sea, and his Barons (Philips true friendes) to depart home, leauing the king (who at Gersey expected their comming) destitute of their seruice. With these so often trecherous delusions, what maruaile, or blame, if a King, and in so important an Action, thus defeated, were enflamed to take due reuenge? On which purpose the King thus [r] enforced to returne, resoluing to chastice those rebellious Spirits (the causes thereof) and to reclaime them to due obedience by force of Arms, the Archbishoppe (resolute to bee as tough a Bridle to the Regall power, as euer Hubert his predecessor was,) came vnto him, to diuert him with Argument, that it was a breach of his Oath, for him to take Armes against any man whomsoeuer, without the iudgement of his Court. But the [s] next day, seeing he could not thus preuaile with reasons (the King forbidding him to intermeddle in matters of lay-iudgements, and [t] swearing that hee would not forbeare for one * Clerkes pleasure to tame his owne vassals) hee followed the King (who was on his way earnestly following his intendment) deterring him with threates, and vowing, [u] if out of hand he did not desist from his purpose, he would excommunicate all (except the King himselfe) who durst take Armes against any whomsoeuer, till the Interdict were quite released. So quickly did this Prelate on his comming into England, shew himselfe not onely a faithfull Philippine, (as the King foresaw,) and a faithlesse Baronist (as these his darings proue) but euen another Pope, to threaten and persecute the King, sith Innocentius had left to doe it.

(53) But these threates of sacred Censure, though they dash the whole course of Regale gouernment, may seeme the more excusable, hee hauing some colour (though but a colour) thereof by reason of his vocation and place: the courses which soone after he pursued, will not admit the like plea or pardon with the King. This English Pope, hauing in a [x] promiscuous Synode of Clergy men and Barons, granted by Indulgence, that in this time of Interdict, both Conuentuals and Seculars, might in their Churches celebrate diuine seruice, so it were with a very low voice; singled out the Barons into a [y] very priuate conference, (more cordiall perhaps to them then seruing of God,) relating with much ostentation, what an Oath at his assoiling the King, hee [*] compelled him to take, for restoring good lawes, and antiquating bad; to which end, a Charter of King Henry the first being lately found (which there hee shewed and caused to bee read) by it, they might, if themselues would reduce, to the pristine estate, those Liberties which long they had lost. Both Charter and Counsell being receiued with [*] great applause and ioy, a [z] Confederacy was stricken betwixt the they all swearing to him to striue for those liberties to the spending of their liues, and hee promising them his most faithfull and vttermost assistance. Amongst so many false to the State, probable it is, that some were false among themselues, by whome these secrecies might come to the Kings eares; who finding himselfe by both Clergy and Lay-Peeres combining against him, vnable to reuenge his forraine, or represse such domesticke indignities, knew no surer way to ouertop them all, then by that high Hand, by which himselfe was first subiected to them all. How this must be fetcht about, because it concernes his Holinesse, a learned Monke shall relate in his owne Language. [a] The King knew and had learned by manifold experience, that as the Pope, both for Ambition, and Pride, went beyond all other mortall men: So likewise, he was in his greedy desire of riches so vnsatiable, tiable, that with money eyther paid or promiſed, hee might be wrought like waxe and made pliable to all wicked actions. Thus hauing the true length of the Popes foot, he fittes him accordingly with rich preſents, and golden promiſes, crauing (by ſuch mouing Rhetoricke) not his aide onely, but his Curſe alſo againſt the Archbiſhoppe and Barons, who ſo vnceſſantly diſtreſſed him. But Innocentius (forward of himſelfe without any Motiues, to put in vre thoſe his Papall vertues, and the execution of his late-vſurped power,) vpon the firſt gladſome newes of Englands Vaſſallage to his See, had preſently diſpatched for England an Agent of greater port then Pandulph, a Subdeacon, Nicholas Biſhoppe of Tuſculum, with no meaner credence and inſtructions for preſeruing what the Pope had guilefully gotten, then Pandulph had to purchaſe, what hee ambitiouſly gaped for: by whoſe [b] arriuall the King ſeemed to be poſſeſſed of thoſe his deſires, before his golden letters arriued at Rome to craue them.

The Popes Legate commeth into England.

[b] Circa feſtum S. Michaelis. Reg. Wend. MS.

(54) For this Legate was infected with the like itches ([c] Ambition and Auarice) as his Maſter, and therefore King Iohn knew how to demerite his faſtneſſe and loue, by ſupplying him with like [d] ointments; whereby the Archbiſhop and Barons ſoone perceiued, that the Legate was [e] wholy Regall, and the King Papall; which icalouſie made both their Actions more diſtaſtfull. The Ouert and profeſſed end of his comming, being to releaſe the Interdict, hee firſt tampered a little to accord the King and Prelates vpon couenantes of Reſtitution; towardes which, though the king offered ten thouſand marks, yet the Prelates ([f] repining at the Legates * partiality to the King in approuing that offer,) [g] choſe rather to ſuffer the whole land to grone vnder that vnchriſtian, and truly-ſtyled Curſe, * then to defalcate any iot of their couetous demaunds. Vnder which colour, the Popes Agent, (a fitte helue for ſuch a hatchet,) brake his mind to the King of a more ſecret & principall cauſe of his Legacie, which was [h] for the contriuing of a more validous and vnexceptionable conueyance of his Kingdomes to the yoake of Romiſh Soueraignety; pretending doubtleſſe, (as Pandulph had done) that [i] hee could neuer be ſafe or quiet, but vnder the powerfull protection of the Popes winges. What iuſt exceptions the World might take to the former Graunt, his Holineſſe was not ignorant; it being an Act in the King, both of manifeſt * Periurie againſt his oath at his Coronation, and alſo of * Conſtraint, * Circumuention, and * Feare; hee being driuen thereto by the Pope himſelfe, who had ſet vp both the French power, and his owne Barons againſt him; an Act of one * actually excommunicate, as alſo were the * Witneſſes conuerſing with him in that action, whereto, as neither the * next Heyres, nor the * Clergy, nor * Body of the Kingdome, gaue any conſent, ſo an * open diſclaime thereof was made by the very [k] Principall man there preſent, in the name (as is likely) of all the reſt: and that all was ingroſſed with ſo many groſſe * vntruthes, as if done moſt voluntarily; without any feare or force; in a general Aſſembly of the Barons; onely by a diuine inſpiration, and becauſe the King had nothing fitte to pacifie God for his ſinnes, but the giuing away of his Kingdomes: Well might the Pope bluſh at theſe ſhameleſſe abuſions; and therefore if now the King, ſtanding on calmer termes, can be wrought to ratifie his former Graunt, though the dealing bee more fraudulent, yet the Act will ſeeme more colourable, becauſe ſauouring of leſſe conſtraint, and more free deuotion. But if we looke with an vnpartiall Eye, wee ſhall ſee both the plight of King Iohn, and the action of Innocentius, ſtill like it ſelfe: the Interdiction ſtill burthening his land; his Barons more moleſtious to him then forraine foes; his Prelates greedily grating on him to empouerish his meanes; his Archbiſhop ſtopping all proceedings againſt forraine or home-bred enemies; and if hee had thwarted the Popes commaund hercin, hee foreſaw farre greater ſtormes at hand, then hee had hitherto eſcaped. Thus in deſire to ſettle his Kingdomes quiet for his owne time, and in hope, perchance, that his Succeſſors would (as ſince by diuine bleſſing they haue) vindicate it againe from ſuch an enforced ſlauery, hee condeſcended to renue his * Charter of Subiection, knowing belike that his expreſſe * reſeruation to himſelfe and his Heires, of all due adminiſtration of Iuſtice, all Liberties, and Regalties, (as being excepted out of the Graunt,) was forcible of it ſelfe to make it vnforceable. For how hath hee his wonted power of Iuſtice, who was ſupreme, and is made ſubordinate? how his wonted liberties, who was abſolute, & is made Homager and Penſioner? how his fore-vſed Regalities, whom another may name, and command as his vaſſall? Yet this Charter, adorned with a Golden Bull, (fitte for the Roman * Phalaru, whereas the former was but ſealed with wax) was at a meeting in Saint Paules Cathedrall Church ([l] pretended for other buſineſſes about the Interdict) preſented for more authenticke ſolemnity at the High-Altar, where, in the King and Legates preſence, the Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury, himſelf alſo both a Cardinal and a Legat (in this, acting the office of a ſtout Patriote, and noble Prelate, as the Archbiſhop of Dublein had done at the firſt Graunt,) ſtept forth, and in the * name of the whole Clergy and Kingdome, [m] boldly and earneſtly preſented [n] at the ſame Altar in ſolemne manner, his Appeales againſt that Charter ſo execrable to the whole world, as likewiſe formerly [o] he had vſed all poſſible endeuor to diuert the kings hart frō that ſubiection to the Pope and Court of Rome. That the Peeres of the land accorded with the Archbiſhop in the Appeale, (and more then in Appeales) both the Kings owne [p] letters to the Pope ſaying, they openly profeſſed, that they forcibly made head againſt him, becauſe hee had ſo enſlaued his land, and their owne bitter exclamations againſt it, ſo frequently in [q] Authors reiterated, doe demonſtrate: and yet both the Archbiſhop and other Barons, are ſo cunningly named in the Popes [r] Tranſcript, as if they had not onely beene preſent and witneſſes at the doing, but alſo approuers of the deed. What comfort then had Innocentius of renouncing his old Charter, and thus ſhuffling for a new? Surely but little, it ſeemeth; eſpecially when he ſaw both his owne Creatures in England thus oppugne it, and Chriſtian Princes abroad; yea King Iohns * mortall enemies, who not onely denied, that England (notwithſtanding this Tranſaction) [s] was any patrimony of S. Peter, and condemned the Pope for holding an errour ſo pernicious to all Kingdomes; but alſo vowed to die before they would yeeld, that any King can of his owne will, make his Kingdom Tributary, and his Nobles ſlaues to others. By which vniuerſall deteſtation, of this the Popes vſurping, it is not improbable (though for the preſent hee flouriſhed the Tranſcript thereof, which hee ſent into England, with the [t] Preface of Chriſt, and Melchiſedech being Kings and Prieſts, and that therefore in one perſon of Chriſts Vicar, as the Soule and the Body, ſo both Kingdome and Prieſthoode did now concurre,) that yet ere long hee was no leſſe aſhamed of this latter, then of his former Charter. Whereto well ſuteth his teſtimony, who writes that a [u] Parliament was held at London the yeere 1214. Where the Archbiſhop ſate as Preſident with all the Clergy and Layty: wherein by commandement of the Pope, the Charter, Fealty, and homage by which the King was obliged to the Pope, was abſolutely releaſed on the 7 day of Iuly: which if bee true, no maruaile if the Court of Rome cannot produce, though often challenged thereto, this Charter whereof ſo much they vaunt. Notwithſtanding ſome vnquiet Spirits, aſpiring long after to the Papacy, though pretending (perhaps) the [x] Originall Charter was conſumed at Lyons (where the [y] Pope cauſing, ſome ſay, his owne Conclaue to bee ſet on fire, ſo haue a pretence to extort a contribution from the Prelates there in councell, the fire went farther then * hee meant it ſhould) they made ſome flouriſh to [z] renew their claime of homage and pen- penſion, till in a Generall Parliament, the Prelates, Lords, and Commons, ſeuerally and ioyntly [a] enabled, that for ſomuch as neither King Iohn, nor any other King, could bring his Realme and people to ſuch thraldom, but by common aſſent of Parliament, (the which was neuer done,) and that in ſo doing hee did againſt his Oath at his Coronation; beſides many other cauſes of iuſt exception; if therefore the Pope thence forward ſhould attempt any thing therein, the King with all his Subiects ſhould with all their Forces and powers reſiſt the ſame, and rather hazard all their liues and liuelyhood, then endure that vſurpation. If Pope Paſchall (in the [b] time of King Iohns grandfather) hauing with much ſolemnity made ſome graunts to the Emperour Henry, and confirmed them with an [c] Anathema, with the [d] oathes of thirteene Cardinals, and with [e] religious receyuing of the bleſſed Sacrament; yet, becauſe ſuch grants were thought preiudiciall to his See, [f] ſolemnly diſclaimed his owne Act, and ſuch his doing was aproued by a Clergy Councel, as pretended to be done [g] by feare: how much more iuſtly might King Iohns Succeſſors and his State, by ſuch approbation of their grand Councel, free themſelues of thoſe ſeruitudes wherewith by anothers vniuſt, forced, vnwarrantable Act, they were ſuppoſed to be enfettered?

King Iohns preſent condition.

(55) Though the Archbiſhoppe were ſo vnkind againſt the Pope (the Aduancer of his Fortunes,) as to giue by his appeale ſo fatall a blow to his deſired Crowne, yet the Pope was not ſo ingrate as to die in his debt; as quickly hee found in [h] another Appeale which hee made to the Pope againſt his Legate, for that he, relying on [i] Apoſtolicall indulgence, not onely diſpoſed of all Spirituall dignities to [k] ſuch as beſt liked the King, but alſo to his owne [l] Italians, and Kinſmen, though abſent, vnknowne, vnſufficient, vnworthy, yea, and ſome [m] vnborne. Which Legatine * Tyranny vnſufferable in a Chriſtian State, though Simon Langton (the Archbiſhops brother and Proctor) vrged earneſtly before the Pope, yet the Legates Agent Pandulphus, ſo diſplayed both the Archbiſhoppes feruentnes in vſing ſuch eager perſwaſions and appellation againſt the Kings ſubiection, and the Prelates [n] auarice, in their vnreaſonable exactions for reſtitution from the King; being the moſt benigne, modeſt, and humble Prince that his eyes euer beheld; that his Holines not onely conceiued [o] exceeding hatred againſt the Archbiſhop and his cauſe, but ſent alſo his Authenticke Letters for repealing the Interdict, vpon reſtitution onely of 13000. Markes * more to the Prelates (the King before had voluntarily offered them 100000) and that but by equall portions of [p] fiue yeeres payment. But the King, who knew the Popes pleaſure before theſe letters came to impart it, hauing found that his French affaires had ſuſtained vnreparable impeachments by his hitherto enforced delayes, [p] entruſting his Kingdome to the Legate and Earle Marſhals cuſtody, was with his Forces paſſed into Poictou, (whiles in his abſence, the relaxation of the Interdict, after [q] more then ſixe yeeres continuance, was by the Legate in a Parliament ſolemnly promulged) where his Succeſſes were ſo fortunate, that [r] it being powerfully ſubdued, great hope was conceiued the other Prouinces would follow. Whence breaking with [s] like victories into Britaine, being there at the point to giue [t] battle to Lewis the Dolphine, his euer-faithleſſe Poictouins ſodainely [u] forſooke him, and made him forſake his purpoſe. But a greater impayrement of thoſe his hopes, was the [x] defeature of his Confederate Otho the Emperour, at the renowned Battle of * Bouines, where King [y] Philip, ſtricken from his horſe by the hand of Reginald Earle of Bulloigne, had there with his life ended the quarrell, if a faithful Souldier had not couered him with his own Body, and brauely ſacrificed his life, to ſaue his Soueraignes; who thereupon recouered both his footing, and the victory. The heauy newes whereof, concurring with his Barons outrages at home, droue King Iohn on [z] deare conditions, to capitulate on a fiue yeeres Truce, and return to bridle them at home, whoſe attempts hee euer found moſt dangerous, when hee was moſt buſied abroad. For vnder a * pretext of Deuotion (the vſuall maske for Treachery) the Barons aſſembling at Saint Edmunds [a] did euery man on the high Altar ſeuerally ſweare, to renounce their ſworne fealty to the King, and purſue him by Armes, till they had enforced his conſent to the Charter of liberties formerly by the Archbiſhop recommended to them. Which when [b] afterward they came in perſon to challenge of the King, as a part of his Oath taken at his Abſolution; hee [c] ſeeing both their forces and affections addreſſed for violence, was enforced with gentle language and promiſed ſatisfactions, to deſire, till after Eaſter, mature deliberation on ſo important a matter; in which breathing time, both in pollicie, hee tooke new oath of loyalty through all the land, and [d] in deuotion, vndertooke the Vow and Signe of the holy Warres, chooſing belike to die againſt faithles Turks, rather then to liue amongſt ſuch vnfaithfull Subiects. But neither Oathes, nor holy vowes * (then eſteemed the ſupreme priuiledge of protection) could bee ſufficient Bucklers to protect againſt ſuch deſperate attempters; who at the prefixed weeke of Eaſter, preparing themſelues not for a Conference, as with their Prince, but for a Battle, as againſt ſome hoſtile power, trouped together at Stanford, with [f] an Army ineſtimable for number, whoſe * very principall Abetter and conſpirer was Stephen the Archbiſhoppe, the more pernicious perſon, becauſe (to hide his falſe entendementes) moſt aſſiduous in attendance about the King. And [g] him the King ſelecting to ſend to the Barons Army (who were come on as farre as Brackley, not farre from the King, reſiding now in Oxford) to know the contents of their deſires; hee brought a [h] Schedule of their claimed liberties, with a meſſage of their reſolutions, if preſently hee ſealed not a Charter thereof vnto them, they would compell him thereto by forcible entrance on all his poſſeſſions. Whereat his great heart * highly diſdaining, hee demanded, why they alſo demanded not his Kingdome? thoſe their exactions being grounded on no colour of reaſon, and ſwearing neuer to enſlaue himſelfe to them by ſuch a conceſſion, hee diſmiſſed his Archbiſhop to return them his peremptory anſwere.

(56) Neither were the Barons leſſe reſolute in performance of their vow and meſſage, appointing for Head vnto that huge and heady rout, Robert Fitzwalter, whom they enſtyled [i] The Marſhall of Gods Army and holy Church: who firſt aſſayling Northampton Caſtle, after fifteene dayes fruitleſſe fury, departed to Bedford, whoſe * Caſtelan being a Confederate gaue them eaſie entrance; but the Londoners (diſpleaſed with the King for burthening them with taxes) not onely admitted them, but [l] inuited them by requeſt, to enter their City by night: where hauing that Key (as it were) of the land in their diſpoſe, they by their [m] threatfull letters not onely drew moſt of the Nobles from the King, but alſo had almoſt lockt him out of his Regall Seat. To preuent which outrage, by gentle meſſages intreating of the Barons a place and day of meeting, who thereto deſigned * Runingmead, ([n] ſince called Counſel-mead, for ſuch conſultations of State,) they thither came [o] with armed multitudes out of all the Kingdome beyond all number, that the King, [p] ſeeing his power far inferiour vnto theirs, was conſtrained to * grant them their vttermoſt deſires, not onely for Liberties, (ſpecified in * Magna Charta, and Charta foreſtæ,) but alſo for a kind of ſway in the Gouernment, by twenty fiue ſelected Peeres, to whoſe commaunds all the other Barons alſo were bound by oath to bee obſequious. Thus one of the greateſt Soueraignes of Chriſtendome, was now becom the [q] twenty ſixth petty king in his owne Dominions; as appeared that very night, when all the reſt following the pompous ſtreame of the new vpſtart-Kings, left their Soueraigne * onelie with ſeuen Gentlemen to attend him. What maruaile, if high diſdain herof pierced his ſwelling heart, and filled his mind with reuoluing thoughts, how to vnwind himselfe out of those seruile fetters? And so he did: [r] sending his letters ouernight vnto certaine his trustiest Castellans, strongly to fortifie and victuall their Castles; and the [s] next morning before breake of day, very secretly retyring into the Isle of Wight; (whence seeking redresse both by the [t] spirituall and temporall sword) hee sent Messengers, both to the Pope, and other his forraine friends, to craue the Censures of the one, and succours of the other, against such outragious Rebels. In both which, his Agents were so sedulous, and his Friends so compassionate, that at [u] Rome by definitiue sentence, the Barons Charters were speedily cancelled, the King and Barons [x] accursed, if eyther of them obserued the composition, (which Excommunication was soone after vpon their continued rebellion put in execution, for that [y] the Pope, Fortunes wheele being turned, did mortally persecute them whome himselfe had first whetted and incensed against the King,) [z] and from Flaunders, Gascoyne, Brabant and other parts, such competent aids came in, as encouraged the King (after [a] three monethes secrecy and retyring,) to shew himselfe in the face of his enemies. His suddaine comming, with so vnexpected attendance, to the siege of Rochester Castle, so amated both the * Captaine thereof, and all the Barons ([b] who had sworne to assist him against any siege,) that the one not daring to approch to his rescue, the other was enforced to yeeld vp his charge; and all his company had receiued, * what they deserued, had not Sauary de Malleon entreated for their liues. The Gales of King Iohns fortunes seemed from this time, to blow frō some happier Angle; & [c] diuiding his great hoast into two parts, with the one, conducted by himself Northward, he* euery where from the Southern to the Scotish Sea, victoriously subdued his Rebels, as likewise did the Earle of Salisbury with the other forrainers Southward. In which most deplored state of this land, all things were in confusion, & all men set on mischiefe, [d] Fathers against their Sons, Brother against Brother, Kinsmen and Allies, against their neerest friends, by assailing, surprising, pursuing, burning, spoiling, disherizing, tormenting, murthering; all the Kingdome, by the combustion of so vniuersall a Rebellion, becomming like a generall shambles, or place of Infernall torture. And yet, as witnesseth one who then liued, [e] the Fathers and aged men (likely to bee the wiser, and better affected,) stood on the Kings part, but the yonger on the contrary; though some againe forsooke the King for loue of their kindred, and other like respects.

(57) Which certaine miseries, and vncertain sydings, in ciuill warres, are not so strange, as is the sauage madnesse of disloyall dispositions, who to attaine a shadow of seeming Liberties, immerge themselues and their abetters into bottomlesse seruitudes and distresses. Yet more strange it is, that those Barons, & their adhering impugners of the king, whose pretext formerly was, that they durst not obey the King because of the Papall Curse, being now themselues by vertue of the same [f] commanded to obey and assist him, could without any scruple contemn both it, and him, [g] pretending, it concerned them not, because particularly they were not named. Yea the Archbishop himselfe, who with his rufflings had made the World beleeue, that the Popes censure, (yea and his [h] owne too,) were of vertue to depriue the king of all Soueraigne commaund ouer his Subiects, now being [i] by name, and vnder that fearfull penaltie, required by the Pope to denounce the same, against those perturbers of the Kings peace; hee esteeming thereof, but as a visard to affright children, told the Popes messengers, [k] he would not doe it for any cause whatsoeuer, till himselfe had in person conferred with the Pope; for which enormious contempt, the Bishop of Winton and Pandulph, [l] solemnly denouncing the curse themselues against the Barons, did likewise suspend him from all Episcopall authority. Stephen thus comming to Rome (for Innocentius had then called a Generall

And for a farther reuenge, whereas Simon Langton (his brother,) by his procurement had beene elected to the See of Yorke, (a strange example to [s] haue a whole Kingdome ruled by two Brethren of so turbulent humors) the Pope not onely did [t] cassate his Election, and made him incapable of any Episcopall Dignitie, but also placed in that See, Walter Grey, [u] (a trustie friend to the King, and a professed enemy to the Langtons) whose [x] Pall cost him no lesse then a thousand pound. (59) Lewis not so void of Ambition, as to loose a Crowne for want of fetching, was not long behind them; though the Pope (vpon notice of the design) had purposely sent his Legate Cardinall Gualo, with [m] Apostolicall commands to Philip, to stay his Sonne from entring on Saint Peters patrimony; [n] who declared the Great curse in the Councell on all men combining with those persons excommunicate, against king Iohn. Vpon which speech, Philip replyed, that England was no [o] patrimony of Saint Peter, no King hauing power of himselfe to alienate his Kingdome, King Iohn especiallie, who [p] being neuer lawfull King, had no power to dispose thereof, and that it was an Errour, and a pernicious example in the Pope, and an [q] itching lust after a new kind of domination: his Peeres sware, [r] by Christs death they would spend their liues rather then suffer that a King should of himselfe, or with a few flatterers, passe ouer his Crowne, and enthrall his Nobles, especially to the Pope, who should follow Saint Peters steppes to winne soules, and not to meddle with warres and murther of mens bodies: and Lewis himselfe [s] hee beseecht his father, not to hinder him from that, which hee had not giuen him, and for which hee was now resolued to spend his bloud, and [t] would choose rather to bee excommunicated by the Pope, then to falsifie his promise to the English Barons. With which [*] slender respect & scorne to his Holinesse, the Legate, [u] seeing such sterne lookes, and fearing also they would presentlie haue done him some mischiefe, got thence in hast; and Lewis as speedily set forth for England, with his Fleet of sixe hundred Shippes, and fourescore [x] boates, (Eustachius an [y] Apostata te Monke thereof being chiefe,) wherewith [*] arriuing first in the Isle of [x] Thanet, and afterward at [a] Sandwich, thither came the Barons and ioyned with him. King Iohn (whose great Nauy, [x] wherewith hee meant to encounter him, was driuen downe Southward by a sodaine tempest,) lying then at Douer, [y] with an Armie consisting most of stipendary Forrainers, better affected (as afterwards appeared, to Lewis a forraine Prince, then vnto him, hee deemed it a point as of necessity, so of greater wisedome, to diuert towards Winchester, and [z] for a time to forbeare battle, rather then commit his whole fortunes to the hazard of their suddaine defection. Lewis hereby had free scope to take in all those parts (Douer Castle onely excepted, which King Iohn committed to the most valiant Hubert de Burgo,) till he came to London, where [*] entring with solemne Procession, and [*] incredible applause of all, hee tooke in Paules Church (whither hee went to pray) oaths of the Citizens, and after at Westminster, of the Barons, himselfe [a] swearing to restore all men their right, and to recouer to the Crowne, whatsoeuer had beene lost by King Iohn. There hee [b] chose for his Lord Chancellour, Simon Langton (so lately disgraced by the Pope,) by [c] whose preaching, the Citizens of London and Barons, though being all excommunicated, did celebrate diuine seruice, and drew on Lewis to doe the like; all which, (Lewis and his Chancellour especially, and by name,) Gualo the Legate (being now with King Iohn) did solemnely [d] accurse, and caused to bee so denounced throughout the whole land; making great aduantage thereof, by* [e] conuerting the profits of all their Church liuings to his owne, and his Chaplens vses. But both French and English had now experimentally learned, that the Popes Curse was no such deadly and dreadfull Hagge, as in former times they deemed it; nor could it so fascinate the Lewysians, and their successes, but that all these parts were soon humbled before him; though some where not without resistance, as at Odiam Castle, [f] wherin 13. English men alone, not onely braued Lewis and his whole Army fifteene dayes, but also sallying foorth vpon them, euery one made his enemy, and so carried them to the Castle, and after with great admiration of the French, and honourable conditions surrendred the Castle. Douer, with a few other Castles onely now stood out; where [g] whiles Lewis imploies incredible cost and toyle in a furious but bootlesse siege, ([h] whither Alexander King of Scots in amity repayred to him, but soone returned,) & his Confederates doe the like at Windsor Castle; King Iohn and his mighty hoast, breaking forth with a suddain violence like a furious tempest, ouerrunneth the Country all about, [i] to the ruining of the Barons Castles, and possessions euery where. Thus setting forth from Linne in Norfolke (where for their faithfull seruices hee [k] bestowed large Franchises and his own Sword, and a Guilt Bole, for restification of his affection,) with a full [l] resolution to addresse his mightie Army for to giue Lewis battle, as hee was passing the Washes with his Army and rich carriages toward Lincolnshire, in those sands (by reason of the often-changeable channell, euer dangerous,) all his [m] Carriages, treasure, and prouision, (himselfe and his Army hardly escaping) were irrecouerably lost.

(70) Many likewise were the greeuances into which the Barons, the meane while were plunged; to see their Native Country by their owne wilfulnesse thus horribly massacred, their owne Castles and possessions ruined and rifled by the King; and which bred in them most anxietie, [n] their faithfull seruices (in this their faithlesse adherence) not so respected by Lewis, as he, and their owne fore-running hopes had promised them, whiles hee conferred onely on his French all such Territories and Castles, as the hand of Victory had lent vnto him. But their distresses were yet farre greater, then those their iealousies could comprehend, [o] till a Noble Frenchman (Vicount de Melun) a man of great esteeme with Lewis, hauing his soule in his sicknes deadly wounded with the sins of his health, desired priuate conference on his death-bed in London, with those English Barons, to whome Lewis had committed the custody of that City. To them hee imparted what lamentable desolations and vnsuspected ruines hung ouer their heads, for that Lewis with sixteene other his chiefe Earles and Barons, whereof himselfe was one, (auerring it on the Saluation of his now departing soule,) had taken an Oath, if euer Englands Crowne were setled on his head, to condemne vnto perpetuall exile all such as now adhered to him against K. Iohn, as Traitors to their Soueraigne, and all their kindred in the land vtterly to extirpate. So counselling them timely to preuent their miseries, and to locke vp his words vnder the Seale of Secresie, presently his penitent Soule being thus in peace with men, went to rest with God. What strange amazements so rufull a relation might worke in the hearers, wee may imagine, but onely men in like perplexed estate can fully and sensibly conceiue. The operatiue power whereof was such, that though many of the Barons then doubted, [p] whether, if they returned to their Soueraignes due allegiance, he (whose hatred against them with so many indignities they had prouoked) would accept them vpon their repentance, [q] yet presently sortie of them addressed their letters of submissiue suite vnto the King, in hope that true [r] kingly bloud is euer ready to yeeld mercy, to such as are ready to yeeld themselues prostrate.

(71) But these Sollicitors for mercy came too late, either to receiue, or yeeld any contentment, by their submission to the King, himselfe (now at Newarke) lying at the mercy of a higher Soueraigne, and by the stroke of death neere to some rest, which in his life hee had seldome attained: vexations being commonly the attendants of Crownes, but quiet and content the Priuiledges of more priuate States. On deathes approch, with penitent [t] confession of his sinnes and great deuotion he receiued the blessed Eucharist, hauing the Abbot of [*] Croxton for his physitian both bodily & ghostly: and not onely forgaue gladly all his mortall persecuters (holding that a mater, though very difficult to flesh and bloud, yet salutary to the Soule) but also sent commaund to Henry his sonne to doe the same: to whom hee caused all ptesent, to [t] sweare fealty, as to the Heyre of his Crowne, and sent his letters to all his Officers abroad, exhorting them to assist him. And [u] thus hee commended his Soule to God, and his Body to bee buried in Worcester Church, where the Bishop solemnly interred it, by the Kings appointment, neere the Body of Wolstan, a saincted Bishoppe, renowned for constant fidelity to his Prince against the rebellious Nobles of * his time: with which kind of men, King Iohns gouernment had beene miserably encombred.

(62) This, being the Catastrophe of his Tragicall Raigne, might also haue beene the close of his Story, had not the suddenty of his death, exacted some search into the cause of his sickneſse. Such Authors as touch the matter but in generall, content themselues with saying, he dyed of a [a] griefe, or a [b] feauer, or a [c] flux, or a [d] surfet; but those who haue entred into the particulars, insist on such a Surfet, as whereof both griefe, feauer, and flux were most probable effects and Symptomes. For comming (say [e] they) from the Washes to Swinshed Abbey, (being of the Cisteaux Order, which of old he had much incensed) hee added new matter of offence, as he sate at meat, when, in speech [f] of his enemies too large prouision, hee sware, if hee liued but halfe a yeere longer, he would make one halfe-penny loafe as deare as * twelue: which to preuent, a Monke of that holy habit, whither in loue to Lewis, or hate to the King, or pitty on the Land, presenting him with an enuenomed Cup, (whereof the King commanded him to bee his Taster) became the Diabolical Instrument of his own and his Soueraignes destruction. This relation, deliuered by Monkes, and men of Monkish humour, as a thing so vndenyable, that they auow (at what time they wrote this) [g] fiue Monkes in that Abbey did sing for this their Brothers soule specially, and so should whiles the Abbey stood, which if it had beene forged euery Child might easily haue refuted; and the rehearsall of all circumstances thereof, (of the Kings speeches, of the Monkes conference with his Abbot, of his preparing the drinke with a Toade in the garden, of his dying in the Firmary) might deserue credite with the greatest Patrones of Monkery; yet [h] one of them (as if by acquiting Simon of Swinshed, all * other of such Orders were cleared from assasinating of Princes) striueth eagerly, to asperse some late * Relaters hereof, with the blots both of malice & forgery. Wherein is the malice? in adding to the narration, Pictures also of the fact, so to moue hatred to Monkes and their Religion; whereas of truth, either Monkes, or men of that Religion, were the very first, who not onely so depictured, but also liuely and richly depainted it in their [i] goodliest Manuscripts. Wherein then the Forgery? in adding to Caxton, that [k] his Abbot gaue him absolution for the same before hand, there being no such matter at all, nor any mention thereof in the story? No? let the very story speake; [l] The Monke went to the Abbot, and was striuen of him, and told the Abbot all the King had said; and prayd his Abbot to assoile him, for hee would giue the King such a drinke that all England should be glad thereof and ioyfull: tho yode the Monke into the Garden, &c. Yea farther, [n] one Monk alleadgeth, an inducement for the Abbots assent therto, for that the King had sent for the Abbots sister (a faire Prioresse) with purpose to haue deflowred her. Yea, but the Story it self is charged with [o] noueltie, the first author thereof being but An. 1483. and all other former Writers making no mention of it. This if true, were somewhat, and doubtlesse, it is as true as the former: for how could hee bee the first Author, when not onelie [p] Ranulph the Monke of Chester, [q] Iohn of Tynmouth, and [r] Thomas Otterbourne the Franciscan Fryer, recorded it as * a fame generally receiued; but sundry other ancient stories, as Iohn of Lichfield, the Monke of Leicester, & Scala Mundi (to omit other [s] nameleſse Authors before Ann. 1483,) so confidently auouch his poisoning at Swinshead, that vnpartiall after-Writers, though friends to Monkery, made no scruple to beleeue it. And why should they not, sith an * Author, more ancient and vnexceptionable then all the rest, (euen king Iohns Sonne and Successor in his Kingdome) auerred it, [u] when, the Prior of Clerken-well saucily telling him (being then in that house) that as soone as hee ceast to doe Iustice towards his Prelates, hee should cease to be a King; the King enraged with his trayterous threat, replyed; What? meane you to turne mee out of my Kingdome, and afterward to murder me, as my father was dealt with?

(63) But not to trouble our selues with refuting a Gooses gagling against Foxes true relation; easie it is to obserue the hatred of Monks against that King, both in thus procuring his death then, and his dishonour (a second death) in their slanderous inuentions euer since. For, whereas he [x] writ by some of his Bishops to certaine forraine Princes, for aides against his faithlesse Rebels; the Monkes charge him, that hee counterfeited his Bishoppes Seales, and writ abroad, that all Englishmen were become Infidels and Apostates from Christs faith, and therefore such should come to subdue them and take their possessions: [y] when he said, a Stag which hee kild, had neuer the lesse fatte, though he neuer heard a Masse; they charged him hee doubted of the Resurrection of the dead; [z] and in saying, hee neuer sped well after his yeelding to the Pope, that hee said hee was vnfortunate since hee was reconciled vnto God: that, [a] when hee gaue leaue to a seruant of his owne, to enter any religious Order, he gaue him leaue to bee of what Religion and Faith hee list. That moreouer, [b] hee offered his Kingdome to a Sarazen, and would embrace the Turkish faith, though this tale were told by one Robert of London (a [c] wicked Masse-Priest, or rather a Monster, [d] hauing a face like a Iew, with one arme long, and another short, his fingers deformedly growing together two and two,) with such senseles improbabilities, as, [e] that hee found that Moorish King reading of Saint Paules Epistles, and that hee refused the Kingdom of England being offered him, with the like. That lastly [f] it was reuealed to a Monke, King Iohn was in Hell; though a Poet for so saying, is by M.P. (a who made no doubt of King Iohns saluation) censured for a * Reprobate. These all are demonstrations of so incredible hatred, as should rather alleuiate their Authors credite, then the Kings; whose Raigne had it not fallen in the time of so turbulent a Pope, so ambitious Neighbour-Princes, so disloyall Subiects, nor his Story into the handes of exasperated Writers, hee had appeared a King of as great renowne, as misfortunes. His works of deuotion inferiour to none; as his Foundations declare at [h] Beauley, [i] Farrington, [k] Malmsbury, and [l] Dublin, and that other for Nunnes, at Godstow by Oxford, [m] for which, some haue interpreted that Prophesie of Merlin as meant of him; Sith Virgin giftes to Maids he gaue, 'Mong st blessed Saints God will him saue. His Acts and Orders for the Weale-publike were beyond most: hee being eyther the first, or the chiefest, who appointed those noble Formes of Ciuill gouernment in [o] London, and [p] most Cities, and Incorporate Townes of England, endowing them also with their greatest Franchises; The [q] first who caused Sterling money to bee here coyned; The [r] first, who ordayned the Honourable Ceremonies in Creation of Earles; The first, who [s] setled the Rates and Measures for Wine, Bread, Cloth, and such like Necessaries of Commerce; The [t] first, who planted English Lawes and Officers in Ireland, and both annexed that Kingdome, and fastned wales to the Crowne of England, therby making amends for his losses in France. Whose whole course of life and actions, wee cannot shut vp with any truer Euloge, then that which [u] an ancient Author hath conferred on him: Princeps quidem dem Magnus erat, sed minus felix; atque vt Marius, vtramque fortunam expertus; Doubtlesse, he was a Prince more Great then happy, and one, who, like Marius, had tried both sides of Fortunes wheele.

His Wiues.

(64) Alice, the first wife of King Iohn, was the eldest of the two daughters, and heires apparant at that time of Humbert the second, Earle of Maurien; now called Sauoy: her Mother was Clemence daughter of Berthold the fourth, Duke of Leringen, who had been the diuorced wife of Henry the Lyon, Duke of Saxonie. This marriage was in their childhoode cõcluded by their Parents at Mountferrant in Auerne, in February, Anno, 1173; he should haue had with her, her Fathers Earledome, but all altered by her vntimely death; and after ensued the death of her Mother, the new marriage of her Father, and issue male of the same, whereof the Dukes of Saxonie are descended.

(65) Isabel, his second wife (by * some called Hawisia or Auis) though the * youngest of the three Sisters, yet was in regard of this marriage, the sole Heire of William Earle of Glouceſter, sonne of Earle Robert, the Naturall sonne of King Henry the first; her Mother was Hawis the daughter of Robert Bossu Earle of Leiceſter. Shee was married vnto him when hee was Earle of Mortaine, in the first yeere of his brother Richards raigne: and after ten yeeres hauing no issue by him, was (the first yeere of his Raigne) diuorced from him, vnder pretence of Consanguinity, and married to Geffrey Mandeuill Earle of Essex, and lastly, to Hubert de Burgo Earle of Kent, but died without any Issue by them.

(66) Isabel also his last wife, was daughter and heire of Aymer Earle of Angoleſme; her Mother was Alice daughter of Peter, Lord of Courteney, fifth son of Lewis the Grosse, King of France. Shee was married vnto him in the first yeere of his Raigne, & crowned by Hubert Archbishoppe of Canterbury, 8. Id. Octob. Anno 1200. and surviuing him, was married to Hugh Brun Earle of March, and Lord of Lusignian and Valence in Poytou, to whom first she should haue beene married, but yet (as seemeth) continued her affection to him till now. By him shee had diuers Children, (greatly aduanced by the King, Henry 3. their halfe brother, and as greatly maligned by his Subiects) Hugh Earle of March and Angoleſme, Guy of Lusignian, slain in the battell at Lewise, William of Valence Earle of Pembroke, Aymer of Valence Bishoppe of Winchester, Geffrey of Lusignian L. of Hastings.

His Issue.

(67) Henry, the eldest Sonne of King Iohn, and Isabell his last wife, was borne at Winchester, 1. October, 10. of his Fathers Raigne, Anno, 1208. K. Iohn dying at Newarke, (*whither hee was brought in a Horselitter from Swynshead,) the Barons malice was ended, their offence amended, Lewis of France reiected, and the yong Prince seated on his Fathers throne.

(68) Richard, his second son by the same Queene, was borne the next yeere after Henry; by whom afterward hee was made Knight, created Earle of Cornwall, and appointed Earle of Poytou. After the death of William Earle of Holland, Emperour of the West, hee was by the Electours chosen to succeed him in the Empire, and crowned King of Romanes, & of Almayn at the City of Acon in Germany, by Conrade Archbishoppe of Coleyne, Maij 27. being the Ascention day, Anno 1257. deceasing at the Castle of Berkhamsted, April 20. Ann. 1271. the 13. yeere of his Empire, his body was buried in his Monastery of Hayles in Glouceſterſhire, but * his Heart at Oxford in Reuly Abbey (founded by him) vnder a Pyramis of admirable worke. Hee had three wiues, the first was Isabel daughter of william Marshall Earle of Pembroke, widdow of Gilbert Clare Earle of Glouceſter; by whom hee had issue, Henry slaine at Viterbo in Italy, and Iohn, both dying without Issue. His second wife was Strachez, (daughter of Raimond Earle of Prouince, & sister to Queene Eleanor his brothers wife) who was crowned with him at Acon, and had issue by him Edmund Earle of Cornwall, and others. His last wife was Beatrice, Niece to the Archbishoppe of Coleyne, who seemeth to haue surviued him, and to haue no Issue by him.

* Rosa Vvarinecanus.

(69) Ioane, the eldest Daughter and Child of K. Iohn and Queene Isabel his last wife; was the first wife of Alexander the second, King of Scots, married vnto him in Yorke, Iunij 25. Anno 1221. who returning into England to visite her Brother, deceased at London, and was buried in the Nunnery at Tarent in Dorsetshire, 4. Martij, in the 21. yeare of her Brother king Henries raigne in England, and the 23. of king Alexander her husbands in Scotland, Anno 1236.

(70) Eleanor their second daughter, was first married to William Marshall the yonger, Earle of Pembroke: and after his decease without issue, and seuen yeeres Widow-hood remarried to Simon Montfort Earle of Leiceſter, (sonne of Simon Earle Montfort in France, by Amice Daughter of Robert Blanchman Earle of Leiceſter) who maintaining the Barons warres against King Henry her brother, was slaine at the battaile of Euesham, in the 19. yeere of her brothers raigne, 1265; after whose death, shee and her Children were forced to forsake England; she died in the Nunnery at Montarges in France. Henry her eldest sonne, was slaine with his father at Euesham: Simon, the second, was Earle of Bigorre, and ancestor to a Family of Mountfords in those parts of France. Almaricke, her third sonne, was first a Priest, and Treasurer of the Cathedrall Church in Yorke, and after a Knight, and a valiant seruitour in sundrie warres beyond the Seas. Guy the fourth Sonne was Earle of Angleria in Italy, and Progenitour of the Mountfords in Tuscaine, and of the Earles of Campobachi in the Kingdome of Naples. Richard the fift sonne, remained priuily in England, and changing his name from Mountford to wellesborne, was ancestor of the family of Wellesbornes in England. She had also a daughter named Eleanor, borne in England, brought vp in France, and married into Wales to Prince Lewellen ap Griffith.

(71) Isabel, their yongest daughter, was born, An. 1214; when shee was 21. yeeres of age, shee was married (being the 6. and last wife) to the Emperour Frederick the second, at the City of Wormes in Germany, 20. of Iuly, 1235. Shee had issue by him, Henry appointed to bee King of Sicily, and Margaret wife of Albert, Landgraue of Thurin: shee was Empresse 6. yeeres, and died in Childbed, Decemb. 1. of her husbands Empire 31. of her brothers raign 38. Anno, 1241.

(72) Iane, or Ione the daughter naturall of King Iohn (by Agatha Daughter of Robert Ferrers, Earle of Darby) marryed to Lewis Prince of Wales. Anno 1204. her Father gaue with her the Castle & Lordshippe of Elinsmore in the Marches of Southwales; she (like a most louing Child) gaue her Father secret intelligence of the Treasons intended against him by the Welsh and English.

(73) Geoffrey Fitz-Roy, a base son, who transported some Souldiers into France, when Archbishoppe Hubert forbad the King his father to goe thither.

(74) Richard, who married the daughter & heire of Fulbert de Dover, who built Chilham Castle in Kent, which Castle hee had with her, and had Issue by her, of which som families of good esteem are descended.

HENRIE THE THIRD, LORD OF IRELAND, DVKE OF NORMANDIE, GVYEN, AND AQVITAINE, &c. THE FORTIE-SIXTH MONARCH OF ENGLAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSVE.

A.D. 12

CHAPTER IX.

HENRIE, the eldest Son of King Iohn, was when his Father dyed about *ten yeeres of age: which state of Child-hood, being most vnfit to succeed in so troublous a state, (the furious waues whereof seemed far from being appeased) God Almighty, in fauour and pitty of his Innocency, strengthned with the seruice of great and worthy men, whereby the free and noble Realme of England was gratiously preserued from French seruilitie; from whose Continent as it was naturally disparted with a Sea, so could it as badly haue endured to be ioyned therto by subiectiue gouernement. Howbeit the difficulties were not few nor sleight, which did at first empeach this happy preseruation, though they did not hinder it long; for, * hee disposing the matter, who ordaineth all things wisely, and moderates them sweetely, faire weather was restored after stormes, and quiet being established through the Kingdome, the peaceable seruants of God had space to breath in.

* Ypod. Neust.

The succours of King Henries Childhood.

(2) To effect so great a benefite, Wallo the Popes Legate stood wholy for aduancement of Henry, and expulsion of the French; the authority of whose perswasions, ioyned with his other power and example, drew many of the Prelates so farre, that (although their lands and goods were therefore spoyled) they would not doe any homage to Lewis; as likewise the loyall care of William Marshall Earle of Pembrooke, did gaine (in time) and settle the hearts of the secular Lords. Great was the wisdom, courage and diligence of that Noble Gentleman in so broken and ieopardous estate; for he, knowing that the maine hopes of his Country rested in the safety of their persons, in whom the right of Succession was was, he first of all secured them within the Citie of Glouceſter, which was at Henries ſeruice: There were with the young King, his mother Queene Iſabel, his brother Richard (afterward King of Romans,) his ſiſters, the ſaid Earle, and many others in great numbers of the chiefe and principall men of all ſortes; who vpon perfect notice of King Iohns death, repaired thither to their young Prince, with a purpoſe to conſult and concur in one, for the re-union of minds and bodies to the obedience of the true borne king. The Earle of Pembrooke therefore bringing forth his precious charge, and placing him with all due honour and ceremony in view of the aſſembled States, is reported for the pleaſing of all ſides, to haue vſed words to this effect. *Albeit the father of this Prince whom here you ſee before you, for his euill demeanours hath worthily vndergone our perſecution, yet this young Child as he is in yeeres tender, ſo is he pure and innocent from thoſe his Fathers doings: Wherefore, ſith euery man is to be charged with the burthen of his owne tranſgreſſions, neither ſhall the Child (as Scriptures teach vs,) beare the iniquitie of his Father: we ought of duty and conſcience, beare our ſelues milder towards this tender Prince, and take compaſſion of his age. And forſomuch as he is the Kings * lawfull and eldeſt Sonne, and ought to be our Souereigne, and his Succeſſor, let vs with one ioint aſſiſtance appoint him our King and Gouernour; let vs remoue from vs this Lewis the French Kings ſonne, and ſuppreſſe his people, which are a confuſion and ſhame to our Nation, and the yoakes of their ſeruitude let vs caſt off from our ſhoulders.*

(3) The entertaining of perſwaſions among the wiſe, is an effect of Truth, not of painted Phraſes; and theſe plaine wordes of the Earle, (the young Kings Brother in Law) were receiued with generall applauſe of all that were preſent, ſo that Henry was immediately proclaimed, and ſpeedily crowned (vpon the day of SS. Simon & Iude) in the preſence both of Wallo the Popes Legate, (who impoſed on his vnexperienced yeeres ſome vndue Oathes of ſeruice to the Romane See,) and of Queene Iſabel, with many of the Lords Spirituall and Secular, and ſtore of all other ſorts of People. The ſpeede of which roiall Ceremony (for it was the ninth day after King Iohns death) was not greater then the neceſsity of the State required: for his Enemy (nor onely his, but the enemy of the Engliſh name, Prince Lewis) had (as yet) London, the chiefe ſeate of the Empire, at his deuotion, many potent Earles, Barons, and martiall malecontents, ſubiect to his command, and an Armie in the field with which he ſought to conſtraine that mirrour of conſtant loyalty, Hubert de Burgh, to render him the moſt important Caſtle in England, that of Douer, committed to his much-approued truſt: The young King on the other ſide was enuironed with many difficulties, want of money not the leaſt, the moſt part of his Fathers treaſures being drowned. To encounter all which miſchiefes, the ſaid Earle of Pembrooke was by common aſſent of Prelates and Peeres conſtituted Guardian of the young Kings perſon, and Vice-Gouernour of the Kingdome.

(4) Letters hereupon iſſuing in the new Kinges name, and for his affaires, to all ſuch as had charge in the common-weale, (with many promiſes of reward and fauour,) were accordingly in moſt places obeyed: for the euill will borne to King Iohn, ſeeming to die with him, and to bee buried in the ſame graue, the loyall bloud waxt warme about the coldeſt hearts, rekindling in them the honeſt deſire of ſhewing themſelues true Engliſtmen. It was alſo a great helpe to the Kings party, that Prince Lewis his followers and abettours, were, on euery Sonday and Holiday, pronounced to ſtand accurſt and excommunicated. Lewis perceiuing (contrary to his expectation) that King Iohns death was to him nothing auaileable, but rather detrimentall, dwels no longer about Douer Caſtle, but raiſing his ſiege, enters London, and prouides the beſt hee can for his tottering eſtate, which hee ſought to ſupport, by putting French Garriſons into Caſtles; The * Tower of London being rendred to him; hee beſiegeth Hertford Caſtle, which after the ſlaughter of many French, being deliuered vpon faire compoſition, the cuſtody of that Peice was demanded by Richard Fitz-Walter, as by ancient right belonging to him; but Lewis put him off with this anſwere, that he ſhould haue patience, till hee had conquered the Realme, at which time hee would reſtore their rights to euery one. The ſecret reaſon which moued Lewis to giue this anſwere, was: for that, conſulting with his French vpon Fitz-Walters demaund, they gaue it for their common opinion: That the Engliſh were not worthy to haue ſuch places entruſted to their charge, who were betrayers of their naturall Lord. A iuſt reaſon to moue Lewis ſo to anſwere, but a farre better to teach others to continue loyall. The Caſtle of Berkhamſted (whoſe Captaine was one Waleran a valiant Dutch Knight) hopeleſſe of ſuccours was likewiſe rendred, which as the reſt, hee ſtuffed with French Garriſons, wherein, howſoeuer hee prouided for his owne Nation during that preſent, hee tooke no wiſe courſe for the maine of his enterpriſe: for ſo apparant iealouſies (ſeconding & confirming the Vicount Melunes predictions) could not but vtterly vnſettle the affections of ſuch great ones as had called him in. His next March being to Saint Albans, where he would haue conſtrained the Abbot to doe him homage, he was encountred with this honeſt anſwere: That he would doe him no homage, vnleſſe hee were abſolued from the homage which hee had made to the King of England: yet to purchaſe reſpite of homage, or rather his, and the Towns peace till Candlemas, hee was forced to vſe the mediation both of his * purſe, and of his noble friends.

(5) But thoſe inteſtine cauſes for which the Barons had called Lewis in, falling now to the ground by the death of King Iohn, and the French by their naturall inſolence, ſuſpitions and vanity, miniſtring new reaſons of auerſion, were all of them ſtrong motiues to diſpoſe the mindes of the Engliſh Lewiſians to returne to due obedience; yet finding themſelues bound in honour, not ſo to leaue him ſodainely deſtitute, (who vpon affiance of their oathes and hoſtages had put himſelfe among them) that he ſhould thereby fall into Henries hands; they deſire therefore his abſence, but not his deſtruction. The more handſomely to compaſſe the reſt, an abſtinence from warre was (for a time) concluded betweene the King and Lewis; the rather for that Lewis had intelligence from Rome, that the curſe which Wallo had denounced againſt him, ſhould ſhortly bee confirmed by the Pope, vnleſſe hee left England. As this Truce gaue Lewis liberty to ſayle backe to France for new ſupplies from his Father, (who greatly deſired to conferre with him;) ſo his abſence gaue opportunity to his Engliſh, to conſult more freely of their beſt way; that from thence forth Lewis was neuer potent in their affections, but * preſently loſt many chiefe Lords and others, who againe became true Engliſh.

(6) Lewis vpon his ſpeedie returne out of France, minding to make a ſpeedy diſpatch, ſets out of London his Army of more then twenty thouſand Souldiers, with a purpoſe not onely to free * Mont-Sorrel (then beſieged by his enemies) but to ſubdue the whole country adioining. Odious and grieuous to the Countries was this paſſage of the French, which reach as farre as Lincolne, there were among them ſo many ragged raſcals, the * verie ſcumme and filthy froth of that Nation, whoſe beggery was ſo baſe that they had not cloathes to hang on their backes, to ſupply the which they made many goe naked in all the places where they marched. The Earle of Pembrooke Gouernour of the King * by the Counſell of Wallo, and the Biſhoppe of wincheſter reſoluing to ſet the cauſe vpon God, and the fortune of a field, is now with the young King and his Aſſiſtant stant Lords, at Newarke, where the Generall assembly for that seruice was appointed. The whole Army after the Musters, rested there some dayes, which they spent not in vanities, but in deuotions & receit of the Sacrament, humbling themselues before the offended Maiestie of God; and so all of them (saith Paris) being prepared, resolue eyther to return victorious, or to die in defence of their country, their Soueraignes right, and their owne Liberties, and possessions, all which seemed now to lie at stake. To giue them the greater edge and spirite, Lewis and his followers accursed.

Wallo with great solemnity accurseth Lewis and his Coadiutors; and thus the Army marcheth towards Lincolne, and the Lewisians there in siege of the Castle: the King himselfe being left with a strong guard at Stow (about eight miles short of Lincolne) accompanied with Wallo and others, there without perill of his person to attend Gods pleasure, in the euent of the enterprise.

(7) Vpon their approch, if the Counsell of* some English Lords had beene followed, the Lewisian Army had issued forth of the City, & giuen them battle in the opē field; but the Earle of Perch (the French Generall) thinking the Kings party to bee greater then it was, for that the Noblemen and Bannerets thereof had each of them two Ensignes, the one born with themselues, the other aduanced among the Carriages, which doubled the shew of their numbers; they did thereupon change that course, closed the Gates of the City, and plyed their endeauours against the Castle more fiercely then before.

The Earle of Pembroke therefore lets Falcasius slip in at the Castle-posterne with his Arbalasters, whiles others breake vp the South-gate of the City, at which the Kings Army most couragiously entring, and they of the Castle sallying out in Flancke of the Enemy, scattered and vtterly defeated the Lewisians. The Earle of Perch their Generall, being enuironed with the Royalists, and willed to render himselfe, sware that hee would neuer become Prisoner to any English: vpon which refusall he was run through the sight of his helmet into the braines, and so dyed without speaking any word. In this conflict (being on Saturday in Whitson-weeke) the force of naturall propension was apparent; for notwithstanding the fierie resolutions of the Kings People, yet when they saw the faces of their kinsmen, friends & countrimen on the other side, that fury relented so strōgly, that the most part of the reuenge fell vpon the Horses, and not vpon the Horsemen, whom onelie they laboured to make their Captiues. The whole riches of the Lewisian Campe, & of the City of Lincolne, became the booty and spoile of the Kings Armie, whereupon this discomfiture was called Lewis Fair; Neither did the Clergy of the place escape, for the Popes Legate had commaunded that they also should be rifled to a penny, as persons excommunicated in partaking with Lewis. The Chase was but coldly & fainedly followed vpon the flying Barons, otherwise not a man could haue escaped; wherein yet the chiefest Barons were taken, with about * 400. Knights, besides Esquiers, and of other sorts without note or number; though * some say that this number of Knights were slaine, & matrons and women of the towne flying by boate, which they had no skill to gouerne, were drowned. Such as escaped the fight were not therefore past the danger; for the Country people fell vpon them as they fledde, killing great numbers, so that almost all the footmen tooke vp their last lodgings before they could reach to London, where Lewis was. The Marshal of France, the Chastellan of Arras, and about two hundreth Knights came safely thither, but were not otherwise then sowerly welcome of the Prince, who laid vpon their cowardise the losse of all the rest. His feare of being taken Prisoner iustly encreasing, hee fortifies London by the best meanes hee can, and dispatcheth Posts into France for more reliefe. This great victory was much the stranger, if (as * some write the fame went) that onely three were slaine vpon both sides, the Earle of Perch, one of Du-Brents Knights, and an obscure fellow belonging to some, or other of the Barons.

The fearefull end of the Earle of Perch.

The Kings Armyhath a strange victory, called Lewis Fair.

(8) The Kings Gouernour after the victory rode presently with the gladsome tidings in the heighth of speed to the King and Legate, who with teares of ioy gaue God thankes. But the noble Earle not leauing his worke imperfect, seekes to embarre Lewis from forraging about London. Meane while by the diligence of Lady Blanch the wife of Lewis, Eustace the ruffianly Apostata, (who of a Monke becomming a * Demoniacke) was now vpon the Sea with a fresh supply of men and munition bound for London; But God was no better pleased with these, then with the other scatterlings at Lincolne. For the English Naute, hauing the wind of the French, sunke diuers of their shippes by tilting at them with the yron Prowes or Beakes of their Gallies; vsing also vnslaked lime in dust or powder, which they threw into the faces of their enemies, and blinded their sight: so were the hopes of Lewis for any present succours absolutely frustrated. Eustace himselfe, found after long search, and drawne out from the bottome of the Pumpe in a French shippe, at Doner had his head cut off, though * some say hee was slaine by Richard, a base-sonne of King Iohn. The newes of which successe being brought to the King, did not more reioice him, then they wounded Lewis, for the losse was not onely great in men, but in all sorts of riches and prouisions. To giue now no rest to Lewis his declining fortunes, the Earle of Pembroke with a mighty Army besieged London, and Lewis therein, aswell by Water as by Land; seeking to driue him by penurie to render the City. It came to capitulation, and in an Ilet in the Riuer of Thames, not farre from Stanes, the King, Wallo the Legate, and William Marshall the Kings Gouernour, met with Lewis & the Barons to finish the Peace: for Lewis had promised to doe as Wallo and the Earle would deuise, so that it might not tend to his dishonour or scandall: Heades or Articles of the agreement which Lewis sware vpon the Gospell to performe, were, 1. That Lewis, the Barons, and other his partakers should stand to the iudgement of the Church (whose censures they had now some yeeres contemned) and from thenceforth bee and remaine true to the same. 2. That he and his should forthwith depart the land, neuer to return again with a purpose to doe harme. 3 That he should doe his best to draw his Father to make restitution of all such things in France as belonged to the King of England, and that Lewis when himselfe was King should quietly part with them. 4. That Lewis should immediately render to King Henry all holdes and places taken in the warre. On the other part, the King, the Legate and the Earle sware; 1 That the King should restore to the Barons and others, all their rights and inheritances, with all the Liberties formerly demanded of his Father. 2. That none (of the Layty) should suffer dammage or reproch for taking part on either side. 3. That Prisoners should bee released, &c. Whereupon Lewis with his adherents was formally by Wallo absolued from the sentence of Excommunication, and so they ranne on all sides into embracements, and parted in the kisse of Peace. The * Welsh, who had held with the Barons, were left out of this Conclusion, being thereby laid open to spoile. Thus was Lewis * driuen out of England, whom the Earle of Pembroke brought to the Sea-side, and the Realme was cleared.

The perillous estate of Lewis.

(9) There are* who write how that Lewis had a great summe of money paide him for restoring the Hostages; but Mat. Paris whom * some cite to that purpose, affirms no such matter in any printed Copy. Reason surelie is vtterly against it; for when euen the life of Lewis was after a sort in King Henries hand, with what sense can it stand that the King should set all the French free without ransoms and yet himselfe pay money for the Hostages? which also were not his, but the Hostages of his enemies mies the Barons; so that, if money were due, it must haue come from them, not from the King, who both in honour and profite was rather obliged to the contrarie. Writers of that very time doe in plain words say, The Pouerty of Lewis was such, that he was compelled to borrow fiue thousand pounds of the Londoners, to set him out of England: and therfore that other seemes nothing else but a vaine gloze to salue the honour of Lewis, who was plainly driuen out of England, after so high hopes with losse, sorrow, and eternall disgrace, which the French are so sensible of, that they scarse seeme to write of the whole action, otherwise then * laying the misfortune of Lewis vpon the Barons mutability.

(10) The Realme of England purged of those forraine dregges, was not therfore presently freed from other manifold encombrances, such as after so great a tossing of all lawes and things diuine, and humane, doe ordinarily flote vp and downe, like the froth & working of a troubled Sea. For diuers men presuming vpon their former seruices to the State, or thinking the old bad world would either continue still, or soone returne, if iustice grew confident against Trespassors, or for what other corrupt motiues soeuer, did dare intollerable things. The *principall Lords of this misrule, were William Earle of Aumarl, Falcasius de Brent with his Garrison Souldiers, Robert de Veipont, with others, who hauing had the Castles and possessions of certaine Bishops and Great men, either to keepe in trust, or otherwise by iniquity of the times conuerted violentlie to their vses; did still with-hold the same, both against the minds of their lawfull owners, and the Kings expresse Prohibition. Among others, Robert de Gaugi defended the Castle of Newarke (being the Fee of the Bishoppe of Lincolne, as was also the town it self) against the Kings Armie, conducted by the * Great Marshall Earle of Pembroke, for eight dayes, and did not first yeeld the place, before (by mediation of friends) the Bishoppe paid to Gaugi one hundreth pounds. There was in that great Earle, a perpetuall care to conclude things without bloud-shedde, wherein shined his Christian piety and morall wisdome, there being no other so safe way to settle disordered humors. The greater was his losse both to the King and State by his death * soone after ensuing, whose * monument yet remaining, doth not so much eternize his memory, as that well-deserued * Epitaph, the Epitome of his noble vertues;

Sum quem Saturnum sibi sensit Hybernia, Solem
Anglia, Mercurium Normannia, Gallia Martem.

Irelands Saturn, Englands Sunne am I,
The Mars of France, and Normans Mercurie.

He left behind him fiue Sonnes, all Earles of Pembroke successiuely, and dying without issue; his fiue Daughters aduanced by great marriages, brought as great aduantage to their husbands issue, by the inheritances of their issueless brethren.

(11) The King (gouerned after Marshals death, by Peter Bishoppe of Winchester, and such * other, whom the Bishoppe had procured to ioyne in administration of publik affairs) seeming now to haue a setled and calme estate, resolues (for good hopes sake) to bee crowned againe; which was performed by Stephen Archbishoppe of Canterbury at Westminster with the attendance and confluence of all the Prelates, Peeres, and People. Vpon the * Saturday before his Coronation, the * new worke of the Abbey Church at Westminster, (Paris calles it the Chappell of our Lady,) was begunne, whereof the King himselfe in person laid the first stone, as if hee ment the world should know, his intention was to consecrate his future actions to raise the glory of God. This calme but new beginning, was almost as speedily distempered and disturbed by sodaine stormes; by reason that, while the King kept his Christmas with great royalty at Oxford, in the company of the Prelates and Peeres of England, William de Fortibus, Earle of Aumarl, incited by Falcasius de Brent, and the like riotous Gentlemen, sodainely departed frō the Court without leaue, & (whither it were vpon discontentment, because the King had against the Earles will the last yeere taken some Castles into his hands, or out of an euill ignorance how to liue in quiet) he mannes the Castle of Biham, victuals it with the Corne of the Chanons of Bridlington, spoiles the Towne of Deeping, and vnder shew of repayring to the Parliament, seiseth on the Castle of Fotheringhay, committing many other furious riots in contempt of the King, and breach of his peace; many * others in other places following his lewd example. Yet at length the Earle comming in vnder the conduct of Walter Archbishop of Yorke, was at the suite of Pandulph (who succeeded Wallo in the place of Legate) pardoned; and the like hurtfull clemency was extended toward his Complices and Retinue, whom the King (in regard belike of some former better deserts) set free without punishment or ransome. And to preuent any further disturbances of that nature, Hubert de Burgh Earle of Kent, for his rare integrity and fidelity (approued in all King Iohns troubles) was also made gouernour of the Kings Person, and Chiefe Iustitiar of England, with the generall allowance of all the States. What need the land then had of a seuere proceeding, wee may iudge by this, that Foulk de Brent held the Earledomes of Northampton, Oxford, Bedford, and Buckingham, with the Castles and Holds; Philip de Mare, the Castles of Peke and Nottingham, Nottinghamshire and Darbishire; and others detained other portions, without any other right, then that which the iniquity of the late tumults gaue.

(12) It was no small addition to the troublesomnesse of this time, that certaine * Lords of Wales, and (as * some say) Prince Lewelin himselfe, desirous to ridde their Marches of the English, rose in Armes, & laide siege to the Castle of Buelt, which inuited king Henry to draw thither with an Armie; but the worke was made easie by the voluntary departure of the Welsh; vpon the fame of the Kings approch: which appearances of some ensuing stirres, moued the king to thinke of strengthning himselfe with faithfull alliances; and not long after, Alexander King of Scots came to Yorke, (who in the yeere * before had met King Henry at the same place) and there tooke to wife the Lady Ioan King Henries sister; and Hubert de Burgh, in presence of both the Kings married the Lady * Margaret sister to Alexander; Boetius * saith, that two great Lords of England married two sisters of King Alexander at that place. About which time, * Isabel Queen Dowager of England, without the leaue of her sonne the King, or of his Councell, croft the seas, and tooke to husband the Earle of March in France. The young King supposing his estate at home now somewhat setled, and his eyes beginning to grow cleare-sighted by the benefite of experience, forgets not to looke about his affaires abroad; and first sends * Sauarie de Malleon to bee his Lieutenant in Aquitaine, where yet the English held the greater part, and dispatcheth Ambassadors to Philip King of France, for restitution according to the Articles with Lewis: whereunto answere was made that nothing ought to bee restored which by right of warre had beene atchieued; but (as it seemes) there was a Truce for * fowre yeeres agreed vpon betweene the two Monarches, concerning the County of Poictou.

(13) The State both of Church and Commonwealth in those troubled daies, seeme to haue much resemblance; euery man daring to attempt in either, what his own audaciousnes would suggest, or others conniuency permit. But Stephen Archbishop of Canterbury (who himselfe was lately the ring-leader of disorders both in State and Church) is now become very diligent in his Prouinciall Synode at Ox-

(14) In the State of the Common-wealth incredible darings (though of inferiour quality to that former) were not wanting, againſt the maieſty of the King; as appeared by Conſtantine Fitz-Arnulf, a Citizen of London: who vpon colour of a popular tumult, by him purpoſely cheriſhed, (which roſe at paſtimes of wreſtling, and like maſteries betweene the Citizens of London, and others of the Suburbes,) attempted to ſet vp a Lewis againe, and in the heat of the ſedition, he traiterouſly cried, * Mount-Ioy, Mount-Ioy, God for vs and our Lord Lewis. Though the * Lord Maior, a diſcreet man, earneſtly perſwaded dutifull behauiours, yet Conſtantine had made the people incapable of good Counſell with his ſeditious Proclamations, which hee there cauſed to bee * publiſhed. The ſecret of this conſpiracy was * reuealed by * another Citizen, and without queſtion was farther ſpred then the compaſſe of one City, euen as farre as into the hearts of all ſuch turbulent people, to whom warre was beneficiall, and Quiet banefull. The chiefe Iuſticiar hearing of theſe matters, with forces aſſembled, entred * the Tower, whither hee commaunded the principall men of the City to come, who eaſily put off the blame from themſelues vpon Fitz-Arnulf: But hee as reſolute in his anſwere, as deſperate in the ſedition, complained of himſelfe in the hearing of all, that he had done leſſe therein then hee ought; yet fifteene thouſand Markes ſterling hee offered for his life, when hee ſaw the halter about his necke, (for with his Cryer, and his Nephew the next day hee was hanged,) but no price could redeeme him out of the hand of Iuſtice. It is ſaid, that he ſo confidently anſwered, vpon truſt of the Articles and Oath between the King and Lewis, that the partakers of Lewis ſhould not be troubled; and that, vpon this occaſion, Lewis denied reſtitution of ſuch things, as the Articles did mention, pretending that Henry had herein broken firſt his faith, and thereby made the whole contract fruſtrate. * Pol. Virg. lib. 16. Fabian.

(15) This dangerous beginning might haue had farre worſe proceedings, if the King, though in yeeres tender, yet had not beene ſo prouident, as to haue foreſeen it, and ſo, with patient conniuence at ſome particular indignities, preuented a publike diſquiet. For the Barons, ſtill minding their long deſired Liberties, and requiring a confirmation of them by the King, who, at the concluded peace with Lewis had ſworne thereto; William Briwere, one of the Kings Councell anſwered; that the liberties which they demaund ought not to bee obſerued, becauſe they were violently extorted. But wordes growing hereupon, and Archbiſhoppe Stephen (the Barons ancient abettour) kindling thereat, the yong King prudently ſhut vp the whole ſtrife with this ſpeech; All of vs haue ſworne to thoſe Liberties, and that which wee haue ſworne, all of vs are bound to obſerue. His Deed immediately ſealed his Word, (for hee ſaw hee durſt doe no other,) and Writs were ſent foorth, to enquire vpon Oathes, what Liberties or free cuſtomes were current, in, and from the time of King Henry his Grandfather: by which act, all mens hopes were raiſed to expect the full concluſion of all thoſe grieuous contentions, which had ſo long encombred the Kingdome. The like hope was conceiued of better ſucceſſes then before, in forrain affaires, vpon newes of the death of King Philip of France, the euer-deadly (and now-dead) Enemy of Englands welfare; which moued the King to ſend the Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury, and three other Biſhops to Lewis, now crowned King of France, there to demand the Dutchie of Normandy, and ſuch other Lands on that ſide of the ſea, as before his departure out of England hee had ſworne to reſtore: but his anſwere was; 1. That hi held thoſe poſſeſſions by a iuſt title, as hee was ready to ſhew King Henry, if he would come to his Court to make his demaund; 2. that the King of England had violated his Oath, for that ſuch as were taken at Lincolne were grieuouſly fined; 3. that ſuch Liberties of England, for which the warre was firſt moued, & had beene granted at his departure, and ſince confirmed by oath, were not onely not obſerued, but the old wicked ones reduced, and generally farre worſe ordained in their place. With which ſolutions to their demand, the Ambaſſadors were faine to returne, and Henry left to come by his owne as he could.

(16) The king well perceiuing, how vnable hee ſhould be either to recouer thoſe his Tranſmarine Dominions, or almoſt to maintaine his owne royall eſtate at home, if ſuch, as by the vnrulynes of former times hauing gotten poſſeſſion of Crowne-lands might ſtill with-hold them, reſolued to reſume them; by aduiſe principally of Stephen Archbiſhop of Canterburie and Hubert de Burgh Earle of Kent, who thereby drew vpon themſelues no ſmall loads of enuie. Which recouery of ſuch parcells of the royall Patrimony, though it were no leſſe needfull then lawfull; yet by reaſon the intereſſed were ſo many (and ſuch as wanted no will to toſſe the whole Kingdom, rather then forgoe their holdings,) they wiſely vſed all the ſtrengthes which Religion or humane policy could giue. Firſt therefore * there was procured a Briefe from the Pope, by which both the King was declared to bee at libertie to chooſe his owne Councell, and gouerne by himſelfe, (which, who doubteth but hee might haue done without the Popes Bull?) and all men commanded vnder pain of Cenſures to reſtore ſuch things as againſt law and the Kings will, they detained from him. This put the intereſſed into a will to raiſe Armes; meeting for that purpoſe at Leiceſter, where the Ceſtrian Earle and his * Confederates conſult, how they (vnder der the ſpecious pretext of remouing the Earle of Kent, as one whoſe predominating greatnes, and euill offices againſt them, were not to be by them endured) might deteine the Caſtle and other poſſeſsions demanded. But vpon notice, that (if forthwith they did not render backe what they vniuſtly held) they ſhould by name bee preſently excommunicated; and that the King (now at Northampton) had with him not onely an honeſter cauſe, * but a greater number of Souldiers (which they much more feared then all their flaſhes of Excommunication) they following a* wiſer courſe, repaired forthwith to the King, rendring vppe into his handes all that belonged to the Crowne; but did not lay downe their diſpleaſure, for that, on their petition, the King would not put from him his chiefe Iuſtitiar, the obiect of their Enuie.

(17) Meane while Lewis King of France not contented to deny the demaunded reſtitution vpon his alleaged pretexts, inuades ſuch other parts as * King Henry peaceably held in Poictou and Xainctoing; the beſt colour and reaſon giuen for it, * is, That whereas Aquitain (whereof Xainctoing and Poictou were part) was holden of the Crown of France by homage, the King of England, being not hindred by ſickneſſe nor other neceſſity was not preſent at the Coronation of Lewis, nor excuſed his abſence by Ambaſſadors. In proſecution of which pretence hee tooke * Rochel (the principall Port of Xainctoing) with other places, and ouerthrew in a Battle, Sauarie de Malleon alſo, Lieutenant for king Henry in Aquitaine: vpon which ouerthrow the loſſe of thoſe foreſaid Townes with the whole Countrey of Poictou (as * one ſaith) enſued. Withall, the king loſt the ſeruice of the ſaid Sauarie, a valiant commaunder, who for ſome indignity offered vnto him by William Longſpe Earle of Salisbury, (* ſent ouer by King Henry, vpon ſome diſtaſte of Sauaries doings, with commiſsion to oueruiew his courſes,) ſodainely turned French, among whom hee had great credit and preferment. King Henry ill brooking ſo great a defalcation of his forraine eſtates, determined to haue recourſe to the generall aide of his people, for meanes to recouer his loſſes, but while (for that purpoſe) hee held a * Parliament, the whole aſſembly was ſodainely troubled with iuſt complaints of an vnſufferable outrage.

(18) For Henry de Braibrocke, a Iuſtice Itinerant, who with other held the Aſsiſes at Dunſtaple, was ſodainely ſurpriſed (and impriſoned vnder ſtrong Garriſon in Bedford Caſtle) by the commandement of Falcaſius, enraged, for that thirty verdicts had there paſſed againſt him, vpon trials of title for lands which hee had forceably entred. The Iudges wife with her teares ſo moued the whole Parliament to indignation and pitty, that all other buſineſſes ſet a part, the Clergy aſwell as the Laity forthwith attended the King to the ſiege. Falcaſius himſelfe flying into Wales, there to contriue a greater body of rebellion, did leaue his brother, Lieutenant in the Caſtle with a deſperate crew, hauing victuals and munition for an whole yeeres reſiſtance. Yet after two Moneths ſiege the Caſtle being taken, the Iudge was enlarged, the Lieutenant and his whole retinue hanged, the pile it ſelfe (as a denne of theeues) demoliſhed; and an example giuen what others ſhould truſt vnto, who did not in due time ſubmit themſelues to their Soueraigne. This * Falcaſius was a Norman by birth and a baſtard, who comming ouer in poore ſort vnder King Iohn, ſo behaued himſelfe in the Kings ſeruices, that in regard of his al-daring forwardneſſe, Bedford was giuen him to defend againſt the Barons; where by rapine and violence hee had drawne together the ſhew of a great fortune, beſides that which he had in marriage with Margaret de Riparijs a great inheritrix, whom King Iohn, to her no leſſe diſcontentment, then diſparagement had beſtowed vpon him. But now when this Caſtle, beyond his imagination was thus beaten to the earth, and all other his poſſeſsions ſeized by the King, he procures Alexander Biſhoppe of Conentree to ſafe conduct him to Bedford, where hee throwes himſelfe at the Kinges feet, imploring mercy for his former good ſeruices. Hee was, after pardon of life hardly gotten, ſent into perpetuall * baniſhment; at which time he with teares deſired the Earle of warren, (who had in charge to ſee him ſhipt away) That hee would commend him to the King, and let him know (a ſecret fitte for the king to take notice of) that all the troubles which hee had raiſed in the Realme, were by the onely inſtigation of the Barons. Notwithſtanding the king was ſo incenſed for the keeping this Caſtle againſt him, that hee commaunded all * Strangers to depart the Realme within a time there limited vnder great penalty.

(19) The interrupted Counſels of Parliament, and purpoſes of the King for recouerie of his Poictouine inheritances, were now againe reſumed; yet the King could not there (but vpon condition * that he ſhould graunt their Liberties, the ſtring which was euer harped on,) obtaine a fifteenth, nor the good will of the States to furniſh him in his French hoſtilities: Thus the king, * drawne with deſire of money (whereof his want was very vrgent) grants thoſe his Charters vnder his Seale, and was ſo further wrought on, that oathes were (by royall commaundement) taken, to tie all men to the obſeruation of the ſaid Graunts, according to the very letter, if that bee the meaning of * literatorium iuramentum, and not ſomthing elſe. Vpon the ſtrength of this money (whoſe dayly expenſe, like vitall nouriſhment, keepes all great actions aliue,) Richard Earle of Cornwall the Kings brother, William Longſpe Earle of Salisburie, and aboue threeſcore Knights with competent forces were ſent into Gaſcoign in the Spring; where they ſafely arriued at Burdeaux, and were honourably entertained. This timely arriuall had good effects, for it confirmed the well-diſpoſed, ſetled the irreſolute, and reduced much which had beene extorted by the French. Hugh Earle of the Marches of Poictou, comming by the French Kings direction to remoue Earle Richard and the Engliſh from the ſiege of the Riol, was with all his Forces intercepted * by an Ambuſcado, and diſcomfited with no ſmall loſſe of men, munition and carriages. All ſides were in the end * contented to pauſe without parliance, and the Engliſh held Aquitaine deſpite their force or practiſes. But William Longſpe the Kings vncle ſuruiued not long his good ſeruices in thoſe parts; who returning (vpon buſines of State) into England, ſoone ended his dayes at his Caſtle of Salisburie, with ſo great humility and pietie, that at point of death hee would not receiue the holy Euchariſt in his Bed (which deuotion is alſo reported of King Henry the eight) but vpon his bare knees on the ground, which hee moiſtned with abundance of penitent teares. Vpon which great Earle this Epitaph was made:

(21) That difficultie ſo auoided; the King was earneſtly bent to make a voyage in perſon to the aide of his brother Earle Richard, who purſued the affaires of Gaſcoigne; which though by the late Earle of Sarisburies death it receiued ſome maime; yet by the fortitude and counſell of other noble perſons, it did ſtill proſper. This intention and deſire was ſtaide by the receit of letters out of France, which declared the Earle his brothers health, and the good ſucceſſe of affaires. The King (ſome ſay) among his Counſellors of State, had one William de Perepound a great Aſtrologer, who fortold that Lewis King of France ſhould not preuaile; and this affirmation did the rather withhold him at that preſent. There is who* writes, that King Henry (vpon the Popes letters) forbare to attempt any thing in France at that time, leſt he ſhould hinder Lewis, who was then vpon an enterpriſe againſt the remaines of the Albigenſes in Languedoc, Prouince, and the parts about. Theſe men were traduced for Heretikes, and ſo condemned by the See of Rome; but what their Hereſie was, a * Fryer (who writes againſt them,) reports, ſaying, *they were of all other the moſt pernicious Sect; for antiquity, ſome holding they were from the Apoſtles time; for generality, there ſcarſe being any Nation where they are not; and laſtly, for ſhew of piety, in that they liue iuſtly before men, and beleeue all things touching God aright, & all the articles of the Creed, * only they blaſpheme and hate the Church of Rome.* No maruail if this horrible hereſie did trouble his Holineſſe; and therefore, whereas his Predeceſſor, and himſelfe had kept much adoe in Chriſtendome, to excite men to take the Signe of the Croſſe, and warre againſt the Turke, (which the Fryers did perſwade men vnto, teaching, that * whoſoeuer were polluted with any hainous offence, as Parricide, Inceſt, Sacrilege, hee was preſently acquited both from the ſinne, and the puniſhment of it, if hee thus tooke the Croſſe vpon him,) now, becauſe the Earle of Tholous, and his people entertained the foreſaid Hereſie, the Croſſe, and holie warres were by the Pope denounced againſt them. Of which Earle yet let vs heare the iudgement of another * Fryer then liuing. Thoſe (ſaith hee) who 'us tooke the warres and Croſſe againſt him, did it more for feare of the French King, and the Popes Legate, then for zeale of Iuſtice; it ſeeming to many a wrong thus to infeſt a faithfull Chriſtian man, and one who with many teares deſired the Legate to examine the faith of euerie one of his Cities, and if any one held againſt the Catholike faith, hee would puniſh him, according to the iudgement of the Church, and if any City ſhould reſiſt him, hee would enforce it to make ſatisfaction. As for himſelfe, hee offered to bee examined by the Legate touching his faith, and if hee were faulty, hee would make ſatiſfaction to God and the Church. But all theſe things the Legate ſcorned, nor could that Catholike Earle find anie fauour, vnleſſe hee would forſake his Inheritance, and abiure it both for himſelfe, and his heires for euer. Theſe were the Heretikes againſt which Lewis was now imployed by the Pope, and King Henry the while * commanded to ſurceaſe from impeaching his holy enterprize. Wherein Lewis had ſpent a moneth in the ſiege of Auinion, and endured (for all his ſacred Croſsings) maruailous loſſes, by a terrible plague deuouring his Army, by a ſtrange kind of venemous flies, diſpatching many, by a ſodaine drowning of a great part of his Armie; and laſtly, by being himſelfe * poyſoned by * one of his Earles (an vnchaſt Riuall of his Bedde) though it was giuen forth of him (as * of his late Enemy King Iohn, whom ſome thinke that Lewis his friends did make away) that hee died onely of a Flux.

(22) The newes of the French Kings death ſeconded with ſure relations of ſundry diſcontentments, and open factions vnder the young King (who was but * about twelue yeeres of age) bred an hope in King Henries mind, that now the time was come, wherein hee might recouer thoſe ancient inheritances which his Forefathers held in France: and to aduance his hopes, he had his mother Queene Iſabel (wife to the Earle of March in thoſe parts,) an earneſt ſollicitor. Peter Duke of Britaine was the principall man who tooke offence that himſelfe had not a chiefe hand in directing the young King Lewis; but his prudent mother Queene Blanch * weakned his party by drawing his brother Robert Earle of Dreux from him; and albeit the Duke had repaired the breach, by affinitie with the Earle of Champain, (one of the twelue Peeres of that Realme, to whom the Duke marrieth the Ladie Blanda his daughter and heire,) yet was the Earle driuen by a ſhort warre to continue quiet. The Duke hereupon caſtes himſelfe vpon King Henrie; Sed ſera auxilia Anglica, the Engliſh aides come ſlowlie ſaith Æmylius. Theſe and the like inducements moued the King to ſend Walter Archbiſhoppe of Yorke, with others, to the chiefe men of Normandie, Angiou and Poictou, that by large promiſes they might procure them to acknowledge Henrie for their King, or by partakings, facilitate their reduction to the Engliſh Souercigntie; who accordinglie proſecuted their emploiment.

* Paul. Æmylius.

(23) Theſe opportunities for that deſigne, moued the King to bethinke how to gather money, to furniſh ſo chargefull an enterprize; whereby while he ſought to prouide to recouer that which was loſt, he miniſtreth occaſion to hazard that which he had. The onely great man in Court now was Hubert de Burgh: For the King proteſting himſelfe of age to gouerne without a Tutor or Protector, did principally conferre with him about all his moſt weightie affaires. Hence grew more enuy againſt Hubert, and perill to the King. From * the Londoners (beſides the granted aides of a fifteenth, which all degrees were ſubiect vnto) he wrung fiue thouſand Markes, for that they had (as was alleaged) to his preiudice, giuen Lewis the like ſumme. In the Parliament at Oxford, by aduice of Hubert his Lord Chiefe Iuſtice, he reuokes the Charters of Liberties, which now for about two yeeres had been practiſed through the Realme: pretending, that at the time of their Grant the King was vnder age, and had then no liberty either of his perſon or Signature; though otherwiſe, the royall power of the Engliſh Monarchie neuer pleads pupillage or minoritie. It ſerued the turne for the time, and all men were faine to pay, what Huberts * pleaſure was to aſſeſſe, for obteining the new Seale. The fortune of ſuch Arts, whereby they were wont to fill Princes Treaſuries, was not alwaies without repentance to the Authors, and Authoriſers. The Clergie was compelled (vnder paine of Papall Cenſures) to pay the Fifteenth, not only for their temporall goods, but alſo for their Eccleſiaſticall; and yet in the end, (after ſo much toſſing of the People,) the Kings Ambaſſadors returne out of France, without hauing effected that which they went about, ſo that the whole enterprize quailed. For Queene Blanch by ſweet and prudent courſes, ſo preuailed among the factious, that there was left no place for Henrie to take ſure hold vpon. The Duke of Britain (who expected the Engliſh ſuccours not till the Spring,) was ſo neerely preſt, and almoſt oppreſt, with a winter war, that he thought himſelfe beholding to his brother ther Robert Earle of Dreux, for procuring his peace though it were with such a condition, as euer after, left vpon him, the by-name of Manclerk or Maledoctus. He* acknowledged the Dutchie of Britain to be the Fee of the Crowne of France, and that by right it ought to hold thereof; this acknowledgment, because against all apparant truth and Record, procured to him that By-name. Such conclusion at this present had King Henries French designes. Our* auncient Authors write, that this dishonourable homage was done long after, and with an halter about his necke, at such time as the King of England refused to goe in person to his succours, but offered foure Earles, and other competent Forces, which hee refused, as harbouring a reuolt in his bosome, and turned Pyrate.

* Mat. Paris

(24) The euill will which the other great Lords secretly harboured against Hubert, (whose Enuy the Kings fauour in* creating him Earle of Kent had lately encreased,) now openly discouered it selfe, vpon this occasion. Richard Earle of Cornwall, the Kings brother, (lately returned with honor out of Gascoigne,) had seized into his hands a certaine Manour, then in the tenure of one Waleran a Dutch-Gentleman, (to whom King Iohn, for his good seruices had formerly giuen it,) which hee alleaged was parcell of his Earledome of Cornwall. The King hereupon directs his letters to his brother, commanding him to come immediately, and shew a reason of his fact. He doth so, and without any pleaders helpe defended, as iust, the seisure which he had made, concluding, among other words, that hee was ready to stand to the iudgement of the Kings Court, and Peeres of the Realm. When the King, and the Chiefe Iustitiar heard him name the Peeres of the Realme, they (suspecting his bent that way) were exceedingly offended; and (said the King) eyther restore the Manour to Waleran, or thou shalt depart out of the Kingdome, neuer to returne: at which peremptory sentence, the Earle boldly (but too rashly) answered; that hee neither would giue his right to Waleran, nor without the iudgement of the Peeres depart the Realme. The *Earle in this heate returnes to his lodging; thence (vpon surmise that Hubert had perswaded the King to lay hold on him) he posts to Marlebourgh, where finding William Marshal the young Earle of Pembroke, hee enters into a fast confederacy, ratified by oath; and Ranulf Earle of Chester is easily drawn to make another. Letters thence flying about to all their friends, at Stanford there assembled vnto them, the Earles of Gloucester, of Warrenn, of Hereford, of Warwicke, Earle Ferrars, many Barons, and an huge multitude of armed men. Their strengthes being in likelyhood able to beare out their darings, they addresse a bold message to the King, by which they require him in lofty Phrase, to make preset amends to his Brother for the wrong hee had done; the fault whereof they imputed not to him, but to the chiefe Iustitiar: and that if he did not without delay restore the Charters of Liberties, which hee had cancelled at Oxford, they would driue him by dint of sword to giue them therein competent satisfaction. The King seeing it no safe time to deny their requests, appoints to meet at Northampton in August next; where the Earle of Cornwall (vpon his Associates resolute demaund of the King) had large amends of any iniury sustained, his Patrimony being augmented with large accessions. The moderation and equanimity of the King (terrified by his Fathers example) peaceably finished this contention (the matter of the Charters being for the time husht, as seemeth) which might otherwise haue cost many thousand liues, and haue hazarded the ruine both of King and kingdome.

(25) That daunger was not a little augmented by the insurrections of the Welsh. The King had giuen the Castle of Mountgomery to his most trusty Counsellor Hubert de Burgh; the Garrison of which place, issuing out, meant to stocke vp the Trees, and shrubbes, which grew neere vpon an high-way leading through a great wood of* fiue leagues long; that trauailers (ordinarily there spoiled) might passe more safely. The welsh not suffering that waste, violently assayled the Workemen, and not without slaughter on both sides, draue them into the Castle; which drew the King (who euen in litle matters vsed to make one) to come thither in person; who, with a competent strength, giues not ouer, till hee had with fire, and other force, consumed the whole Forrest. From whence hee peirceth farther into Wales, and consumes with fire a place called * Cridia; where whiles the King is building a Castle to bridle them, * Lewelin drew thither his forces, where many were slaine on both sides, and a man of speciall worth William de Braosa (or de Bruse) by the Welsh intercepted, as he went to forrage in the Country; * many great persons there in the Kings Armie being secretly confederated with Lewelin. By which trecherous practise, victualles grew so scarce, that the king was compelled to yeeld to a very dishonourable peace, the conditions whereof were: that the King should raze to the ground the new Fort now almost finished; that William de Bruce should still remaine Prisoner till the Welsh thought good; that Lewelin should giue the King toward his expenses three thousand Markes.*

(26) These home-bredde garboyles thus appeased; whereas Ambassadors had formerly repayred to the king out of Gascoigne, Poictou, and Normandie, to offer him their seruices for recouery of those his inheritances, if himself would com in person with a royall Armie, hee about Michaelmas is now ready at Portsmouth for the exploit; whither all his Nobles were come with so great a multitude, not onely out of England, but out of Ireland, Wales and Galloway, as none of his ancestors euer had. Many were the motiues which encouraged the king to this attempt, but none greater then the busie workings of Queen Dowager his mother. Lewis king of France had created his brother Alfonse Duke of Poictou, commaunding the Lords of that Country to doe their homages to him; one of these was Hugh Earle of March, now husband to Queene Isabel, who because shee had once beene the Wife of a King, and now the Mother, disdained that euen her present husband, though but an Earle, should doe homage to a Subiect, and thereby her selfe (bearing the stile of a Queene) seeme inferiour to the Lady Ioan, wife of Duke Alfonse. The Earle was hereupon drawne to a refusall of homage; and the like spirit shee had breathed into the hearts of the princely family of Lusinian, whose Ancestors had been Kings of Ierusalem and Cyprus. Nor thus contented to haue plotted a party, for her Sonne among the French, she is charged to haue sought by poyson to make riddance of Lewis himselfe, and that her Agents for that purpose were discouered, and executed. But Æmylius shall pardon vs, if we herein credit not his iudgement, as also in thinking her the Author of suborning Assasines to murther the King; for that wee find him singular therein, the * receiued opinion being, that they were sent vnder-hand by the Sarazens out of Asia, to take away the daunger which they foresaw was comming, in regard King Lewis was so deuoutly addicted to Christian piety, and the hatred of Mahomets Infidelity. There were also at the same time great Diuisions among the French Nobility; but the English (saith Æmylius himselfe) wrought not by treachery, but after the manner of faire warre, which they first by defiance denounced, and then did openly prosecute with sword in hand.

(27) The King of England being thus prouided of men, munition, and other necessaries fit for the field, and now ready to embarke; there was not shipping sufficient to transport halfe the Company. Which enraged the King so farre, that turning himselfe to Earle Hubert, (vpon whom hee charged the blame,) he called him ranke old Traitor, affirming, that that hee had of purpose beene slacke herein, as in other things, in regard of fiue thousand Marks, with which the Queene Dowager of France had (as he said) embribed him, and withall ranne at him in great fury with his drawne sword, but Ranulph Earle of Chester and others stept betweene, and saued the King from so foule a blemish, who soone after receiued him into grace againe. But that assembly was dispersed by the arriuall of a * great man out of Britaine, a principal confederate with the English against Lewis, who shewed the vnseasonable time of the yeare, and other reasons; and the enterprize thereupon adiourned to the Spring. So after Easter hee transports from Portsmouth with a full Armie into Britaine. The * same day in which hee set saile from England, himselfe did in person, visite the poore and feeble, and dealt large Almes, not refusing to kisse the sicke and leprous. The successe of this voyage is so diuersly reported, that without preiudice to an obseruant Reader, it might be all left out. Much certainely was not done. The King of Englands purpose* was to haue marched through Britaine (where many receiued him) into Poicton; and as * some write hee did so, and tooke homagein Gascoigne. To empeach this passage, the King of France lay with a great Armie at Angiers, and the King of England at Nants in Britaine, expecting the repaire of more force. Fulk Paganel a noble Norman, with about * sixty valiant Knights perswaded the King of England, it was easie for him to reduce Normandie to his obedience; but Hubert de Burgh diuerted the King from acceptance of that enterprize. The Normans therefore made an ill iourney and an vnlucky, for * they preuailed not with King Henry, and for their conspiracy were dispeiséd at home by King Lewis. But whether it were by losse in battle (wherin, if any battle were at all, some say the * French had the better, taking about foure thousand of the English,) or otherwise, this is agreede on, that after the wast of infinite Treasures, and the great diminution of his numbers, the King of England returned * without accomplishment of his purpose; leauing for the defence of Britaine, the three great Earles of Chester, Pembroke and Aumarl, with forces answerable.

The noble form of warre among the old English praysed by strangers.

Earle Hubert in the Kings displeasure.

(28) It is not vnlikely that the dangerous rebellion of the Irish, hastned his returne; for the King of Connaught and his Irish, seeing the King and the Earle of Pembroke (who as Heire to the great Strangbaw had goodly possessions in those parts) wholie embusied in the enterprise of Britaine, had inuaded the Kings people, with a purpose and hope, vtterlie to expell and amoue our Nation from among them: but their deuises proued mischieuous to themselues, that rebellious King himselfe being taken Prisoner, not without the losse of many thousands of the Irish. The Welsh also soone after brake out againe, whose Prince Lewelin, (in reuenge of those Welshmens heads, which Hubert de Burgh had cruelly caused to bee strucken off in cold bloud, and presented to the King,) had burnt certaine Churches and Gentlewomen in them; for which, at * Oxford in the presence of the King, all the Nobility, and Clergy, hee was solemnly excommunicated; and the King there gathering a great Army, in person went to represse the Welsh, though not without losse.

(29) Another Garboyle thereafter no lesse disturbed the whole land, the * Insolency of the Romans (who were charged to haue wrought innumerable confusions and infinite grieuances to the King, his Kingdome, Peeres and People) stirring vp multitudes through the Land, by a common consent, to seeke by force to shake off the importable yoke of their oppressions. It was alleadged by these reformers, *that they had vnder hand the Kings Letters Patents, the Lord Chiefe Iustices assent, the Bishop of Londons countenance, and the Shiriffes aide in sundry Shires, wherby the armed troupes took heart euery where, violently to seize on the Romanes Corne, and their other wealth; which booties they imployed to * good purposes, and for reliefe of the poore, the Romans the while hiding their heades, for feare of loosing them. And though the King, on the Popes complaint thereof, seemed to mislike the outrage, yet had the King himselfe no lesse cause to bee moued with the insolency of the Pope, then were his subiects of those Popelings. For that very time the See of Canterbury being void, Ralph Newill Bishop of Norwich was elected by the Monkes, and gladly approued by the King, whose * most faithfull Chancelour hee was, an vnshaken pillar of truth, doing right to all without delayes, especially to the poore, without declining to the right hand or the left. But the Pope being told he was a Royalist, and one that would ioine with the King and whole Kingdome (who now all strugled to shake off the Popes seruitude,) and would to the death sticke to that law, and those Appeales, which Stephen Langton solemnly before the Altar in Saint Paules Church vrged against King Iohns submission to the See of Rome; his Election (as being a person very dangerous) was presently pronounced void. Whereupon the Monkes choose a second, and him the Pope misliked, for beeing too old, and soft spirited, then a third was elected, a man of eminent learning, a Student in the Vniuersity of Oxford, and him also the Pope reiected; neuer resting till they had chosen Edmund of Abington, a man more pleasing to the Romane palate. But the King seeing the Great Emperour Fredericke, euen this very time whiles hee was winning the Kingdom of Ierusalem from Infidels, so Turkishly in his absence deposed from his owne Empire by the Pope, vpon a priuate spleene; no maruaile, if in this his vnripe age, and distracted gouernment, hee feared to draw on himselfe by any opposition, so mercilesse an enemy. So that for the time these indignities were winked at in these parts: in France also by the wisedome of * Queen Blanch, and mediation of the Archbishoppe of Reims, and Philip Earle of Bollein of one part, and the Earles of Britaine and Chester on the other, a three yeeres cessation from mutuall hostilities was ratified by oath, betweene the French and English.

(30) Hubert de Burgh Earle of Kent, Chiefe Iusticiar of England, hauing with few rubbes hitherto, enioyed the most inward loue and fauour aswell of this King, as of King Iohn, seemes now to haue run the Stage of his best fortunes. For the King (vpon occasion of such inrodes and spoiles, as the Prince Lewelin continually made in the Marches of Wales) being aduertised by Peter Bishoppe of Winchester, and certaine other of the Councell, once for all to giue an end to those braues and insolencies of the Welsh, complained; that hee was not able, in regard of his wants; saying, that his Treasurers told him, all the rents of his Exchequor would doe no more then scarce maintaine apparrell, houshold and ordinary Almes-deedes. This was not vnknowne to the Bishop, and the rest of that faction, who watched this opportunity of purpose to lift the Earle of Kent out of fauour: wherefore they boldly answered the King: that if he were poore hee might thanke himselfe, who gaue away to others such Honours, Custodies, and Dignities, as were vacant, alienating them from his estate; that hee was onely to be called a King in name, rather then for any riches which he had; that his Ancestors, magnificent Princes, abounding in all sorts of worldly glorie, and wealth, heaped to themselues inestimable treasures, out of no other meanes, but the Rents and Profites of the Kingdom.

(31) The King stung with this iust reprehension, beganne (by their instructions) to call the Sheriffes of Shires, Baylifes, and other his Officers to a strait account, for all such receites, as appertained to the Exchequor, thrusting some out of their places, and wringing out of all their full * spunges, store of coine, till hee satisfied himselfe both for the arrerages and interest. Out of Ralph Britton * Treasurer of his Chamber hee screwzed a thousand pounds, and and also put him from his place, into which (by the Bishoppe of Winchesters suggestion, who now predominated in Court) hee substituted Peter de Orinail a * Poictouine, the Bishoppes * Nephew or Sonne, if Paris say true; and so, saith hee, the Kings coffers otherwise empty and leane, were by these meanes stuffed againe, though not to their full surfet. For these were but preparatiues to a farther scrutinie and ransacke, intended against the Earle of Kent, whom (vpon the * Bishoppes suggestion) the King remoued from the * Proto-Iustitiarishippe (or high office of his Chiefe Iustice) and put in his place Sir Stephen Segraue a Knight onely in name. Then is a strict and captious account demaunded of the Earle of Kent, for all such things as he was in any sort chargeable with; as, 1. For such receipts or debts, as were due to King Iohn, or to this King Henry himselfe; 2. For the meane profites of such lands, as the King was seised of, from the day of the death of the first great William, Earle of Pembroke, his Iustitiar and Marshall, whither those lands were in England, Wales, Ireland, or Poictou: 3. For such Liberties or free Customes which the King had in Forrests, Warrens, Counties and else where, and how they were kept or alienated. 4. For such things as the King lost by Huberts negligence: 5. For the wronges and dammages offered to the Romane, and Italian Clerks, and to the Popes Nuncios against the Kings will by authority of Hubert, who would take no order to correct the misdoers, as by vertue and nature of his place hee was obliged: 6. For the many escuages comming by Carrucages, gifts and presents, or for the rents of Custodies belonging to the Crowne.

(32) To all which heades, the Earle answered, that hee had the Charter of the Kings Father, by which hee was freed from giuing any account eyther for things passed, or to come, and that hee had giuen such proofe of his fidelity vnto King Iohn, as he would not endure to heare him make an account. Peter Bishoppe of Winchester replyed hereunto, that such a Charter after the death of King Iohn had no force, and therefore the Fathers Charter, and graunt of Priuilege, was no reason why he should not stand accountant to the Sonne. This defence for money dangers in this sort trauersed or auoyded, they labored to draw him in for his head, by charging him with sundry Articles sounding treasonable; as, 1. That Hubert had disswaded the Duke of Austria from matching his Daughter with the King who sought it; 2. that he had hindred the King from entring vpon forrain lands to him belonging, whereby the King, Peeres, and People consumed their Treasures vainely: 3. that hee had enticed the Daughter of the King of Scots (whom King Iohn had entrusted to his custody, meaning himselfe to marry her) & traiterously defiled the noble yong Lady, whom he married in hope to bee King of Scotland in her right, if shee suruiued her Brother: 4. that hee had stolne out of his Iewel-house a precious stone of wonderfull value, whose vertue was to make him who had it, inuincible in Battle, & that he gaue that stone to Lewelin prince of Wales, the Kings enemie: 5. that he by his letters had caused Lewelin to hang William de Breuse.

(33) The Earle much perplexed with these accusations (whither true or false) could hardly obtaine a short respite to make his answere: Thus; that Hubert (say * the Monkes) who for loue of the King, and defence of the Kingdome, had prouoked the hatred of all the great Lords, now being forsaken of the King, is left sole and solitarie, without friends or comfort. Onely Luke Archbishoppe of Dublin, neuer forsooke him, but with prayers and teares besought the King on his behalfe, but could not bee heard against so great opposites, on so great pretenses. When the cry was thus vp, and that the world saw it was no superficiall displeasure, into which the Earle was faln with the mutable King, there rise forth many accusations (sauouring of much malignity) round about, vpon hope to oppresse & bury Hubert vnder them for euer; as, 1 that he had poisoned the two noble Earles of Salisbury and Pembroke; 2. that hee had also procured Falcasius de Brent, and Richard Archbishop of Canterbury to be made away; 3. that by Sorceries and Enchantments, hee had diuerse the King to fauour him aboue all other; 4. that in the victory gotten against the French by Sea, hee forceably tooke many Prisoners from the Kings Sailers, and made his benefite of their ransoms, contrary to right, and that hee had spoiled and disinherited many; 5. that hee had without triall vniustly put to death Constantine, for which excesse the Citizens of London required iustice against the said Hubert. The King hereupon makes Proclamation through the City, that all such as could charge Hubert with any wrong; should repaire to Court, and there receiue immediate redresse. This strange course of proceeding did so appale and terrifie the Earle, that hee forthwith fled to the Priorie Church of Merton in Surrey, where among the Chanons, hee sheltered his head for a time.

(34) The King with his Prelates and Peeres meeting at Lambeth, at the * day appointed for Huberts answere, hee (being made to beleeue that the King would put him to a most foule death) durst not appeare, or peepe forth of his sacred refuge. The Londoners were assembled in Armes (by the Kinges commaund) to the number of about twenty thousand vnder banners displayed to dragge the Earle out of Sanctuary: but vpon the Earle of Chesters wiser Counsell, the prey was taken out of the hands of a bloudy multitude (who mortally hated him for Constantines death) and they returned againe to their City. The Archbishoppe of Dublin still performing the office of a true friend, ouerslips not this occasion, and by his importunity obtayned day for Hubert, till about Twelfe-tide then next ensuing, and the King for his assurance, during the Interim, giues him letters Patents. Hubert thinking himselfe secure for the present, is now vpon his way toward his wife at the Abbey of Saint Edmund in Suffolke, but his enemies so preuailed by their suggestions, that Sir Godfrey de Crancumb Knight, with three hundred armed men, was sent to apprehend the Earle in Essex. Hee hauing intelligence of their approach, fledde into a Chappell at * Brentwood, which adioyned to his lodging; from whence those rough Souldiers haled him (hee holding in one *hand a Crucifix, and in the other the Sacrament) and sent for a Smith to make for him shackels of yron. But when the Smith vnderstood, that it was for Hubert de Burgh Earle of Kent, he refused, vttering such words (if Mathew Paris doe not Poetize) as did well shew that honourable thoughts are sometimes found in the hearts of men, whose fortunes are farre from honour; for hauing first drawne a deepe sigh, hee said; * Doe with mee what yee please, and God haue mercy on my soule; but as sure as the Lord liues, I will neuer make yron shackles for him, but will rather die the worst death that is. For is not this that most loyall and couragious Hubert, who so often hath preserued England from being destroyed by strangers, & restored England to England? He who faithfully and constantly serued his Soueraigne Lord King Iohn in Gascoigne, Normandy, and else where, that he was compelled to eate the flesh of horses, whose high courage euen Enemies admired? he, that so long defended Douer Castle, the Key of England, against all the exquisite slegat of the French, and by vanquishing them at Sea, brought safety to the Kingdome? what need I rehearse his excellent doings at Lincolne and Bedford? Let God be iudge between him and you, for vsing him so vniustly and inhumanely, repaying good with euill, nay, requiting his most excellent deserts with the worst recompence that can be. But Sir Godfrey, and his blacke band regarded not such speeches, but otherwise binding the Earle hard, they set him on horseback, and so conuayed him to the Tower of London.

The Earle restored to the Sanctuary from whence hee was taken.

(35) This breach of Sanctuary being made knowne to Roger Bishoppe of London(whose Diocesse it was) he confidently tels the King, that if the Earle were not restored to the Chappell, hee would excommunicate all the Authors of that outrage. The Earle is accordingly restored: but the Sheriffes of Essex and Hertford, at the Kings commandement, with the powers of their counties besiege the Chappell so long, that at last (they hauing cast a Trench about it that none might goe in or out) the Earle was compelled to come forth and render himselfe, bearing all things with an equall mind, as one that had a cleare conscience before God, which hee professed to haue. While the Chappell was thus beset round, the Kings indignation was so violent, that hee forbad all men once to make mention of Hubert in his hearing. No maruaile then if it bee said, that the Princes indignation is death. The Archbishoppe of Dublin neuertheless was not deiected, but with praiers and teares besought the King, who remained as yet inexorable, Huberts enemies possessing his soule and senses. Hubert therefore is againe imprisoned in the Tower. There was no sacrifice as it seemes could appease the Kings ire, but that of the Earles Hoord of gold, and other riches, which the Knights Templars had in their custodie vpon trust, & without Huberts consent refused to deliuer. Hubert therefore willingly yeelds; which when the Depositaries did giue vp, the value seemed incredible. This hoording perhaps was Huberts crime, whereof being thus purged, he had hope to recouer out of these deadly pangs and conuulsions of fortune, and himselfe to bee made capable of curing. Well, the king obtains this precious booty, but his enemies would haue his bloud also; saying, sith hee was conuicted of theft and fraud, it was meet he should die a most shamefull death. It seemes, they thought, that the verie finding of so much treasure was a conuiction of fraud in the getting, and that the King must bee interpreted to haue lost, whatsoeuer the Earle had gained. But the displeasure of the King was mollified with this golden balme, for hee answered them thus; Hubert from his childhood hath (as I haue heard) faithfully enough serued my vncle King Richard, and my Father King Iohn, and if he haue done ill towards me, hee shall neuer therefore die an euill death. For I had rather be reputed a foolish or a negligent King, then a cruell Tyrant, or a bloudy man toward him, who hath long serued mee and mine ancestors; nor will I weigh more his euill deedes, which are not as yet manifest, nor proued true, then all his good deeds, which are plainelie knowne to the Realme, and to vs all. Hereupon Hubert had all such lands granted vnto him, as eyther King Iohn had giuen, or himselfe had purchased. There vndertooke for him to the King(as sureties) the Earles of Cornwall, and Warrenn, Marshal & Ferrars, and himselfe was committed to the Castle of Deuises*, there to abide in free Prison, vnder the Custody of foure Knights, belonging each of them to one of these foure Earles. This Court-storme thus in part ouerblowne, let vs take our standings, to view what other weather followed, and what countenance of things in this Kingdome did next present it selfe to the world.

(36) The King being naturally, as it seemes, addicted to repose himselfe vpon some one mans counsell, was now wholy swayde by Peter de Rupibus Bishoppe of Winchester, who had therefore wrought the Earle out of grace, that hee might soly raigne, and predominate in the gentle King. Which the better to effect, the Bishoppe procures him to displace the * English Officers, and in their roomes to surrogate Poictouines and Britons; who comming ouer to the number of about two thousand, he stuffes his Castles with them; and(in briefe) did as it were wholy entrust himselfe, his treasures, strengthes, and the Realme to them. So that * Iudgements were committed to the vniust, Lawes to the Out-lawes, Peace to Wranglers, and Iustice to wrong-doers. Such as would haue praied redresse for these abuses, were interrupted, and put off by the Bishoppe of Winchester. Among them who were remoued from their places in Court, was one Sir William de Redune a Knight, and Deputy Marshall to Richard Earle of Pembroke. This was to the Earle very displeasant, which ioyned with a consideration of the publike cause and danger, he associates vnto him certaine of the great Lords (as was the fashion of those Lording times, vpon euery discontent,) and in the Company of them aduanceth confidently to the King, whom in the hearing of many hee reproueth; for that he had, through sinister aduise, called in the Poictouins, to the oppression of the Realme, of his naturall subiects, of their Lawes and Liberties: humblie therefore hee beseecheth him that hee would spedily reforme such abuses, which threatned the imminent subuersion both of the Crowne and Kingdome: which if hee did not, himselfe and other Lordes, would so long withdraw their attendance, as he entertained Strangers. The Bishoppe hereunto makes answere; That the King might well and lawfully call in what Strangers himselfe thought good, for the defence of the Crowne and Realme, and such, and so many of them, as might be able to compell his proud and rebellious people to due obedience. When the Oracle would speake no otherwise, they departed from Court greatly discontented; firmely promising one to the other, that in such a cause which did so touch them all, they would like men stand together while anie breath was in their bodies.

The King relenteth towards the Earle, and will not take his life.

(37) Those who were now most potent about the King, nothing sorry for the discontentment of so great a Peere as the Earle Marshall, but counting it a part of their strengthes, to vse the regall power toward the weakning of the English, nourish in the King his auersion. The minds of men sufficientlie inclining of themselues, to doubt the worst vpon such diuisions, had their feare increased by sundrie prodigies of strange thunders and raines, but especially of foure redde Parhelions (or resemblances of the Sunne) besides the Sunne it selfe, (appearing about the parts of Hereford and Worcester) from morning till night in the Skies: and indeed much trouble immediatly ensued aswell in England as Wales, & Ireland. The Poictouins, and other Strangers thus bearing the sway, so as the Kings person went guarded with troupes of such, the Earles and Barons being by the Kings commaund summoned to another Parliament at Oxford, refused to come. While the King was there, one * Robert Bacon, who vsed there to preach before the King and Prelates, freelie told him, that if hee did not remoue from him Peter Bishop of Winchester, and Peter de Riuallis, he could neuer be in quiet. The King did hereupon a little come to himself, & Roger Bacon a Clergy-man also of a pleasant wit, did second Roberts aduise, telling the King that * Petra and Rupes were most daungerous things at sea, alluding to the Bishoppes name, Petrus de Rupibus. The King therefore(as he had the happines in his mutability, to change for his more security) taking that good aduise of Schollers, which he would not of his Peeres, summons a Parliament to be holden at * Westminster, giuing the world to know withall, that his purpose was to amend by their aduise, whatsoeuer ought to be amended.

(38) But the Barons, considering that still there arriued sundry strangers, men of warre with Horse and Armour, and not trusting the Poictouine faith, came not, but presumed to send this traiterous message to the king, that if out of hand hee remoued not Peter Bishop of Winchester, and the Poictouines out of his Court, they all of them, by the common assent of the kingdom, would driue him, & his wicked Counsellors together out of it, and consult about creating a new Soueraigne. The king (whom his fathers example made more timerous,) could easily haue beene drawne, to haue redeemed the loue of his naturall Liegemen, with the disgrace of a few strangers; but the Bishoppe of Winchester and his friends infused more more spirite into him. Whereon, to all those whom hee suspected, the King sets downe a * day, within which they should deliuer sufficient pledges to secure him of their loialty. Against that day the Lords in great numbers make repaire to London, but the Earle Marshall (admonished of danger, by his sister the Countesse of Cornwall) flies backe to Wales, and chiefly for want of his * presence nothing was concluded. The King not long after is at Gloster with an Armie, whither the Earle and his adherents required to come, refused, the King therefore burns their Mannors, and giues away their inheritances to the Poictouines.

(39) This Rebellion had not many great names in it, but tooke strength rather by weight then number: the known Actors were the Earle Marshal, the Lord Gilbert Basset, and many other of the inferiour Nobles. The Bishoppes Arts had pluckt from him, the Kings Brother, and the two Earles of Chester and Lincolne, (who dishonourably sold their loue * for a thousand Markes,) and otherwise, as it seemed, secured the rest: neuertheless, these may well bee thought, not to haue borne any euill will to their now forsaken confederate, the Earle Marshall, who tooke himselfe to handle the common cause; certainely hee handled his owne safety but ill, as the euent shall demonstrate. The Earle hearing these things, contracts strict amity with Lewelin Prince of Wales; whose powers thus knit together, by aduantages of the Mountaines, were able to counterpeize any ordinary inuasion. To the Kings aide, Baldwin de Gisnes with many Souldiers came out of Flanders. The King now at Hereford in the midst of his Forces, sends from thence (by winchesters counsell) the Bishoppe of Saint Davids, to defie the Earle Marshall; how farre soeuer this word defie extends it selfe, sure it seems that the Earle hereupon vnderstoode himselfe discharged of that obligation, by which hee was tied vnto the King, and freed to make his defence. The King notwithstanding after some small attempts, and better considerations, did promise and assume, that by aduise of his Councell *all that was amisse should (at a * day appointed) bee rectified and amended*. About which time, Hubert de Burgo, hauing intelligence that the Bishoppe of Winchester (who was a Poictouine) * plotted his death, escaped out of the Castle of Deuises (where he was prisoner) to a neighbour Church, but was haled from thence by the Castle-Keepers. The Bishop of Sarisbury (in whose Dioceese it happened) caused him to bee safe-restored to the same place, from whence by the Earle Marshall, and a * troupe of armed men his friends, hee was rescued and carried into Wales.

(40) The King, at the day and place appointed, holds his great Councell or conference with the Lords; but nothing followed for the peace of the Realme; it was not an ordinary passage of speech, which hapned there betweene the Lords, and the Bishoppe of Winchester. For, when the English Bishops and Barons humbly besought the King, for the honour of Almighty God to take into grace his naturall Subiects, whom (without any triall by their Peeres) hee called Traitors: the Bishoppe (offended it seems, at Peeres) takes the words out of the Kings mouth, and answeres; That there are not Peeres in England, as in the Realme of France, and that therefore the King of England, by such Iusticiars as himselfe pleaseth to ordaine, may banish offenders out of the Realme, and by iudiciall processe condemne them. The English Bishops relished his speech so harshly, that with one voice they threatned to excommunicate and accurse by name the Kings principall wicked Counsellors; but Winchester appealed; then they accursed all such as alienated the heart of the king from his naturall subiects, and all others that perturbed the peace of the Realme.

(41) The Earle Marshall, this while had by force resumed a Castle, which he had a little before surrendred to the King, which stirred the King to gather his forces at Glocester, and thence to aduance towards Wales. But the Earle had politickly barred the Country of all Prouisions, for man and beast, that the King was faine to strike aside to Grosmont Castle; where the Earle, with his Confederats and the * power of Wales, so awaited their time, that assailing the Kings Campe vnawares, there were taken about fiue hundreth horse, with the Sumpters, riches, and carriages of the Armie; vpon which losse (his men also greatly scattered) the King leauing * two noble Gentlemen with the Poictouins, to make good the Marches against the Welsh, returned more empty and inglorious then before. The Earle found them worke, whom the King had left behind; and (as hee was a man of no lesse courage then deepe witte,) whereas Baldwin de Gisnes (the valiant Flemish knight) with a thousand Horsemen, thought to haue surprized him, who hauing but a tenth part of that number, came to view the Castle of Monmouth; the Earle alone defended himselfe against twelue of his enemies; and when his horse was cowardly slaine by them, he pitcht one of them by the legge out of the Saddle, and leapt into it himselfe, neuer giuing ground till his Armie came to the rescue, and obtained a faire victorie, with the slaughter and captiuation of many Poictouines and others. His other exploits in and about wales, were not few nor vnfortunate; if it were not onely in this, (as what indeed could be more grieuous or vnglorious to a noble mind?) for that his Soueraigne was vpon the contrary side.

(42) The King about this time, to strengthen his life and State, with the prayers of Beneficiaries, and other deuoted affections, founded the * house of Converts, where such as forsooke the Iudaicall Superstitions, had prouisions for maintenance vnder a sober rule and ruler; he also erected and endowed a * famous Hospitall at Oxford, both for the entertainement of Forrainers and Pilgrimes, (who thither much frequented,) and for reliefe also of such as were diseased: So that Leoline Prince of Wales, (the Earles chiefe Confederate) when hee was threatned sore, if hee would not liue in quiet, did not speake more magnificently of charity, then honourably of the King; I more feare (quoth hee) the Almesdeedes which the King dooth, then all the men of warre which hee hath, and the whole Clergy, put together.

(43) The Earle Marshall encreasing in strength and hatred against such as were the Kings reputed Seducers, makes spoile and booty on their possessions, and ioyning with the power of Leoline, puts all to fire and sword, as farre as Shrewsburie, part whereof they burnt to Ashes, and sackt the residue. The * King then at Gloster for want of sufficient Forces, departed thence (greatly grieued) to Winchester, abandoning those other parts as it were to wast and ruine. It therefore seemes, that he was not growne stronger or richer, by the displacing of Hubert Earle of Kent, and the rest, and by taking new into their roomes, who commonly bite and sucke hard till they haue glutted themselues, (if at leastwise there be any satietie in auarice) whereas the old officers, hauing prouided in a sort for the maine chance, haue the lesse reason to be grieuous.

(44) Therefore the Lions skin not being large enough for the Bishoppe of Winchester, and his factious purposes, they piece them out with the Foxes case; an inequitable stratageme is deuised. The Earle Marshall had in Ireland all the ample Patrimonies of his Grandfather, the famous Strangbow. To make that member of his strengthes improfitable, if not also pernicious, they deuise certain letters directed to Maurice Fitz-Gerald (Deputie Iustice of Ireland) and other principall men, who held of the Earle. In them they signifie, that Richard, once Marshall to the King of England, was for manifest treason by the iudgement of the Kings Court, banished the Realme, his Lands, townes and Tenements conſumed with fire; other his Hereditaments deſtroyed, and himſelfe for euer diſinherited; that if vpon his comming thither, they did take him either aliue or dead, the King did giue them all the Earles lands there, which now were forfeited by vertue of his Attainture; and for aſſurance that the ſaid gift ſhould continue firme and good, they, by whoſe aduiſe the King and Kingdome were gouerned, faithfully vndertooke. To theſe letters (which the Monkes call bloudy) they cauſed the King to ſet his Seale, as they themſelues alſo (being eleuen) did theirs; vpon receite of which lines, the parties ſignifie backe vnder the ſeale of ſecreſie, that if the Contents of thoſe letters were confirmed by the Kings Letters Patents, they would performe that which was deſired. The Letters patents bee made accordingly, and *hauing fraudulently gotten the Great Seale from Hugh Biſhoppe of Chicheſter, Lord Chancellour, who knew not thereof, they make them authentike with the impreſſion.

* Rs Wend. MS. Mat. Paris.

Alexander Biſhop of Chicheſter cleareth himſelf from diſloyaltie.

(45) The Kings mind therefore being ſtill exulcerated towards the Earle Marſhall, hee grieuouſly charged Alexander Biſhoppe of Cheſter, that he had too much familiarity with the Earle, affirming that they ſought to thruſt him from his throne; the Biſhop to cleare himſelfe from ſo hainous a ſcandall, puts on his Epiſcopall habite, and ſolemnly pronounceth all thoſe accurſt, who did but imagine a wickednes of ſo foule a nature, againſt the Maieſty or perſon of the King: and thereupon by the interceſsion of other Prelates, hee was receiued into grace. The King was then at Weſtminſter; where Edmund the Archbiſhop of Canterbury elect, with other his Suffragan Biſhops, bewailing the eſtate of the kingdome, preſent themſelues before him, telling him, as his loyal Liegemen, "that the Counſell of Peter Biſhop of winchester, and his "Complices, which now he had, and vſed, was not ſound "nor ſafe, but cruell and perillous to himſelfe and "*his Realme. Meanwhile the behauiours of the Marſhalline faction (hauing this backing at Court) grew more and more intolerable: for while the King was at Huntingdon, the Lord Gilbert Baſſet and others, ſet fire vpon Aleckmundbury, a Towne belonging to Stephen de Segraue, the flames whereof were ſeene of the owner, being then with the King at Huntingdon. They alſo tooke priſoners vpon the Welſh Marches, and according to the Law of VVarre (which, ſaith one, is lawleſſe) did put them to their ranſomes.

* Qua exlex eſt. Matth. Paris.

(46) Nothing had hitherto preſerued the King more, then that hee could, without great griefe forgoe any fauourites, if hee were neerely preſſed; the contrary quality whereof hath beene the cauſe of finall deſolation to ſo many Princes. For albeit the choice of Counſellors ought to bee free, yet by common intendment, they ſhould bee good; or howſoeuer they are, or are not, it is madneſſe to hazard a Crowne, or leeſe the loue of an whole Nation, rather then to relinquiſh or diminiſh a particular dependant. The rights of amity ought neuertheleſſe to remaine inuiolable, but in ſuch diſtance, that the publike be not peruerted, nor interuerted for a priuate. The King therefore, in this point not vnfortunate, commaunded Biſhop Peter to betake himſelfe to his reſidence at VVinton, without once medling in affaires of State; but againſt Peter Riuallis his Treaſurer, hee was ſo vehement, that he ſware, hee would plucke out his eyes, were it not for reuerence of holy Orders; commaunding alſo their Poictouines to depart the Realme, neuer to ſee his face more.

(47) Then are the Archbiſhop of Canterbury with the Biſhops of Cheſter and Rocheſter ſent into Wales to pacifie things there. But the inuincible Earle Marſhall had now croſt the Seas into Ireland, to take reuenge for the ſpoiles and diſſeiſures, which his hired enemies had made in his lands there; by whoſe plots, according to that ſecret agreement, hee was finally taken, and died of a wound giuen him in the backe, as hee with admirable manhood defended himſelfe. His Body was buried in Kilkennie, (which pleaſantly-ſituated Towne our Soueraigne, King Iames erected into a City,) where himſelfe in his life had appointed, in the Oratorie of the Minorites: in which Town, as yet ſome ſmall tokens of this great name are remaining; for in the Eaſt window of the Abbey-Church of S. Iohn Baptiſt, and in the Abbey of S. Dominicke, the ancient Armories of Marſhal, Lord of Kilkenny*, are yet extant. The Patrimony of this Earle was ſhared by the Contractors according to the purport of the Letters patents: but when the King heard of his death, hee (to the wonder of all that were by) brake forth into teares, bewailing the loſſe of ſo braue a Knight, affirming that he had left no Peere behind him in the Kingdome. A bleſſed King, ſaith Paris, to loue euen thoſe who had offended him.

(48) The Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury with the other Biſhoppes, repaired to the King at Gloceſter, vpon their returne from Leoline Prince of Wales, who pretended hee could not conclude, till the King had receiued into grace ſuch of the baniſhed Nobility, with whom himſelfe had beene confederated during the late diſpleaſures. The King hereupon moued with Pittie, ſends forth his Proclamations, that all ſuch as were outlawed or proſcribed, ſhould bee at Glouceſter vpon a certaine day, there to be receiued into the Kings fauour againe, and to haue reſtitution of their inheritances; but leſt they might ſuſpect any euill meaſure, it was ordered that they ſhould bee in the Churches protection, and come vnder the ſafe-conduct of the Archbiſhoppe and the other Prelates. Thither at the time and place limited doth Hubert de Burgo Earle of Kent (and lately chiefe Iuſticiar of England) repaire; vpon whom, by mediation of the Biſhops, the compaſsionate King looks gratiouſly, receiuing him in his Armes with the kiſſe of peace; in like ſort was the Lord Gilbert Baſſet, and all others of that fellowſhippe, receiued into fauour, their ſeuerall liuings and rights fully reſtored; and both Hubert and Baſſet admitted to bee of his Councell. And, that nothing might bee wanting to make the ioy vniuerſall; Gilbert, Brother to the late Earle Marſhall, had the whole Earldome conferred vpon him with all the lands and rights thereof whereſoeuer, notwithſtanding the foreſaid treacherous conueyance; whom alſo the King made Knight at VVorceſter, and deliuered into his hands the the Rod of the Marſhalſhip, according to the cuſtom. Howbeit in all theſe points the King may ſeeme but to haue temporized (as thereto driuen by ouerbearing inducements) or elſe greatly afterward to haue changed his iudgement, becauſe hee openly at one time * called the ſaid Richard a bloudy Traitour, and cauſed this Gilbert to bee forcibly kept out of the Court vpon a Chriſtmas day.

(49) Vpon this reconcilement the practiſe, by which the late great Marſhall was deſtroyed, and his poſſeſsions diſmembred, came to light; the copy of the letters, which had beene ſent into Ireland, being by commandement of the Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury, openly read in the preſence of the King, the Prelates, Earles and Barons. It moued teares in all of them; the King with an Oath affirming that hee knew not the contents of the ſaid letters, though by the vrging of the Biſhoppe of Wincheſter, Riuallis, Segraue, Paſſeleu, with other of his Councell, hee had cauſed his Seale to bee put vnto them. At the ſound of Summons to make their ſeuerall appearances, the Malefactors take Sanctuary, the Biſhop and Peter de Riuallis in Wincheſter Church, Segraue in Leiceſter Abbey, Paſſeleu in the new Temple, and others otherwhere. In the end, vpon the interceſsion of Edmund Archbiſhop of Canterburie, who piouſly endeauoured to extinguiſh all occaſions of further diſſention in the Kingdome, and vndertooke they ſhould haue a lawfull triall, the delinquents appeared at Weſtminſter before the King; *who * ſate in perſon with his Iuſticiars vpon the Bench. Peter de Riuallis* was firſt called (for the Biſhop came not,) whom the King ſhot through with an angrie eye, ſaying; O thou Traitour, by thy wicked aduiſe, I was drawne to ſet my Seale to theſe treacherous letters for the deſtruction of the Earle Marſhall, the Contents whereof were to mee vnknowne; and by thine and ſuch like counſell, I baniſhed my naturall Subiects, and turned their minds and hearts from me. By thy bad counſel, & thy Complices, I was moued to make warre vpon them to my irreparable loſſe, and the diſhonour of my Realme, in which enterprize I waſted my treaſure, and loſt many worthie perſons, together with much of my royall reſpect. Therefore I exact of thee an account aſwell of my treaſure, as of the cuſtodies of wardes, together with many other profites and eſcheates belonging to my Crowne. Peter denying none of the accuſations, but falling to the ground, thus beſought him. My Soueraigne Lord and King, I haue beene nouriſhed by you, and made rich in worldly ſubſtance, confound not your own Creature, but at leaſtwiſe grant mee a time of deliberation, that I may render a competent reaſon for ſuch points as I am charged with. Thou ſhalt (ſaid the King) be carried to the Tower of London, there to deliber ate till I am ſatiſfied. He was ſo, Stephen de Segraue, the Lord Chiefe Iuſtice (whom the King alſo called moſt wicked Traitour) had time till Michaelmas to make his accounts, at the Archbiſhops and other Biſhops humble entreaty; and for other matters, he ſhifted them off from himſelfe, by laying the blame vpon ſuch as were higher in place then hee: into whoſe office of Chiefe Iuſtice, Hugh de Pateſhull is aduanced. The like euaſion Robert Paſlew had, by leauing the fault vpon Walter Biſhoppe of Carleil, who was aboue him in the Exchequer: and thus were theſe ciuill enormities reformed, not without reducing ſtore of Coine to the King.

(50) As thoſe continuall turmoiles, and plagues of the Sword, much afflicted the land, ſo this was the third yeere, wherein God inflicted alſo for ſin, the plague of famine, whereby the poore did miſerably periſh, there being no Samaritan to pay for their harbouring, or to annoint their wounds with the oyle of conſolation. Our Authors, to make manifeſt, how odious the mercileſſe heart is in the ſight of God, relate a ſtorie of that time with proteſtation, that they doe it, leſt ſo memorable an example ſhould be in time forgotten. Certain * poore, while as yet the Corne was greene, pluckt the eares in the common fields, to ſuſtaine their liues; whereupon the Owners call on the Prieſt, to curſe all ſuch as had ſo done: but one in their company adiured the Prieſt in the name of God to exempt his corne from the ſentence, ſaying, it pleaſed him well, that the poore driuen with famine, had taken his corne, and ſo commended that which they had left to God. The Prieſt, compelled by importunity of the reſt, was entred into the ſentence, when by a terrible interrupting tempeſt of thunder, lightning, wind, haile, and raine, all the corne-fieldes about were deſolated, as if they had beene troden downe with Horſe and Cartes; that no kind of beaſt or fowle would feed vpon the corne thus laid. But (as ſay our Authors out of the * Scripture) ſeeing * they who are pitteous find mercy, that honeſt and compaſsionate hearted man, found all his corne and grounds (though interlaced with theirs,) altogether vntoucht and vnharmd. Wherupon (ſay they) it is more cleare then any light, that as glory to God on high is ſung of Angels, ſo there is peace on Earth to men who are of goodwill. This dearth was in * France and Gaſcoigne aſwell as in England. A Iewiſh impiety may well be annexed to want of Chriſtian Charity. There were brought before the King at Weſtminſter ſeuen Iewes, who circumciſed a Child, and purpoſed in contempt of Chriſt and Chriſtianity) to haue crucified him in Eaſter at Norwich.

(51) Theſe now calmer times, were made more happy, by the marriage of the Emperour Fredericke with the Lady Iſabel, the King of Englands ſiſter, a beauteous young Lady about twenty yeeres of age. The meſſengers arriued in March with the Emperours letters, cloſed vnder a Seale of gold; and there were ſent to conduct her ouer, the Archbiſhoppe of Colein, and the Duke of Louain. The King brought her to Sandwich with about three thouſand horſe in his traine; and being imperially furniſhed with all worldly abundance, ſhee tooke ſhipping in May, and in one dayes and one nights ſpace arriued at Antwerpe, a City of the Empire, & was euery where moſt magnificently entertained; her ſweet humility, and excellent beauty, drawing all to loue and honour her. At the ſolemnitie of her * marriage were preſent three * Kings, eleuen Dukes, thirty Marqueſſes & Earles, beſides the number of great Prelates. On whether ſuperſtition, or obſeruation, of the Emperour is noted at this marriage, that he forbare the Empreſſes company, till a certaine howre, which his Viſards or Aſtrologers had aſsigned, and in the morning hee cauſed her to bee carefully tended as a woman with child, and ſent word to his brother the King of England, that hee ſhould haue a ſonne, ſo skilfull or confident hee was; and God did fauour his iudgement, for it proued ſo. This Imperiall affinity gaue a * worthy Hiſtorian occaſion here to diſplay and emblazon the Maieſty and glory of the Engliſh Princes; but amongſt them all, none were higher aduanced then the Children of King Iohn, one of whoſe ſons was now a * King, the other afterward choſen to be an * Emperour, and one of his daughters a * Queen, this other (here mentioned) an * Empreſſe. And here doth Vvendouer end his hiſtory, to whom we haue hitherto been beholding for his labours, ſorry wee can enioy his good company no longer.

(52) There were ſpread through England about this time certaine Romane Vſurers called * Caurſini, who had entangled the King himſelfe, moſt of the great men, and all others as had to deale with the Court of Rome, in their cunning ſnares. Their firſt entrance into England was ſome few yeeres paſt, when the Pope requiring the * tenth of all moueable goods in England, Ireland and Wales, towards his wars againſt the Emperour Fredericke, ſent Stephen his Nunce hither to collect it, * who brought with him that race of deuouring-Monſters vnder humane ſhape, called the * Popes Marchants, vnder colour of of supplying with money such as wanted present pay. The * Popes continuall angariations and extortions, vnder colour also of the Turkish warres, kept these men (if men) still in vse here in England, to the * extreeme beggering of infinite numbers, who were inueigled (either by perswasion, or crauing, or commanding or comminating, or excommunicating,) to giue way to the Popes vnsufferable extortions, all men wondering into what bottomlesse gulfe that huge Masse was put, which the Popes Factors had gathered. Wherewith all mens hearts were deeply wounded, for that all this vnualuable treasure neuer was imployed to any publike vse, or honour of the Church. Roger Bishop of London (a learned and religious Prelate) burning with zeale of Christian charity, seeing the numbers and mischiefs of these execrable Vsurers, thus still to encrease, first admonished them (whom he reputed no better then Schismatickes) to repent, and leaue that wicked trade of life. But when he found them deafe to all aduise, armed with the weapons of spirituall iustice, he openly pronounceth them accursed, precisely commanding them to packe out of LONDON, WHICH TIL-THAT TIME KNEW NOT WHAT SVCH A PLAGVE MEANT, least his flocks should be infected therewith. But so Apostolicall and holie a remedie tooke not such effect as it deserued; for they swelling with pride and presumption on the Popes patrociny, easily procured from the Court of Rome, that the old sickly Bishoppe should be peremptorily cited to appeare in the remote parts beyond the Sea, there to answere for that iniury which he had offered the Popes Merchants.

(53) The King being now in the best strength of his yeeres, tooke to wife the Ladie Elenor, second daughter of Raimund Earle of Prouince, which hee had by the daughter of Thomas Earle of Sauoy. A Ladie about twelue or thirteene yeers of age, and altogether as beautifull and princely, as shee was yong. Her father, by * reason of warres which hee had with the Cittizens of Massilia his subiects (who vpon pretence they were oppresst, sought to driue him out of all his territories) was but a poore Prince. Neuertheless it was the happinesse of his foure daughters (whose Parentage adorned with rare beautie, and fashioned with excellently-vertuous education, made them fit Brides for any Princes in the world) that each of them had * a King to her Husband. The Eldest was married to Lewis the ninth King of France; Elenor to the King of England; Santia (or Cynthia) to Richard his brother King of Romans; Beatrix to Charles the French Kings brother, King of Sicilia. The Nuptials were accomplished at * Westminster; where also shee was crowned Queene with incredible state and splendor, the King himselfe wearing his Crowne also. The Citizens of London are noted of much seruiceable forwardnes and magnificence at this royall feast. The Citie was adorned with silkes, banners, Crownes, Pals, Tapers, Lamps, and with * certaine wonders of witte and strange showes; the Citizens richly attired and well mounted, met the King on horsebacke. At the Nuptiall dinner, the Trumpets sounding before them, they came in, carrying three hundreth and threescore Cups of gold and siluer, to serue the King and that noble Company with wine, according to their duties at Coronations. The King had twice or thrice before attempted to marrie, but God ordained otherwise till now; and it was a match made principally after the manner of honest priuate persons, for loue; and not as heads of publike Bodies vse to do, for seeming worldly strengths and profits. It was also begun and concluded without the priuitie of the States. The Emperour soone after requested the King to send him his brother Richard, Earle of Cornwall, to make him Generall against the French, whereby the English also might recouer their right: but the Emperour was desired to choose any other; for him the States of his Realme, (which were assembled to consult thereupon) would not forgoe, because he was but yong, and next heire to the Crowne, if the King should die without children. This answere was giuen to the Emperours Ambassadors at Merton neere London; where also the Statutes, called of Merton, were at the same time enacted.

(54) The humorous Lords began now againe to relapse into their wonted gyddinesse, taking it in great in dignity, that the King was so much ruled by his wiues vncle, William de Valentia; in so much that the King withdrawing himselfe into the Tower of London, thither none of the Lords would come. Vpon better aduice therefore hee returnes to his Palace; where some great Officers and others were put from the Priuie Councell and their places, not without the admiration of many. But the Bishop of Chichester, chosen Lord Chancellor in the Kings minority, being required by the King to deliuer vp the Seale, refused; alleaging more stoutly then loyally, that as he had receiued it with the publike allowance of the Parliament, so without the same assent he would not resigne it. Which thwartings of his Peeres and Prelates, incited the King (it seemeth) to resume againe into his fauour some of those his Counsellers which he had formerly dis-courted, as Peter de Rimallis, and Stephen de Segraue. But (whether on discontent hereof or no) Richard the Kings brother (whose seruice was formerly denied to the Emperour,) the Earles Marshall, Chester, * Lincolne, and Sarisberie with many other honourable Souldiers assumed the vow to fight in Palestine against Gods enemies, for accomplishment whereof they departed thither * the second yeere after. Meane-while the King to secure himselfe from dangers neerer home, trauails toward Yorke to settle a peace betweene himself and Alexander King of Scots; who, the rather vpon Confidence of Leolins amitie, (which toward the English was but * shadowie and alwaies suspected) demanded Northumberland. Neuertheles by the wisdome of friends, & moderation of both the Princes, they parted in peace, the King of England being elsewhere to lay out lands to a certaine * value, least he should dismember his kingdome by forgoing so great and necessary a frontire. The Scottish King claimed that County from King Iohn, who by his deed enfeoffed him thereof, as in portion with his daughter which King Alexander had married.

(55) Peter Bishop of Winchester (remoued formerly from Court by the working of the English Bishops and Lords) being crased and sicke in bodie returned about Michaelmas from forreine parts; soone after which (as if that Bishoppe had brought them with him) Paris notes, there ensued great raines, and extraordinary land-floods: Though * indeed he was a man of great wisdome, and dexterity in handling weightiest affaires: he also built sundrie Monasteries, and besides other his worthy deedes, he left his Bishopricke so furnished at his * death (a president which few of his successours haue followed) that there was not so much diminished of that which he found at his entrance, as the verie * Cattle which serued to draw the plough.

(56) The King whose treasures were exhausted with paiment of his sisters portion (* thirtie thousand Markes) to the Emperour, and otherwise, called a Parliament at London, where he could not obteine any * supplies from the States, but vpon * confirmation of the Nationall Priuiledges of England formerly granted, and vpon acceptance of the Earles of Warren and Ferrars, and Iohn Fitz-Geoffrey into his most inward Counsels; whom the King (meerely enforced to satisfie his People) caused to sweare to giue faithfull Counsell, and to forsweare all corruption or sale of Iustice; and finally hee conditioneth, to relie wholly vpon his naturall Subiects for aduise, leaning all others. The money gathered (the seuerest and most mistrustfull point of all,) was not to be paid into the Eschecquer, but to be deposited in some religious house, or fortresse of euery Countie, to to bee expended in the generall seruices of the Kingdome, as occasion required; so that if the king failed to performe his part, euery man should haue backe what hee had disbursed. One great and ordinary cause of waste, seemed now taken away, for that Leoline (who had * first taken homage of all his owne Barons) did * voluntarily yeeld to hold his whole Principality of the Kings of England; moued thereunto (though with much mislike of the Welsh) to strengthen himselfe against his son Griffin, who greatly infested him, being also assayled with a pallie.

(57) There is in Mathew Paris much complaint of the State of England at this time, which by the Kings flexibility (saith he) was becom the ordinarie prey, sometime of one sort of strangers, and sometime of another, Poictouins, Italians, Alemaines, and Prouincois. Indeed the Genius, and common humour of a Nation, is not easily alterable: and our Misoxenie (or hatred to Strangers) was no new quality, for * Horace noted it before or about Christs birth: and Englishmen can hardly see when they are well to keepe them so. But no kind of Strangers at that time more infested England (saith our * Monk) then the Romans, of which here swarmed three sorts, *Vsurers, which were the Popes Merchants, Italian Clerks, most vile and illiterate persons, which armed with the Popes Bulles possessed themselues (against all right of Priuiledges) of spirituall reuenues, and if any withstood them, they were by the Popes owne warrant excommunicated; lastly, the * Farmers and Proctors for the Romans, who cunningly scraping together whatsoeuer was of price in the Land, sent it ouer Sea to the Masters, who there lined in deliciousnes on the Patrimony of him that was crucified, and in pride on other mens goods.* Insomuch, that *holy men with heart-breakings, teares, and * deadly grones*, professed it was better for them to die, then to see those miseries on their Nation and holy men. So that the daughter of Sion was become like an impudent Harlot. And as these Papall Engines dealt here in England, so did they with others * at Rome, the Gouernours of that Church not seeking to winne mens soules, but their money, oppressing the religious by punishments, vsuries, & Simonie, without any care of iustice and honesty. Which made the Greeke Church at this time to fall quite away, and oppose it selfe against the Romane. Doubtlesse England had no lesse cause so to doe, then had the Greekes; but as Pope Gregory knew that his onely way to keepe England fast, was to hold close with the King; so the King also saw no way to strengthen himselfe against his Barons, but by holding in with the Pope, though with so many vnsufferable mischiefes. And for some such purpose of the Kings, newly now arriued Cardinall Otto, the Popes Legate, greatly against the liking both of the Peeres, and of the Archbishoppe of Canterbury, who not onely reproued the King thereof, as of a thing dangerous to the Kingdome, but soone after also tooke his iourney to Rome, to make some complaints, neither would he stay, though the Legate recalled him by his authoritie, which euer after caused much hatred betwixt them. Yet sundry good offices were at first performed by the Legate. The treatie of peace begun betweene the two Kings of England and Scotland at Yorke, was again resumed in the same City, where Otto interposed himselfe toward making a finall agreement, which ensued. There were also assembled the Earles and Barons, who by the princely offices * of Alexander King of Scots, were reconciled to the King their Soueraigne, if this be the time which Boetius meanes, and not the next yeere. Otto had formerly accorded many of them among themselues, whose disagreements had emperild the State of the Realme, so that for a time nothing but calmnesse and amity appeared. Yet soone after they stormed to see the King so * addicted to the will of the Romans, especially the Legate, for which, Richard Earle of Cornwall reproued him, as carrying himselfe more like the Popes Pensioner then a King. Notwithstanding the King was so prouident of his State, that the Legate calling his * Nationall Counsel, thither came from the King, Iohn Earle of Lincolne, Iohn Fitz-Geoffrey, & William de Kele a Canon of Pauls, to forbid the Legate on the behalfe of the King and Kingdome, not to attempt any thing against the Crowne or royall dignitie.

* At Paul in anno 11. E. Martini.

The king forbids him to touch the rights of the Crowne.

(58) Simon de Montfort (afterward created Earle of Leicester) had now wrought himselfe into such fauour, that the King with his owne hand secretlie gaue Elienor, (widdow of the last William Marshall Earle of Pembroke) to him in marriage, notwithstanding that she had vowed herselfe a Nunne. When this was once knowne to Richard Earle of Cornwall, and the angry Lords, they all took such snuffe thereat, because they were not first consulted with, in regard the King had promised to doe no weighty matter without thē, that none but Hubert de Burgh Earl of Kent adhered to the forsaken King. The head of this defection was the Earle of Cornwall, of whom men generally had hope, that he would now free the Land from the miserable oppressions both of Romans and other Strangers. Him therefore the Legate vndertakes, but found him stiffe and vntractable at first. For when hee truely and fatherly told him: That if all the people of the land rose against the King, yet he being his own brother ought alwayes to stand fast with him against the whole world, and not to make himselfe Captain of the enemies, &c. The Earle roundly replied; * That none ought to marualle, if hee being the onely Heire apparent, had a care of the Kingdomes state, when there was no treasure in the publik coffers for defence thereof, though it were enuironed with enemies: That it was moreouer wondred at, for somuch as the King his brother did most stand in need of helpe; and good discretion, that he would not take example by such as were wise; as neither of the Emperour, who hauing married their sister, retained her with him, but sent backe all that attended her, not giuing to any of them either lands or money, although himselfe did abound in both; nor the example of the King of France, who tooke the same course though he married the eldest sister of the English Queene, &c. The Legate vpon these and many other shrewde sharpe speeches, takes with him Peter Bishoppe of Winchester, and deales with the King, who required time to answere; which the Lords granted, and met at London stronglie appointed vpon the day. There, while the quarrell hung in suspense, Simon de Montfort had with money, faire wordes, and much entreaty of Mediators, reconciled himselfe to the fierce young Earles, and so also had Iohn Earle of Lincolne, another marke of the publike enuie. This practise (which Earle Richard entertained without his Confederates priuity) had profitable effects; for the controlling Lords lost thereby their Generall, and hee greatlie weakened himselfe in the opinion of the Lords and People; both which were points of aduantage and safety for the King. But Simon feeling himselfe as yet vpon no sure ground, left his wife with child at Kenilworth, not ceasing, till by the fauour of the Emperours letters and * excessiue bribes, (by which iustice was ouercome, and made captiue to the Romane auarice) hee had obtained at Rome a dispensation for that marriage, which yet was * doubted, whether it could bee lawfull, because shee had taken the * ring, though neither the habit of a Nunne, nor the vaile. Howsoeuer, the King did afterward sodainely breake with him, obiecting that Montford had * first corrupted her, and hee to couer his Sisters shame, was content to giue her in Mariage.

of Richard late Earle Marshall) to commit that * assassinate vpon him. This execrable wretch having beene a Courtier, and one of the Kings * Knights, supposing to haue found the King in his owne retiring Bed, had about midnight gotten in at the Chamber window; but God (in whose special protection, the liues of Princes are) disappointed him, for the King was elsewhere in bed with his Queen. Neuertheless he gaue not ouer, but with naked knife in hand, sought vp and downe in some other Chambers. One of the Queenes * gentlewomen (sitting late and very deuoutly at her booke by candle-light,) at sight of the furious villaine, with her shriking noise wakened the Kings seruants, who starting out of their Bed, laid hands vpon him; & afterward he was drawne in peeces with horses at Couentree. And worthily: for (as * a vulgar Chronicler hereupon saith truly,) *in wounding and killing a Prince, the Traitor is guilty of homicide, of parricide, of * Christicide, nay of * Deicide. William de Marisco*, who was saide to bee the instigator of this Treason, knowing his danger, became a Pyrate & fortified the Isle of Lundey in Seuern, where hee did much mischiefe, the situation of that little Iland being * inexpugnable. At length hee was surprised therein, and sixteene of his Complices, who all of them after conuiction were put to death at London. William to the last gaspe denying his priuity to the former treasonous attempt of killing the King. About the time of the Kings danger at Woodstocke, the Legate was in very little better case at Oxford, where being at first honourably by the Vniuersity entertained in Ousney Abbey, the pride of his Romans there proued so intollerable, that a troupe of the yonger Students, prouoked therewith to arme themselues, not onely slew the Legates owne brother, but would haue done the like with the Legate himselfe, whom they termed an Vsurer, Symonist, Rentraker, Money-thirster, peruerter of the King, subuerter of the Kingdome, enriching strangers with spoiles of the English; but hee lurking in the Belfrey, at midnight escaped ouer the riuer (not without danger of drowning) and fled to the King for his protection. For which outrage, the King sending the Earle of Warren with an armed band, * imprisoned about 30. of the offenders, and the Legate interdicted the Vniuersity, till *all the Bishops of England (purposely * meeting in a Synode) pleaded for the Vniuersity, as being the second of Christendome*: to whose importunity the proud Legate would not condiscend, vnlesse all the Bishops would yeeld to goe on foot with the Students from Paules Church to the Legates house, (which was about a mile,) who there vngowned and vnshod, should humbly craue absolution; which accordingly they performed.

(60) The Legate was (not long after) called home by the Pope, * vpon notice of the scandall daylie giuen in England, by the vnsatiable auarice of the Romanes; but by the earnest workings of the King, who feared lest his great ones would rise against him, hee was detained as a necessary euill to establish the good of Peace. For it was in a manner taken vp for a fashion among the Lords, to glorifie themselues with the senseless multitude, by seditiously disparaging and taxing the Kings discretion and gouernment, being farre too gentle and amiable for spirites so peruerse and insolent; which might well force his louing nature, to seeke kindnesse and aduise among strangers, seeing he could not haue it for any his deserts among the homeborne. A great reason why (perhaps) he did some few things rashly and passionately enough: it being a thing forceable to distemper a very wise man, to haue so many imperious censors to obserue his actions, and few to humble their abilities to obsequious seruices, all bearing themselues rather like Tutors or Controllers, then like Subiects or Counsellors. About which time, one William an ordinary Calumniator, and accuser of great men to the King, was for that impious practise condemned to die; though hee sought to peece out his dayes by the helpe of new appeachments and false criminations; but that being discouered, he was hanged vpon a Gibbet in London. Now also the King beganne to smell out the vndirect and false dealing of his beloued Legate, whose familiar friend (Peter Saracen) being taken Captiue by the Emperour, and to pay 10000 l. Sterling for his ransome; the shamelesse Legate counselled the king to bind himselfe and his Crown for that payment. Whereby the King perceiuing what toiles were laid to entrap him, (the Romanes not caring what losse happened to the Kingdome, so they might be gainers) (were in great rage, that it repented him he had euer admitted the Legate into the land, to dissipate the wealth thereof. But the Bishoppes of the land meeting in Councell at London, to redresse the oppressions of the English Church, tolde the Legate flatly, that the Romanes importunity had so long exhausted their Church-goods, that they would no longer endure it. These English repentances seeme somewhat too late; but that prouidence which the King of Scotland soone after vsed, was, as more tempestiue, so more commendable, when meeting the same Legate (for now into Scotland he is going to gather coine) he denied him entrance into his Kingdome, telling him, he was the first Legate which euer entred that Kingdome; yet by intreatie to saue the Legates credite, hee was permitted; first making a declaration, that his entrance should neuer goe for a President of any after; whereto the Legate should put his Seale at his departure; but hauing gotten what hee came for, he sodainly stole away without leaue of the King, and carried his writing with him. By all which vile and indigne vsages, a man might thinke the Church of Rome did purposely striue to draw the hatred of all nations against her; especially, sith (as we shewed) the Greekes were fallen from the Romane vnion, so now the Church of Antioch had both excommunicated the Pope, the Church and Court of Rome, and challenged the Primacie aboue the Pope and the Romane Church, as being an ancienter See, wherin S. Peter first sate Bishoppe for seuen yeeres; and more excellent and deare, sith there Peter liued with loue and reuerence, whereas both he and Saint Paul were continually persecuted in Rome; which Church was now also defiled with Simonie, Vsurie, Auarice, and other haineous offences.

(61) But (doubtlesse) it was worthy of reproofe in the King; that after so manifold trials of faith and constancy in Hubert Earle of Kent, hee should now againe afflict his honourable old-age with reuiuall of accusations, when hee rather ought to haue tendred him as a Father. Among other the Articles (engines of vexation) which the King bent against him, these were 3. new ones, by which any reasonable man may take a scantling of the rest. 1 That Hubert had taken the money out of the barrels which were sent for the reliefe of Rochel and Poicton, and stuffed them with sand. 2. That to dissuade a great Lady from marriage with the King, he had said the King was a squint-eyd foole, a lewd man, and a kind of leper, deceitful, periured, more faint-hearted then a woman, only terrible to his owne friends; and vtterly vnfit for any faire or noble Ladies company. 3. That at Wodstocke, when the King was alone, he rusht in with a naked knife to murder him: Which and many other accusations the Earle did modestly and cleerely refute. But with the last (being most wicked of all) he was so greeued, that making low obeisance to the King, he could not forbeare to say, that hee was [illegible] to his father, nor to him, which by Gods grace did wel appeare in the King: as if he should haue said, (quoth Paris) That if the Earle would haue beene a Traitor, the King had neuer obtained the Crowne. This seemes to haue beene a publike triall, vpon a Suit or Action of trespasse, brought against the Earle by the King in the Kings Bench, at which triall the King him-himselfe was also present. But howsoeuer the Earle answered, hee was condemned to giue to the King * foure his *deerest Castles, Blanch Castle, Grosmount in wales, Skenesrith and Hasild; and then also (as it seemes) hee was * depriued of his Title of Earle.

(62) After so many mischiefes patiently brooked, at last the King vpon receipt of letters from the Emperour (whom as his brother in law, hee was loth to offend,) commanded Otho the Popes Legate, in regard of the great enmities betweene the Pope and Emperour, to depart out of England. There was also strait commandement giuen to the Italian Vsurers, to leaue the most * pure earth of his Realme (meaning that his owne people was most innocent and free from such a sinne,) but (saith * one, who durst write any thing hee thought) by giuing the King money, which is too much vsed to iustifie the wicked, they for a great part remained still, as loth to forsake such fat pastures. And the Legat himselfe also staied so long, till the Pope by wily inducements and * forged calumniations had drawne the King, both to relinquish the Emperour his brother in law, and to suffer the Papall Excommunication to passe here against him, and money also to be gathered to his impeachment. A briefe taste of all the Popes proceedings against this glorious Emperour, we may take from the Nobilitie of France, who (when the Pope offered the Empire vnto Robert the French Kings brother) in their grand Councell refused to accept it, charging the Pope with the Spirit of audacious rashnesse, for deposing the Emperour, not conuicted of any fault, and whom a Generall Councell onely ought to censure, not the Pope, to whom no credit ought to be giuen, being his Capitall Enemie. For that themselues knew he was a vertuous and victorious Emperor, and one who had in him more religion then the Pope had. Our Legat Ottho (who now at length is gone) was no sooner departed, but Peter of Sauoy the Queens Vncle arriued, to whō the King gaue the Earldome of Richmōd, and entertained otherwise most magnificently. This and the like largesse to strangers, drew on the King much euill will, who also in fauour of his Queene, procured her Vncle Bonifacius to be chosen Archbishop of Canterbury in place of * Edmunde, who weary of his life in England, by reason that he could not redresse the Popes detestable exactions and oppressions, made choise of a voluntarie Exile at Pountney in France, where he died with the honour and opinion of a Saint.

(63) The Kings imploiments hitherto haue (almost wholly) been taken vp either in the impatiencie of ciuill disturbations, or in the too-patient sufferance of some forraine greeuances, nourished within his Kingdome; which gaue him perhaps little leasure, minde, or meanes, to pursue any transmarine designe. But now better prouided with money, then with men, (and yet not sufficiently, with money) he takes shippe immediatly after Easter towards Poictou, where the Earle of March (now husband to Queene Isabell his mother) expected his arriuall. Hee committed the Gouernment of the Realme in his absence to the Archbishoppe of Yorke. Thirtie Hogsheads or Barrels fraught with sterling money were shipt for that seruice. There also went with him Richard Earle of Cornwall, (who was returned with much honour out of the Holy-land not long before) and seauen other Earles with about three hundreth Knights, besides other Souldiers. To resist the English, the King of France (who had giuen Poictou to his brother Alfonse) assembled an Armie royall of foure thousand men of Armes, excellently wel appointed, and about twenty thousand choise Souldiers; with a thousand Carts to carrie their other necessaries. King Henrie vnderstanding that the King of France lay before Frontenay, (a Castle belonging to the Earle of March,) seeking to force it by assaults, sent a messenger of defiance to him as a breaker of Truce. Lewis a most iust and valiant Prince, denied that euer hee brake the truce, but that the King of England by maintenance of his Rebels, did rather seeme to infringe the Peace. Neuertheless hee offered (so as the English would not protect his enemies the Earle of March and others) to giue him Poictou, and a great part of Normandy, in satisfaction of his * Fathers Oath, and moreouer, to enlarge the last truce with a longer terme of yeeres. These so honourable, safe, and profitable conditions, by the practise of the Poictouines (who feared the French Kings indignation would proue too heauie for them to beare, if the English abandoned their cause) were vnfortunately refused.

(64) When the French King heard hereof, it repented him that he had humbled himselfe so farre; telling his Lords, that he neither feared his Cosen of England, nor all his forces, but onely that Oath, (for restoring of the lands in France) which his father made when hee was in England. This scruple did so trouble the Kings mind, on the behalfe of his dead Father, that hee would admit no comfort till one of his Lords told him, that the King of England, by putting Constantine Fitz-Arnold to death, for hauing spoken some words in honour of King Lewis (his Father) had first broken the truce. This satisfied the French. That whole businesse is thus concluded by * Tilius; Hugh Earle of March ouercome with the pride and perswasions of his wife Isabel, would not doe homage to Alfonse the French Kings brother: for shee was a cause to draw the English thither, where things thriuing on his part but meanely, Hugh is constrained in the end to doe both homage and fealty vnto Alfonse. This onely must be added, that he did vnfaithfully prouide for his priuate safety without the knowledge of the King of England, at such time as he * pretended otherwise.

(65) This treacherie lost the King all Poictou, for whereas he principally tooke care for money, presuming vpon the Earle for men, when it came to the point, the Earle was not onely not prouided, but sware by the throat of God, he neuer promised any such matter, and denied he had set his Seale to any writing concerning such promises, and that if any such sealed writing were (as the King and his brother the Earle of Cornwall affirmed) their mother his wife had forged it. They were now in sight of the French Host before Tailbourg in Xainctoing when this improuident expostulation was made. The King of England manifestly seeing his perill, and hauing by his brother Earle Richards mediation (whom many of the French did greatly honour because he had by composition been a meane at his arriuall to free them from the Saracens in the holy-land,) raised his camp by night, and retreated with much more haste then good speed. Not long after this, the faire Citie of Xainctes in Xainctoing, vpon displeasure conceiued by the Cittizens against the King, because he had giuen the same to the Lord Hugh his halfe-brother (sonne to the Earle of March) first contriued a perfidious reuolt so closelie, that if first the said Lord Hugh, and then Guy de Lusinian his elder brother, had not in good time signified the danger, the King and all the English had been surprized by the French. There was none (among all the mutable Poictouins) found respectiue of honor and loyaltie, but onely one called Hertold, Captaine of the famous Castle of Mirabell, who in great sorrow repaired to the King of England, praying counsell and assistance, where the King with a downecast looke gaue him this answere: Thou dost see (ô Hertold) that my forces are source sufficient to defend my selfe. Our Lord and Sauiour was betraied by his Disciple Iudas, and therefore who shall be safe? Behold the Earle of March, whom I tooke and reuerenced as my Father, hath giuen a pernicious president. I haue trusted in a staffe of reed, and the splinters thereof haue wounded my hand. Thou art the only man who hast behaued thy selfe honestly: whatsoeuer therefore thou dost possesse of mine by any iust title, take it to thee as thine owne, I giue it thee: Prouide otherwise

(66) Meane while the King looking carefullie into the double dealings of the Poictouins, who were the limitanie or border-subiects of the English dominions in Aquitaine, and by a nature proper to free March-men which lie betweene the hammer and the Anuill, are enured to all sorts of deuices how to saue themselues and delude others, wiselie withdrawes his * large Pensions, which they by deep dissimulations and improfitable shewes of assistance had shared among them, for which they repayed nothing but secret scoffes of their Patron and Pay-master. The Earle of March whatsoeuer his Fees were from the King his Sonne in Law, made but an euill bargaine in the end: for, besides that the French King tooke from him no small portion of his Estate, hee was openlie appeached of Treason in the French Court, by a valiant Knight, who offered to proue the truth of his accusation by Battel. Isabell, whom the French in passion called Iezabell, because her pride and turbulent practises had procured all those euils, fled vpon the newes to a Nunnerie. In the end yet her husband being aged, by the diligence & care of friends auoided the Combat, and was suffered to returne home. (67) Neither will the Maiesty and honour of the Kingdome permit, that such kindes of expense should bee wanting, when publike occasions do require; in which respects they are not onely vsefull, but absolutely necessary, because Common-weales are partly founded vpon the opinion which Subiects and neighbours haue of their power and riches, and their estimate is commonly made by that which is outwardly seene at such times. This care, besides the great loue hee bare to his wiues kindred and Countrimen, made him purucy for money in this manner; for in December the Lady Beatrix Countesse of Prouince * mother to the Queenes of England and France, hauing with her the Lady Cincia, Cynthia, or Scientia (for by all those names shee is called in Authors) and a princely traine in all points excellently well furnished, landed at Douer, where innumerable of the best sorts gaue her welcome and attendance. London was hung with rich Ornaments, from the Bridge thereof to Westminster. This noble young Lady Cincia, was brought hither to bee married to Richard the Kings brother Earle of Cornwall: At whose Nuptiall feast, there were thirty thousand * Messes prouided in the Cookery onely, and of all other things there was incredible plenty. All which notwithstanding did manifestly proue (as Paris saith most truly) that the world is but a very Iugler, and the pompe thereof but an idle shadow, seeing the next morrow blew away the whole varietie of so great preparations, like as if it had beene a Cloude. Nor much vnlike is the life euen of greatest Princes, which hangeth on very vntrusty termes, as Griffin, eldest brother of Dauid Prince of Wales did find, when hoping by a chaine of Blankets, and such like stuffe to escape out of the Tower of London, where the King had emprisoned him, the line breaking, hee pitcht vpon his head, which the weight of his great body draue (as it were) into his shoulders, and miserably slew him. The King therefore punishing the Keepers for their sloth, commanded that the Sonne of Griffith (prisoner with his father) should from thenceforth bee more narrowly watched. Not long after the which, Dauid Prince of Wales prouoked by wronges, (chiefly done by the * Earle of Hereford) inuaded the English Marches, whom the Earles of Gloceſter and Hereford, and other mighty men in those parts, hauing the Kings consent and assistance, did withstand; yet fighting but with variable fortune. It was Prince Dauids purpose to haue freed himselfe from the obedience or tenure which hee had acknowledged to the King; for which purpose he exhibited his * complaint to the Pope, pretending that the King of England compelled him vniustly to hold his Principality and Lands of him. But the Kings credite, cause, and workings, easily ouerweighed the Prince of Wales, and preuailed.

*Stow in his Surucy, p. 367. saith she was mother to 5 Queenes, adding to the 4 forementioned, Ioan married to Philip king of Nauarr. Richard the kings brother marrieth the Queenes sister.

(68) The States of the Realme were in those dayes nothing supple, when the King sought to handle them for money: for hee about this time labouring to draw some from them, vpon faithfull promise to keepe and obserue the liberties, vnto which he had sworn at his Coronation, and whereof he had granted his Charter, they besought him to remember, how often hee had wrung from his faithfull liege people (whom hee ought to cherish, not vtterly empouerish) without performing his promise. That forth- "with after the taking of Bedford, hee had Carru- "cage, that is, two shillings vpon euery Plough- "land; the next yeere after, a fifteenth of all their "Moueables: vpon his passage into Britain, no small "summes of money from the Prelates, Religious or- "ders, Burgesses and Iewes: after his returne, hee "had Escuage, that is, vpon euery Shield (or knights "Fee) three markes: then a fortieth part of all their "Moueables: within a while after a thirtieth part; "By and by, for the marriage of the Lady Isabell "to the Emperour, two Marks vpon euery Plough- "land; at his Sonnes birth, hee by Presents heaped "vp no small store of money. Againe, when hee "went into Gascoigne, hee raised almost infinite "heapes of money from all sorts of Subiects: vpon "his returne, where hee had beene deluded and "dishonoured, hee fleeced all manner of Subiects. They now also (vnder the name of aide for the marriage of his eldest daughter) granted him vpon euery Knights Fee, which held of the King in chiefe, twenty shillings, the one halfe to bee paide at Easter, the other at Michaelmasse. But (say they) how well the King will keepe and fulfill his vndertakings and promises, in requitall of the past and present contributions, he onely knowes to whom nothing is vnknowne. But such as trauelled to strengthen the Popes designes, with collections of money among the English Clergy, found a stern and constant opposition, not onely for that they were vnwilling, but also for that the Emperour had written to the King in plaine phrase, that if hee suffered any such matter, hee would not faile in grieuous sort to punish all the English hee could get, in reuenge of that partiality.

(69) About

(69) About which time many ſeditious perſons were in the Court of England, which * hoped that warre with Scotland would bring them this commodity, that the oppreſsions they did to the people ſhould reſt vnpuniſhed; for Lawes and Iuſtice haue no place in time of battell. Their hope thus tooke beginning. Alexander King of Scots had married the Lady Mary, a goodly Gentlewoman daughter to the Lord Ingelram de Cowcie, who (as all Frenchmen) being a deadly enemy to the King of England, had laboured to weaken that ſtrength of amity, which was betweene the two Kings of England and of Scots, as a point neceſſarie or profitable for the tranquilitie of France. Their hope thus had ending; the ſaid Ingelram by the ſtumbling of his horſe in a Foord, being caſt out of his Saddle, and pitcht into the depth of the riuer, while his foot hung faſt in the ſtirrop, his ſword at the ſame time falling out of his ſheath, and running him through, did moſt ſtrangely end his life by a triple death, with whom it ſeemed the humour of battel between the two ſiſter-Nations likewiſe died: for not long after, (notwithſtanding the great preparations on both ſides) all quarrels were abſolutely * concluded, with relation to ſuch Articles as had been formerly made betweene them at Yorke. The King of England had with him fiue thouſand horſemen moſt fairely armed and appointed; beſides a moſt puiſſant number of ſeruiceable men on foot. The Welſhmen feared and expected that vpon this agreement, the King would turne all his forces againſt them; but hee knowing it needleſſe to vſe ſuch numbers for that ſeruice, ſent onely three hundreth men of Armes, vnder the conduct of Sir Hubert Fitz-Mathew, to repreſſe their attempts, but through their own raſhnes, & the Welſhmens valiancie, hee and his people were with loſſe at that time ſcattered. The newes of this bad ſucceſſe troubled the King neerely, for finall remedy whereof, hee reſolued to lead a full Armie thither. But when, to furniſh this deſigne hee prayed more Subſidie of the States of his Realme, they with one voice and with one mind contradicted; though alſo his debts to Merchant-ſtrangers for wines, and other neceſſaries, were ſo many and ſo continually called for, as hee could ſcarce paſſe abroad without their clamors. Neuertheleſſe, the newes which he receyued out of Aquitaine, where his Seneſchall Nicholas de Molis had wonne the day in a battell againſt the King of Nauarre, did ſomewhat mitigate the ſowreneſſe of theſe ouerthwarts; and for repleniſhment of Coffers, Robert Paſſelew ſo ordered the matter, by fining ſuch as had encroched vpon the Kings Forreſts, that hee vnexpectedly beganne again to make them ouerflow.

(70) The great helps which the King found by the new ſupply of his Treaſure, made him dayly conſider, how to augment the ſame, and how to ſtoppe all vndue Outlets, by which it was ordinarily impaired. Vpon the departure of Ottho the Popes Legate, who had well ſtuffed his owne and his Maſters Coffers, (and had no leſſe filled the Peoples heartes with repinings, and their mouthes with curſes of him) there was ſome hope the Romiſh Horſe-leaches would for a while haue left ſucking the beſt iuyce of the land; but it proued otherwiſe, new Agents, Legats, & Factors, ſtill comming ouer, as if England had bin a wel which could neuer be drawne drie, and Rome a bottomleſſe gulfe which could neuer bee filled full. Whereupon, before this, the King writ his letters both to this Pope, and to his Predeceſſor Gregory 9. deſiring them to ſurceaſſe from thus afflicting England with their exactions; but neither one nor other of them would vouchſafe to bridle their owne wilfull motions, as if God and Saint Peter (whoſe ſteps they follow not) had euen bent their bowes againſt that Church of Rome. With which contempt the King had the more reaſon to bee incenſed, becauſe the Pope had endeauoured to free Dauid Prince of Wales from his homage made to King Henry, pretending that if it were done by feare or force, it was of no force but vtterlie void. Notwithſtanding the Pope ſeeing the King and State reſolued to the contrary, was deſirous not onely to hold faſt the Kings good-will, but alſo to come into England; to which purpoſe he cauſed his Cardinals to write their perſuaſory letters to the King, as a thing tending much to his ſafety, and to his Kingdomes immortall glory, to enioy the Lord Popes preſence, who did long to ſee the delicacies of Weſtminſter, and the riches of London: but the kings Councel told him, that the Romans rapines and Simonies had enough ſtained Englands purity, though the Pope himſelf came not perſonally to ſpoile & prey vpon the wealth of this Church and Kingdom. The like denyal of entrance he had found both in France and Arragon, it being ſaid, that the Pope was but like a mouſe in a ſacchel, or a ſnake in ones boſome, who did but ill repay their Hoſtes for their lodging, & the infamies of the Popes Court deſerued no other whoſe filth (ſaith our Monk) ſent forth a ſteme & ſtench as hie as the very Clouds. The Pope, though hee could not come himſelfe, yet hee had his pipes & conducts to conuay this ſtench into this land, and the wealth of it backe in lieu thereof. Which was now ſo factoured by his Chaplaine Martin, that certaine of the Peeres commiſerating the inceſſant depredation of the land, tooke order for ſtrict watch at all the Ports in England, that all letters comming dayly from the Pope to picke mens purſes, ſhould be ſtopt. But ſoone after a more generall redreſſe was intended againſt ſo vnmercifull tyranny: the King finding by diligent inquirie in euery Shire that the annuall reuenues here, wherewith the Court of Rome had fraudulently and violently enriched Italians, amounted to threeſcore thouſand Markes, to the great both wonder and anger of the King; which made him now beginne to deteſt the inſatiable greedineſſe of the Court of Rome. Hereupon, for that the Pope had now ſummoned a Generall Councell at Lions, Embaſſadors were thither ſent, there publikelie in the name of the whole Kingdome, both to complaine and craue redreſſe of the Popes too long ſuffered extortions, (which were particularly there rehearſed, and which as being deteſtable to God and man, they would no longer endure;) and to diſauow all ſubiection vniuſtlie pretended from King Iohn, as whereunto both the then Archbiſhoppe openly contradicted, and the Nobles and State neuer conſented nor euer would. The Pope (aſhamed belike to bee ſo taxed in ſo great an aſſembly) is noted to haue ſate long ſilent, not ſo much as lifting vp his eyes from the ground, till at length hee cut off their importunity with this briefe anſwere, that ſo difficult a matter would aske longer deliberation; which vaine delay ſo enraged Earle Bigod, and the reſt of the Kings Agents, that with threats and terrible oaths, they ſware to remedy that themſelues, which the Pope would not. And indeed the Nobles at home had already begunne ſo to doe; hauing commanded Martin (the Popes Agent) to depart out of hand, for if hee ſtayed, hee and all his company ſhould bee cut in peeces; who preſently packing away, (the King alſo wiſhing the Diuell to take him, hauing thus preyed vpon his land) ſo enraged the Pope with tidings of this vſage, that his Holineſſe ſaid; it is high time that we make a quicke end with the Emperour, that ſo we may cruſh theſe petty Kings (meaning the Engliſh and French, who both denied him entrance into their land) who ſpurne againſt vs; for the great Dragon being once cruſhed, thoſe leſſer poore ſnakes will ſoone bee troden vnder.

(71) The Welſh affaires by reaſon of the caſuall death of Fitz-Mathew growing dayly leſſe tractable then other, the King againe prepares to repreſſe their inſolencies in perſon. Before he ſets forward, hee came into London to the Church of Saint Paul, to the intent that before his departure hee might take his leaue of the Citizens in a popular and louing manner. And becauſe neither warre nor want could make him forget his magnificence, and bountie, hee causèd the East-part of the great Church at Westminster to bee taken downe, and by aduise of expert Workmen newly to bee builded and ioyned to the West. The effect of the Kings expedition into Wales was, that after he had fortified the Castle of Gannocke in North-Wales, vpon the passage into Anglesey, and by the Irishmen wasted that fertile Iland, hee was himselfe enforced by sharpenesse of the weather, and for want of victuals to returne about the end of October, hauing taken all courses hee could to serue the Welsh, forbidding the Irish vpon pain of death to bring any reliefe into Wales; and lest that they of Cheshire, or the neighbour parts should giue them any succour, hee so spoiled them of all their prouisions, that they were scarse able to feed themselues; and if the Welsh compelled by famine ventred out of their strengthes or fastnesses, in or about Snowdon, the Garrison Souldiers of Gannocke were ready to intercept and kill them; and on the other side the Lords of Brumfield and Powys, though Welshmen, *held with the King, so that they were miserably straitned. The King pawnd his Iewels to his brother Richard at this iourney for 3000. Markes, which holpe to piece out the charge thereof. Paris hath a long list of great names, which dying about this time, left neither name, nor issue to preserue the memory of their Greatnes; but none so strange as of the Marshals, fiue brethren of them successiuely Earles of Pembroke, and all dying issuelesse; which he attributeth to the iudgement of God, for the iniquity of their Father, and of themselues, who would neuer restore certaine Manours, which their Father in warre-time had taken in Ireland from the Bishoppe of Ferns, an holy Irish man, who often required restitution, and for want thereof, did put them vnder Gods curse and his. *One doth indeed obserue, that the Irish Saints are vindicatiue; but certainely the examples of punishments for Sacrilege, and violent extortions are terrible in holy Scripture; and most fearefull was the sentence it selfe which Gods Prophet pronounced against Ahab for Naboths vineyard; agreeing with the very plague which this yeare fell vpon the house of Marshall.

(72) The Popes furie was now so much inflamed against King Henry and the English, for so disgracing him publikely in the Generall Councell, * that hee vsed lofty threats, if once the Emperour were quelled, to tame England also; and whetted on the French King, to enter on the land, promising him all the helpes of the Church and Papall power. But the iust King, not only refused so vniust an offer, (as hauing no title to England, themselues also knit by kindred, and by truce, their Queenes being sisters, the attempt bloody for Christians, &c.) but further ratified the former truce, and enlarged it with the addition of more yeers, because King Lewis was prepared to make warre against the Infidels, which voyage King Henrie would not hinder, but aduance. And that nothing might disturbe the peacefull life, with which the King of England was most delighted, Dauid Prince of Wales departed out of the vale of the dying, (as Paris eleganly saith) into the vale of the dead. The King seeing all things quiet and safe about him, doth now conuert his whole cares to the reformation of the inward maladies of his dominions, calling the estates of the land together for that purpose. To whom he there deliuered in writing, sundrie * Articles of the greeuances and oppressions of his Kingdome and the Church. 1. that the Pope extorts great Contributions of the Clergy, without the Kings assent, against the rightes and liberties of the Kingdome. 2. that Patrons cannot bestow Church liuings on fit men; but the Pope giues them to his Romans, who can speake no English, (nor celebrate diuine seruice, nor preach, nor keepe hospitalitie, nor care for soules, &c.) but only beggar the Land with carrying away the Coine. 3. that the Popes Promisions and Pensions are vnsufferable. 4. that Englishmen are drawne forth of the Land to end their causes. 5. that the Pope by his non obstante ouerthrowes Oathes, Customs, Charters, Graunts, Statutes, Priuiledges, Rights, &c. whereupon, the King, Bishops, Nobles, Abbots, and Priors, did all write *their seuerall complaints to the Pope, requiring speedie redresse of those infinite wrongs to the King, the Kingdome, the Clergie, the Nobles, and the People, who would rather die, then thus daily endure those oppressions. Notwithstanding sundry Prelates (either out of ambition or feare) vnderhand furthered the Popes desires, when secretly he craued an annuall tallage of the Clergie for maintenance of his Souldiers; and that the State should take no notice thereof, the Pope causèd his Agents to make them* swear not to reueale this their Contribution to any man liuing for the space of halfe a yeere. Yet the King came to the knowledge thereof; and sent forth his writs, forbidding vnder great penaltie that the money should be carried forth of the Land. This the Kings displeasure was much augmented vpon the returne of his messengers from the Councell of Lyons, who related how proudlie the Pope reiected the iust complaints of the State, saying, the King himselfe did Frederize, and holding his People as Schismaticks. Which incensed the King to publish his Proclamation in Euery Citie and Towne, that none of his subiects should dare to contribute any money to the Pope: but it came to no effect, for that some * Popizing Bishops and ambitious Clerks (of his Councell) fearing the Papall threats, where no cause of feare was, drew him to leaue his purpose womanly, which he manfully vndertooke.

* Mat. Paris.

(73) The Bishop of worcester (a principall worker herein) was said to * haue had authoritie from the Pope to interdict the land, which perhaps was it which the King so greatly feared, and which the Monke said, was not worth the fearing. The Earle of Cornwall also with others (who fauoured not the Emperour Fredericks cause) laboured to change the Kings minde, so that the wonted extortions were as current as euer; insomuch that a * Cardinall truely told the Pope, that *England was to the Pope as Balaams Asse, which being so often wronged, spurgalled, and cudgeld, it was no maruaile, if at length shee opened her mouth to complaine: and for themselues and their Romane Court, they were like Ismael, euerie mans hand against them, and theirs against euery man. But if we should so often insist on the relation of this Kingdomes distresses, as the popes endlesse Corrasions from yere to yeere, and the States remedilesse complaints giue vs occasion, wee should but cloy the Reader with rufull matter, which * Monks themselues haue mournefully and copiously endited vnto vs, and set forth the too seruile affections of our owne Ancestors, who still entred new consultations about the disease, but neuer brought the medicine vnto a perfect receipt. For vpon fresh angariations from Rome, the King *againe assembles his State to thinke of redresse, * the common-wealth, as well of Laity as Clergie, being brought to the point of vtter desolation, as the like was neuer heard in any age*, whereof they againe made their lamentable complaint to the King, whose duety it was to protect the land from such wrongs and dangers. Their only remedy was, againe to write letters to the Pope, which slender meanes he could as slightly put off; and though (to stop the clamour for the present) he promised neuer to send any Legats into England, but on entreaty of the State, yet daily did he send his raking Clerks, with the power, though not the Title, and Ensignes of Legates, both into England and Ireland, so to delude the King, and still purloine his Subiects.

(74) The State of the Kingdome still requiring reformation, there assembled againe at London certaine Prelats, Earles and others, at the Kings commandement, where after so much purloyning by others, now the Kings owne errand and affaires was to get money for himselfe. But they (who gaue such way to the Popes collections) were now all close-close-handed, and open mouthed; for, besides their vndutifull vpbrayding the King with some ouersights, they vntruly and seditiously charged him to haue done contrarie to the example of his magnificent Predecessors, in that his chiefe Iustice, Chancellour and Treasurer were of his owne choosing, and not by the Common Councell of the Realme, as they ought. The King inwardly touched herewith, yet seeing no other helpe, promiseth redresse and change for the better. Whereunto they answered; that they would expect a while with patience, and as the King shall carrie himselfe toward them, so will they performe their obeysance to him. So the meeting was adiourned from that Candlemas till Midsommer; at which time also there was nothing done, but all parts rose discontented. The cause of that discontentment was, for that the King, in stead of satisfying their audacious demands, answered them, That they sought to bridle him at their surlie pleasures, proudlie forbidding that in him, which was lawfull for themselues. For that euerie priuate man may vse, what, and whose Counsell he list; euerie master of a familie preferre or remoue what officers in his house he list; which yet they saucily denied vnto him, their Lord and Soueraigne, as if Seruants and Vassals were to rule their Lords; whereas indeed he is no King but a seruant, who must bow at others becke. That therefore he would neither place nor displace either Chancellour, Iusticiar, or Treasurer as they thought good. Neuerthelesse hee required money at their hands, to recouer such forreine lands as concerned him as well as them, to see it done. Hereupon the Parliament brake vp, and the King was left to furnish himselfe otherwise so well as hee could, euen by sale of his Iewels, Plate and other precious stuffe, after a dishonourable manner.

(75) The affaires of Gascoign (which one Guasto de Biard had greatly troubled) by the manhood and wit of Simon Earle of Leicester were now brought into better quiet, which made his presence (being returned, as it seemeth for more supplies, which went againe with him) very acceptable in the Court of England. The King intending to furnish that enterprise afresh against the comming spring time, left no meanes vnthought of, which either by Art or strong entreatie he could vse, to repleniish his exhausted Coffers. In which he embased too much the Royall name and dignity, telling some (and perhaps truely) whose bountie he craued, that it was more almes to ayde him with money, then one that went begging from dore to dore. Meanewhile the king neglects not his administration of Iustice; for, whereas the whole Countie of Hampshire swarmed with felons and murtherous robbers, himselfe so ordered the matter, sitting in person in Winchester Castle, that the infamie and danger of those places were cleared by hanging the Offendors; many of which were very wealthie, and some the kings owne seruants. Walter de Clifford also (a Baron of the Marches of Wales) for enforcing an officer (whom he had otherwise handled badly) to eat the kings writ, waxe and all, ran so farre into the kings displeasure thereby, that while he liued, he was made the lesse able to feed himselfe; paying to the king a very great sum of money, and hardlie escaping without confiscation of his whole patrimonie. The king desirous to be friends with the Citizens of London, to whom of late he had beene ouer-hard, publikely reconciled himselfe vnto them, whom for that cause he had commanded to appeare at Westminster, and there immediatly receiued the badge of the Crosse at the hand of Boniface Archbishop of Canterburie; but whatsoeuer his intention was, it neuer came into action on his part. In the meane time contrarie to his Fore-fathers example, he so much abridged the expences of his house, and his Almes, that he vnderwent some dishonourable imputation. Neuerthelesse he wisely wound himselfe out of many a Merchãts debt; whereto he wrung great helps from the Iewes, (as the ordinary Clippers and defacers of his Coyne,) and the forgers of seales and Charters; from one of whom hee had at times drawne thirtie thousand markes Sterling, besides two hundreth markes in gold.

Thirtie thousand markes wrung from one Iew in a few yeeres.

(76) It seemeth an inseparable qualitie in his nature, to bee extreamly violent, in doing whatsoeuer hee had a mind to doe, and that sometime without the due respect to secular Maiestie; as in the Course hee tooke for aduancing his halfe-brother Æthelmare to the Bishoprick of Winchester. For not contenting himselfe to haue sent his messengers to the Couent by them to worke the election, hee came thither in person, where the Chapter being set in the Cathedrall Church, hee entred, and placing himselfe in the Presidents seat, makes to them a speech in the nature of a Sermon, taking for his Theme those words of Dauid: Iustice and Peace kisse each other. Whereon hee shewed them, That, whereas Iustice belonged to him, and to such as had the rule of Nations, and to the Clergy calmnesse and Peace, both these should that day kisse together, if they elected his brother for their Bishop: For which he gaue them many reasons, but concluded, if they did otherwise, they should feele his Princely displeasure. When therefore they published to the King their Choise, they did it with this reseruation (because Æthelmare was to remaine vnder the title of the Elect of Winchester, for that he was not a Priest) if such an election might stand by law, or lawfull fauour. But the Pope, who meant to make his aduantage hereof, as well as the King, exacted of him for confirmation of the same election, fiue hundreth Markes of Church reuenewes, to be passed ouer vnto the Earle of Burgundits sonne a childe; which makes * the Monke to breake forth into this bitter lamentation; *O Pope, the Chiefe of Fathers, why dost thou suffer thus the Christian world to be defiled? worthily, worthily, therefore art thou * driuen out of thy owne Citie and See, and like a runnagate and another Cham, art inforced to wander vp and downe. ô God, thou God of iust reuenge, when wilt thou draw forth thy sword to imbrue it in the blood of such oppressors?* Though in these vniuersall abuses, the Pope would neither redresse himselfe nor others, yet God raised vp a stout and learned Prelate, Robert Grosteste, Bishop of Lincolne, who vndertooke to reforme the Monks and Friars; but they (who knew Rome was from the beginning* Asylum Latronum) appealed to the Pope. Whereupon the aged Bishop going to his holinesse, tolde him that all offenders escaped, by his opening his bosome to such as brought him bribes; who snapping him vp with angrie Countenance and speech, sent him home with reproach. The Pope was at this time at Lyons, where not long after the Coũcel breaking vp, Cardinal Hugo made *a Sermon of farewell to the Citizens; wherein, amongst other benefites which the Popes lying in their City had brought them, he told them this was a * Principall, that whereas at their comming there were three or foure Whore-houses in the Lyons, now at their departing they left but one, but indeed that reached from the East-Gate of the City to the West.* Whereby wee see, France had some part of the Popes Almes, as well as England.

(77) The King now wholly intent vpon encrease of treasure, neither gaue any rich presents according to the ancient Custome of England, and also shorteneth yet more the allowances of his Household and entertainements, without any regard to Maiestie or rumor. And to spare his owne charge the rather, he inuites himself sometime to this man, and sometime to that, but no where contenting himselfe with his diet & hospitage, vnlesse both he, his Queene & sonne Edward, yea and chiefe fauourites in Court, were presented with great and costly gifts, which they tooke not as of Courtesie, but as due. This was the vnhonourable face of the Kings estate at that time. But in the depth of his wants and rigour of his Patrimonie, he could not shut vp himselfe against the suites and aduancement of his Familiers and Frenchmen, so that it was become a common murmur in England, Our inheritance is conuerted

(78) Another of the Kings Iuſticiars, and a learned Knight, Sir Henry de Bath, (whoſe Lady, becauſe herſelfe was well deſcended, filled him with pride,) was ſo confidently greedy, the better to ſatisfie her ambition, that in one circuit, hee appropriated to himſelfe aboue two hundreth pound lands. Corruption in Iuſtice (which muſt needs be ſuſpected to be there, where exceſſiue wealth is gotten by the Officers of Iuſtice) is but a ſandie ground-worke of a vainely-hoped greatneſſe, and may well bee reputed in the number of crying ſinnes; and this moued a Knight, Sir Philip de Arci, to appeach him before the King, both for vnfaithfulneſſe in his office, and treaſon againſt the King. The King had no hold of himſelfe, after hee was once throughly kindled. Bath knowes it, and therefore writes to his wiues friends to come ſtrong in his defence, that the King ſhould not dare to call him to his triall; yet withall hee ſeekes all ſecret meanes how to appeaſe the King; who vnderſtanding of this combination, was the more enflamed. The Earle of Cornwall his brother could not appeaſe him; no, not though hee knit vp his interceſſions with theſe minatorie words; Wee muſt not forſake Gentlemen in their right, nor in preſeruing the peace of the tottering Kingdome. In March there was holden a Parliament at London; there the King cauſed Bath to bee ſharpely proſecuted. Thither Sir Henry Bath repairs, ſtrongly attended with Knights and Gentlemen of his owne friends, and his wiues, to daunt the edge of Iuſtice, which he deſeruedly feared. The accuſations were many, (for all mē were called to ſay what they could againſt him,) and among all, theſe two, moſt hainous: that he troubled the whole Realme, and ſtirred all the Barons thereof againſt the King, ſo that a generall rebellion was to be feared, (which one of his fellow-Iuſticiars did openly teſtifie:) that hee had for reward diſcharged a conuicted Malefactor out of priſon without puniſhment, in preiudice of the King, and to the perill of his aſſociate Iuſticiars. The King was ſo enraged herewith, that ſeeing no other way to puniſh him, being ſo ſtrongly backed, hee mounted into an higher place then before, and cries out, Whoſoeuer kils Henrie de Bath ſhall be quit of his death, and I here doe acquit him; and preſently departs. Neuertheleſſe, although hee left behind him many men, who would haue readily executed the Kings terrible doome; yet by the wiſdome of Sir Iohn Manſel, (one of the Kings priuate Councellors) they were reſtrained. His wordes are worthy to bee remembred; Gentlemen, and friends, it is not neceſſary for vs to put that preſently in execution which the King hath in his anger commanded. It may bee when his wrath is ouerblowne, hee will bee ſorry hee ſaid it. Moreouer, if any outrage be done to Bath, loe here are his friends who will take all ſorts of reuenge. Sir Henry eſcaping thus from ſo preſent a danger, found meanes vpon promiſe of* money and great mediation of friends, to obtain his peace & ſafety; for at this time, Iuſtice and all things grew ſaleable. mas to Yorke, there eſpouſed, though very young, the Lady Margaret, daughter to King Henry. There were preſent the two Kings in perſon, with a moſt choice multitude of either Nation, the Engliſh being in number aboue a thouſand Knightes, beſide greater States, as Prelates, Earles and Barons, and of the Scots about ſixe hundreth Knights and Gentlemen, all of them well appointed. There was alſo two Queenes, the Mother of the Bride, (who was to be Queene) and the widow or Queen Dowager of Scotland, who for that cauſe was returned out of France, attended vpon in royall manner with many Lords and Gentlemen of France. The Scots were lodged in one place of the City by themſelues. Vpon Chriſtmas day the King of England gaue the order of Knight-hood to the King of Scots, and at the ſame time to twenty others richly apparrelled. Vpon the next day the princely couple were eſpouſed. Take a ſcantling of the cheere and multitude of gueſts by this. The Archbiſhoppe of Yorke, who was Prince (as it were) of the Northerne parts (and the common hoſt of all that moſt noble fellowſhippe, which coſt him about foure thouſand marks) gaue toward that feaſt ſix hundreth fat oxen, all which were ſpent in the firſt generall ſeruice; and whatſoeuer the vaine Stage-play of the world* might afford eyther for pompe or delight, was there all enioyed. More worthy to bee remembred, then that magnificent gluttonie, (the natural vice of theſe our Nations) was the orderly [illegible] no childiſh action of the young Bridegroome, in reconciling Philip Louell (whom King Henry had latelie fined and diſcourted for taking Bribes) to the King his Lord. K. Alexander vndertaking the buſineſſe, and finding a fitte time, preſents himſelfe to the King of England vpon his knees, holding vp his hands, neither would hee riſe, though earneſtly requeſted, but with a geſture which ſeemed to draw teares of ioy and loue from the eyes of ſuch as * ſate round about, proſecuting his intent, ſaith; My Lord King, your Maieſty knowes, that though I my ſelfe am a king, and through your goodneſſe honored with the girdle of Knight-hood, yet that I am withall both a Child, aſwell in age as in knowledge, and alſo an Orphan, my father being dead, and my mother leauing mee, though at your ſending for, ſhe is now pleaſed to bee preſent; therefore from henceforth, and for euer after, I here doe take you, both for Father and Mother, that you may ſupply both their wants, and with your paternall care help & protect all mine inſufficiencies. The King ſcarſe able to refraine from tender teares, or to hold down his throbbings, ſaid no more but onely this one word, Willingly. The princely Child replied thereupon: I will make experiment of that, and know it by proofe; ſeeing you haue graciouſly heard mee hitherto, in trying whether I ſhall reape the effect of my firſt ſuit. Then hee declared his requeſt, and had it; ſo that Louell was afterward Treaſurer.

(80) The State and fidelity of the Gaſcoignes was ſo deſperately ſhaken and plunged by the reuenges which Simon de Montford (to whom the king had giuen the gouernment of their Country for ſixe yeeres,) had exerciſed vpon them, for that they had accuſed him to the King of tyrannous & proditorious dealing, and affirmed, that his name ought rather to bee Sinon then Simon, that but for the vent of their wines, (in which reſpect their ſubiection to England was verie beneficiall to their Common-weale) it was thought they would generally haue reuolted. But the King though readie thus to leeſe Gaſcoigne, would yet needs hope to obtaine Normandie, and his other lands in France without blowes. The King of France (whoſe conſcience was wonderfully tender and ſincere) had indeed written out of Paleſtine to that purpoſe, as thinking King Henries title was better then his owne: but the French, among whom their Kings miſfortunes in the loſſe of Damiata in Ægypt, (which was wholy * aſcribed to the Popes auarice, who for money releaſed thoſe who ſhould haue aided him,) had brought him into leſſe regard then his excellent vertues merited, did vniuerſally and conſtantly refuſe, adding, that before the King of England ſhould haue any more land among them, hee muſt paſſe through a thouſand ſharpe Lances, and a thouſand bloudy Swords when the Lances were burſt. On the other ſide, the King of England was but in little credit with his people: for, whereas (by an agreement betweene the Pope and him,) the Tenths of the Clergie through England during three yeeres ſhould haue beene receiued toward his charges in his pretended iourney to the Holy-Land, yet in a generall aſſembly at Weſtminſter very few were drawne to giue their names to that ſeruice, notwithſtanding that two Biſhops and the Abbot of Weſtminſter laboured in their Sermons all they could to ſtirre the people to that martiall Pilgrimage, and though the King himſelfe in all their view took a moſt ſolemn oth, that within three yeere he would ſet forward; the onlie reaſon of their vnwillingnes growing vpon ſuſpition, that he onely ſought (as the Pope had giuen him example) to draw by this colour the treaſure of the Realme into his hands. This their diffidence of ſinceritie in him, made him the rather incline to foſter and fauour ſtrangers, & that with a kind of peruicacie, though himſelfe by manifold neglects of his word, had worthilie bred that diffidence.

for

(81) The King could more hardlie find followers in ſuch an enterpriſe, for that his people had no conceit of his valour, but ſaid: What reaſon encourageth him, who was neuer trained vp in Martiall diſcipline, nor hath managed an horſe, nor drawn a ſword, nor charged a ſtaffe, nor ſhooke a Target; to hope for a triumph ouer the Sarazens, againſt whom the Chiualrie of France hath miſcarried? or wherefore dreames hee of recouery of more land, who could not keepe that which he had in forraine parts? concluding, that he was a man onely borne to draine their purſes, to empty his own, and to multiplie debts. This was the opinion of men, & behind his backe; but not onely of men, for Iſabel Counteſſe of Arundel, widow of Henry Earle of Arundel, a young Lady receiuing the repulſe at the Kings hands in a matter which ſhee allcadged to be hers in equity, durſt ſay thus to his face: O my Lord King; why doe you turne away from iuſtice? we cannot now obtaine that which is right in your Court; you are placed as a mean between God and vs, but you neither gouerne vs, nor your ſelfe, neither dread you to vexe the Church diuerſly, as it hath not onely felt in preſent, but often heretofore. Moreouer you doubt not manifoldlie to afflict the Nobles of the Kingdome. The King fired at ſo free a ſpeech, with a ſcornefull and angry countenance, anſwered with a loud voice; O my Lady Counteſſe? What? haue the Lords of England, becauſe you haue tongue at will, made a Charter, and hyred you to bee their Orator and Aduocate? whereunto the Counteſſe replied: Not ſo my Lord, for they haue made to mee no Charter, but that Charter which your Father made, and which your ſelfe confirmed, ſwearing to keepe the ſame inuiolably and conſtantly, and often extorting money, vpon promiſe that the Liberties therein contained ſhould be faithfully obſerued, you haue not kept, but without regard to honour or conſcience broken. Therefore are you found to be a manifeſt violator of your faith and oath. For where are the Liberties of England ſo often fairely engroſt in writing? ſo often granted? ſo often bought? I therfore though a woman, and all the naturall loyall people of the Land, appeale againſt you to the Tribunal of the fearefull Iudge, and Heauen and Earth ſhall beare vs witneſſe, that wee are vſed vniuſtly, and God the Lord of reuenges right vs. The King abaſhed at theſe words asked her, if ſhee did not looke to obtaine her ſuite vpon fauour, in regard ſhee was his Kinſwoman? whereunto ſhee anſwered: That ſeeing hee had denied that which the Law gaue, how could ſhee hope to obtain her ſuit by fauour? Therefore (ſaid ſhee) I doe appeale to the preſence of Chriſt, againſt alſo thoſe your Counſellors, who bewitch and dull your iudgement, and draw you out of the path of truth, gaping onely after their own commodity. But the King (ſaith Paris) remained incorrigible, and the Lady loſt both her charges, hopes and trauell.

(82) Thus harſh were the former yeeres to the King and Kingdome: let vs ſee what more gentle or rougher accidents riſe vnto vs in the next. But it then the firſt little better appeares; for the King hauing bought out the time which Simon de Montfort had in the gouernment of Gaſcoigne (which now he giues to Prince Edward) was truely aduertiſed, that Guaſto de Biard was turned Spaniſh, and labored by all the meanes hee could to plucke that part from the Engliſh obedience. Alfonſe K. of Spaine, claimed the ſame by vertue of a Charter made therof by Henry the ſecond, confirmed by Richard and John Kings of England. Simon Earle of Leiceſter thus diſplaced, to let the world ſee that hee would not for any preferment incurre the ſuſpition of diſloialty, refuſed moſt honorable offers, which, (after the death of Lady Blanch, Queene Dowager, and Rectrix of France,) the French Nobility made him, if he would with his counſell and Force helpe to ſuſtaine that Monarchie, while Lewis their king was abſent. In the meane time the king of England (all old matters being buried in obliuion, vpon hope of future amendment) for aduancement of his martiall Pilgrimage had large aides granted him in Parliament; but vpon condition that hee ſhould now at laſt, once for all, ſubmit himſelfe to gouerne by a Law, not at his pleaſure, confirming the Charters of Liberties, againſt the breakers whereof a moſt ſolemne curſe was pronounced by the kings aſſent. The Archbiſhoppe, Biſhoppe, and the reſt of the Prelates pontifically apparelled, pronounced that curſe with Tapers burning, which when they had throwne away vpon the pauement, where they lay extinguiſhed and ſmoking, the King (hauing laid his hand on his breaſt all the while,) ſware to keepe all Liberties vpon pain of that execratory ſentence; as he was a Man, a Chriſtian, a Knight, and a King annointed and crowned. The buſineſſes of Gaſcoigne ſoone after called him to a neerer warre, whether vpon his promiſe made to the Gaſcoigns, he ſet ſaile, leauing his ſonne Prince Edward, and his kingdome to the gouernment of his Brother, the Earle of Cornwall, and the Queene his wife: his arriuall there giuing a light and ſtay to all the affaires therof. Such Holds as held againſt him hee reduced to obedience, but with too faulty a Clemency ſparing moſt open Traitors, whereas if an Engliſhman had offended, he was ſure to ſmart for it, and that rather more then leſſe.

(83) His feare now was, leſt the Gaſcoigns ſhould draw in the Spaniards, and relinquiſh his Soueraignty. To preuent this, hee verie prudently and ſeaſonably ſent Ambaſſadors to Alfonſe King of Spain and Caſtile, to deſire that the Lady Elianor his ſiſter, might be giuen in marriage to Prince Edward. The motion was well approued, and beſides that they brought Letters Patents from the King of Spaine, in which, among all other Clauſes it was contained, that the King of Spaine did quit his claime and whole right, whichby vertue of any Grants from Henry, Richard and Iohn Kings of England, he had, or ought to haue. Hereupon hee ſends both for his Sonne (whom the king of Spaine deſired might be conuaied to him, onely with a noble intent to ſee and doe him honour) and for his wife the Queene. Among other Acts of ſincerity and loue, Alfonſo ſent to the King of England good aduiſe: that, after the example of good Kings and Princes, he ſhould be a Lambe toward his Subiects, and Seruitours, and a Lion to Aliens and Rebels. Simon Earle of Leiceſter with a gallant Troupe of Souldiers offered his ſeruice to the King, who admiring the Earles charity, receiued him with all ioy poſſible: at which reconciliation the Gascoignes who feared him like lightning, were so appalled, that they came droppinglie in, and became good Subiects. That valorous Earle was thereunto moued by that great, free, and noble Prelate, Robert Grosted, called the Maull of the Romans*, as being a great curbe in those dayes of the Popes vngodly courses towards his State of England; against which hee writ a* famous letter to his Holinesse, learnedlie prouing, that his detestable, abhominable, soule-murdering actions, did euince him to be an Heretike, worthy of death, to be Antichrist, and to sit in the Chaire of pestilence, as next to Lucifer himselfe, and that he had no power to excommunicate such as resisted those his actions. With which Catholike Letter, the Pope was besides himselfe for rage, swearing by Saint Peter and Saint Paul, that he could find in his heart to make that doting Prelate a mirrour of confusion to all the world for his sawcinesse. But some wiser Cardinals aduised him from any sharper course against him; telling the Pope that all was true he said of their Courts abuses; that he was holier then any of themselues, and one who had no Peere amongst all other Prelates for sanctity or learning; and therefore it were best to hush the matter, for feare of stirring coales, especially sith it was knowne, that at length there would bee a departure from their Church. This noble Prelate dyed this very yeare, with opinion of a Saint (in despite of the Pope, who would haue had his bones throwne out of the Church) leauing this* Prophetical farewell at his verie last gaspe; that the Church would neuer bee set free from such her Egyptian seruitude, but by the dint of bloudy sword.

Ann. 1254. Prince Edward married the king of Spaines sister.

(84) Soone after the Queenes arriuing in Gascoigne, when all things were rightly prepared, Prince Edward was thence sent into Spaine, where, at the City of Burgos hee married the Lady Eleanor, sister to the King with great honour, hauing first receiued Knight-hood at his hand; which done, hee returnes with his Bride to Burdeaux, from whence they all together came safe through France into England. What treasure this noble young Princesse brought in portion to her husband, wee cannot say; but the King forthwith gaue his sonne Gascoigne, Ireland, Wales, Bristow, Stanford, and Grantham. He had drawne vpon himselfe a debt, in this and other his actions of aboue three hundred thousand Marks; the King of France being not long before returned from the Holy-Land, gaue them both safe-conduct in their passage, and did to him, & his whole noble company all the honor which the wit of man, or the most goodly kingdome of France could afforde. There were at Paris in this entertainment Beatrix the Countesse of Prouince, and foure Queenes her Daughters. The King of England had in his owne Houshold traine, a thousand choice & excellent horse, beside Carriages, Sumpters, and Coursers. Hee was lodged in the Pallace of the olde Temple, being an house almost capable of an Armie, where the next morning hee commanded that all sorts of poore should be relieued with his charity and Almes. The magnificence of the great Feast of the Kings, at the King of England's charge, shall bee expressed in our Authors owne words, who is bold to affirme, that Assuerus, Arthur, Charles the Great, had neuer any such. After dinner, the King sent to the French Lords, and men of Armes, Plate, Buckles of Gold, and other royall presents. The King of England sate at the Table on the right hand of the French King, and the king of Nauarre on the left. But the French King contended much in curtesie to the contrary, till K. Henry obstinately refused saying, the King of France was his Lord, & should be, for there was reason, meaning, because hee held his Lands in France of him. To whom the most iust and gracious King Lewis with a soft voice answered; Would to God euery one had his right without offence, meaning such other lands as the English Crowne had right vnto. At another time he gaue the reason, why the Peeres of France would not consent to the restitution of Normandy, for that the Normans would neuer learne to keepe their Borders in quiet. The English King did to himselfe, and to the English name great honour, in his whole behauiour and carriage, which was full of Charity towards the poore (a vertue for which in those dayes Kings chiefly sought to be commended) of Maiesty, Magnificence, and all sorts of royall liberality and gentlenesse. The King and Court of France brought him an whole daies iourny vpon the way. He staide a while at Boloigne for a wind, but returned safe, hauing peaceably measured a way through France, out of Gascoigne, which his martiall Nephews kings of England trode afterward in another maner, drawing lines of bloud and fire ouer all France, the most pleasant, rich, and spacious realm of Christendome.

(85) Elenor Prince Edwards wife landed at Douer in great State. On the other side, Edmund the Kings second sonne, by a Ring, which the Pope sent (so to ingage King Henry in his warres against Manfredus, the sonne of the late Emperour Fredericke) was solemnly inuested in the kingdom of Sicilie. The Ambassador was a Bishoppe, who forthwith departed, for indeed his errand was in shew glorious, but in truth both delusory and vnprofitable, aswell because the King had already vnreasonably interessed himselfe in this quarrell, (the Pope hauing changed his vow against the Turkes, into this against Christians,) as also, for that the Romane Armie which (by the Popes fetches) warred most at his charge; was (notwithstanding the Popes blessings) vtterly ouerthrown, before this ayrie honour could bee setled in the Lord Edmund, whom yet his Father (whose credulity the Pope for his owne ends had shamefully inueigled, by drawing him into obligations of *two hundreth and fifty thousand pounds) openly tearmed and vsed as the King of Sicily, (for which also he vsed this anexed Seale) highly pleasing himself in the varietie of a wastfull Title to his owne, and his whole Kingdomes extreme impouerishment.*

A.D. 1256. A. reg. 40.

(86) The Calamities of the Kingdome, in these exhaustings, was the more lamentable, because they were countenanced by the King, who should haue repelled them. But the Pope hauing no so easie way to be supplied as by the King, nor the King any but by the People, both Pope and King were well accorded to grinde the people each for the others vses; the King to satisfie the Popes Auarice; the Pope to aduance the Kings Ambition. The gayning of the Kingdome of Sicilie must bee the colour, for which the King was resolued to goe in person; and therefore Rustandus (the Popes Agent) sent to gather the Tenth of all England, Scotland and Ireland, for the Popes vse and the kings, indifferently, had called called a great Councel the former yeere, and adiourned it * till this; where he also required all the Prelates to binde themselues to the Popes marchants, as hauing receiued of them a great sum of money, which was imploied to the vse of their Churches. At which guilefull and vntrue deuise the Prelates replyed they would rather die then suffer such oppression, and that they held it a manifester Martyrdome to die in such a cause, then was the death of Thomas Becket. The Nobles also peremptorily refused either to recouer Sicilie, or to beare the charge thereof, being both impossible; the one for the strength of Manfredus, the other for the present pouertie of England. And indeed soone after the Pope and Manfrede were made friends, and so King Henrie and King Edmund beguiled one of his great expenses, the other of his high hopes. The King was herewith wakened out of a sweete dreame wherein till then he continued, feeding his minde with the hope to leaue to either of his sons a kingdome; though neither so he rested quiet till he had almost throwne the Crowne into the gulphes of irrecouerable debts and vsurie. The yong King of Scots and his Queene, about this time came into England to visite their best friends, the King and Queene of this Kingdome, which lay wholy open to their honor and vses. The King to let his sonne in law see how welcome he was, did bestow vpon him the Earledome of Huntingdon; They and their Queenes with almost all the great Lords and Ladies of England met at Woodstocke by Oxford, from whence they came to London. The King was vnwilling to denie his sonne in law and daughter any thing, for at their earnest suite he pardoned Sir Willi de Lile, Knight Sheriffe of Northamptonshire, who was proued to haue practised by most foule suborned treacherie to spoile another Gentleman of his estate: for which the said Lile had died a shameful, but a worthy death, by drawing and hanging, had not his wiues teares and praiers made the King and Queene of Scots their intercessors. Thus the yong Princes returned into Scotland, worthily well contented.

(87) The King much the fresher to vndergoe serious affaires, by reason of the late comfort he had in his Childe the Queene of Scots, bestirres himselfe, and comes in person into the Exchequer among the Barons therof, when the Court was set, and made sharpe orders against all Sheriffes and Bayliues of Towns incorporate, who did not yeerely appeare at the Eschecquer, to pay such money of the Kings as was come to their handes. At the same time all the Sherifs of England were amerced, because they had not distreined all those which had such estates in land, as the law limiteth to take the order of Knighthood, or pay their fines. Which of the Lords could say now, that the King would not proue a good husband? Howbeit the case of the people seemed nothing relecued, for (saith Paris) there were so many petty Tyrants by the negligence or conniuence of one, that the ancient State of England, when it had many Kings, seemed to be brought in againe.

(88) Occasions of expence like the heads of Hydra daily encreased. The Welsh (oppresst by Geoffrey de Langley an officer vpon the Marches) rose in armes, and ministred one of those occasions, but that Prince Edward, to whom his Father had giuen Wales, was left therein to himselfe, for his Father could spare no money. The Prince therefore borrowes some thousands of markes of his vncle Richard, and with his owne and them wageth Souldiers; his seruants behaued themselues most violētly euery where, taking without paiment, or paying with blowes; and it was the humor also of their young Master, who had store of martiall and stirring fire in his bosome. The Welsh therefore would not for any perswasions be drawne to lay downe weapons, but hauing about ten thousand of their countrey horsemen, and many more on foote, tooke a solemne Oath, that they would stand together for their libertie and ancient lawes, holding it better to die with honour, then to liue a wretched life in shame and seruitude. And indeed they did great things vnder Prince Lewelyn ap Gruffith, by whose meanes they valiantly recouered all the Inland-countrey of Northwales, with other places; and in one fight slew aboue two thousand Englishmen, and draue the rest out of the field. They also spoiled the land to the very * gates of Chester. This they had the greater opportunitie to doe, for that the King, while he built Kingdomes in the Clouds, and plunged himself into the Abysses of Vsury, suffered some few, his sonne, his brother, the Earle of Gloecster, and his halfe-brothers with their families to trample right and reason vnderfoot, and with his hatred to enrich themselues, his owne meanes daily consuming, and mens mindes more and more alienated from him, as men that despaired of redresse and iustice. The Welsh also persisting in their enterprise, made Prince Edward retire in a battaile, and he complaining to his Father, had no other comfort but this: what is that to me? the land is thine of my gift. Put forth thy strengths at first, and get honour in thy youth, that from thenceforth thy enemies may stand in feare of thee. As for me I haue somewhat else to doe.

The high and noble resolution of the Welsh.

(89) The greatest worldly forrein honour that (since Constantine) euer fell vpon anie English subiect, was at this time, in regard both of his birth and riches, deriued and tendred to Richard, Earle of Cornwall, brother to the King, to whom was sent an honorable Ambassage out of Germanie, who, in humble manner declared, that the Princes of the sacred Roman Empire had elected him King of Romans, beseeching him to accept of that their common choise. In testimonie whereof the Archbishop of Colon, high Chancellor of the Empire, Prince Elector, and other great Lords of Almaine had sent their writings vnder seale, affirming, That neuer was anie one with so generall consent and vniuersall good liking elected to that place as he, his name carrying it clearely without anie contradiction among them. Vpon receipt of this most honourable inuitation and offer, there was much debatement in the Chappell where they sate vpon the Earles behalfe, whether he should accept therof or no; but while all of thē stood in doubt the king puts in a deciding voice, saying: Lest my brother be thought faint harted, my opiniō & request is, that he wold not refuse to accept this honor, which God & man haue tēdered vnto him. This made the squadron of the negatiues to giue way, and at leastwise to become Neutrals, till all obiections were answered, as they were all of them by one or other, concluding in their speeches to the Earle; That hee should bee warned, and withall stirred vp to the seruice of God, in acceptance of this highest place, by the example of Robert Curthose Duke of Normandie (eldest sonne of William the first, King of England) to whom the Kingdome of Ierusalem, for the entent to rule the inheritance of Christ, was offred, which he refusing to accept, did afterward feele the grieuous wrath of God, and neuer had happy daies after. To these and many other reasons, the King, his halfe brothers, and speciallie the Elect of Winchester encouraged him with one voice, affirming, that this honour would exalt the English name for euer: The Earle therefore putting on the man with a free and cheerefull voice answered: And I relying vpon the goodnesse of Almightie God, though I am insufficient, & vnworthy, to auoide the note of faintnesse, doe thankefully accept this burthen and honour, which Heauen (I hope) hath put into my hands. And then turning himselfe to the Bishops who were present, among which Richard Bishop of Bangor (from whose mouth our * author wrote those things) was one, hee concluded and said. Let me before I depart out of this Chappell, die, and sodainely be burnt with the fire of Hell, if I doe accept thereof either for ambition, or auarice; but onlie to restore the Empire (which God grant)

(90) In the meane time, while his brothers royall preparations were in hand, the King being for a weekes ſpace at the Abbey of S. Albans, certaine maſters of Oxford brought a great complaint againſt the Biſhop of Lincoln, for ſome encroachments vpon the * ancient liberties of that Vniuerſitie, to whom the King was gratious and aſſigned a day; & Matthew Paris, whom the King in honor of his learned paines, admitted euery day to his table, and Chamber, ſaid to him vpon this Complaint; * My Liege, for Gods loue haue a care of the ſhaken State of the Church. The Vniuerſity of Paris (the Nurſe, and mother of ſo many holy Prelates) is not a little diſquieted. If at the ſame time the Vniuerſity of Oxford ſhould be diſturbed, which is the ſecond Schoole of the Church, yea the fundamental baſe thereof, it is greatly to be feared, leaſt the whole Church do fall to ruine. Whereunto the King made anſwere, God forbid that ſhould happen at all; but chiefely in his daies. Which the Parliament then at hand, he accordinglie prouided for, to their contentation. The memory of the King ſeemes by this to haue beene excellent, for beſide that hee recounted to Paris all the Kings of England which had beene Canonized Saints, all the Princes Electors, and great Princes of Germany and France, he called to minde the names of about two hundreth and fifty Baronies in England.

(91) At this Parliament, (which was exceeding great) holden at London, the King in ſight and view of all the people, brings forth his younger ſonne Edmund attired like an Italian of Apulia, (which Country is a member of the Kingdome of Sicilia) and vſed this ſpeech: Behold here good people, my Sonne Edmund, whom God of his gracious goodneſſe hath called to the excellencie of kingly dignity; how comely and well worthy he is of all your fauors, and how cruell and tyrannicall they are, who at this pinch, would deny him effectuall and timely helpe, both with aduice and money. The ſumme of all was to draw a vaſt contribution from the Clergie for atchieuement of this ſhadow (it prooued no better) into his Coffers. Neuertheleſſe he obtained a grant of aboue fiftie thouſand Marks, vpon couenant that the liberties of the Realme ſhould be really and finally once for euer eſtabliſhed: which was done. There were preſent in this Parliament ſix Archbiſhops, Canterbury, Yorke, Dublin, Colin, Meſſana in Sicilia, and Tarentum in Apulia. The politike Germans knew what they did in chooſing Richard their King, for they ſaw a cloud of gold and ſiluer would diſſolue it ſelfe into ſhowres among them at his arriuall; and all elections of ſtrangers turne to their profit, becauſe none is choſen that relies wholly vpon the rents of the Empire.

The King commends the cauſe of his ſonne Edmund for the kingdome of Sicilia.

Note that by this it appeares Edmund was not deformed as Hen. 4. did afterward alleage.

(92) It was a worthy care in this King, that when by the prouiſion of his brother Richard King of Romans, there arriued in the riuer of Thames fiftie ſaile of German Ships, laden with corne to relieue the great dearth, which then raigned through the Land, he cauſed proclamation to be made, That no Citizen of London ſhould buy any of that corne to ſtore vp, which they were wont to doe, to the intent they might ſell it the dearer afterward, to ſuch as wanted. But no warning, praiers, aduiſes, nor ſenſe of wants were able to make him frugall of his expenſe; whereby he was miſerably ſtreightned, neither would the Laitie in Parliament contribute any thing, but (hammering ſome great attempts in their thoughts) in plaine words concluded, That they neither would, nor could any longer endure ſuch (they called them) extorſions. Moreouer they there vttered many greeuances, and Simon Earle of Leiceſter complained of the diſhonor and iniury done him by William de Valence, calling him Traitor; ſo that againſt the Seſſion to be holden vpon prorogation, he, the Earle of Gloceſter, and Marſhall, confederated themſelues and (pretending the feare of ſtrangers the Kings fauorites,) determined to come ſtrong to Oxford at Saint Barnabas day. They alſo ſent meſſengers to the King of France, praying at leaſt ſo much aſſiſtance, as that he would not hinder the good purpoſe which they held of orordeining and ſeding the troubled eſtate of England. They had alſo taken order to watch the * Ports againſt ſtrangers. Thus they prepared to abate (as it ſeemed) or baniſh the loftineſſe and inſolencie of Poictouines and of other Forteiners, by whom the King was powerfully lead, for they deſpaired of redreſſe at his hands, who like another Proteus (as Paris ſaith) tooke all ſhapes vpon him to ſerue his turnes, and then ſlipt out at his pleaſure, no promiſes, or ties being ſtrong enough to hold him. Theſe were the beginnings of bloody euils, and the ſeede-ſparks of thoſe factious fires which afterward brake forth, from the ſight and ſenſe whereof, many thouſands were taken by death, whoſe mortall ſtroake of peſtilence raged ouer England, ſpecially among the poore through ſcarcity of food.

(93) When the time appointed for the Parliament at Oxford was come, the ſeditious Earles and Barons (with whom * ſundry Biſhops had taken Counſell againſt the King the Lords annointed) repaired thither, and ſternely propounded ſundry trayterous Articles to the King, to which they required his aſſent. The chiefe points were, That the King would vnfainedly keepe and obſerue the Charter of liberties, which he had ſo often granted, and ſworn to maintaine inuiolable; That ſuch a one ſhould be in the place of Chiefe Iuſtitiar who would iudge according to right, without reſpect to poore or rich, &c. Then they renewed their confederacie, ſolemnely ſwearing, That neither for life nor death, nor loue nor hate, they would be drawne to relent in their purpoſe, till they had cleared England (in which themſelues and their Forefathers were borne) from vpſtarts and aliens, and had procured laudable Statutes. Thoſe turbulent Nobles had yet a further plot, then all this; which was firſt broached (ſaith Mat: weſtminſter) by the diſloyall Biſhops, which was, that 24. perſons ſhould there be choſen, to haue the whole adminiſtration of the King and State, and yeerely appointment of all great Officers, reſeruing onely to the King the * higheſt place at meetings and ſalutations of honour in publike places. And becauſe they would not be croſſed in their purpoſes, they * came exquiſitely armed and appointed, that ſo the King and his Aliens ſhould be enforced, if they would not willingly aſſent. To al theſe their ordinations the King and Prince Edward was enforced to ſweare, for feare of perpetuall impriſonment, the traiterous Lords hauing by an Edict, threatned death to all that reſiſted. Whereupon all the Peeres and Prelates tooke their Corporall Oath to be faithfull in this their infidelitie, and made all who would abide in the Kingdome, to ſweare they would ſtand to the tryall of their Peeres: the Archbiſhops and Biſhops ſolemnelie accurſing all that ſhould rebell againſt it. The * Monkes themſelues deteſting this impudent treaſon, aſke with what forehead, eſpeciallie Prelats, durſt thus impaire the Kinglie Maieſtie, expreſſe againſt their ſworne fidelitie to him? This coniuration they ſo proſecuted, that when William de Valence the Kings halfe-brother, denied with Oathes to render vp any Caſtle which was giuen him, the Earle of Leiceſter, and the reſt of the Barons anſwered, they would either haue his Caſtles or his head. This violent proceeding ſo terrified the Poictouines, that ſodeinely they left Oxford, and ſhortly fled into France, where alſo the Barons had made them odious. Hugh Bigod, brother to the Earle Marſhall, was made chiefe Iuſtitiar. The people, ſeemed wholy theirs, which made the Barons ſo rough and peremptory in all their conferences, that when the Lord Henrie ſonne to the King of Almain, refuſed to combine or take their oath, without his Fathers conſent, they roundly bad him know, That if his father himſelfe would not hold with the Baronage of England, he ſhould not haue a furrowre of earth among them. And leaſt anie thing which might tend to their ſecuritie, ſhould ſeeme to be omitted, they vſing the Kings name, commanded London to ſtand vpon her guard, by keeping their Cities gates carefully ſhut, & by maintaining ſtrong watches night by night, vpon pretence of danger to the Realme through the practiſes of ſtrangers; and after they diſpatched thither certaine fit Agents, who in the Guilde-hall made known their commiſſion, which was directly to vnderſtand, whether they would immutably adhere to the Barons and obey their conſtitutions, by manfully aiding and effectually ſupplying them in the common cauſe. Whereunto the Citizens condeſcended, binding themſelues thereunto vnder the publike ſeale of London.

The City of London ioines with the Barons to redreſſe the kingdome.

(94) The Barons did as yet forbeare to declare, what thoſe reformatorie Prouiſions ſhould be, becauſe the Earle of Glouceſter (a principall man among them) was in danger of death; whoſe ſickneſſe did perplex & ſuſpend their proceedings, & the maner of his maladie did put them in doubt of their owne ſafeties, making them grow in diſtruſt of their Cooks, their butlers, and ſewers, for the Earle his body breaking out into puſtules, and his haire, nailes, teeth and ſkinne it ſelfe, falling away, was (as many others, of which ſome died) thought to be poiſoned. But whither they were or no, the Poictouines and ſtrangers had the blame laid vpon them, to make them the more odious to the Commons. But the Earle partly recouered his health in time by the benefit of medicines and diligent attendance. The * poiſons were ſaid to haue beene tempered in the houſe of Elias a Iew afterward baptized. The King himſelfe perhaps would not haue beene ſorry, if that he, Simon Earle of Leiceſter and ſome few others of the Barons had beene with God, for howſoeuer his body was among them, yet his heart was not at quiet, which in this wiſe well appeared. For being in the moneth of Iune vpon the riuer of Thames in his barge, the aier ſodeinly grew darke, and there enſued a terrible ſhower with thunder and lightning, of which the king impatient commands himſelfe to be ſet on land at the next place which was Durham houſe, whereas then, the Earle of Leiceſter lay. The Earle being thereof certified came out to entertaine him, ſaying, Sir why are you afraid? the tempeſt is now paſt: whereunto he anſwered with a ſeuere looke: I feare thunder and lightning aboue meaſure, but by the head of God, I doe more feare thee then all the thunder and lightning of the world. Whereunto the Earle replied: My liege, it is iniurious and incredible, that you ſhould ſtand in feare of me, who haue alwaies beene loyall both to you and your Realme, whereas you ought to feare your enemies, ſuch as deſtroy the Realme and abuſe you with bad Counſels. The Barons therefore remaining firme in their firſt purpoſe, ſend meſſengers abroad to will all ſuch as had beene wronged by the Kings halfe-brothers and other Poictouines and ſtrangers to preſent their greeuances to the Barons, and to proſecute them. Moreouer (becauſe ſundry other petty-tyrants of the Engliſh nation, enconraged by their example, had exceeded their limits, in oppreſſing their inferiours) they procured the King to appoint foure Knights Commiſsioners in euerie ſhire, to enquire of all ſuch iniuries, and certifie the ſame vnder their ſeales within a certaine time limitted.

* Mat. Paris p. 951.

The King feares the Earle of Leiceſter more then thunder and lightning.

Commiſſioners to certifie what oppreſſions in euery Countie.

(95) The Barons in the meane time neglect not their enterprize, at whoſe inſtance (principally of Hugh Bigod the new chiefe Iuſtitiar) Philip Louel the Kings Treaſurer, for abuſes committed in the Kings Forreſts and game about Stony-Stratford, and many Officers of the Exchecquer, were likewiſe remoued, to giue roome to ſuch as the Barons better liked. The Sherifs likewiſe of Shires, their practiſes, and extortions, were diligentlie ſeene into, and it was ordeined, that aswell the giuers as takers of bribes ſhould be ſeuerely puniſht. The welſh ſeeing theſe round proceedings in England, the peace & reflouriſhment whereof they feared, labored for reconciliation but could not then obteine it.

Officers put from their places.

(96) Richard King of Romans, hauing a deſire to ſee the King his brother, and his lands in England, not without a purpoſe to bring an Armie, or ſuch a number of men as might greatly ſtrengthen the King againſt the Barons, as they ſuſpected, was aduertiſed that they prouided for his resistance aswell by land as sea. This made him, his wife, and sonne, to lay aside that purpose, and to arriue in a priuate manner at Douer with a small traine, in which there were onely two Earles, and about nine Knights. The king met him with great congratulation at the Sea side, but nor King, nor hee could bee suffered to enter into Douer Castle, because (forsooth) it was the principall Key of England; for the safegard whereof they openly exacted an Oath of him at Canterburie in this manner. The holy Gospels being laide vpon the Pulpet in the Chapter-house of Canterbury, the Barons reuerently brought in thither the Kings of England and of Almaine; then Richard Earle of Gloucester (for Simon Earle of Leicester was gone with others into France, to deale with the King and States thereof about a perpetuall league) standing in the midst openly, and in humble sort cals Richard King of Romans vnto him, by the name onely of Richard Earle of Cornwall, who obeyed accordingly, to whom hee distinctly ministred the Oath following: Heare all men, that I Richard Earle of Cornwall sweare vpon the holy Gospels, to bee faithfull and forward to reforme with you the Kingdome of England, hitherto by the counsell of wicked men too much deformed. And I will be an effectuall Coadiutor to expell the * Rebels and troubles of the Realme, from out the same. This oath will I obserue vpon paine to forfeit all the lands I haue in England. On the other side (had the King known how to vse it) there fell out such dissention between the Earles of Glouceſter and Leiceſter, that Leiceſter departed from England discontented, saying, he tooke no ioy to liue among men so mutable and deceitfull. Neuertheleſſe such meanes were vsed, that these two chiefe Captaines of the Barons, brake not forth into any farther diuision. Thus whiles the Barons vsing the Kings name, disposed of all things, and Simon de Montfort Earle of Leiceſter, was gone with others to transact with the French about an indissoluble league; the King himselfe through desire not to* be interrupted with forraine matters, if warre should rise at home, or through want of money or better aduise, was induced (if not betrayed) to an act of little honour, though it carried with it the face of profit and setled quiet.

The King not suffered to enter his own Castles.

*Polyd. Vergil. lib. 16.

(97) For (the affaires of the realm thus strangely managed) the King in person sailes ouer into France, there to demand a peaceable restitution of such Signiories as Philip & Lewis (Father of this Lewis) had iniuriously withdrawne from his father King Iohn. The French replied, that no restitution was due for many respects, specially, because the * ancient grant made to Rollo the first Duke of Normandy, was not voluntary, but extorted by feare and force of Armes, in the dayes of the weake state of France. The King hauing * no disposition to recouer his claimes by battell, and destitute of money wherewith to wage an Armie, but principally for that his owne Peeres and people stood on their guard against him, did *vnwillingly ratifie a conclusion; the Articles whereof were, that the King of France should quietly hold the Dukedom of Normandy, and Earledome of Angiou (Main also, Tourain and Poictou) for * three hundreth thousand small pounds of Tourain, and vpon promise to receiue other lands to the yeerely value of twenty thousand pounds. Polydor saith, that the reputed limits of the English Pale in France, were from thenceforth the riuer of Charent in Xanctoing, and the mountaines Pyrenæi; and that hee should peaceably haue Angoumois, Quercy, and Limain, being Countries marching vpon Gascoigne, in lieu of the rest, yet so as the King of England should *hold them of the Crowne of France by homage and fealtie. Vpon these Articles the king acquitted, and for euer renounced all his challenge to Normandy & the other lands, and thenceforth abridged his Stile, and changed his Seale, vsing a Scepter in place of a Sword: whereon these Monkish and mockish verses were written.

(98) The King (at these vnworthy rates) hauing secured himselfe from the French, labours to vindicate the Regall power out of the vsurping Barons hands (whose ouer-toppings at home had driuen him to those forraine indignities,) alleadging, that the Oath which his sonne and hee had taken at Oxford, was voide, in regard it was compulsorie, that the Barons also, who pretended the profite of the Realme, sought onely their owne honour and gain, contrary to their decrees. For his more security * he takes the Tower of London, preparing force by the helpe of his brother King of Romans. There followed a grieuous perturbation of the Realm, although at this time it brake not forth into the extremity, Armes being laid downe for a little space. Edward the Kings eldest sonne would not trauerse the oath he had made at Oxford, but held with the * Barons for the present. The King, the Queene, and his selected friends, still remaine vpon their guard in the Tower; where hee (in the yeere before) had burst vp the locks of the ancient Depositum, or dead stocke of the Crown, to employ against the Barons. was notwithstanding brought about againe by the Queenes speciall diligence; and Douer and Rochester Castles (whither hee went in person) are deliuered vnto him. This makes him resolue to pursue the Barons; the rather also for that the French King (who much condemned the Barons vniust courses) had promised his assistance. Henry therefore thrusts out the Barons Chancellor, & Chiefe Iusticiar, placing Walter Merton & Philip Basset, men of much more loyall affections in their roomes. The Barons hearing of this, hasten in Armes to Winchester, where the King was, who (hauing intelligence by his faithfull Clerk, Sir Iohn Mansel) got back into the Tower of London. The King of France was made Vmpire in the quarrell. The * cause was heard at Amiens, where hee gaue iudgement with the King of England against the Barons, pronouncing all the Statutes and Acts made at Oxford, to bee vtterly void: prouided neuertheless, that the Charter of Liberties which King Iohn had made to the English nation, should in no sort bee thereby infringed. This proviso animated Simon Earle of Leicester, and the Barons, to maintaine all the Statutes of Oxford, (because they were pretendedly founded vpon that Charter) notwithstanding that iust iudgement which King Lewis had giuen. The secret confederacy with Lewelin Prince of Wales, ministred to the Barons no little encouragement; who about this time wasted the Dominions of Prince Edward in the Marches of Wales. This iudgement of the French King did much disaduantage the Barons, of whom diuers being drawne with perswasions, gifts, and promises, reuolted from Simon Montfort. There was now a taking of Townes and Prisoners on all hands. Prince Edward (who now was wholy for his Father in despite of the Barons) takes the Castel of Bristol, and fines the City at a thousand pounds. Simon Montfort executeth his greatest reuenges vpon the Queenes friends which were Aliens, not sparing the Kings. Marching forward, he recouers Glocester Castell, enters Worcester and Bridgenorth; lastly, surpriseth the Ile of Ely, subduing that fastnesse or fenny strength to the Barons vse. Sir Iohn Mansel the Kings Councellour, fearing the euent of things, flies secretly from the Tower where the King was. Henry sonne to the King of Almain, was after this taken by the Barons. Meanewhile Prince Edward fortifies windsor Castle with strangers. Mutuall wearinesse at length begat a desire of peace, and the * King had yeelded that the Statutes of Oxford should stand: but the Queene was vtterly against it, not without cause; for it did enfeeble the arbitration which the French King had made. The Queenes opposition in this point was knowne to the Londoners; which put the baser sort into so lewd a rage, that shee being to shoot the Bridge from the Tower toward windsor, they with durt and stones and villanous words forced her to returne. Prince Edward vnder the conduct of the Bishoppe of Worcester, came from the Castle of Bristol (by reason of quarrell betweene his men of warre and the Burgers) and contrary to his promise entred into Windsor Castle; but afterward going forth to meet Simon Montfort at Kingston vpon Thames, with purpose to offer peace, the said Simon got Windsor Castle, & would not permit him to depart. At London yet in a Parliament, matters were pieced againe, and the Kings side grew stronger dayly.

(99) There were with him his brother King of Romans, his sonne Edward, William de Valence (whom Prince Edward had brought out of France) Iohn Comyn of Scotland with a multitude of valiant Scots, (whose King was Henries sonne in law,) Iohn de Balioll Lord of Galloway, Robert de Brus, &c. with whom hee marcheth from London to Oxford, where the Rendeuou of his friends and forces was appointed. The King meaning to make that place (where his chiefe blow was giuen him) his chiefe seat to consult for remedies, dismissed thence all the Students, by reason of their multitude, * being about 15000 (saith William Rishanger who then liued) of those only whose names were entred into the Matriculation booke, amongst whom being so many young Nobles, the King doubted how they might bee affected to the Barons. Whereupon many of them went to Northampton, where then the Barons were strong; and thither the King comming with his hoast, and breaking in at the Towne-walles vpon Passion Sunday, encountred his enemies, amongst whom the * Students of Oxford had a Banner by themselues aduanced right against the King, and they did more annoy him in the fight, then the rest of the Barons: which the King (who at length preuayled) had vowed sharpely to reuenge, but that his Councellors told him, those Students were the sonnes and kindred of the Great-men of the Land, whom if hee punished, euen the Nobles who now stood for him, would take Armes against him. The King there tooke Simon Montfort the younger, and foureteene other principall Barons and * Knightes Banerets, forty other Knights, besides Esquiers, &c. Encouraged with this successe, hee aduanceth the Standard royall toward Nottingham, burning and wasting the Barons lands whersoeuer hee came. To diuert this tempest, Simon Montfort hasteneth to London, and attemptes the taking of Rochester Castle, which Iohn Earle of Warren defended for the King: who comming to raise the siege, takes Kingston Castle, which belonged to the Earle of Glouncester; then vnexpectedly falling vpon such as maintained the siege of Rochester, while Simon was absent, kils verie many, and scatters the rest. Then seiseth hee the Castle of Tunbridge, and therein the Countesse of Glouncester, whom, notwithstanding he nobly set at large, as professing not to warre against Ladies; from thence the Cloud of power borne vpon the winges of indignation, speedes to Winchelsea, and receiues the Cinque-Portmen to grace, setling at last in Lewis, where himselfe rested in the Priorie, and his sonne in the Castle, whither the Barons sent letters to him, protesting their loyall obseruance to his person, but all hostility to their enemies which were about him.

(100) But the King flaming with desire of reuenge, sets slight by these vowed (but fained) fidelities; and returnes a full defiance as to Traitors, professing that hee takes the wrong of his friends as his owne, and their enemies as his. The King of Almaine, Prince Edward, with other of the Kings chiefe friends, sent their like letters of defiance. The Barons, loath to let it come to the hazardous and vnkind triall of steele, (though they then encamped about sixe miles from Lewis,) not acquitting themselues in this repulse, iterate their message, with an offer to pay to the King thirty thousand pounds, in satisfaction of such hurts as their people had done through the Realme; so as the Statutes of Oxford might stand. The king of Almaine (whose honour they had touched, and spoild part of his inheritances) hindred all harkening to any their offers.

(101) It came to a battel; wherein Simon de Montford commands his traiterous Army to weare white Crosses on breast and backe, to shew they fought for Iustice; great was the effusion of bloud on both parts; chiefly of the Scots vpon the Kings side, & of the Londoners vpon the Earles side; whose Battalion, (lead by the Lord Segraue,) Prince Edward most furiously charged, and had the execution of them for about foure miles, which he pursued the more bloudily, in reuenge of the extreame disgrace which they had offered vpon London Bridge to the Queene his Mother, and after that the Garrison of Tunbridge followes, and slew many at Croydon. But while the Prince spent himself in that reuenge, his Father (who, hauing his Horse slain vnder him, had yeelded himself prisoner to Simon de Montfort) his vncle the king of Romans, and others great Peeres were taken, and the whole hope of that day lost. There fell in all on both sides, about fiue thousand. Prince Edward returning from the slaughter of the Londoners, would

An. 1265. An.reg.49. The Earle of Leiceſter carries the King about till he had gotten all the chiefe ſtrengths of the Realme.

(102) By this aduantage this Kingly Rebell got all the cheif Caſtles of the Kingdõe into his hand, leading his Soueraigne as his Priſoner about the Country (yet with all outward reſpect and honour) the rather to procure a more quiet ſurrender. The King of Romans hee impriſoned in the Tower, Prince Edward and the Lord Henry in Douer. The Earle feeling now his owne greatneſſe, began to be leſſe tractable; neither could the Popes authority interpoſing it ſelfe for the King, preuaile. For as the Pope by Apoſtolike ſentence before had abſolued the King and others from his Oath to the Prouiſions of Oxford, ſo now he ſent his * Cardinall Legate to excommunicate all th· Fauourers of thoſe Acts, & impugners of the King; but theſe men hauing the material ſword to truſt vnto, made no reckning of the Spirituall*, pretending they appealed to the Pope, or to better times, or a generall Councell, or to God himſelfe: ſo great account made theſe croſſed ſouldiers of the Popes curſe. Notwithſtanding the loyall blood of Roger de Mortimer, and many other high ſpirited men of Armes, could not brooke their Kings ſo baſe vſage and dangerous eſtate, but make head, in vaine. For Simon treacherouſly combines himſelfe with Lewelin Prince of Wales, and with their ioint forces takes Hereford Caſtle; thether they remoue Prince Edward from Douer. The loyall band was hereby compelled to capitulate, and deliuer hoſtages. ô the fearefull point, to which England was brought at this preſent, but God (in whoſe protection it was) deliuered it. Simon and the Earle of Gloceſter fall at debate about their Diuidend and ſhares in the ſpoiles, (for what euer they pretended for the Kingdome, their owne greatnes and gaine was the motiue,) and ſomewhat alſo the vnequall altitude of his ſaid partner the Earle of Leiceſter, together with the perill of his Country moued him. Who thereupon confederates, with Roger Mortimer and his aſſociates, to whom not long after, Iohn Earle of Warren, Surrey and Suſſex, and William de Valence Earle of Pembrooke with others are ioyned; and not long after, Prince Edward by eſcape from the Caſtle of Hereford, commeth in ſafetie to Wigmore. There were that laboured to attone the two Earles of Leiceſter and Gloceſter, but offence and indignation had taken too deepe roote. Meanewhile thou, ô Henrie art ſhewed vp and down by the Arch-rebellious Earle of Leiceſter, to countenance thine owne deſtruction.

* Mat. Weſt.

Prince Edward hauing eſcaped, ioines with the Earle of Gloceſter.

The Earles of Leiceſter & Gloceſter fall at debate in a good time.

(103) The Prince therefore ſeeing that he muſt reſolutely ſtand for the liberty of the Realme and of his Father, friends and poſterity, raiſeth an Armie, confederates himſelfe with the people and Counties of Hereford, Worceſter, Shropſhire and Cheſter. Gloceſter hee enters by force, and driues the defendants into the Caſtle, which after yeelds. Simon Montfort with Lewelin Prince of Wales, doe in the meane time ſpoile their enemies lãds in * Mõmouth & Glamorganſhires, the King in perſon, not in ſpirit being preſent. Prince Edward, and the Earle of Gloceſter on the other ſide, ſpeed to the Caſtle of Kenelworth, kept againſt them by Simon, ſonne of the Earle of Leiceſter; there they intercept the Earle of Oxford with about thirteene Knights Bannerets before they could reach the Caſtle, whither they were haſtning. Newes came then that the Earle of Leiceſter was returned with the King in his companie out of Southwales, neere to Worceſter. Thither the Prince aduanceth to fight with him. The Earle hearing of his approach, encampes at Eueſham with his whole power. Vpon the third of Auguſt the noble Edward ſets out of Worceſter, and ſtrikes betweene Simon Montfort and his way to Kenelworth, and the next day turnes backe toward Eueſham; the Earle of Gloceſter with his force, and Roger de Mortimer (as they had agreed) with his battalion, drawing thither by two other waies; ſo that Simon thus ſhut vp and encloſed, muſt either fight or yeeld. They ioine in battaile in a goodly large field before the Towne of Eueſham; where the Earles hoſt being aſſailed on all ſides, was with much ſlaughter (of the Welſh eſpeciallie) vtterly in the end diſtreſſed and diſcomfited. At the houre of his death it thundered and lightned, and ſo great a darkneſſe ſpread the skie that men were amazed. The Earles head, (which was ſent to Worceſter Caſtle to the Ladie Mortimer) his hands, and feet, were chopt off. In this cruell Battaile the King himſelfe (being wounded vnawares with a Iauelin) was almoſt ſlaine. Let vs now behold how this victorie is vſed. The King being thus reſtored to liberty, cals a Parliament at Wincheſter, by authority whereof hee ſeiſeth into his hands the Charters and freedomes of the Citie of London, and of many other Townes for their Rebellion. Thoſe that were taken in the battel are committed to ſafe Cuſtody, and all ſuch as had been vpon the Earls ſide were diſinherited, a ratable diſtribution being made of their eſtates to the Kings well deſeruing friends. Simon and Guy de Montfort, the Earles ſonnes, were chiefe of the attainted; their mother the Counteſſe with all her goods was ſent in ſafetie out of England neuer to returne. Simon the eldeſt brother ſought to preſerue himſelfe, and the remaines of his Fathers misfortunes in the Ile of Axholme.

(104) The King meaning to take all refuge from him, is together with his brother the King of Romans, Ottobon the Popes Legate, (who was lately arriued) and a puiſſant armie, at Northampton, with purpoſe to oppreſſe him by warre. Simon had friends about the King, but the Earle of Gloceſter maligning his reſtitution to full grace, it was concluded (vpon his ſubmiſſion) that he ſhould liue in exile, and for his maintainance receiue onely fiue hundreth marks by the yeere. But the Caſtle of Kenelworth would not yeeld, driuing the King to an halfe yeeres ſiege; who alſo in the end was content to giue the garriſon pardon for life and limme, licenſing it to part with bag and baggage. In the meane while the other outlawes and diſinherited men, made ſundry excurſions out of the Ile of Elie. Temperate men, deſirous to pacifie all theſe euils, would gladly haue had the king to pardon thoſe tranſgreſſions, and reſtore their lands vpon reaſonable fines. This propoſition found a ſowre enemie of Roger Mortimer, who had by the kings gift gotten much of their land; which moued the Earle of Gloceſter (who fauoured the other courſe) to indignation and diſtruſt, ſo that he withdrew himſelfe. Not long after which, hee by his meſſengers beſought the king, to remoue ſtrangers from about him, to ſee that the Statutes of Oxford were obſerued through the kingdome, and to keepe ſuch promiſes as he had made at Eueſham. Otherwiſe the king muſt not marueile, if he did that which himſelfe thought beſt. The Legate Cardinall Ottobon, about the ſame time (to hinder the growth of anie new rebellion) excommunicated the Biſhops of Wincheſter, Worceſter, London and Chicheſter for hauing adhered to Simon Montfort, and alſo declared that the Clergie were to pay their tenths, for ſeuen yeeres next enſuing, to the king. On the other ſide, all the vndone and diſinherited men (except the ſonnes of Simon Montfort and Robert Earle of Derbie) were offered to be put to ranſome, and for certaine fines to be reſtored to their lands; but they required to haue them without redemption, expoſtulating with the king and Legate many greeuances. When words had no better operation, the King and Prince Edward beſiege the Ile of Ely on all ſides. This being known to the Earle of Gloceſter, who (although hee had vnder his ſeale promiſed neuer to take armes againſt the King and Prince, but only in his owne defence) gathers a force force in Wales in fauour of the diſinherited, marcheth vp to London and taketh it, the Citizens fauouring him. Then commands he the Popes Legate, who lodged in the Tower, to yeeld vp the ſame; but he, as taking no knowledge of any ſuch matter, repaired quietly to Pauls, there, by preaching to ſtirre vp people againſt the enemies of Chriſt in the Holy-land. Peace enſued not long after, by mediation of the King of Romanes, and the Noble Lord Philip Baſſet, the Earle binding himſelfe in ten thouſand markes to the King, neuer to moue any tumult. Lewelyn Prince of Wales, who had greatly ſupported the Earle of Leiceſters rebellion, for* thirty two thouſand pounds ſterling was reſtored to foure Cantreds, which the King had taken from him in the warre, and reconciled.

(105) Domeſtick peace now beginning to ſhine in the Engliſh Hemiſphere, Prince Edward his brother, the Lord Edmund, the Earle of Glouceſter with many other Noble men of England, with intent of a more honourable warfare, take the Croſſe vpon them at Northampton, by the deliuery of Ottobon, who not long after returned into Italie. Then was the Kings peace proclaimed through England, al men being vpon paine of death commanded to forbeare to make ſpoiles, or take booties violently, as they of late had been accuſtomed. The Prince, ſeeing the Realme thus acquitted, doth the more willingly (hauing his Fathers conſent) yeeld to goe with Lewis King of France, into the holy land, who, toward his furniture in that voyage, lends him thirty thouſand markes: for aſſurance whereof the Prince morgageth Aquitaine vnto him. But what true ſetled peace may we iudge it, when Iohn de Warren Earle of Surrey the Kings halfe-brother (vpon the increaſe of words betweene them) durſt kill Alan le Louch the chiefe Iuſtice, with his owne hand in Weſtminſter Hall? A plaine and fearefull example of fauorites potencie. That all things yet might not run out of ſquare, the King held a Parliament at Marlborough where the Statutes called of Marlborough were enacted. The old King and his Queene henceforward enioyed the bleſſing of a quiet eſtate at home, with the more leiſure to pray therein for their ſonnes faire ſucceſſe in Paleſtine, whoſe virtues had there raiſed an admiration of him among the Infidels. That quiet neuertheleſſe was a little interrupted by an incendiarie outrage at Norwich, where the Citizens ſet fire on the Priorie Church. The king being kindled with another kind of fire, ſware he would in perſon ſee a reuenge taken; and diſpatching firſt away Sir Thomas Triuet, (before whom a great multitude were found guilty, and condemned to be drawne and hanged) himſelfe, hauing in his company one Biſhop and the Earle of Gloceſter, followed; where beholding the deformed ruines, he could hardly refraine from teares. The Biſhop hauing therefore excommunicated the nocent, and the King condemned the Towne in three thouſand markes, toward the reedification of that Church, as alſo to pay one hundreth pounds for a Cup weighing ten pounds in gold, he purpoſed to returne toward London. This publike act of zeale to religion and Iuſtice, was the laſt which he did, as a King; for now he was come to that, which hee was to enter into as a mortall man: At the Abbey of S. Edmund in Suffolke, he fell greeuouſly ſicke, where while he lay, * he cauſed the Earle of Gloceſter to be ſworne to keepe the Realme for his ſonne; the Prelates, Earles, and Barons of the land, being aſſembled to be preſent at his departure. Therefore after hee had in Chriſtian manner prepared his ſoule, by acknowledging his ſinnes, and receiuing fit ſpirituall conſolations, he rendred vp the ſame to his Redeemer. His will was ſhort, for his Creditors and the Poore ſhared all his goods. The ſpace of time which he reigned, is almoſt an old mans age, and abſolutely the longeſt number of yeeres, that euer any King of England reigned, not excepting Ethelbert the firſt Chriſtian King, if (which is * written by ſome) he reigned fiftie ſixe yeeres, and as manie daies more, as are between the feaſt of Simon & Iude, and * Saint Edmund the Archbiſhop, which are about twentie. A Prince whoſe * deuotion was greater then his diſcretion, as we ſee in his permitting the depredation of himſelfe and his whole kingdome by Papall ouerſwayings, the errour of whoſe Gouernment, concurring with the tumultuous treaſons of his Nobles, did precipitate him into many miſchiefs, out of which yet God almighty did ſtrangelie deliuer him; for if he had not beene diuinely protected, there is no cauſe for a reaſonable man to doubt, but that his end had proued as headlong, as ſome of his own, and his Barons actions ſeemed to threaten. The royall remaines of this happily-dying Prince were with all the due pompe of exequies interred in Weſtminſter, the great and ſumptuous new worke whereof he began, but finiſhed not; the deſcription of whoſe life, being full of diuerticles and abrupt paſſages, as a maze or labyrinth, here at laſt hath found a place of reſt for it ſelfe and vs.

His Wife.

(106) Eleanor the wife of King Henry, was the ſecond of the fiue daughters, of Raymond Earle of Prouince, ſonne of Earle Alfonſe, ſonne of Alfonſe the firſt king of Arragon; her mother was Beatrice, daughter of Thomas Earle of Sauoy, ſiſter of the Earles Amee, and Peter, and the Archbiſhop Boniface of Canterbury. Shee was married to him at Canterbury, Ianuary 24. An. 1236. regn. 20: Crowned at Weſtminſter the 19. of the ſame moneth: was his wife 37. yeere, his widow 19. died a Nun at Almeſbery, the 25. of Iune, in the 20. yeere of her ſons raigne 1291, and was buried in her monaſtery, the 11. of September following.

His Iſſue.

Edward their eldeſt ſonne was borne at Weſtminſter, the 28. day of Iune, the 24. yere of his Fathers Raign; 1239, hee was ſurnamed Longſhancke, of his tall and ſlender body, made knight in Spaine of Alfonſe king of Caſtile, created Earle of Cheſter by his Father, after the Iſſue male extinct of the former Earles, and ſucceeded his Father in the kingdome of England.

(107) Edmund their ſecond ſonne, borne Ian. 26. A. 1245. and of his Fathers raigne, 29. was ſurnamed Crouched-backe, of bowing in his backe, ſay ſome, but more likely of wearing the ſigne of the Croſſe, (anciently called a * Crouch) vpon his backe, which was vſually worne of ſuch as vowed viages to Ieruſalem, as he had done. He was inueſted titulare King of Sicilia and Apulia, and created Earle of Lancaſter, (on whoſe perſon originally the great contention of Lancaſter and Yorke was founded) and hauing of the grant of his Father, the lands of Simon Montfort and Robert Ferrers, (diſinherited in the Barons warres) was by vertue of the ſame graunt Earle of Leiceſter and Derby, and high Steward of England. He had two wiues, the firſt was Auelin, daughter and heire of William Earle of Albemarle, by whom he left no iſſue, the ſecond was Queene Blanch, daughter of Robert Earle of Artoys, (brother of Saint Lewis King of France) widow of Henry of Champaigne, King of Nauarre, and mother of Ioane Queene of France and Nauarre, the wife of Philip the faire. By her he had iſſue three ſons and one daughter. Thomas who after his Father was Earle of Lancaſter, and hauing married Alice, daughter and heire of Henry Lacie Earle of Lincolne, was beheaded at Pomfret without iſſue: Henry Lord of Monmouth, who after his brothers death was Earle of Lancaſter, and father of Henry, the firſt Duke of Lancaſter: Iohn, who died without marriage: and Mary, married to Henry Lord Percie, mother of Henry, the firſt Earle of Northumberland. This Earle Edmund died at Bayon in Gaſcoigne, Iune. 5. An. 1296. and of King Edward his brothers raigne 24. when hee had liued fifty yeere, foure moneths and nineteene daies; whoſe body halfe a yeere after his death, was conuaied into England, and lieth entombed at Weſtminſter on the Northſide of the high Altar, vnder a faire monument of ſtone, with his Portraiture, and the armes of him and others of his houſe, and manie noble houſes of that time.

(108) Richard the third ſonne of King Henry and Queene Elenor, (bearing the name of his vncle Richard, King of Romans Almaign,) deceaſed in his youth, and lieth at Weſtminſter, enterred on the ſouth-ſide of the Quire.

(109) Iohn the fourth ſonne of King Henrie and Queene Eleanor, (bearing the name of King Iohn his grandfather,) deceaſed yong, and at Weſtminſter his bones lie enterred with his brother Richard.

(110) William the fift ſonne of King Henry and Queene Eleanor, is mentioned by Thomas Pickering, (a Prieſt of the monaſtery of Whitby in Yorkeſhire, who liued in the time of King Henrie the ſixt, and wrote a large Genealogie of the Kings of England, and their iſſues,) and that he dying in his childhood, was buried within the new Temple, by Fleete-ſtreete in London.

(111) Henry the ſixt ſonne of King Henry and Queene Eleanour, is alſo reported by the ſame Pickering, to haue died yong, and to be buried at Weſtminſter.

(112) Margaret the eldeſt daughter of King Henry and Queene Eleanor, borne the twentie ſixt yeere of her Fathers raigne. 1241. was the firſt wife of Alexander the third, King of Scotland, married to him at Yorke, An. 1251. by whome ſhee had iſſue, Alexander and Dauid, (who died both before their Father without iſſue,) and Margaret Queene of Norway, wife of King Erike, and mother of Margaret the heire of Scotland, and Norway, that died vnmarried: ſhee was Queene twenty two yeeres, liued thirtie three, deceaſed before her husband, in the twenty third yeere of his Raigne, the firſt of her brother Edwards in England, and was buried at the Abbey of Dunferinling in Scotland.

(113) Beatrice the ſecond daughter of King Henrie, and Queene Eleanor, was borne at Burdeaux in Gaſcoigne, Iune. 25. An. 1242. of her Fathers raigne 27. At the age of eighteene yeeres, ſhee was married to Iohn the firſt Duke of Britaine, (ſonne of Iohn the laſt Earle of the ſame,) and had iſſue by him, Arthur Duke of Britanny, Iohn Earle of Richmont, Peter, and Blanch married to Philip, ſonne of Robert Earle of Artoys; Eleanour a Nunne at Amsbery, and Marie married to Guy Earle of Saint Paul: when ſhee had beene his wife twelue yeeres, and liued thirty yeeres, ſhee deceaſed in Britany, in the firſt yeere of the Raigne of her brother King Edward, and was buried at London, in the Quire of the Grey Fryers within Newgate.

(114) Catherine the third daughter of King Henry and Queene Eleanor, was borne at London, An. 1252. of her fathers raigne 37. Nouemb. 25. being Saint Katherines day, whoſe name was therefore giuen vnto her, at the font, by Boniface Arch-Biſhop of Canterburie, her mothers vncle, who chriſtened her, and was her Godfather. Shee died yong and at Weſtminſter her bones lie enterred, with her brother Richard and Iohn, in the ſpace betweene the Chappels of King Edward and Saint Bennet.

EDVVARD THE FIRST, LORD OF IRELAND, AND DVKE OF AQVITAINE, &c. THE FORTIE-SEVENTH MONARCH OF ENGLAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSVE.

CHAPTER X.

1273. EDward, who followed K. Henry in wearing the Engliſh Crowne, but far out-went him in all regall vertues, was abroad at the time of his fathers death, ſtill purſuing his high deſires for the Holy Warres: wherein what he performed, (being yet but a Prince,) againſt the publike enemies of Chriſtians, it ſhall not bee impertinent to touch, before wee come to his actions as a King; hauing already remembred, with what valour and felicity hee had ſubdued his Fathers domeſticke enemies, ſetled the peace of his Kingdome, and reeſtabliſhed the raines of Soueraignty in his Fathers hands, which thoſe potent Rebels had formerly extorted.

(2) King Lewis of France, whoſe perſwaſions had enflamed this noble-ſpirited Prince to aſſociate him in this glorious quarrell, hauing firſt ſet forth for the enterpriſe, lay now in ſiege of Tunis in Africa; where Prince Edward with all his forces arriuing, the French King (greatly reioycing in his wiſhed preſence,) together with the King of Nauarre, and other Princes of his Army, went forth to meet him, and receiued him in the kiſſe of Peace. This place which they beleaguered, was (as then) not great, yet by reaſon of the ſituation,* it greatly impeached the Chriſtians in their paſſages through thoſe Seas; being built out of the ſcattered ribs, and waſted ruines of that mighty and famous City Carthage, riual once in Maieſty and Ambition with ancient Rome, as contending with her about the Empire of the World. Therefore to ſecure the Mediterranean Seas, it was thought neceſſary to beginne that enterpriſe for Aſia; with this in Africa; but not long after Lewis yeelding vppe his holy Soule to God at the ſiege, and ſickneſſe (by reaſon of the heates in thoſe Regions, for it was Auguſt) raigning ning in the Christian Campe, Charles King of Sicilie, whom Lewis (before his decease) had sent for, to take charge of the whole enterprise, arriues; and after sharpe reenforcement of the siege, (where Edward gaue frequent proofe of his great valour and prudence,) Charles is content to forbeare extremity, (to which the Sarazens were brought) vpon capitulations with them, contrary to Edwards mind, being wholly set to subdue, conuert or root them out.

Prince Edward vnwilling to any truce with the Sarazens.

(3) Yet the points of the treaty & truce (though granted for many yeeres) carried shew of honour, being these: 1. that all Christian Captiues should bee set free without ransome: that in the Cities of that Kingdome, the Christian faith might freely be taught: 3. that all such as were willing, might freely receiue sacred Baptisme: 4. that the Sarazens should repay to the Christian Kings, their charges: 5. that the King of Tunis should remaine tributarie to the King of Sicilie. The siege hereupon was raised, to the griefe and indignation of Edward, who would not (as is reported) partake nor share in any of the treasure, which by reason of the truce was payed by the Sarazens, as accounting it to be wickedly gotten, and contrary to the Tenor of the vow, which for the honour and aduancement of Christian Religion had beene made. The euent also seeming to confirme no lesse; for the wrath of Heauen (saith our * Author) pursued King Charles, brother to the late King Lewis, and finding him out vpon the sea in his returne toward Sicilie, tooke seuere reuenge by terrible weather, aswell vpon him, as almost his whole Army, which perished in the waters, together with the impious treasure brought from Tunis, and all other his furniture of State and Houshold. Which when Prince Edward vnderstood, hee sware by the bloud of our Lord, that though all his Companions in Armes and Countrimen should abandon him, yet hee and Fowin his * Lackey alone would enter into * Ptolomais, and keepe the vow which he had made, whiles soule and body held together. A noble resolution, and as faithfully performed; but not with so smal attendance; for the English hearing his feruent asseueration, promised with one heart to accompanie him, and that (in all likelyhood) the more willinglie, because it is not obserued, that the tempest had any way dānified Edward, or his fellowship. He forthwith therefore sets saile toward Acon, into which hee entred safe not aboue four daies before the City should haue beene yeelded to the Sarazens, from which precipitation these succours out of England withheld it. The Sultan of Babylon, who lay about Acon with a puissant hoast, and had begun to assault the breaches; hearing this, not long after raised his siege, and without the fruition of his desire withdrew to his owne Dominions.

Hee arriueth safe at Acon.

(4) Edward vndoubtedly was not more tall of personage then stout of courage, and vpon trust thereof, doing some things, which perhaps a Prince of his hopes, and fortunes, might with good reason haue forborne. His vndaunted courage against those Infidels may bee gessed by the like against a domesticke Rebell. Among those who were out-lawed for Rebellion & Treason, after the battell of Euesham for partaking with Simon Earle of Leicester, was one Sir Adam Gurdon a Knight of the parts about Winchester, who with certaine his Complices kept out of the way of the Kings officers, but made the Kings high-way betweene Wilton and Farnham, (which by reason of woods and windings was fitte to shelter enemies) very dangerous for such as meant to passe, but doing most mischiefe to the lands and goods of such as were the Kings friends. Edward hearing of this mans singular courage, gets intelligence of a fit time, and comes vpon him with a strong band of followers, but he, nothing terrified, prepares himselfe to fight for his life to the last gaspe. The Prince hereupon commands that none of his men should dare to interrupt their Combat, and forthwith with equall courage exchanged mighty blowes without winning ground each of other. Edward delighted with the bravery of Adams spirit, and proofe of his manhood, had him yeeld, promising him life, and his lands againe; who presently throwing away his weapons, enioyed the full benefite of Prince Edwards promise. The happinesse of that age, wherin Sword and Shield were the ordinary weapons, and afforded much assurance in fight, might somewhat excuse the Prince from the note of temerity, which otherwise, in hazarding his princely person against a priuat Gentleman, hee could hardly haue escaped. But here at Acon hee refused no occasion of putting forth the naturall strengthes of his firme-compacted body, till by the Sultans retreat the most honourable opportunities were subtracted.

Edwards voluntarie single fight with Sir Adam Gurdon.

(5) All this while did that renowned and vertuous Lady, Elenor, wife of Prince Edward, endure with him an inseparable companion of all his fortunes, and was at Acon deliuered of a daughter, baptized there by the name of Ioan. But if God had not better prouided for him, shee was not likely to haue enioyed any longer the deare company of her louing Lord and Husband. Amongst that bloody Sect of Sarazens, called Assassini, who, without feare of torments, vndertake (vpon commaund of their * Superior) the murther of any eminent prince, impugning their irreligion, was one Anzazim, often vsed by the Sarazen Admirall of Ioppe, as a Messenger betweene him and Edward, whom the Admiral pretended exceedingly to honour for his heroicke parts of mind and body. The desperate wretch by this employment getting credite and accesse, vpon his insinuation of certaine secrets to be imparted, Prince Edward commanded all men to voide the Chamber, when looking out of a window, the Assassine sodainly with a poisoned knife giues him three wounds, two in the arme, and one neere the arme-pit; whom Edward presently with his foot threw to the earth, wrung the knife from the Traitour, (not without wounding himselfe in the hand,) and with the hest sel of a Table smote out his braines. Then calling in his people, hee commands that the body of the villaine should bee hanged vp ouer the Cities Wall, and a liue dogge with him. The Admirall hearing of this trayterous attempt, is * said to haue sighed for sorrow, for that hee neuer knew thereof, but meant himselfe to haue become a Christian. But when the Christians vnderstood of this cursed assault vpon the person of so renowned a Prince, they ment in reuenge thereof, to haue forthwith inuaded the Pagans wheresoeuer. But the Prince (whose first care was the safety of Christians) said, I forbid you on the behalfe of God, that none of you yet presume to infest the Pagans Armie, because many of our people are gone to visite the holy Sepulchre, who shall euery one of them bee murthered by the Sarazens, if they shall now sustaine any (though but small) vexation at our hands. The second care was of his wounds, which by reason of the enuenomed blade were feared to be mortall; wherein the Lady Elenor gaue so rare example of coniugall affection, as her immortall memory doth iustly impart glory to that whole Sex. For when no medicine could extract the poison, shee did it with her tongue, licking dayly, while her husband slept, his rankling wounds, whereby they perfectly closed, and yet her selfe receiued no harme; so soueraigne a medicine is a wiues Tongue, annointed with the vertue of lowely affection.

Edward is deliuered of a daughter at Acon.

Prince Edward trayterously wounded by Assassine.

* Cuiusdam Persa.

(6) Thus while Edward abode in forraine parts for the generall seruice of Christianity, against the encreasing Enemies thereof, (contending then to that lamentable Greatnesse, wherein our vnhappie times behold them;) his Father king Henrie dies, and Prince Edward had the defect of his presence supplied by the faith and care of such venerable and noble persons, as his Father left behind him at his death. Therefore Robert Kilwarby Archbishop of Canterbury, Gilbert Earle of Gloucester, with other the chiefe chiefe Prelates and Peeres of the land, assembling together at the New-Temple in London, acknowledged and proclaimed absent Edward for their Soueraigne Liege Lord; and by the assent of his Mother, the Queene Dowager, prouided for the common affaires of the King, and the good estate of the Kingdome. The first newes of his Fathers death were brought vnto him, when after his return from the Holy-Land (which seruice hee was * enforced to forsake, hauing long in vaine expected the promised aids of Christians, and Tartars,) he rested himselfe in Sicilia, with Charles the King thereof; where to the immortall commendation of his pietie, and filiall affection (rare in Princes) it is recorded, that the death of his Sonne and Heire, comming first to his eare, and afterward of the King his Father, hee much more sorrowed his Fathers departure, then his Sonnes: whereat King Charles greatly maruailed, and demanding the reason, had of him this answere; The losse of Sonnes is but light, because they are multiplied euery day: but the death of Parents is irremediable, because they can neuer bee had againe.

(7) Now, whether it were the terrour of such reuenge as followed the captiuation of his valiant Predecessor King Richard, or his owne wiser carriage, or the calmer condition of the times, or all of them together, which secured him in his returne: certaine it is, that hee trauelled in great safety and honour ouer land from Sicilia to Rome, where he was met vpon the way with all the Cardinals, gratulating the honourable successe of his Cheualrie against the Turkes, his safe returne, and new Kingdome. At his instance Pope Gregory * excommunicated the bloudy-handed Guy Montford (because * his person could not easily bee gotten, by reason of his Greatnesse, and power) with all his receiuers, and (vntill amends were made) put their whole Dominions vnder interdict, for that the said Guy, (sonne to Simon, late Earle of Leicester, slain at the battel of Euesham) in reuenge of his Fathers death (*for which he mortally hated all King Henries race,) had most butcherly murthered * Henry of Almaine, King Edwards neere kinsman, vpon his returne toward England, in the raigne of the late King Henry, as hee was deuoutely seruing God in the Church at Viterbo in Italie; which horrible act induceth a * iudicious Author to suspect, that Guy also had a hand in that Assassination on Edward, who had slaine his Father. This Guy being afterward taken by the Admirall of Arragon, to gratifie King Edward, was kept in prison, & the death of Henrie reuenged *with his. From Rome hee iournied through the Cities of Italy, where he was generally entertained with exceeding ioy and honour; and as he was * entring into Sauoy, at the stoope, or descent of the Alpes, very many of the Prelates, and Peeres of England met him, acknowledging their gladnesse for his safety, and their duties to his Soueraignty. In his passage, hee gaue notable proofe of his great proweesse and strength at a Turnament (or rather * battel) against * the Earle of Chabloun, and his Burgundians: for the said Count being a gallant man at Armes, after many blowes with the sword betweene King Edward and him, throwing away his weapon, grasped the King about the gorget, and hung vpon him with the weight of his massie body, in hope to cast him to the earth; but the King, sitting vpright, without any bending, put spurres to his lusty horse, and lifted the Count so hanging about his necke, quite from his Saddle, carrying him away, till hee had forceably shooke him off to the ground, who recouering himselfe, & comming to redeeme his disgrace, had such entertainement, as hee was contented to yeeld. In our effeminate and degenerous age, to omit such an atchiuement of a King of Eng'nd in his owne person, had beene hainous and piaculum. Thus his renowne encreasing with his progresse, hee had magnificent entertainement in France, of Philip the king, to whom (vpon condition to haue such territories restored, as were promised to his Father King Henrie, when he sold Normandie to the French) hee did homage for such Signiories, as he held of the Crown of France.

(8) And as well to shew his owne moderation & princely temperance, (a vertue which makes euery man a King in himselfe, and Kings like to Gods) as also his reuerence to the Crowne of France, whose Homager hee was for his transmarine Dominions, Guasco de Biern, a valiant man of Armes, being in actuall rebellion against K. Edward in his Dutchie of Gascoigne, was admitted to appeale for triall of his pretended causes to the French King, as the superior Lord. Many of King Edwards friends and Counsellours were vtterly aduerse to this fauour; aswell because the said Guasco had drawne the King to no small charge, and labour, as also for that now he was brought by strait siege to such extremities, as that hee could no longer hold out, and himselfe, hauing all that while put his confidence in walles of stone; and the weapons point; there was also little reason to allow him an ordinary ciuill triall of his pretexts for taking arms; and many perhaps, both thought the example preiudicious to King Edward and his Successors, by giuing way to such appeales, and distrusted the iustice of the French Court: Contrary to all which, the king decreed, and it was fortunate with him; for Guasco (not long after) was condemned in France, and sent with * an halter about his necke, to prostrate himselfe to iustice, or mercy at King Edwards feete in England, who pardoned him the forfeiture of life, & (when hee had for certaine yeeres kept him prisoner at Winchester) set him at liberty, and sent him backe to his own, who remained for euer after gratefully firme and loyall.

(9) King Edward (his transmarine affaires thus being setled) arriued in England, where hee was after so long desirings most ioyfully welcome, and there, in the Church of westminster (the magnificent newwork of his deceased Father, who had with great cost, and after aboue fifty yeeres spent therein, almost finished the same) he and his deareſt Elenor were annointed, and crowned by * Robert Kylwarby Archbishop of Canterbury. There were present at this solemnity Queen Elenor the Kings mother, * Alexander King of Scots, the Duke of Britaine, with multitudes of Peeres and others: where (as * one saith) for the more royall celebration of this great feast, and honor of so martiall a King, there were fiue hundreth great Horses let loose, euery one to take them for his own, who could.

(10) The finall abolishment of succession of the Welsh bloud in the Principality, or chiefedom of Wales now ensued: but yet (as great matters vse) not first without some time, and certaine degrees. The originall was this; King Edward hauing sent for Lewelin Prince of Wales to his Coronation, there to doe him homage; he, excusing the same, was againe (for that cause) admonished to repaire to the Kings Parliament at Westminster: whither likewise he forbare to come, pretending it was danger to his person, but * directing his excuse to the Archbishops of Canterburie and Yorke, and their Suffragans, professed his readinesse, if it would please the King, either to send a Commission for taking his Oath, and fealty, (who bare him a deepe displeasure, euer * since Lewelin had put him, being then but Earle of Chester, to the worse) *or else, to appoint some indifferent place, or giue to him for hostages the * Kings sonne, and Robert Earle of Gloceſter, with Robert Burnell the Kings Chancellour*. But King Edward dissembling the arrogancie of the demand for the present, went forward in his Parliament, where the first Statutes, called of Westminster, and among them the Statute of Mortmain were enacted. But after the Parliament, the King repaired to his City of Chester, being very neere to Wales, and Lewelin foreslowed his comming thither also; wherefore the King, resoluing (for deniall

(11) Meanewhile, Lewelines affaires, by the manhood and diligence of *Pain de Camuſijs, and others, who had takẽ Weſt-Wales in, & broght it to the Kings peace, thriuing but poorely, and the ſaide Prince feeling the foundations of his ſafetie beginning manifeſtly to faile, and ſhrinke from vnder him, * ſued for peace, and had it vpon ſuch termes, which in likely-hood were not (as * Polydor Virgil would haue it ſeeme) granted by King Edward, leſt he ſhould leeſe his coſt, and care, by warring againſt bogs and mountaines. In the conditions of Peace (which was procured * with great difficulty) the moſt remarkeable (as carrying the ſhew of a farre greater riches in the poſſeſsion of the welſh, euen at that time, then ſome preiudicated can eaſily beleeue) * were theſe. 1. That the Prince ſhould pay to the King for his peace and goodwill, fifty thouſand pounds ſterling, the * payment whereof, ſhould bee in the Kinges will and grace; that is (as wee conceiue it) how much thereof the Prince ſhould pay or not pay, and when. 2. That the ſaid Prince ſhould haue the Iſle of Angleſey in Fee-farme of the King, to him, and to the lawfull iſſue of his body in generall taile, for fiue thouſand Marks readie money, for * greſſom, or a fine in hand paid, & the yeerly rent of a thouſand Marks. The reſt of the articles (being about eight,) amounted to ſo much as a plain Conqueſt, or diſſolution of the Principality of Wales, after Lewelins death, who was to enioy the ſame, during his time vpon conditions.

This Gentleman for ſome cauſes, * flying into England from his Brother Lewelin, for his faithfull ſeruice to the State of England, was there honoured (contrary to the manner of his Nation) with the order of Knighthood, and receiued alſo, by the bounty of King Edward, for his maintenance, the Caſtle of Denbigh, with lands to the yeerly value of one thouſand pounds, and the Daughter of the Earle of Derby (being then a Widow) to wife: with all which bounty, the King did but entertaine a reuealer of his ſecrets, as * ſome (not improbably) doe affirme. The State of Wales thus compoſed, and the Caſtle of * Aberiſtwith (which ſeemes to bee the ſame, that by * another is ſaid to haue beene built in Weſt-Wales at Lãpader Vaur) being built by King Edward for aſſuring thoſe parts, the King (as he was munificent, and roiall) the more to tie Lewelins faith, gaue vnto him the Lady, of whoſe ſurpriſe at Sea we haue mentioned, to be his conſort, honouring the Nuptials with his owne preſence, and his Queens. And whereas Alexander King of Scots came about the ſame ſeaſon into England to treat with Edward concerning important affaires, and had formerly ſent to the Welſh warres, certaine aides of the Scots, the ſaid Alexander being iealous (on his Countries behalfe) that thoſe aides might bee interpreted, to haue beene ſent vpon duty, obtained letters teſtimoniall from King Edward, declaring that they were not ſent of duty, or in reſpect of ſeruice due.

(13) Though King Edward were thus deſirous to gaine the Welſh-Nation rather by his largeſſe, then puiſſance, hauing ſo honourably vſed Lewelin, hee could not yet retain their hearts; for whether it were (which * ſome, to amoue the note of ingratitude, & turbulency from them, affirme) for that there was partiality vſed by the Engliſh officers in diſtribution of iuſtice vpon the Marches, or (which ſeems to ſome as likely) *for that they aſpired in vaine to their ancient liberty (being miſerably ſeduced with certaine * blind propheſies)* the Welſh betooke themſelues afreſh to Armes: for Dauid himſelfe, whom the King had laden with ſo many benefites and graces, became to them a principall leader, and to giue them full aſſurance of his faſtneſſe to their cauſe (reconciling himſelfe to his brother the Prince) he ſodainely and treacherouſly vpon Palme-Sunday ſeiſed the Caſtle of * Hawardin, ſurpriſing Roger de Clifford, a noble & famous Knight, whom the King had diſpatched into thoſe parts, as Iuſticiar of all Wales, and ſlaying ſuch vnarmed men as offered to reſiſt that violence, whence marching, hee laid ſiege together with the Prince his brother, to the Caſtle of * Rodolan, doing many outrages, and killing all ſuch as they could reach, yea ſom (as it is ſaid) whoſe ranſomes * they had taken, though againſt Lewelins mind. And while King Edward ſpent his Eaſter at the Viſes in Wiltſhire, and afterward viſited the Queene his mother, who liued in the Nunnerie at Ambresberie, the Welſh, vnder diuers Captaines, had taken ſundry of the Kings * ſtrengthes and Caſtles in diuers parts. There are extant the * Copies of certaine grieuances, exhibited to Iohn Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury by the Welſh, at ſuch time as of his owne accord (ſo ſay the ſaid Copies) hee interpoſed himſelfe (without the Kings leaue) to ſettle their quiet; which Articles in ſhew, (for the anſweres of the Engliſh are not ſet downe) containe indeed ſundry great abuſes; but the fate of Wales had now inuolued them all in a deſolating warre, and made them vncapable of reliefe. For after the Archbiſhoppe had trauelled in perſon to the Prince of Wales, being then in * Snowdon, and returned without any Concluſion made, * comming vnto Oxford, hee there ſent out the lightnings of * excommunication againſt him and his ſeduced adherents: Wee ſay ſeduced, becauſe they did capitulate in ſuch ſort, as if they had beene able to make their party good.

(14) But though the old Britiſh Principality was now to expire, yet it muſt bee confeſſed, that as Lewelin had an end vnworthy of his bloud, being rather vnfortunately ſlaine, then otherwiſe, ſo on the other ſide the ſame hapned not without reuenge: for at one encounter in open field, Gilbert Earle of Gloſter loſt William Valence (a yonger Coſen of the Kings) ſlaine in the fight, and foure other Knights, though at the ſame time alſo, many of the welſh left their bodies dead vpon the earth, together with the victory to the Engliſh: but the day certainely which they had of King Edward himſelfe, may not bee forgotten, in which the Welſh ſlew the * Lord William de Audeley, and the Lord Roger Clifford the yonger, and got foureteene Enſignes from the Engliſh Armie, K. Edward being enforced to enter into the Caſtle of Hope for his ſafety. Theſe things, though not contemptible, but rather certaine deceitfull fauours, vſuall when the ruine of a Nation is by God decreed, could not vphold the cauſe. For firſt the Prince, hauing vpon ſome occaſion withdrawne himſelfe with ſome few others from his Army, which then was in the land of Buelth, was ſet vpon by two principall Gentlemen, Iohn Giffard, and Edmund de Mortimar, with their Forces, and there by the hand of one * Adam Francton was runne through with an Horſemans ſtaffe, who at the firſt being vnknowne, had his head ſtrucken afterward off, and preſented to King Edward, at whoſe commandement it was * crowned with Iuie, and ſet vp for a certain time vpon the Tower of London.

end of Lewelin, betrayed by the men of Buelth, who was the laſt Prince of Britaines bloud: and with him (*whom one Verſifier calleth the Captaine, the praiſe, the law, and light of Nations, and another defaceth with as many ignominious attributes) the liberty of that people did alſo die. For it was not long but that King Edward ſubdued in a manner all Wales, & reſeruing to himſelfe the Coaſt-Towns & ſtrengths toward the Sea, diſtributed the In-land Countries to the Lords his followers: therein prudently following the counſell of Auguſtus, who thus vnder pretence of defence for the Prouinces, had the brideling of all their forces at his pleaſure. Neuertheleſſe the whole flame was not as yet extinguiſhed, for Dauid the Princes Brother, and * chiefeſt firebrand in this fatall combuſtion, was at large: who being taken & brought to King Edward at the Caſtle of Ruthlan, could not obtaine admiſſion to his ſight or ſpeech, but was amanded, and ſent Priſoner to Shrewsburie. Thither the King, hauing ſetled the State of Wales, repairing to a Parliament which he had ſummoned, there to bee kept after Michaelmas, cauſed Dauid (hauing firſt had a Legall triall * before certaine Iuſticiars for that cauſe appointed) to bee ſeuerely put to death, by * hanging, heading and quartering, whoſe head was ſet vp at London, and his quarters in foure other principall Cities of England, to the terrour of all ingratefull and diſloyall perſons. The Welſh line thus thruſt from the Principality, King Edward vpon Saint Marks day had a ſonne borne vnto him in Wales at Caernaruon, who alſo was called Edward, and raigned after him; and that with the birth of a new Lord, the welſh might bee inured to new lawes, the King eſtabliſhed (by example of K. Iohn his Grandfather in Ireland) the Engliſh lawes and offices among them.

(16) But the King that hee might not ſeeme forgetfull of his French affaires, repayred into France, where hee obtained ſundry fauours, though they continued not long, and ſate in perſon there with the French King in his Parliament at the City of Paris, as a Lord or Peere of that Realme, in reſpect of ſuch lands as hee had in thoſe parts. Nor may here bee forgotten an Act of ſingular munificence, and charity in this renowned King, for the redemption of Charles Prince of Achaia, ſonne and Heire of Charles King of Sicilia, who had ſome yeers before beene taken in a battell at Sea before Naples, by the Gallies of Sicilia, fighting on the behalfe of the King of Arragon: for whoſe ſpeedier enlargement, K. Edward diſburſed thirty thouſand pounds ſterling, and gaue his owne Knights in hoſtage, till Charles had ſent in his two ſonnes, Robert and Lewis, as pledges to Alfonſe king of Arragon: which done, King Edward returned into Gaſcoigne, and there tooke vpon him the Croſſe, in full purpoſe to finiſh the iourney which once he had vndertaken, and had in part performed againſt the Sarazens.

(17) In the meane time, to purge England (whither hee was now returned) from ſuch corruptions, and oppreſſions, as vnder which it groaned, and not neglecting therein his particular gaine, hee baniſhed the Iewes out of the Realme, confiſcating all their goods, leauing them nothing but money to beare their charges. And whereas they by their cruell vſuries had one way eaten his people to the bones, & his Iuſticiars (like another kind of Iewes) had ruined them with delayes in their ſuites, and enriched themſelues with wicked corruptions, hee (like a father of his Country) put all thoſe from their offices who were found guilty (and they were *almoſt all) and puniſhed them otherwiſe in a grieuous manner, being firſt in open Parliament conuicted. The particulars whereof, by reaſon of the moſt iuſt and commendable example, we will not thinke needleſſe (the order of naming them only changed) to recapitulate here. Sir Ralph Hengham, Chief Iuſtice of the higher Bench, 7000. marks.

At which time the King conſtrained all his Iuſtices to ſweare, that from thenceforth they would take no penſion fee or gift of any man, except only a breakfaſt, or the like preſent. O diuine and ſtill neceſſary ſeuerity, onely able to breake the pernicious combination of men that vnder the profeſſion of law & offices of Iuſtice make merchandize of honor, iuſtice, law, and conſcience, which cannot in the end but bring forth ruine, and confuſion.

(18) That tempeſt now, which * Thomas Erſilton, a Scottiſh Rimer, is ſaid to haue obſcurely prophecied, alluding to the troubles of Scotland by reaſon of King Alexanders death; hapned about theſe times; which raiſed ſo great, and bloody contentions, that it had almoſt blowne vp the regalitie of that kingdome by the very rootes. For when, by the violent fall from his horſe, King Alexander had moſt vnfortunately loſt his life, that Realme was wofully deſtitute of any apparent heire, ſundry perſons ſtãding in competition for the ſame. Theſe things were thought to be foreſhewed from heauen by many * fearefull preſages, as extraordinary Meteors, Flouds, Fires, and Peſtilence. But King Edward intending to ſway that affaire, and being vpon his way toward the borders, the death of his royall conſort, and Queene, which he lamented while himſelfe did liue, called him backe to the celebration of her funerals: as her excellent virtues did well deſerue: To our Nation ſhee was a louing mother, & (ſaith * one) the Column, and pillar (as it were) of the whole Realme. (20) The names of the Competitors were these, according to Walsingham: Erick, King of Norway, who appeared by his Attorneys; Florence, Earle of Holland; Robert le Brus, Lord of Annandale; Iohn de Baliol, Lord of Galway; Iohn de Hastings, Lord of Abergeuenny; Iohn Comin, Lord of Badenaw; Patrick de Dunbar, Earle of March; Iohn de Vesci, on his Fathers behalfe; Nicholas de Sules; William de Rosse. These all peaceably submitted themselues, for so much as concerned their seuerall titles to the Scottish Crowne, to the finall award and arbitration of King Edward, passing thereof an authentick Instrument vnto him; who hauing giuen caution to restore the realme of Scotland, (within a certaine prefixed time,) to that party to whom the Crowne thereof should be adiudged, had seisin deliuered to him, the better to put the sentence in execution, or (say the writers of that nation) they giuing him power to constraine the parties to stand to this sentence. The whole carriage of which weighty businesse, being so diuersly related and censured by the writers of both nations, (though for the present it be not material, both Kingdoms now blessedly acknowledging one absolute Superiour) wee will so trace the steps of truth in a middle way, as resoluing neither to impeach the action of that glorious vmpier, nor preiudicate the right of our noble sister nation. The State of Scotland now was not without manifest perill; for the Scots * denying that their Kingdome was in anie point subalterne to the Crowne of England, and King Edward either perswaded that it was so, or resoluing and plotting now to make it so, would not neglect the aduantage of this * Akephalisis or want of a known head in Scotland.

(21) Vpon full ventilation therefore and scanning of all rights, the maine doubt rested vpon Lord Brus and Baliol, for the residue might seeme rather to affect the honour of hauing pretended title in blood to a Diademe, then to haue colour to contend with either of them. Great was the aduise, and deliberation (as there was cause) which King Edward tooke therein, for not trusting to his owne iudgement, hee caused (saith * Hector Boetius) twelue of the best Clerks or learned men of Scotland, and twelue of England to concurre as Assessors with him in that great decision.

A. D. 1293.

(22) While this weighty cause was in debatement; there fell out deadlie strife betweene the English and Normans, occasioned by one of them casually slaine by the English; which mischiefe the King of France forwardly nourisht, as thirsting for the dutchy of Gascoigne, which best he might attain by troubling the forreine affaires of King Edward, whom they saw now entangled at home in so weighty emploiments. Whereupon the Normans slew sundry of the English, and hung vp one vpon the mast of a Shippe, whom they had taken at Sea: but, ere long after, threescore English ships encountring with two hundreth saile of Normans, laden with wines, after a most bloody batel (wherein many * thousands of the French were slaine) tooke, with their whole fleete, their full reuenge, and brought them into England.

(23) At last yet King Edward returning to Berwicke, hauing with him the said twenty foure Assessors, as it were a iury of either nation, * and, with the good will and assent of the Scottish Lords, gaue solemne iudgement with Baliol, as being descended of the eldest daughter of Dauid, Earle of Huntington, a yonger sonne of Scotland; whose issue (the line of the elder brother being extinct) was to inherite, without question. But the strife being betweene the descendents of the said Dauid, of which the Lord Robert Bruce was also a principall, reasons of importance were produced, which drew many mens iudgements, to incline to him, as hauing a neerer interest to that Crowne. But according to the sentence, Baliol was solemnly crowned King of Scotland vpon S. Andrews day, and, in Christmas following, repaired to King Edward, at Newcastle vpon Tyne, and * there (against the minds of many Scots) did homage vnto him for the whole Kingdome of Scotland.

(24) Meanetime the French King pursued the reuenge of the Normans, demanding restitution, and citing King Edward iudicially to appeare to answere such wrongs, as were done in Aquitaine: who, (desirous to settle his owne affaires at home, or, as some write, * eager vpon a match for himselfe in France) while he discouered either his vnwillingnes to appeare in that kind, or to warre, suffered himselfe by a French deuise, to be meerely deceiued, and put out of his possession of Gascoigne, to the great mischeife, and disaduantage of the English: whereupon K. Edward highly incensed, called a Parliament at London, where Iohn king of Scotland was present; and had the full consent of the whole Realme, to regaine that honestlie by the sword which was craftilie gotten away by a cunning trick, * renouncing to the French his homage for Aquitain. Wales also was at the same time full of troubles; but the fires of rebellion, there rashly kindled, were, not long after, quencht with the blood of the Actors, and thousands of their Complices.

(25) Baliol hauing thus obtained the Crowne of Scotland, and finding his party, by the homage which he had made to King Edward, much empaired among the Scots, who greatly repined thereat; for regaining their loues, * attempted a secret combination with the French against the English; which Edward ignorant of, and * requiring him by vertue of his homage to aid him with all his powers against the King of France, * discouered (by Baliols delaies, and trauerses) the said conspiracie. Whereupon he aduanced forward against the Scots with a puissant armie to Newcastle vpon Tyne: The first blood which was drawne was of the English, of whom, the Scots * slew almost one thousand in a village vnder the leading of one Robert de Ros, who had fled from King Edward: The City of Carlile likewise was assaulted, and the County of Cumberland spoiled by seuen Earles of Scotland, and their companies, which to Edward was not greatly displeasing, (as was said) for that the first hostile acts were done by them, whom he had a full purpose to subdue, that at last he might bee sole in Albion; which, had not God reserued for other times, we might wonder he effected not.

(26) King Edward therefore presented himselfe before the strong Towne of Berwick with a mighty host, there to auspicate his entrance to a conquest of Scotland; and, after summons sent to the Towne, abode one whole day, without offer of violence: The Townesmen refusing to render, had a victory of the English Marriners, who rashly entring, with twentie and foure Ships into the harbour, were repelled with the losse of foure of their vessels, which was soone reuenged by the forceable taking of Berwick, where * Hector Boetius saith, there was exercised great cruelty by the English. In the Towne, the Flemish Merchants (who were smothered by the English with fire) had a very strong house in the maner of a Tower, from whence they leueld, at the entring of the English, with darts, and iauelins, one of which casually slew Richard of Cornewal, a gallant Gentleman brother to the Earle of Cornwal, which, in an army heated with former contumelies, for the Scots vpon the slaughter and repulse which they had made of the English marriners, published certaine rimes in derision, as together with the remembrance of many fresh shrewd turnes, might stirre vp bloody effects. After the Towne was thus taken, the Castle after stood not long out, but rendred it selfe. * Sir William Douglas, captaine therof, was detained prisoner, and (as * some write) Sir Robert Bruce: others were suffered to depart, vpon oath, to beare no armes from thenceforth against the King of England. The losse of this important Towne, and Castle was very great, for it was the key, and common Bulwarke of Scotland.

Berwick taken by king Edward

(27) While the Englisth, at this place, were busie to cast a very deepe ditch, to hinder the sodeine inroades of their enemies, Iohn King of Scotland sent two religious men to the King of England with * letters; in which, alledging that he was by Oath bound to defend his owne kingdome, and people, he renounced his homage, and fealtie, as extorted by violence, and void in it selfe, being made without assent of the three estates of his Realme. The resignation was admitted, King Edward commanding his Chancellor to record the same for perpetuall memorie, as a iustification of his proceedings.

(28) The Scots hereupon, vnder the conduct of the Earles of Bucquhan, Menteth, Strathern, Ros, Athol, Marr, and other of their nobility, made an incursion into England, whence with the spoiles of two religious houses, and other booties they returned: But Patrick Earle of Dunbarre came to King Edward submitting himselfe; and the Castle of Dunbarre (by this submission being vnder King Edwards protection) was regained by Scots: For recouerie, or surregaining whereof, the King sent Iohn Earle of Surrey, and Sussex, and William Earle of warwick, who were entertained with battel by the Scottish nation, of whom the Englisth, *after cruell fight, obtained a victory of great importance, the chase holding about eight miles, in which the slaughter was not small. The siege of Dunbarre being reinforced. King Edward had it yeelded vnto him, at his comming, wherein were taken three Earles, sixe or seuen Barons, besides many knights, and Esquires, which were all sent prisoners to diuerse Castles of England, and (if some say true) not put to the sword (as Hector transported perhaps with hatred to Edward writes) contrary to his word, and faith giuen.

(29) King Edward knowing as well how to vse a victorie, as to get it, hauing a present spirit vpon all aduantages, and turnes of fortune, takes the Castle of Rocksbrough, and (for a finall end to this affaire) marcheth to Edenburgh it selfe (the chiefe Towne of Scotland) which * was shortly rendred: Then tooke they Striueling also, and draue Baliol to the * Castle of Forfar: where Iohn Comin Lord of Strabogie submitted himselfe to King Edward. About this time there came to the Englisth campe great numbers of Welsh souldiers, with whom he releeued many of the Englisth footemen, tyred with seruice, sending them backe into England. Thither also came the Earles of Vlster with bands of Irish.

(30) The King of England prospering thus, passeth with his army ouer the * Scottish Sea, where while he kept the feast of Saint Iohn Baptist * at Perth (or Saint Iohns Towne) there came messengers from Baliol, and the Lords his factors, to sue for mercy, which was granted vpon condition, that they should render themselues to him as his subiects. * Hector Boetius saith, that after this agreement (wherein * Anthonie Bishop of Durham was vsed) Iohn Comin brought Baliol, void of all kingly habiliments with a white rod in his hand, to the Englisth campe at Montros, where he resigned his whole right that he either had, or might haue to the Crowne of Scotland, into king Edwards hands, and made thereof a formall Charter in French, and at the same time also (for feare of life) gaue his sonne Edward for hostage, and assurance of his fealtie; by which final disclaime, the Lord Bruces right might seeme now vnquestionable. But this resignation being thus made, king Edward returnes to Berwick, where * all the Nobles of Scotland (at a Parliament there holden) were sworne to be loyall, and true subiects to king Edward for euer after: and * hereof a solemne instrument was sealed by the said Lords (of whom Iohn Comin of Badenaw was first) bearing date at Berwick in the twentie fifth yeere of the reigne of their Souereigne Lord King Edward.

(31) Iohn the late King, was sent to the Tower of London, and there was honourably attended, hauing liberty for twenty miles about. The Scottish Lords were confined within Trent, ouer which Riuer they might not passe toward Scotland, vpon paine of life: The custody of Scotland was committed to Iohn de Warrenn, Earle of Surrey and Sussex, and the Treasurershippe thereof to Hugh de Cressingham; but William de Ormesby was ordained Iusticiar, with this particular commandement, that hee should take the homages and fealties of all such as held lands of the King. And the more to shew his purpose, vtterly to dissolue the distinct Regality of Scotland, and to vnite it to the Englisth Monarchie, as hee had done Wales, hee tooke out of Edinbrough the Crowne, Scepter and Cloath of Estate, offering them vp at * Saint Edwards shrine in Westminster, if the Author mistake not, for at Saint Thomas at Canterbury, * hee offered vp Baliols Crowne saith another; and (besides many other Acts tending to the abolishment of the Scottish Name, which * Hector relates, as the burning their Records, abrogating their lawes, altering their forms of diuine seruice, and transplanting all their learnedst men thence vnto his Vniuersity of Oxford,) hee tooke out of the * Abbey of Scone the * Marble Chaire, in which the Kings of Scotland were wont to bee crowned, and sent the same to Westminster, for Priests to sit therein at Celebration. This Chaire is the same vpon which was engrauen, the famous Prophetical Distichon:

Ni fallat fatum, Scoti quocunque locatum
Inuenient lapidem, regnare tenentur ibidem,

If Fates goe right, where ere this stone is pight,
The Regall race of Scots shall rule that place.

Which by whomsoeuer it was written, we who now liue, finde it happily accomplished. But these great Acts of this yeere brought to the Commons of England small commodity, vpon whom the charge of the warres lay heauily, and it is not often found, that the people gaine much by their Princes Conquests.

(32) The force of Scotland with a greater force being thus for the present broken, who would suppose, that it could once again haue lifted vp the head, and that chiefly by the particular vertue of a priuate man, as it after hapned? which hee had the more opportunity to doe, for that the King of England was diuersly diuerted by occasion of warres in Gascoigne for recouery of his owne, and for aid of his friends in Flanders, whom the French did afflict in hostile manner. The Captaine of the reuolted troupes in Scotland, was one William Wallace (the sonne of * Sir Andrew Wallace of Cragie Knight, though some * vpon heare say, write contemptibly of his course of life, as of a publike robber) who, by the assistance of such as were outlawed, for refusing to doe their homage to King Edward, draue William de Ormesby (the Kings Iusticiar) out of Scotland. Which King Edward hearing, discharged Iohn Comin of Badenaw, and the Earle of Bucquhan from their confinement, to the entent, that hee might by their endeuours, the sooner settle matters, but withall hee gaue Iohn de Warren Earle of Surrey commission to leuie an Army: and the king (loath to bee hindred from his other destinations) easily yeelded to such requests as were propounded on the Scots behalfe for that time. The voyage which hee had then in hand, was to transport from Winchelsea an Armie, to assist the Earle of Flanders his confederate.

(33) England at this time was not without great discontentments, which Humphrey de Bohun Earle of Hereford and Essex Constable of England, and Roger Bigot Earle of Norfolke, Marshall of England, did countenance; for present satisfaction whereof, the King yeelded (among other things) to confirme "Magna Charta, and Charta de Foresta, and that "there should no Subsidie nor taxation bee leuied vpon "the people, without the consent of the Prelates, Peeres, "and people. But before this time, and while the King was absent out of the land, the Scots vnder the leading of William Wallace, put to * flight, the Earle Warren and all the Englisth Forces which were with him, him, taking them at aduantage, as they were passing ouer a narrow Bridge, neare vnto the Castle of Strivelin: the slaughter of the English was not smal. There Hugh de Cressingham Treasurer of Scotland for King Edward, fell in battell, whose dead body for speciall hatred borne vnto him, the Scots did flea, diuiding his skinne among them. The King hearing of this ouerthrow, commands the Lordes of England by his letters to bee ready to assist the said Earle VVarren (his Custos or Guardian of Scotland) with their Forces, in the Octaues of S. Hilary at Yorke, and also to proclaime such of the Scottish Lords as came not thither, enemies of the State; but they kept themselues within Scotland, and came not. Whereupon the English Captains marched to the rescue of the Castle of Rocksbrough, whence VVilliam VVallace fled vpon notice of their approach to raise his siege. But King Edward (aduertised of these accidents) hauing taken a truce for two yeeres with the King of France, by mediation of Bonifacius the Pope, who interposed himselfe (non tanquam Iudex, sed amicabilis Compositor, saith VValsingham, not as a Iudge, but as a friendly Composer, made hast into England, where his presence was extremely wanting: but in his way home, at a Towne called * Ardeburg, all the Scots almost, which hee had brought with him to serue in the Flemish warres, forsooke him, and went to Paris.

* Tho.Wals.

(34) After his arriuall in England, hee summoned a Parliament at Yorke, giuing the Scots a day to appeare thereat; which they not doing, nor acknowledging that they ought to doe, hee entred with a mightie Army into their Country, his Nauy laden with victuals coasting along; which by contrary winds being holden off for a time, put the Scots the rather in hope of victory, by reason of the scarsity of prouisions among the English; but three dayes before the Scots appeared, the shippes came, and plentifully refresht the fainting souldiers. Hereupon the king led forward his people, and vpon the next morning, a terrible showt being heard from the Scottish host, the English ranne to armes; but the kings horse (affrighted with the sodaine tumultuous noise) as hee was putting foote in stirrup, threw him to the earth, and striking with the hinder heeles, brake two of his ribs; who neuertheless vpon the same horse proceeded in person to the battell. VVillam VVallace, who had wonne to himselfe, by many his hardy enterprises a singular opinion among the Peeres, and people, hauing set his Scots in array (whose numbers far exceeded the English) vsed euery where this short speech vnto them in stead of Orations, I haue brought you to the King, hop gif yee kun. For their more security, hee had * fixed betweene them and the English, certaine Pales or stakes, bound together with ropes, which the English Vauntguard brake downe, and came to strokes. The first which fled, were the Scottish Horsemen, leauing their Infanterie, or battels of foote, open to that great destruction which followed, the victory resting clearely to the English.

*Tho Walsingh. The bloudy ouerthrow at Fawkirke.

(35) Our Scottish * Author writes, that by reason of emulation against VVallace, the Scots burning in mutuall hatred, made the enterprise easie to their enemies; which as it may bee verie true, so certainely there was scarse anie battell betweene the two Nations, in which more Scottish bloud was spilt then in this, for thereof * Sebastian Munster seemes to meane, saying, that there were slaine threescore and ten thousand, which though wee take not to bee the true number, (for some haue * threescore thousand, * others not so many) yet shewes it that the slaughter was vast, as it could not otherwise bee, the Scottish footmen valiantly * fighting as it were to the last man. Bloud "worthy to haue beene shed on both sides, against another "kind of enemy, then Christians, the deformity of which "effusions may iustly represent to vs the blessed estate of "our now setled vnion. This victory was obtained by the English vpon Saint Mary Magdalens day, at a place called Fawkirke: from which VVilliam Wallace, opening his way with his Sword escaped. The Welshmen deserued ill of the King at this iourney, for that they foreslowed to charge vpon the Pallisado, or fence of the Scots, in hope (the English being vanquished, which by the inequality of their numbers, they presumed would happen) that themselues might ioyntlie with the Scots, execute vpon King Edward the hatred, which they bare him for the * euils hee had brought vpon their nation. After this victory the King tooke sundry places, and returned into England by Carlile.

*Tho.Wal.

(36) The two yeeres truce formerly taken betweene the English and French, was now, by the interceding of Boniface Bishoppe of Rome, turned to a setled peace, who (among other things) brought it about, that K. Edward should marry the French kings sister Margaret, and Edward the kings sonne, the same kings daughter, though (saith Walsingham) hee aduanced not the good of his Realme by this match in any point. To this affinity were added the greater strengthes of a domesticke quiet, for the king (whom wars had together made renowned, & aged) graciously & wisely yeelded to confirm such grants of laws and liberties, as the Earles and Barons (the pretended Conseruators of the Peoples intereest,) did declare, were by his promise to bee confirmed to them at his returne from Scotland: and which hee accordingly did, in a Parliament holden at London, vpon prorogation, in Quindena Paschæ, where for their fuller satisfaction hee * left out this Clause in the end, Saluo iure corona nostræ, sauing the right of our Crowne: and what at this time was wanting, he made vp afterward in a Parliament at Stamford.

A.D. 1

*Tho.Wal.

(37) But that he might not seeme willing to deny the Pope any iust request, or not to know the sweetnesse of an others freedome, he deliuered to the hands of the Popes Nuntios, Iohn the late King of Scotland, (vpon their assuming for King Edwards indemnity,) whom they conueied to his inheritance in France, where (vpon euery side vnfortunate) he remained as vnder the note of a false seducer, and of a periur'd person in king Edwards iudgement, and without anie part of his regall office ouer the Scottish nation; who found that the peace which King Edward made in other places, did but turne to their more grieuous affliction; for albeit they had gotten Strivelyn by surrender of the English, and began with an immortall desire of their ancient Liberty, to assemble again vnder William Wallace, yet the time was not come of their deliuerance; for King Edward (according as it was formerly appointed,) hauing accomplished his marriage with the French Kings sister at Canterbury, made it his whole affaire, to finish the annexation of Scotland to the Crowne of England.

The Rebel Liberty.

(38) He therefore accompanied with his sonne, and a dreadfull Army, pursued the matter so close, that whereas the Scots had gotten together againe in exceeding great numbers, vnder their seuerall Captaines, (whose * Enuie had caused Wallace to giue vp all such authority, as the commonwealth of Scotland had formerly granted vnto him, for preseruation of their freedomes,) and flying before King Edward, whose fortune in warre had worthily made him terrible; that day (in Walsinghams iudgement) had beene irrecouerably fatall to the Scottish name, if the English had beene able to haue followed them in their Armour, ouer their bogges and mountaines, or that the Welsh had with their naturall nimblenesse supplied the same. Sure it is, that Edward held himselfe so fast in possession, that hee neither would grant the Scottish Lords their Baliol to raigne ouer them, (which they requested saith Walsingham) nor suffer them to redeeme such lands of theirs, as hee had giuen to the English among them.

*Hect.Boet.

(39) Armes failing, and the Scots hauing made their way in the Court of Rome, procured inhibitorie

ry letters from the Pope, which were brought by one Lombardus into Scotland: but the King swearing a * terrible oath, said, that he would not desist. Nevertheless the Scots, after a few dayes, requested the King to let them liue in peace till they had taken counsell of the Peeres, and of the King of France; threatning that otherwise the Pope would take the matter vpon him. But the King with a disdainefull "smile answered: Haue you done homage to mee (as to "the chiefe Lord of the Kingdome of Scotland) and now "suppose that I can be terrified with swelling lies, as if "(like one that had no power to compell) I would let the "right which I haue ouer you to slip out of my hands? Let "me heare no more of this, for if I do, I swear by the Lord, "I will consume all Scotland from sea to sea. On the other side, the Scots did boldly enough replie, That in this cause they would shed their blood for defence of iustice, and their Countries liberty.

(40) About this time the King made his sonne Edward, (who was borne at Caernarnon) Prince of Wales, and Earle of Chester, which so greatly contented the Welsh, because (in regard of his birth place) they held him as one of theirs, that when all friends did afterward forsake him (as the following raigne will shew) they alwayes stucke most loyally vnto him, expressing wonderfull loue and affection, and bewayling his heauy fortunes in wofull songs, which neither the dread of his enemies, nor length of time could euer make them to *forget.

(41) But, in the matter of Scotland, the King not to seeme altogether to neglect the Court of Rome, addressed thither the Earle of Lincolne, and the Lord Hugh de Spenser with manifold complaints against the Scots, and iustification of his owne proceedings; howbeit at the Popes request, he granted them truce from Hallowmas to Whitsontide. This very yeere, Cassan King of Tartars gloriously slew one hundreth thousand Turkes in a battell vpon the plaine of Damascus, and was baptized therupon, as acknowledging the victory to come from the sonne of God: the ioy whereof filled England, as other the partes of Christendome.

(42) The iustice of the English Armes against the 1302. Scots, being now againe directly impugned by the Papall letters, comprehending sundry arguments on the behalfe of that Nation, King Edward in a Parliament at Lincolne published their contents, and by consent of the whole representatiue body of the Realme, returned a copious defence of his whole proceedings, with protestation, first, that hee did not exhibite any thing as in forme of iudgement, or triall of his cause, but for satisfaction of his holy Fatherhoods conscience, and not otherwise. But whereas the Pope had required the King to stand to his decision for matter of claime, hee writes, that thereunto hee would make no answere, as hauing left that point to the Earles and Peeres of his land: who with one "mind directly signifie, that their King was not to "answere in iudgement for any rights of the Crown of "England before any Tribunall vnder Heauen: and that "(by sending Deputies or Attorneyes to such an end) hee "should not make the said truth doubtfull, because it mani-"festly tended to the disinherison of the said Crown, which "with the helpe of God, they would resolutely, and with al "their force maintaine against all men. So * ceased that Action, and the sooner also, for that Bonifacius had much to doe at home, by reason of some great controuersies between the French and him. Meane time Sir Iohn Segraue, Lord Segraue, a renowned Souldier, was sent Gouernour or Custos into Scotland, with an Army, after the Truce expired, which at the French Kings instance, King Edward had yeelded vnto for a time; Iohn Cumin, who had also beene a Competitor for the Crown, was chosen by the Scots * for their Gouernour.

(43) We may not here ouerpasse a victory (at Rosselin) which the Writers of that nation celebrate, wherin the English were by them ouercome, howbeit there is in our Writers much variety in that relation. It is the saying of Hector Boetius, that the English were about three for one, our ancient and later authors say that the Scots had farre the * more people; he affirmes, that it was in the plaine field, ours that it was *an Ambush; he that the Scots did put to flight, and tooke the spoiles of three whole battels, in either of which were *10000. English, ours, that the Scots by reason of their multitudes did onely ouerbeare the Vauntgard, from which the neerest of the other battels was * foure miles off. All agree in this that the Lord Iohn Segraue (Ralfe Confrey saith Hector) who had the point or voward of the English (whose Generall he also was) by diuiding his army into three parts for their better reliefe, weakned so his whole force, that thereby, and his vnaduised forwardnes (impatient to stay for his other powers) he gaue occasion to the Scots of such a victory. They had also taken the person of the said Lord Generall, but *Sir Robert de Neuile, who with others was at diuine seruice, hearing therof, came with his troups of horse, rescued Segraue, slew many, put many to flight, and brought away backe the rest of the prisoners, without *the losse of any one man of his owne. The said Scottish Chronicle makes no mention of William Walleys, at this discomfiture of the English, but giues the whole glory thereof to Cumyn, and to Simon Fraser: whereas we attribute all to Walleys, and make no mention of the other, with farre lesse wrong to the immortall deserts of Walleys; for he vndoubtedly, was the only man, who kept vp Scotland, till neere the time of deliuerance.

(44) The Scottish Nation (as Hector reports) had "for their warrant in conscience, and iustification of resi-"stance, the Popes iudgement, who vpon ripe deliberation "in their matter, decreed (saith he) that the Scots had iust "action of battell in defence of their liberties against King "Edward: who not much esteeming the doome of that Oracle, vpon the other side was perswaded hee might proceed to subdue them wholy to his dominion: and therefore, (vpon report that the Scots were not only vp in Armes) but encouraged to greater attempts by this late successe,) came in person with a dreadfull host, piercing therewith * through all Scotland, from one end thereof to the other; from Rocksbrough to Catnes, which is the farthest point in the length of that Land, being about three hundreth miles: whither he marched by small iourneys, not an enemie appearing with power to empeach him. For they, vnable to make head, being so continually wasted, did either for their safetie betake themselues to the woods, and Mountaines, with their Walleys, or wholly submitted themselues, * swearing to be true to king Edward, there being in al Scotland but one Castle (the Castle of Striueling) which stood out, and that also (vpon King Edwards returne from Catnes) was *absolutely surrendred to him; and therefore no great cause, why Hector should call King Edward false Tyrant for committing the Captaine and Garrison of that Castle to sundry Prisons: So that had not God in his eternall prouidence, fauouring the liberty of that people, ordeined some inaccessible places, and naturall strengths, where no Armie could march nor be maintained, the Scots had in all likelihood perpetually vndergone the same fortune, which we the English were brought into, for want of the like, by William the first, and his Normans:

"(45) Therefore let prophane discourses (with their "Father Epicurus and Lucretius) blush and tremble, as of-"ten as they shall dare to insinuate any thing against "Gods wisdome in the Fabrick of the world, as if the "Craggy, and desert places, thereof, had no vse in nature, "when (omitting all other reasons of their being) the con-"seruation of kingdomes, and nations was thus by them "effected. We had an * Herward in the Conquerours "time, aswell as the Scots had a Walleys in this; and we "might perhaps at this houre haue beene without French "mixtures, if God had prouided our Country of such "Wastes, and deserts as either they or the Welshmen did "enioy, who for manie hundreths of yeeres, after the ruine of

*of their Monarchie in Britaine, vpheld, in some sort, "their liberty, when the English had twice by Danes, and "Normans, in the meane time, vtterly lost it.

(46) Scotland (saith * Hector) being in this manner subdued and all the strengths of buildings, and the Nobility thereof at King Edwards disposition, he hauing ordered the affaires thereof as himselfe thought best, left the custodie thereof againe to * Segraue, and in his triumphall returne through England from Dunfermelin in Scotland where he kept his Christmas, caused the Courts of the Bench, and Eschecquer, which had beene seuen yeere kept at Yorke (for the more commodity of his Scottish expeditions) to be reduced to London, their ancient residence. Moreouer he ordained Iustitiars for Trailbaston, who were to inquire of man-slaughters, Ruffians, Disseisors, Boot-halers, Incendiaries, and other perturbers of the common quiet, and them to punish, by fine, death and otherwise, which brought to the Realme much rest, and to the King much riches.

A.D. 1306.

(47) But, the more to secure king Edward in the Scottish kingdome, it was not long, but that william walleys (whom an Earle of Scotland in the beginning of his resistances had honoured (saith Walsingham) with the girdle of * Knight-hood) was brought vp prisoner to London, being treasonably taken at Glasco by * one Sir Iohn Menteth (though * Polydor Vergil saith the English tooke him in warre) where he had publike triall at Westminster, and * denying that he was a Traitour to the King of England, was there for other his crimes (as burning of Townes, taking of Castles, killing the English, &c.) adiudged to death, which sentence was executed vpon him, and his head and quarters set vp in seuerall places ouer the Iland, his right * leg at Perth or Saint Iohns Towne in Scotland, and his left at Aberdein. This was the end of Wallace, whom his Countrey had once by common consent chosen for their defender, and * Captaine Generall, and, for his deserts towards her, doth place in glory farre aboue the starres, as the only person, by whose example, the Scots had their spirits kept awake, and quicke vpon all occasions, by which they might recouer the Gouernment out of the hands of the English, whose reigne ouer them this Wallace neither by faire meanes, nor by force could euer bee drawne to endure, or looke vpon with a patient eie; whom though (with Hectors * translatour) we doe not call a Martyr, yet must we thinke his Countrey honoured in him, wishing many the like in our owne.

King Edward one of the greatest English Monarchs.

(48) Let no man now make doubt to write vp King Edward among the greatest of our English Monarchs, for (besides the whole Ilands of Britaine and Ireland) hee also held Aquitaine, which about two yeers before, the King of France (entangled with troubles otherwise) did restore, and the City of Burdeaux of the owne accord submitted it selfe againe to the English Scepter, as that wherewith it had formerlie beene so long, and well acquainted; and to gratifie the same Edward the King of France also banished the Scots out of his dominions. Thus was King Edward possessed of Scotland; which neuertheless (that the world may see Gods hand in translating of Kingdomes, being a* point of his prerogatiue) was not long after pluckt from his sonne; and the calamities which the Scots had suffered, whelmed backe vpon the English. Which peculiar art of diuine prouidence you will more easily acknowledge, when you shall behould by how naked an instrument he raised againe the Scottish Common-wealth out of that dust, in which for a little season it seemed to lie buried.

Tho. Walsing. ad An. Dom. 1306.

* Daniel cap. 2 ver. 21.

(49) Wallace therefore being taken out of the way, the Lord Robert Bruce (betweene whom, and the vnfortunate Baliol the maine strife lay for the Diadem) beholding the state of his Countrey, for which Wallace, without interest to the Crowne therof, had stood so nobly, and desirous to giue it a new head by making himselfe King (whereto by Baliols surrender his other right was made more passable) had for that purpose entered into a conspiracy with Cumyn, whose disclosure thereof (as Scots doe write) brought into apparent danger the Lord Brucet life, who was then attendant in the Court of England. King Edward vpon the first discouery of the plot not crediting the same, Bruce, most constantly denying it, and casting the accusation, with good probabilitie, vpon Cumyn enuie, had time, and warning to escape. For an Earle (saith Boetius) sent vnto him twelue Sriueling pence, and a paire of sharpe spurres, presently vpon his departure from the King, which he wittily interpreted to be a Symbole of speedie flight. According whereunto he forthwith sped from London, where K. Edward kept Christmas, shooing his horses backward, that he might not be followed by their prints vpon the snow, and with his owne hand thrust his sword into Cumyn * in the Church of the Friers Minors at Dunfreis in Scotland, whom two of Brucet friends with other mortall thrusts dispatched. Bruce knowing now no way to answere the fact, but by open defection, which he did resolue vpon, did thereupon procure himselfe to be crowned King of Scotland about our Ladies day in March in the Abbey of Scone.

(50) Such an attempt as this could not be long hidden from King Edward, who hauing at the whitsontide next after honored Edward Prince of Wales, his eldest sonne, with the order of Knighthood at London, sent him against King Robert into Scotland, attended with a troupe of noble yong gentlemen, Aimerie de Valence Earle of Pembroke; Robert de Clifford, and Henry de Percie being gone before with an Armie, and King Edward preparing to come after, appointing the Rendeuous of his owne host to be at Carleil. Where, in a Parliament, besides prouisions for the warres, sundry consultations and courses were entred, for repelling another kind of enemie no lesse dangerous to the State, to wit, the Pope, and his* still continued extortions in this Land whereof greeuous complaints were made in that Assembly; and both the Clergy there * appealed from the Popes Bull, and his Cardinal-Legats exactions: and also the Kings Councell was driuen to enact some orders for brideling their excessiue depilations.

(51) Meane time Aymery de Valence at Perth in Scotland had put to flight king Robert Bruce, & pursued him so neer, that he tooke his wife, his brother Nigellus, and others, but himselfe escaped into the vtmost Iles of Scotland. This hansell taken at the entrance to his Regalitie, draue his people into such despaire of his future better fortunes, that there remained only two friends vnto him, the Earle of Lenox, and Gilbert Hay; the rest, as the Earle of Athol, at London, (who had twise reuolted) and his brother Nigellus at Berwick, were put to death as al others his chiefe partakers were, or else kept prisoners in England. In which number was King Roberts wife (daughter to the Earle of Vlster in Ireland) and his daughter, the Bishops of Glasco, and Saint Andrewes, the Abbot of Scone and others. The Counteste of Bucquhan, sister to the Earle of Fife (then absent in England at his mannor of* Whitwick in Leicestershire, whose office it was to haue crowned the Scottish King) was also taken; and because (in her brothers absence) shee had stolne from the Earle her husband, with all his great horse, to* set the Diadem vpon Bruces head, it was deuised that shee should be set in a woodden Cage (made * Crowne-wise) vpon the wals of Berwick Castle, for all to wonder at. This ridiculous reuenge was held sufficient, without taking her life, though shee were a manlike woman, and did herein but the part of a noble spirited Lady. Thus was King Robert (saith the *Scottish translatour of Boetius) brought to such misery, that hee was sometime naked and hungrie without meat, or drinke, saue only water and roots of herbs, and his life perpetually in danger. Howbeit, hee neuer forsooke himselfe, but as one that had firme trust in God, cherished an hope in his minde, at one time or other to recouer the Crowne. In which condition hee exhibited himselfe so noble a spectacle as in which euen the * morall Heathen doe teach, that the Gods themselues took pleasure; how then can Christians looke off? Certainly, all generous spirits, whom cruell iniuries oppresse, haue reason to dwell in this patterne of Christian magnanimity and patience.

(52) King Edward also on the other side (like a Christian Prince) as hee had some yeeres before, by his speciall letters (directed to the * Archbishoppe of Canterbury,) requested that publike prayers should bee made to Almighty God for him, his Realme and people, that the heauenly Maiesty would direct his way and workes to the glory of his holy name, and aduancement of the Kingdome; so now repayred hee with his Lords to Westminster, after this discomfiture of his enemies, there solemnly to render vnto God his humble thanks for the Conquest, whereof hee thus held himselfe assured. Which confidence drew him on so farre, that now (his turns being serued, as he thought against the Scots) hee refused to stand to the confirmation which hee had made to his Barons, of such lawes and liberties as haue before beene mentioned, pretending that they had forced his consent: and doubtlesse, as great was the Kings fault thus to renounce what hee had solemnly sworne, (* though indeed it was on some necessity and enforcement) so the Popes warranting thereof (which certainely encouraged the King thereunto) is most execrable, who afterward absolued him (as other Popes had done to his Predecessors) from obseruance of that oath.

53) The miraculous deliuerance of Scotland was now at hand; for the noble Bruce, not staying till King Edward were dead (who was now about threescore and eight yeeres of age,) came forth out of the Scottish Ilands with such powers as hee had gotten together, taking the Castles of Carricke, Innernesse, and many other, doing many things aboue the opinion of his meanes. To put an end to all which troubles, King Edward resolued once againe in person (notwithstanding his age,) to enter Scotland with a mighty hoast, which hee appointed to attend him at Carliel in Cumberland, three weekes after Midsommer day: where God visiting him with his last sicknesse, hee commanded his Sonne the Prince to repaire with speed vnto him, vnto whom being come, hee vttered many admonitions and precepts, the summe wherof was* this.

" (54) That he should be mercifull, iust and curteous, constant in word and deed, familiar to the good, and toward such as were in distresse alwaies pitifull. * That after his death he should not hasten " to take the Crowne of England, till hee had honourably reuenged the iniuries of his Father, and " accomplished the present seruice. That hee " should carry his Fathers bones about with him in " some coffin, till hee had marched through all Scotland and subdued all his enemies, for that none " should bee able to * ouercome him while his Skeleton marched with him. Moreouer, hee com- " manded the said Prince to loue his * Brethren, " Thomas and Edmund; but specially to tender and " respect his mother Queene Margaret. * That vp- " on paine of his malediction, and curse, hee should not " presume without common consent to repeale Piers de " Gaueston, who for abusing the tender yeares of the " Prince with wicked vanities, by common decree was " banished. That whereas himselfe, by the conti- " nuall, and new attempts of Bruce, could not in " person (according to his vow) make warre in the " Holy-land, therefore hee should send his Heart thi- " ther, accompanied with seuenscore Knights, and " their retinues, for whose support hee had proui- " ded thirty & two thousand pounds of siluer. That " his Hart being so by them conuaied, he did hope in " God, that all things there would prosper with " them. Lastly, That vpon paine of eternall damnati- " on, the said money should not bee expended vpon any o- " ther vses.

(55) With these admonitions dismissing the light young men from his presence, to accomplish (so prouident was hee to the very end of his state affaires) the mariage with the French Kings Daughter, which had beene formerly agreede vpon between the Parents; hee aduanced neerer to the enemy vnto Burgh vpon Sands, where his lingering Dissentery encreasing (for that was the sickneſſe whereof hee died, though one malcuolently sayth, hee died sodainely, without shew of repentance for his sinnes) hee tooke his * leaue of this world, after no lesse preparation (no doubt) for his owne soules health, then carefull premonition for the carriage of his sonne, and ordering of his Kingdome. Which puissant Princes raigne and life, wee cannot here shut vp with a nobler Eulogie, then that wherewith our * Great and Iudicious Antiquary hath already deportrayed him, as a Prince of chiefe renowne, to whose heroicke mind God proportioned (as a most worthy mansion) a body answerable; so that as well in beauty and goodly presence, as in wisdome and valour, hee was sutable to the height of his Regall Dignity, whose flourishing youth his Destinie did exercise with many warres and troubles of the State, so to frame and fitte him for the British Empire; which, being King, hee so managed with the glory of his Welsh and Northerne victories, that by due desert hee is to bee reputed a chiefe honour of Britannie.

His Wiues.

(56) Eleanor, the first wife of King Edward, was sister to Alphonsus King of Castile, Daughter to King Ferdinando the third, and onlie Child of Ioan his second wife, Daughter and Heire of Iohn Earle of Ponthieu. Shee was married to him at Bures in Spaine in the thirty ninth yeere of King Henry his Father, 1254. shee was crowned with him the day of his Coronation, and liuing his wife (in louely participation of all his troubles, and long voiages) thirty six yeeres, died at Herdeby in Lincolnshire, Nouember 29. of her husbands raigne 19. An. Do. 1290. shee is buried at Westminster at the feet of King Henry the third, vnder a faire marble Tombe, adorned with her portraiture of Copper guilt; * other costly monuments of her husbands loue being in euery place erected where her Hearse rested, as it was conueyed from Herdeby to Westminster.

(57) Margaret his second wife being sister of Philip the fourth, surnamed the Faire, King of France, and eldest daughter of King Philip the Hardy, sonne of S. Lewis, was married vnto him at Canterbury, on Thursday, September 8. of her husbands raigne 27. An. D. 1299. after almost eight yeeres marriage, surviuing him, shee remained a widow ten yeers, and deceasing 10. of Edward 2. An. D. 1317. was buried at the Gray-Fryers in London before the Altar in the Quire which her selfe had built.

His Issue.

(58) Iohn the eldest sonne of King Edward and Queene Elenor was borne at Windsor in the raigne of King Henry his Grandfather, before his Fathers voyage into Syria, and in his absence, was committed to the charge of Richard King of Romans, his great vncle, and others, who procured principall men of euery Hundred in each County within the Realme, to sweare their fealty to his father and him, but hee died shortly after, being a Child, & was buried at Westminster by the wall, betweene S. Edmunds and S. Bennets Chappell, August 8. in the last yeere of King Henry his Grandfathers raigne; there is remaining ouer him a Tombe of Marble inlayed with his picture in an Arch ouer it.

(59) Henry the second sonne of King Edward and Queene Elenor, deceased also being a Child, the newes of whose death was brought to his Father, being then in the Isle of Sicill in his returne from the Holy-Land, not long before the report of his owne fathers death came to his knowledge; he was buried in Saint Peters Church at Weſtminſter, the twentieth day of November, in the firſt year of his Fathers raign, Ann. Dom. 1272. in the ſame place, and vnder the ſame Tombe where his brother Iohn lies with his picture alſo in the Arch aboue it.

(60) Alphons, the third ſonne of Edward and Queene Elenor was borne at the Towne of Maine in Gaſcoigne, as his father and mother were in their returne towards England from Ieruſalem, Nouember 23. in the ſecond yeare of his fathers raigne, 1273. hee deceaſed at Windſor, Auguſt 4. in the twelfth yeere of his age, 1285. and was buried at Weſtminſter in Saint Peters Church by Saint Bennets Chappell, where his body lieth vnder the Tombe of his Brothers, Iohn and Henry, his Image alſo there portraied with theirs.

(61) Edward, the fourth ſonne of King Edward, and Queene Elenor, was borne April 25. in the thirteenth yeere of his fathers raigne, 1284. at Cacrnaruan in Northwales, and after the death of Lewelin ap Griffith, in regard of the place of his Natiuity, was by his fathers Creation, with the conſent of the Welſh made Prince of Wales, the firſt of the ſonnes and heires apparant of the Kings of England, that bare that Title, which afterward became ordinary to moſt of the reſt: hee was alſo Earle of Ponthieu and Cheſter, and being made Knight by his father at London on Whitſunday, in the thirty fourth yeere of his Raigne, 1306. ſucceeded him the ſame yeer in the Kingdome of VVales.

(62) Elenor, the eldeſt daughter of King Edward and Queene Elenor was borne at Windſor in the fiftieth yeare of King Henry her Grandfather, ſhee was married with all Ceremonies of Proxie to a Deputy for Alphons King of Arragon, ſonne of King Peter, who deceaſed A.Do. 1292. before the ſolemnization of marriage, leauing his Kingdom to his brother Iames, and his new wife to another husband, who was married at Briſtow in the two and twentieth yeere of her fathers raigne, 1293. to Henry the 3. Earle of Barrie, whoſe Earledome lay in the Eaſt-borders of Champaigne in France. Shee had Iſſue by him Edward Earle of Barrie, from whom deſcended the Earles and Dukes of that Country, whoſe inheritance by Heires generall deuolued to the Kings of Arragon, and from them again to the Dukes of Anion that were Kings of Sicill. Henrie another ſonne of hers was Biſhoppe of Troys in Champagny. Helen her Daughter was marrird to Henry Earle of Bloys; and Ioan to Iohn Warren Earle of Surrey, ſhe was his wife fiue yeeres, and deceaſed 27. of her fathers raigne, A.D. 1298.

(63) Ioan the ſecond daughter of King Edward, and Queene Eleanor, was borne in the firſt yeere of her fathers raigne, 1272. at a City in the holy land ſometime named Ptolomais, commonly called Acon and Aker, where her mother remained during the warres that her father had with the Saracens: Shee was, at eighteene yeeres of age, married to Gilbert Clare called the Red, Earle of Gloceſter and Hereford, by whom ſhee had iſſue, Earle Gilbert ſlaine in Scotland without iſſue; Eleanor, married firſt to Hugh Spencer (in her right, Earle of Gloceſter,) and after to William Zouch of Ricards caſtle. Margaret, firſt maried to Peter Gaueſton, Earle of Cornwal, after to Hugh Audeley Earle alſo of Gloceſter; and Elizabeth Lady of Clare, married firſt to Iohn ſon and heire to Richard Burgh, Earle of Vlſter in Ireland, mother of william Burgh Earle of Vlſter, and Grandmother of Elizabeth, Dutcheſſe of Clarence; ſecondly, to Theobald Lord Verdon, and laſtly, to Sir Roger Damary. This Ioan ſurviued her husband, and was remarried to Sir Ralph Monthermere a Baron, father to Margaret the mother of Thomas Mountacute Earle of Salisbury, of whom the now Vicount Mountacute is deſcended; ſhee liued thirty eight yeeres, and deceaſed in the firſt yeere of her brother King Edwards raigne, and is buried at the Fryer Auſtines in Clare.

(64) Margaret the third daughter of King Edward and Queene Elenor, was borne at the Caſtle of Windſor in the third yeare of her fathers raigne, and of our Lord, 1275. When ſhee was fifteene yeeres of age, ſhee was married at Weſtminſter, July 9. in the eighteenth yeere of her fathers raign, A.D. 1290. to Iohn the ſecond, Duke of Brabant, by whom ſhee had iſſue Duke Iohn the third, father of Margaret, wife of Lewis of Mechlin Earle of Flanders, and mother of the Lady Margaret, the heire of Brabant and Flanders, who was married to Philip Duke of Burgundie.

(65) Berenger the fourth Daughter of King Edward & Queen Elenor, was born the 4. of her fathers raigne, An. 1276. as Iohn Eueresden the Monke of S. Edmundsburie in Suffolke, hath recorded in his booke of Engliſh Annales, but other mention there is none, but onely from him: whereby it is likely that ſhee did not liue to be married, but that ſhee died in her childhood.

(66) Alice the fifth Daughter of king Edward and Queene Elenor, is by Thomas Pickering of the Monaſtery of Whitby, (who wrote the large Genealogie of the Kings of England and their iſſue) reported to haue deceaſed without Iſſue.

(67) Marie, the ſixt daughter of king Edward and Queene Elenor, was borne at Windſor, April 22. in the eight yeare of her fathers raigne, 1279. and at ten yeeres of age, A.D. 1289. September 8. ſhee was made a Nunne in the Monaſtery of Ambreſberie in Wiltſhire, at the inſtance of Queen Elenor her Grandmother, who at that time liued there in the habite of the ſame profeſsion, although her Parents were hardly enduced to yeeld their conſents to that courſe.

(68) Elizabeth, the ſeuenth Daughter of king Edward and Queene Elenor, was borne at the Caſtle of Ruthland in Flintſhire, in the thirteenth yeere of her fathers raigne, An. 1284. When ſhe was foureteen yeeres of age, ſhee was married at London to Iohn the firſt of that name, Earle of Holland, Zeland, and Lord of Freezeland, who died within two yeeres after without Iſſue, and ſhee was remarried to Humfrey Bohun Earle of Hereford and Eſſex, Lord of Brecknoke, and high Conſtable of England, by whom ſhee had Iſſue Iohn and Humfrey, both Earles ſucceſsiuely after their Father; Edward, that died in Scotland without iſſue; and William, who being created Earle of Northampton, while his Brothers liued, after their deceaſes, was alſo Earle of Hereford and Eſſex, Lord of Breknok and high Conſtable of England, and father of Earle Humfrey the tenth of that name, and laſt of that houſe, who died without Iſſue male: ſhe had alſo by him two daughters, Elenor married to Iames Butler Earle of Ormond, and Margaret to Hugh Courtney the firſt, Earle of Deuonſhire. Shee was this Earles wife foureteene yeers; liued thirty three, deceaſed in the ninth yeere of the raigne of king Edward her brother, A. D. 1316. and was buried in the Church of S. Iames, at the Abbey of Saffron VValden in Eſſex.

(69) Beatrice, the eight daughter of King Edward and Queene Elenor, bare the name of Beatrice Dutcheſſe of Britannie her fathers ſiſter: ſhe is by ſome Genealogiſts mentioned to haue liued till ſhe was marriageable, but yet no mention being made of her match, it ſeemeth ſhe died vnmarried.

(70) Blanch, the ninth daughter of king Edward, and the laſt of Queene Elenor, is ſo mentioned by Thomas Pickering, and ſome others, but not at all by Thomas Ebraham a Monke, who made a Pedegree of the Kings of England, but ſhee is by the reſt reported to haue died in her childhood.

(71) Thomas, the fifth ſonne of king Edward, and the firſt of Queene Margaret his ſecond wife, was borne at a little village in Yorkſhire called Brotherton, Iune 1. in the nine and twenteth yeere of his fathers raigne, Ann. 1300. hee was created Earle of Norfolke, and Earle Marſhal of England, which Earledomes the laſt Earle Roger Bigod, leauing no Iſſue, left left to the disposition of the King his father. He had two wiues, of which the first was Alice the daughter of Sir Roger Hayles of Harwich in Suffolk, by whom hee had issue Edward, who married Beatrice the daughter of Roger Mortimer the first, Earle of March, but hee died before his father without Issue; and two daughters, Margaret twice married, first to Iohn Lord Segraue, by whom shee had Elizabeth Dutchesse of Norfolke, wife of Iohn Lord Mowbray (from whom the Mowbrayes & Howards Dukes of Norffolke, and Earles Marshall descended;) secondly, to Sir VValter Manny a Knight of Cambray, and by him had Anne wife of Iohn Hastings the elder Earle of Pembroke, and mother of Earle Iohn the yonger, that died without Issue; his yongest daughter Alice was married to Sir Edward Montacute, and had by him three daughters, Elizabeth and Ioan married to VValter and VVilliam two of the Vffords, and Maud that died vnmarried. The second wife of this Earle Thomas, was Mary the daughter of VVilliam Lord Ros, and widow of Sir Ralph Cobham, who surviuing him without Issue by him, shee was married the third time to VVilliam Lord Brerose of Brember.

(72) Edmund, his sixt sonne by Queene Margaret, was borne at Woodstocke in Oxfordshire, August 5 in the thirtieth yeare of the raigne of his Father, A. 1301. Hee was created Earle of Kent, and married Margaret daughter of Iohn, and sister and sole heire of Thomas Lord VVake of Lydel in the County of Northampton, by her he had Issue two sonnes and one daughter: Edmund his eldest sonne was Earle of Kent after his father, and died vnder age without wife or issue: Iohn the yonger was Earle also after his brother, he maried Elizabeth the daughter of the Duke of Gulike, and died likewise without Issue; His daughter was Ioan, for her beauty called the faire Maid of Kent, first maried to William Mountacute Earle of Salisbury, and from him diuorced, and remarried to Sir Thomas Holland, in her right, Earle of Kent, and by her, father of Thomas, and Iohn Holland Duke of Surrey, and Earle of Huntington: and lastly, shee was the wife of Edward of Woodstocke, the Blacke Prince of Wales, and by him, mother of King Richard the second. This Earle Edmund was beheaded at Winchester the 19. of March, in the fourth yeere of King Edward his Nephew.

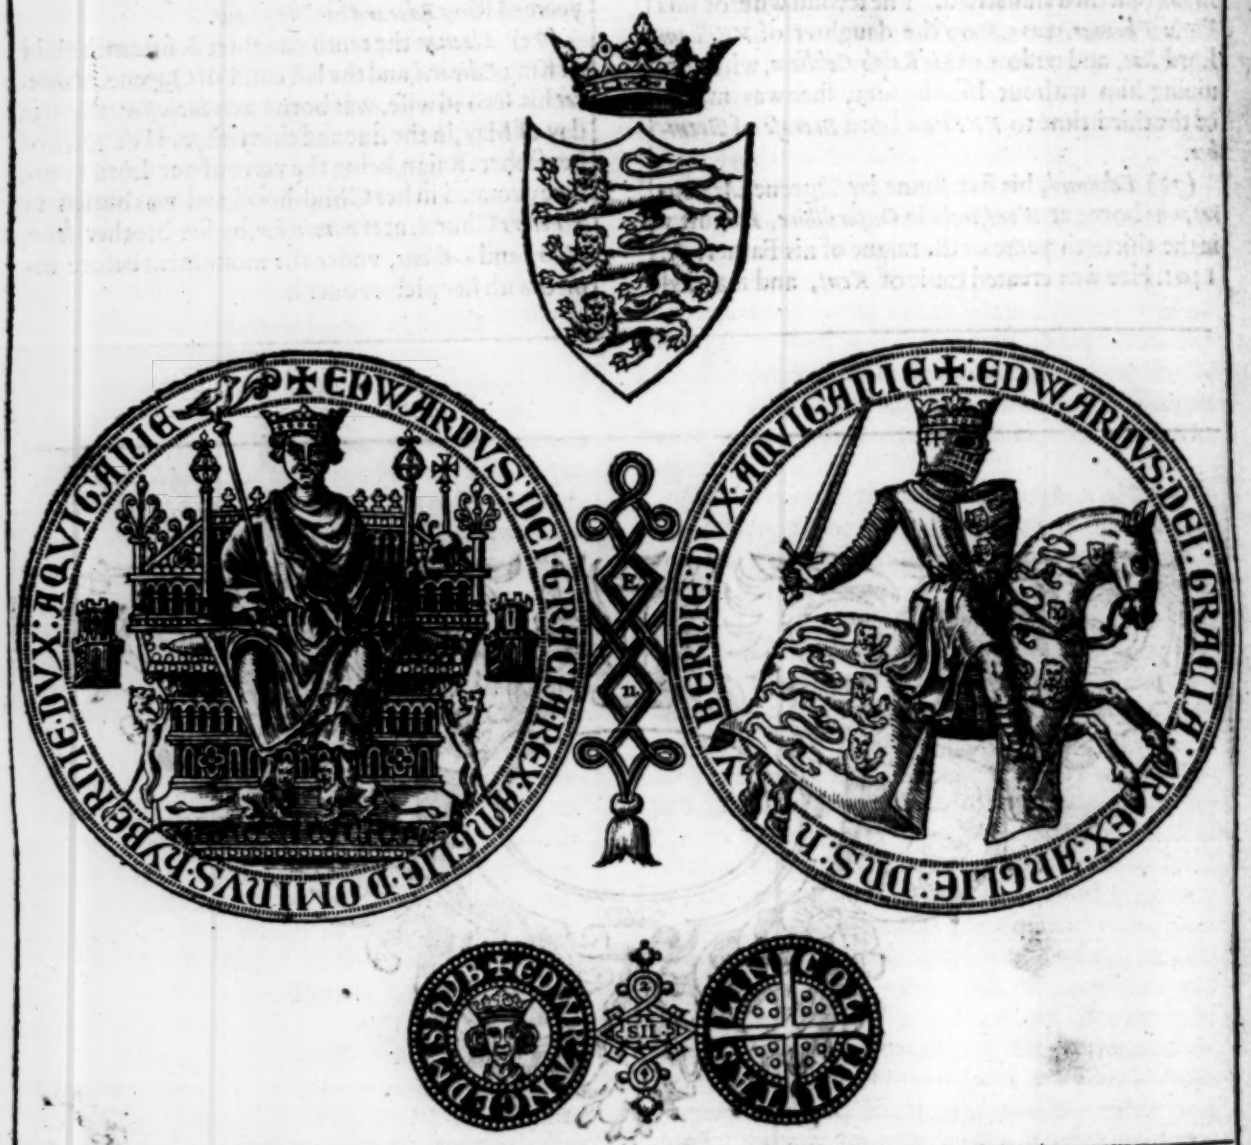
(73) Eleanor the tenth daughter & fifteenth child of King Edward, and the last child of Queene Margaret his second wife, was borne at Winchester the sixt day of May, in the fiue and thirtieth, and last yeere of her fathers Raign, being the yeere of our Lord 1306. shee deceased in her Child-hood, and was buried in S. Peters Church at Westminster, by her brother Iohn, Henry and Alfons, vnder the monument before named with her picture ouer it.

EDWARD

Edward II.

EDVVARD THE SECOND, LORD OF IRELAND, AND DVKE OF AQVITAINE, &c. THE FORTIE-EIGHTH MONARCH OF ENGLAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSVE.



CHAPTER XI.

THat the Mind is not deriued from Parents, certainely the second Edward (called of Caernaruon) might (if nothing else) abundantlie shew, being of a most valiant, wise and fortunate father, an vnlike sonne; yet not to beginne our description of his courses, with preiudice of his person, we will so temper our stile, that by his owne actions sincerely related, rather then by any verball censures the man may bee iudged. This cannot be denied, that whereas from the Conquest till his time, England though it endured (by Gods iust iudgements) many bitter, sad and heauy stormes through some headinesse, ambition, or other sicknesses of mind in the Princes thereof, yet had she Men to sway and gouerne her, and those distempers were as the perturbations incident to vigorous dispositions; whereas vnder this Edward, who could neither get nor keepe, it seemed to endure the leuities of a Child, though his yeeres, being about twenty and three, might haue exempted him from so great infancie of iudgement, as his raigne discouered.

(2) Neuer came Prince to the crowne with more generall applause then he: so great hopes of doing well, his victorious father, Edward of * Winchester had left vpon him, besides the right of succession, whose last warning and terrible adiurations you haue heard: with the * vtter contempt and breach whereof, to the destruction of himselfe, and his friends, hee in a manner auspicated his gouernement.

(3) After that Edward had in his best maner prouided for the * affaires of Scotland, where (at Dumfrees) many of the Scottish * Lords did their homage to him, as they had to his Father; the first taske which hee gaue of his future behauiours at home, was was a rigorous reuenge taken by him vpon Walter de Langton Bishoppe of Chester, Treasurer of England, and principall Executor of the last Will of the deceased King, whose body was not as yet interred, but by the care of the Executors, conueied with funerall pompe to Waltham, and (after sixteen weekes) to Westminster, where vnder a plaine monument the same at this present rests. The Bishoppes crime was a kind of good freedome, which hee vsed in the late Kings daies, in * grauely reprouing the Prince for his misdemeanors, and shortning his waste of coine by a frugall moderation; and particularly, * for that he had complained of Peirs Gaueston, whereupon ensued Prince Edwards imprisonment, and the others banishment, and therefore comming now to the Crowne, hee arrested the Bishoppe by Sir Iohn Felton Constable of the Tower, and imprisoned him in * Wallingford Castle, seising vpon all his temporall goods and * credites, there being not a man in the Realme who durst speake a word on his behalfe, (so great displeasure hee had conceiued, seeking vtterly to ruine him) till afterward by means of the Papall authority, hee was restored, and in a faint sort reconciled.

(4) The thing which suited best with his youthfull affections, to wit, the marriage of young Isabel, daughter of Philip the Faire, King of France, he performed with wonderfull magnificence at Bolein, at which solemnity were present besides all others, The King of France Father to the Bride; The King of Nauarre his sonne; The King of Almaine; The King of Sicill; Marie Queene of France; Margaret Queene Dowager of England, her daughter; The Queene of Nauarre. There was also present (as no Sunne-shine but hath shadow) * Peirs of Gaueston, the beloued Minion of this Edward, whose reentertainement the dying King had so seriously forbidden, whom notwithstanding, together with his own new wife, he brought into England.

(5) This fatall fauourite of this young King was a stranger borne, but a * Gentleman, and (in regard of good seruice done by the Father of Peirs in Gascoigne, * brought vp (at old king Edwards owne appointment) with this Prince: from whom not to derogate in any point, as if hee had without some appearances of worth and value embraced Peirs, it is certaine (by that which a * Knight and seruitor of this very King hath left written) that he had a sharpe witte in a comely shape, and briefly, was such an one, as wee vse to call very fine; Neither yet was he vnhardie in Arms, but of commendable performance, whereof (saith de la Moore) hee gaue proofe against the Scots, (to whom * hee was alike hatefull as to the English) till hee was recalled to satisfie such as (saith their Courtier) did enuie his graces, and good successe; but of his Christian or morall vertues (which onely make men truly commendable) there is great silence in Authors, though not of his vices, wherof wee shall haue occasion enough to speake hereafter.

(6) At the Coronation of the King and Queen, (which the Lords would haue empeached, had hee not promised reasonably to * satisfie them about Gaueston) none was * neere to Peirs in brauery of apparrell, or delicacie of fashion, which (and for that the King gaue him *S. Edwards Crowne to carrie in that pompe,) greatly encreased the offence of the Lords against him: But hee that (hauing a King to backe him) knew no other means to extinguish hatred, but by daring it to the vttermost, spared not afterwardes to scoffe and reproach the principall Peeres, * calling Thomas Earle of Lancaster, Stage-plaier; Aimerie de Valence Earle of Pembroke, Ioseph the Iew, because hee was pale and tall; and Guy Earle of Warwicke, the blacke dogge of Ardern: all whom, and others, he at a * Turneament by him proclaimed and holden, handled vilely.

(7) But King Edward was dayly more and more possessed with the familiarity of Peirs, who to establish his interest in the vnprudent Prince, by sensualities and riotous practises, filled the Court * with buffons, parasites, and the like pernicious instruments, drawing Edward from the thought of al great enterprises, in accomplishment of his fathers will, or discharge of his particular dutie, to all sorts of vnworthy vanities, and sinnefull delights; while himselfe in the meane space reuelled in all outward felicity, wasting the riches of the Kingdome, or conuerting them to his priuate vses. For (fearing belike that the time might come againe to vndergoe banishment) hee transported much treasure into forraine parts, and much hee had to transport; for not onely by the * sale of his fauour with the King; to which there was no speeding approach but by Gaueston, (who vsed to peize the gifts, more then the causes) but also by the kings prodigality, hee had whatsoeuer could bee powred vpon him: for (though it might seeme incredible) he both gaue him his iewels and ancestors treasure, and * euen the Crowne it selfe of his victorious father, not sticking to professe, that (if it lay in him) hee should succeed him in the kingdome.

(8) The Lords (who for reuerence of the King sate downe by their priuate iniuries, in hope there would be a season, in which their Soueraign might by timelie and sweet admonitions recouer the vse of himselfe,) not thinking it tollerable to bee now any longer silent, (and the rather, lest that Peirs, farther abusing his greatnesses, should * bring in Forreiners, not onely to the preiudice of the English lawes and customes, but of their authority also and places,) preuailed so much with the King, in a Parliament holden at London (where sundry prouisions concerning the liberties of the people, and execution of Iustice, were enacted, and by corporall oath confirmed by the King himselfe,) that among them, the decree of Gauestons perpetuall banishment, was by the king (ouercome with a meere necessity for satisfaction of the Kingdome, to whom the said Earle of Cornwall was odious) vnwillinglie suffered to passe; and the king was thereupon regratified with a Subsidie of the twentieth part of the subiects goods. The king also tooke his Oath not to reuoke the said Earle of Cornwall frō banishment (if it may be called a banishment) wherin * he had the kingdom of Ireland entrusted to his charge, and for the securing thereof against rebels, was furnished with men & money by the king.

(9) Yet forgetting, that those affections, which oftentimes deserue praise in a priuate person, are subiect to much construction in a publike, and neglecting both his deceased fathers so solemne adiurations, and also his owne oath, as careless of the sequele, hee cals Earle Peter home, with whose loue hee was most fondly, and most passionatelie transported, and (as if hee had receiued some diuine benefite) gaue him most ioyous welcome at the Castle of Flint in Northwales, and * bestowed vpon him for wife Ioan of Acres, Countesse of Gloceſter his sisters daughter, resoluing with himselfe to retaine his Gaueston, maugre all his Earles and Barons, or (for the loue of him) to put his Crowne and life in perill when time should serue. In which, whether the king or his fauourite shewed lesse discretion, it is not at the first sight easily determinable; it being as vnsafe for the one, with so offensiue behauiour, to affect immoderate shew and vse of grace, as for the other, to the iniury of his name and realme to bestow the same.

(10) The contemptibilitie and vanitie of this effeminate argument detaines vs longer, then for the qualitie thereof were fitting, did not so much mischiefe issue out of it. For Peirs (of his owne nature insolent) being thus (aboue reason, or his own darings) aduanced to alliance with the bloud royall, was so far from all amendment, as hee rather seemed to striue to outgoe himselfe in his former courses, consuming so much of the kings treasure and meanes, that he had * not wherewith to defray ordinarie charges, or to pay for the neceſſaries of his Court. The young Queene alſo tooke her ſelfe not to be a little wronged by this vngracious mans predominancie, & thereof ſent her complaints to the king of France her father, which concerned iniuries in the higheſt kind, as in her bed (the King being drawne by Gaueſton to *adultery) and in her honour and *maintenance. Whereupon the Peeres of the land, animated by the King of France, ſo confidently dealt with Edward, that his Earle now the third time did abiure the Realme: but (the King of France and his enemies making forraine parts vnſure for him to abide in) he returned in Chriſtmas to the generall perturbation of the Kingdome, and to his owne certaine ruine, for that the Barons (his aduerſaries) had gotten him baniſhed with this Prouiſo, * that if at any time afterward hee were taken in England, hee ſhould be forthwith apprehended and ſuffer death. But an Angell from heauen could not ſeeme more welcome, then this moſt faithful friend (as that * Courtier cals him) was vnto King Edward, who * forthwith aduanced him to be his principall Secretary.

(11) Vpon report of Gaueſtons returne, the chiefe Lords, aſwell Eccleſiaſticall as temporall (Walter Biſhoppe of Couentree excepted, * who allowed the Kings affections towards Gaueſton; and procured him to breake the former agreements, which were made and ſworne in the Parliament at London,) conſulted vpon a deſperat courſe of reformation in this point, and made choiſe of Thomas Earle of Lancaſter to be their leader. This Thomas was ſonne of Edmund Earle of Lancaſter, Leiceſter and Ferrers, ſecond ſonne of Henry the third King of England, and in right of his wife (after her fathers deceaſe, which hapned about this time) Earle of Lincolne, Salisburie, and (beſides many other great Lands in Yorkeſhire, Cumberland, and Wales) hee had the Earledom of * Arteys in Picardy, ſo that without compariſon hee was the greateſt ſubiect of the Kingdome.

(12) The Iſſue of which combination before we purſue, wee may not here in our way ouerſlippe a ſtrange alteration both here in England, and in all Chriſtendome, by the vniuerſall extinguiſhment of the Order of the Templars, wrought about this time by the procurement of the French King, who being ſo gracious with Pope Clement, that formerly hee ſent Ambaſſadors to craue of his holineſſe with great importunity, that the bones of his Predeceſſor Pope Boniface might bee burnt as being an Heretike*; ſo now alſo he ſo farre preuailed with him, that in the Councel at Vienna this ſo highly eſteemed Order, was vpon clear proofe of their generall odious ſinnes, and ſcarſe credible impieties, vtterly aboliſhed through Chriſtendome. The French King * cauſed 54. of that Order, together with their Great Maiſter to bee burnt at Paris; and though that King hoped to conuert all the Lands of that Societie to his ſonnes vſe, whom hee intended to make King of Ieruſalem; yet the Pope and Counceil annexed their poſſeſſions to the Order of the Knights Hoſpitalers, called commonly Knights of the Rhodes. Notwithſtanding, in England (where ſuch Papall commands went not alwayes for lawes) the heires of the Donours, and ſuch as had endowed the Templars here with landes, entred vpon thoſe parts of their ancient Patrimonies after the diſſolution of the Order, and (ſaith our * Courtier) detained them vntill not long after, they were by Parliament wholly tranſferred vnto the Knights of the Rhodes, *or of S. Iohn of Ieruſalem.

(13) King Edward was now at Yorke, and Earle Thomas, according to that which had beene concluded among the combined Lords, who reſolued to trie all extremities, rather then any longer to endure Peirs Gaueſton, (as being perſwaded while that King-bane breathed, peace could neither be maintained in the Realme, nor the King abound in treaſure, nor the Queene enioy his loue) ſent humble * petitions by honourable meſſengers to their Soueraigne, requeſting him to deliuer the man into their hands, or to driue him from his company out of England. But the ſelfe-wild King * preferring the deareneſſe of one ſtranger before the loue of the whole Realme, would not condiſcend.

(14) Afterward, Peirs (whom * the Earles purſued with an Armie) being * entruſted for his ſafe-guard to Aimerie de Valence Earle of Pembrok, was left by him but one night at a Village or Manour called Dathington betweene Oxford and Warwicke, (being a place neither * farre enough off, nor ſtrong enough) pretending to haue conuaied him on the next day to the Caſtle of Wallingford, the ſaid Aimerie in the meane ſpace departing to lodge with his Counteſſe, who lay hard by: but, the ſaid Aimerie conniuing thereat (as our * Courtier chargeth him, who alſo writes, that hee tooke a ſolemne oath before the king to doe his beſt to ſafe-conduct Gaueſton, the king purpoſing in the meane time to labour his peace with the Lords *vpon any conditions) Guy Earle of Warwicke with his people ſurpriſed him the ſame night, and took him to his Caſtle of Warwicke, where in a place called Blacklow (afterward * Gaueſhead) his head was ſtricken off at the commandement *and in the preſence of the Earles of Lancaſter, Warwicke, and Hereford, *as of one that had beene a ſubuerter of the lawes, and an open Traitour to the Kingdom. In which bold attempt, themſelues (who yet pretended ſo much ſtanding for the liberties of the land,) did moſt vnaduiſedly infringe a Capitall branch of the ſame Franchiſes, in putting to death an Earle, and ſo deare a friend of the Kings, * without any iudiciall proceeding by triall of his Peeres, which cauſed a laſting hatred betwixt the King and his Nobles.

(15) There wanted nothing now to King Edward but preſent meanes to reuenge the bloud of his friend, or rather of his halfe-ſelfe, the lacke wherof did encreaſe the ſorrow he tooke for his death; which being well knowne to the Lords, they reſolued not to lay downe Armes, till they had prouided for their ſecurity, and the performance of all ſuch points, as concerned the temperament of the Regall power, that (vnder colour thereof) the Nobles themſelues might finger ſome part of the Soueraigne gouernment. The King was then at London, and the Lords at Dunſtaple: but by the continuall interdealings of the Prelates, and of Gilbert Earle of Gloceſter, who ſtood neutrall, the kindling diſpleaſures were for the preſent allaied, vpon condition that the Lords ſhould reſtore to the King all ſuch things, once belonging to Peirs Gaueſton, as they had taken at Newcaſtle, which they accordingly did.

(16) King Edward neuertheleſſe, as if his ſoule were ouercaſt with ſome blacke cloud, continued mourning, till it pleaſed God to enlighten the world with the birth of a young Prince, whoſe noble Acts did afterward redeeme all the blemiſhes wherewith his Fathers infelicities had darkned the brightneſſe of the Engliſh name, and at this preſent cleared the mind of the ſorrowfull King his father: for *vpon Saint Brices day, Iſabel his Queene brought forth her firſt ſonne at Windſor, which cauſed great reioycing through the Kingdome. Her French kindred and friends (which were there in good numbers of either ſexe) & among them as chiefe, the Queens owne brother, Lewis the French Kings ſonne, would haue had the Infant at his Baptiſme named Lewis, but the Engliſh Lords would *not permit, who therfore was after his Fathers and Grandfathers name, called Edward. This was hee who afterward rayſed the honour of Engliſh Cheualrie to ſo high a point, by his famous victories in France and elſewhere.

(17) The euill will which the King bare in his mind againſt the Barons for their ouer-ruling his affections, and the death of Gaueſton, by ſundry bad offices and ſycophancies of the French* at Windſor was rubd ſo hard vpon, that it grew raw againe before it was halfe healed. Therefore in a Parliament at London the king ſharpely charged thoſe preſumpſumptuous Lords with their contempt againſt him in the ſpoiles they had committed at Newcaſtle, and (which moſt afflicted his languiſhing ſpirit) in taking, and wickedly killing Peirs Gaueſton. To all which, they ſtoutely anſwered, *that they had not offended in any point, but deſerued his roiall fauour, for that they had not gathered force againſt him, but againſt the publike enemie of the Realme, &c. Howbeit, to preuent the feared miſchiefe of ciuill Armes, by the working of the young Queene, of the Prelates, and Earle of Gloceſter, the Lords in open Court at Weſtminſter humbled themſelues to the King, praying grace; and the King granted to ſuch of them, as would deſire the ſame, his gracious pardon. The whole houſe of Parliament ſeeing the kings wants, of their own accord granted a Fifteenth; & al parts hereupon returned with ioy and peace, but not long after the Lord Guy de Beauchampe Earle of Warwicke, who in this Parliament was appointed to be of Priuie Councell with the King, deceaſed, being (as by the Barons wel-willers * it was ſaid) impoiſoned by ſuch of the Kings ſecret friends as did maligne him.

(18) The miſchieuous effects of the Kings former miſgouernment, beganne now moſt perilouſlie to diſcouer themſelues. For the Scots his neighbours, who could not bee ignorant of all ſuch griefes and maladies as feſtred in the heart and entrals of England, had long ſince made their timely vſe thereof, adhering ſo to the vndaunted Bruce, that by degrees hee had gotten a great ſtrength, and was againe publikely receiued, and obeied for King of Scotland, from moſt places whereof hee * draue the Engliſh, and (in contempt of Edward) committed great ſpoile by ſlaughter of People, burning of Townes in Northumberland, and other Acts of hoſtility. The principall charge of Scotland for King Edward had beene entruſted to the Lord Iohn Cumin a Scot, Earle of Bucquhan, whom * King Robert had vanquiſhed in battell, and was now (while Edward ſate bewitched with moſt vnworthy languiſhments) grown potent, ſending his Brother Edward Bruce to beſiege the Caſtle of Striuelin, which was in the hands of the Engliſh.

(19) The King of England awakened out of his ſlumbers with theſe Alarums, marched thereupon with a very great Armie toward the ſaid Caſtle. It pleaſeth Hector Boetius (putting off, as it were the Hiſtorian) to report maruellous thinges of the numbers of Souldiers which came with King Edward in this iourney; for (if he ſay true) there were not fewer then one hundreth and fifty thouſand horſemen, and as many thouſand footmen; and that we may not ſuſpect the multitude to bee far greater then either the cauſe required, or the realm of England could well afford, hee informeth vs, that beſides the Engliſh there were in his aid at this time, Hollanders, Zelanders, Brabanders, Flemings, Picards, Boloners, Gaſcoignes, Normans, with much people of many other Regions; and that beſides theſe three hundreth thouſand men of warre, there were infinite familes with their women, children, ſeruants, and houſhold-ſtuffe: but becauſe other Writers doe ingenuouſly grant, and containe probable matter enough for the honour of the Scottiſh Nation in this iourney, wee will as neare as wee can, (being things to vs neither vp nor downe, in regard of the long time ſince theſe hoſtilities hapned,) truely and freely, though briefly informe our ſelues hereof.

(20) The Earles of Lancaſter, Warren, Warwicke, and Arundel (the greateſt Peeres of the land) *refuſed to attend their King in this ſeruice, for that hee had delaied to ratifie the points of their deſired liberties, and prouiſions for the pretended better gouernment of England, by himſelfe ſo often conſented vnto. In which as their loyall affection cannot bee much admired: ſo it is certaine, that King Edward hereby vndertooke that voyage with farre the leſſe force eyther of men or counſell. Neuertheleſſe his hoaſt was great enough (if numbers did ſway in ſuch affaires, more then religon, diſcipline, and valour,) to haue effected more then it ſelfe did ſuffer. But King Edward and his people rather ſeemed to goe toward a wedding or a Triumph, then to a battell, * adorning themſelues with all ſorts of riches; gold, ſiluer, and the like toies, in a kind of wanton manner, correſpondent to the humour of the Prince whom they followed.

(21) In this iourney it was made manifeſt, what true and ſober valiancie could effect againſt light brauery and inſolency. King Robert lodged with his forces (being inferiour in numbers to the Engliſh) not farre off, where was nothing but a religious, *deuout and modeſt care, quickned (after manifold calamities, with a moſt noble deſire to recouer the libertie of their Country, and to ſettle the ſame into the hope whereof they were the rather erected by a freſh victorie, which they had obtained that day vpon certaine of the Engliſh *horſemen. King Edward on the contrary part nothing eſteeming ſo ſleight a preſage, reſolued vpon the very next (being Midſommer, or Saint Iohn Baptiſts day) to take a terrible reuenge vpon the Scots: but how to effect the ſame the care was not exceſſiue; for in his Campe, * Waſſaile, and Drinkehaile were thundered extraordinarily, as accounting themſelues ſure of the victory: which kind of impious ſelfe-truſt, if God Almighty did not ſometime ſcourge with iuſt and terrible confuſions, what outrages would not bee executed.

(22) Farre otherwiſe the Bruces Army: which by his commandement ſpent * the euening in making humble confeſsion of their ſinnes, that they might (ſaith our Author) bee ready on the morrow to receiue the bleſſed Sacrament, as accordingly they did: Moreouer to leaue nothing vndone which might aduance their cauſe; the Scots had digged before their Battalions, certaine * trenches or dikes *three foot deepe, and three foot broad, which (hauing fixed * ſharpe ſtakes in them with their points vpward) they couered ſo with * hurdles, that footemen treading warily) might paſſe, but not troupes of horſe. Next to Gods anger againſt the Engliſh, (whom courtly Pride and Sloth had now effeminated) this ſtratageme was the cauſe of their ruine: for whereas they repoſed much vpon their Cauallerie, in theſe Pit-falles, the fury of their charge was intercepted and broken, the riders being miſerablie ſlaine by the Scots, whom King Robert marching formoſt on foot, had preſented moſt couragiouſly to the enemy.

(23) The King of England not altogether careleſſe, neither yet by his care able to doe much (as one whom God was not well pleaſed with) had ordered his battels with ſome aduiſe, but vpon the diſmall and vnexpected diſcomfiture of his horſe in thoſe miſchieuous holes or ditches, was enforced, (after ſome troubled reſiſtance) to leaue to the Scots the greateſt victory that euer they had before or after. *Hardly could K. Edward bee drawne to flie: the courage which it became ſuch a Monarch to haue then firſt diſcloſing it ſelfe, till by his friends hee was enforced to ſeeke his preſeruation by that more neceſſary then noble meanes, and with him (beſides others) the Lord Hugh Spencer (whom our Courtier cals a faint hearted Kite) betooke himſelfe to like remedie.

(24) All things proued vnfortunate to the Engliſh in this iorney, for when they perceiued their Cauallerie thus miſerably ouerthrowne in the ditches, they ſhot their arrowes compaſſe, with purpoſe to kill or gall ſuch Scots as came to the execution, but did them little or no harme, as they who were armed in the fore-parts; and in ſtead of that, * ſlew their friends, whoſe backes being toward them were vnarmed.

(25) The loſſe fell much vpon the Nobleſt, for there were ſlaine in this Battell, Gilbert Earle of Gloceſter (a man of ſingular valour and wiſdom) the Lord Robert

Robert de Clifford, and beſides other Lords, about *ſeuen hundreth Knights, Eſquiers, and men of Armories. Of the reſt the ſlaughter could not bee but great, though much the leſſe, in regard the Scots fought on foot. Hector ſaith, that there were not ſlaine fewer then fifty thouſand Engliſh, no Writer elſe, that hitherto wee can meet with, exceedes the fifth part of that number; the riches gotten by ſpoiles and ranſomes of the Engliſh, were doubtleſſe very great. Among the number of priſoners, the principall was Humfrey de Bohun Earle of Hereford, but recouered afterward by exchange for King Roberts wife, who all this while was detained in England. This battell was fought at Banocksbourne neere Striuelin in Scotland.

(26) From this ouerthrow King Edward eſcaping to Berwicke, King Robert (who to his great glory, as hauing himſelfe beene trained vp among the Engliſh, vſed ſuch as were taken priſoners with ſingular* humanity) ſent thither to him the bodies of the Earle of Gloſter, & Lord Clifford, that they might receiue honourable interrement among their owne friends. But Edward (vnder whoſe vnfortunate leading the Engliſh name ſuſtained ſo great diſhonour and dammage) withdrew to Yorke, reſoluing (therein onely Princelike) to aſſemble new force, and either to bee reuenged, or to die. But * all enterpriſes and attempts of that nature miſcarried, for aboue twelue yeeres after; inſomuch that great feare raigned among the Northerne Engliſh, who lay open to the firſt brunts and violences of the Scots, ouer whom many faire dayes ſhone. And to augment the calamities of the North, many of the diſloiall Engliſh * conſpired with the enemie, and iointly ſpoyled the weſt parts of Northumberland, nothing being ſecure, but that which wals defended.

(27) God, to humble the Engliſh, who through long proſperities had forgotten both themſelues & him, drew not backe his heauy hand ſo; for ſeldom hath ſo terrible a famine beene heard of here, as ſucceeded to this ouerthrow: ſo that for moderation of prices, a Parliament was aſſembled at London: but (ſaith Walſingham) as if God had beene diſpleaſed at the ſaid rates (which not long after were repealed) things grew ſcarſer day by day: and the dearth was generally ſuch, that vpon Saint Laurences Eue, there was ſcarſely bread to be gotten for ſuſtentation of the Kings owne family. This famine which laſted about two yeeres was accompanied with much mortality of people.

(28) But neither the diſhonours taken in Scotland, nor innumerable afflictions and diſcontentments at home, made Edward ſuſpend the celebration of his Gaueſtons funerals; whoſe Body with great pompe hee cauſed to bee tranſferred from the place of his former buriall, (which was among the Friers Preachers at Oxford) to Kings-Langley in Hertfordſhire, where hee in perſon with the Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury, foure Biſhoppes, many Abbots, and principall Churchmen did honour the exequies, but few were preſent of the Nobility, whoſe great ſtomackes would not giue them leaue to attend. Somewhat alſo to ſweeten theſe generall acerbities, Lewelin Bren and his two ſonnes, were brought vp priſoners to London, hauing burnt many towns vpon the Marches, and committed ſome murthers with their Welſh adherents.

(29) Meane-while the ſtate of the Kingdome was miſerable, there being no loue betwixt the King and the Peeres, nor any great * care in him or them of the common affaires; neuertheleſſe they aſſembled at a Parliament in London, where no great matter was concluded: for the famine and peſtilence encreaſed. The famine was growne ſo terrible, that horſe, dogs, yea men and children were ſtolne for food, and (which is horrible to thinke) the theeues newly brought into the Gaoles, were torne in peeces, and eaten preſently halfe aliue, by ſuch as had been longer there. In London it was proclaimed, that no corne ſhould be conuerted to Brewers vſes, which Act the King (moued with compaſſion toward his Nation) imitating, cauſed to bee executed through all the Kingdome; otherwiſe (ſaith Walſingham) the greater part of the people had died with penury of bread. The bloudie flux or diſſenterie cauſed through raw and corrupt humors engendred by euil meat and diet, raged euery where, and together with other maladies brought ſuch multitudes of the poorer ſort to their end, that the liuing could ſcarſe ſuffice to bury the dead.

(30) The King was now in ſo great diſlike and diſtruſt with the Lords and Barons, that they would not appeare at Clarendon, where hee held a great Councell. To augment this fatall auerſion, a certaine Knight belonging to Iohn Earle Warren, ſtole away from Caneford in Derſetſhire, the wife of Thomas Earle of Lancaſter (chiefe of the Lords faction) not without the Kings conſent (as it was ſaid) and brought her to the ſaid Earle Warrens Caſtle at Rigate, with great pompe, and in deſpight of the Earle; whom one Richard de Saint Maurice, a wretched, lame, and bunchbackt Dwarfe challenged for wife, pretending that he was formerly contracted, and had lien with her, which ſhe (the greateſt and nobleſt Inheretrix of her time) did openly confeſſe, to her immortall infamie, incurring alas (ſaith Walſingham) the publike note of a moſt filthie ſtrumpet. This deformed Elfe (hauing mighty ſeconds) durſt hereupon claime the Earledomes of Lincolne and Salisburie as in her right, and in the meane time, the name and honor of Thomas the great Earle was baffold, as it were, by a light and wicked woman.

(31) The parts of England beyond Humber, were now more and more afflicted; for ſuch as till then had oppoſed themſelues againſt the Scots in defence of the Country, perceiuing all things left at large, inſtead of Protectors became Tyrants, * ſaith our Author; of defenders, deſtroyers; and of valiant Champions, treacherous Chapmen; ſo that as betweene the hammer and the anuile, the Scots vpon the one ſide, and theſe falſe Engliſh on the other, all was lamentable, and brought in a maner to nothing: and this face of things continued there about foure yeeres.

(32) Neither did the King ſeeme to haue any will or power to relieue the common calamities, but rather to conuert his whole both wits and forces vpon reuenges againſt the Lords, who vnder pretence of their extorted prouiſions, manifeſtly withdrew their loues, ſeruice and duties from him. wherfore feeling himſelfe thus weake and diſfurniſhed, he beſought the ſpirituall aſsiſtance of Pope Iohn the two and twentieth; who thereupon ſent certaine Cardinals to ſet all things in quiet without bloudſhed. Betweene the King and Earle of Lancaſter they eſtabliſhed a peace, who, in a * certaine plaine neere Leiceſter met, embraced and kiſſed each other; but when they could not worke the like with the Scots, they put that Country vnder Interdict.

(33) For they (as it is the manner of proſperity) after the victory at Banocksbourne, which clearely got them Scotland, did beginne to bethinke themſelues of gaining new Empire in Ireland. Thither Edward Bruce Brother of King Robert had paſſed with an Army, procuring * himſelfe to be crowned King thereof by fauour of ſome of the Iriſh Nobility, whom neuertheleſſe about three yeeres from his firſt entrance, the Engliſh vnder the conduct of the Archbiſhoppe of Armagh, and of Iohn Lord Brinningham Iuſticiar of Ireland, valiantly encountred, where, together with his late vſurped Kingdome, hee loſt his life. There were ſlaine in that battell many honourable Scots, beſides the new King Edward, and aboue * fiue thouſand others: his head was cut off * at Dundalke (ſaith VValſingham) but Hector Boetius writes that he was ſlaine in the battell it ſelfe. Thus did God temper one with another, and the iuſt reioycement which the Scots had conceiued of their so happie victory ouer the Engliſh at Bannockbourne, was ſowred with this loſſe.

(34) But King Robert (as a moſt expert and vigilant Prince) did not ſuffer this ioy to continue long to the Engliſh, for by practiſe with one * Peter Spalding to whom King Edward had entruſted the keeping of Berwicke, hee recouered it from the Engliſh, ſaith * Harding, By treatie, with Peace, Spalding, and treaſon; after it had remained twenty yeers in their poſſeſſion; which when King Edward thought to haue wonne againe, the Scots diuerted him from the ſiege, with incurſions and ſlaughters of his people in other parts of England, not failing much of ſurpriſing the Queene in a village not farre from Yorke, where ſhe ſoiourned during the ſiege at Berwicke, the plot being laid, and drawne between the Scots and ſome perfidious Engliſh, whom King Robert had monied for that purpoſe. But Spalding after the treaſon done had the reward of a * Traitour, for King Robert put him to death.

(35) To giue ſome breathings after theſe ſo manifold troubles, a truce was agreed vpon and confirmed betweene the two Kings of England and of Scotland, for the ſpace of two yeeres, which brought forth confuſion and not refreſhment. For thus it hapned; The King vpon the commendation of the *Lords themſelues, had made Hugh de Spenſer Lord Chamberlaine, who being at the leaſt of equall inſolence, vices, and ambition to Gaueſton, ſo wrought that hee ſucceeded in ſhort time to all the graces of familiarity and power which euer Gaueſton enioyed, as in like ſort to all his hatred and enuie. Hugh his father an ancient Knight, the better to ſtrengthen his ſonnes courſes, was likewiſe imployed, and grew in ſpeciall fauour with the King, who afterward alſo created him Earle of Wincheſter, but the father in manners vnlike to the ſonne, was ruined rather by a naturall tenderneſſe, then any malicious will. The ſonne, as hee was of ſhape moſt louely, ſo the vetie ſpirit it ſelfe of pride and rapine, carried him to all ſorts of intollerable behauiours and oppreſſions, that Gaueſton might with good reaſon ſeeme to be wiſhed for againe. Againſt theſe two, who wholy ſwayed the vnfortunate King, Thomas Earle of Lancaſter, and in a manner all the Barons of the Kingdome, (who meant the King ſhould loue none but with their leaue) did ſwell with ſuch impatience, that (not contented with the waſt of their lands) they neuer reſted till (by the terror of ciuill Armes) thoſe two fauourites (father and ſonne) were baniſhed; they thus reuenging vnder publike pretexts both publike iniuries and * their owne.

(36) In all contentions which hapned betweene the King and his Lords, Queene Iſabel had euer hitherto beene a maker of Peace, doing therein worthy offices, but the euill ſtarres of the Earles of Lancaſter and Hereford would not ſuffer her to continue any longer ſo: for the Queene being denied lodging one night at the Caſtle of Leedes in Kent, which belonged to the Lord of Badlesmere (one of the Earles faction) ſhe withdrew her good conceite, and was an author to the King of preſently reuenging that diſhonour, who vpon her complaint, came in perſon with many thouſand Souldiers before the Caſtle, tooke the * Captaine, and put both him and all the men therein to ſhamefull death. Moreouer, longing to bee righted againſt the Lords for their late inſolencies, marched on to Cirecſter taking many Caſtles, and beſieging others: The Lords (who little ſuſpected any ſuch ſodaine aſſaults) prouiding in the meane time for their defence.

(37) Thither repaired to him (at his commandement) Hugh Spenſer the ſonne, who had houered vpon the Sea, expecting from thence the ſucceſſe of things vpon the land. The Lords, who had falne from their Soueraignes good conceit, and wanting now their wonted Mediatrix the Queene, lay open to all the miſchiefe which enemies could work them by the King, who (as taking his regall power and authority to be in danger) reſolued wiſely and manfully, to die in the quarrell, or to bring the Lords to be at his commandement. Meane time the iudgement giuen againſt the Spenſers was reuerſed as erroneous, and their reuocation decreed at London by the * Archbiſhoppe of Canterburie and his Suffragans.

(38) The Lords not all of a like temper began to miſdoubt, and many of them forſooke their Chiefe, (the Earle of Lancaſter) and rendred themſelues to the King, or were apprehended; among which were the two Rogers Mortimers, who were committed to the Tower of London, and others to Wallingford Caſtle. The faction weakened by this defection made head in the North, vnder the Earle of Lancaſter, who now was to fight for his life. Thither the King marcheth, and with the onely ſhew of his Armie, made the Earle to flie from Burton vpon Trent, whoſe forces in their retreat or flight behaued themſelues outragiouſly.

(39) But Gods heauie diſpleaſure, and the Arme of the Kings power left them not ſo: for at Burrowbrigge, Humfrey de Bohun was ſlaine by a Welſhman; who thruſt him into the body with a Speare from vnder the Bridge; and the Earle of Lancaſter him ſelfe with other principall men, Barons and knights, to the number of aboue * foureſcore and ten were taken priſoners, by a man of ſmall fortunes, Andrew de Herckley Captaine of the City of Carleil, and Sir Simon Ward, * Captaine of Yorke, who with great forces out of thoſe parts, ſtopt their farther paſſage at Burrowbrigge, as the Kings forces tooke all ſafegard from them behind.

(40) The third day after their apprehenſion, the * King in perſon being ſet in iudgement at Pontfract, and with him Edmund Earle of Kent, Aymerie Earle of Pembroke, Iohn de Warren Earle of Surrey, and among * others, the Lord Hugh de Spenſer the Father, as alſo * Hugh Spenſer his ſonne; the Earle of Lancaſter was brought before them, and had ſentence pronounced againſt him * by the ſaid Andrew de Herckley (created afterward Earle of Carliel) and the Kings Iuſticiar, the * Lord Mapleſthorpe, as againſt an Arch-Traitour; neuertheleſſe, for reuerence of his bloud (being the Kings neere Kinſman) drawing and hanging were remitted vnto him, but his head was ſtricken off the ſame day without the Towne of Pontfract.

(41) Nor ſatisfied herewith, the King gaue full way to reuenge, putting to ſhamefull death, by drawing, hanging, and (as ſome write) * quartering in ſundry places, all the Barons (the Lord Roger D'amarie onely excepted, who died of his naturall death) with ſundry Baronets and Knights taken at Burroughbrig and elſewhere. The Lord Badlesmere (at whoſe houſe this tragicall fire beganne) was executed at Canterburie. And that ſo great and mighty a man as Thomas Earle of Lancaſter, ſhould not ſeeme to die without a bloudie complement ſutable to his condition; there were hanged and quartered vpon the ſame day at Pontefract * fiue or * ſixe Barons; and the next day at Yorke were hanged in yron chaines, the Lords Clifford, Mowbray, Dey-ncll; and others afterward in other places, to the number in all (though all of them not Barons) of * twenty and two, the chiefeſt Captaines of the Realme ſuffered death for their diſloyalties. Threeſcore and twelue Knights more were diſperſed into ſundry priſons, who (ſaith De la Moore) vpon fines paid had afterward their Liberties.

(42) As for the ſaid Thomas Earle of Lancaſter, there are ſo many reaſons why he cannot reaſonably be iudged either a good ſubiect or a good man, that we may worthily wonder why ſome at that time ſhould repute him a Saint. Certainely, the wiſe and diſcreet old Writers are not ſo opinionated of him; but note his priuate life for * vicious, himſelfe to be nothing * valorous, and of the publike * not well deſeruing, omitting his contumelious behauiours toward the King his Soueraign Lord in his diſcomforts, which as Walsingham forgets not to relate, ſo thinkes he that the like was worthily vſed toward that Earle himſelfe, who, when hee was brought priſoner to Pontfract (his owne Caſtle but then ſurrendred) the whole multitude derided, and called him in ſcorne King Arthur: by which name hee was deſigned (as *ſome write) in the Scottiſh Cypher intercepted, prouing a conſpiracy with Scots: but the very ſhoppe, where his and the other Barons original Treaſons were forged, was the Parliament houſe, wherein from time to time, they forced on the King preſumptuous and treaſonous Ordinations, whereby the Peeres challenged, *not onely to reforme the Kings houſe and Councell, and to place and diſplace all great Officers at their pleaſure, but euen a ioint intereſt in the Regiment of the Kingdome together with the King, which William Inge (a Iudge of the Common-Law) with other like ſticklers, traiterouſly perſwading them to be according to Law.

(43) Of his ill deſeruings toward the common-Weale (who for the good thereof could not diſgeſt any indignity) let this bee a kind of demonſtration: for when King Edward hauing by ſtrait ſiege brought Berwicke neere to termes of yeelding, chanced once to breake forth (after his vaine manner) into theſe words; The Lord Hugh Spenſer ſhall be captaine of the Caſtle, when it is taken: the Earle forthwith with others of his affection abandoned the ſeruice: by reaſon of which departure, it was thought that Berwicke was not as then obtained, * and that the enemy thereby had great aduantage in all their attempts. The names of ſuch Barons (beſides Banerets, and ſome few others of ſpecial note) as periſhed by hatchet and halter for this buſineſſe, as out of ſo great variety of Writers wee could now gather them were,

Neuer did Engliſh earth at one time drinke ſo much bloud of her Nobles in ſo vile manner ſhed as at this, which, whatſoeuer could bee pretended (as doubtleſſe their offence was capitall) yet all was taken to be done as in the quarrell of the Spenſers onely, nor was it vnreuenged, as will appeare: in the mean ſpace their enemies not contented with their bloud, procured alſo the *confiſcation of their eſtates and inheritances.

*Fabian. Holinſh. p. 332. c. 1.

(44) King Edward thinking that this exploit had made him terrible aſwell to the Scots, as it had done to the Engliſh, marcheth with a mighty hoaſt into Scotland, from whence not long after (for want of victuals) hee was compelled to returne without the honor of any atchieuement, and being * vpon his returne, was ſodainely by Scots aſſailed in the night, very narrowly eſcaping in his owne perſon, and with a few ſaued himſelf by flight, leauing his *treaſure & furniture for pillage, and ſo came ſorrowfull to Yorke. Iohn de Britain Earle of Richmond, was taken priſoner by the enemy, and the reſt of the Country defaced with deſtructions as farre as to the wals of that City.

(45) Thus * paſſed this yeere, to the Engliſh full of loſſe, reproach, and lamentation, by reaſon of their inteſtine diſcord and the ſhambles of their Nobles: to the King infamous, and hatefull alſo for his vnfortunate iourney into the Northern parts, &c. But theſe bloudy and tempeſtuous winds blew ſome to profit; for * during the ſpace of about fiue yeeres after, the fortune of the Spencers hugely encreaſed, and the Queenes decreaſed, who (for her relenting toward the Lords, & expreſſing ſome diſlikes of theſe ranckly-growing weeds) was grown to beare a ſhare in the perſecution. And that theſe with ſuch like violent men working vpon the Kings inclination, were the onely Authors of that ſharpe reuenge taken vpon the Lords, for their particular and inglorious enrichment (for what elſe can we call the ſame, ſince that they betraide thereby their Soueraignes Crown and Life to ſpeedie deſtruction?) let it by this in part appeare, and moue the world the rather to pitty the ſeduced.

(46) Among them who were condemned for riſing with the Earle of Lancaſter, there was one of a meane Familie, for whoſe life neuertheleſſe, becauſe hee had once ſerued in Court, and was pleaſing to ſome of the Grands, or Potent fauourites therein, many interceded, and preſſed the king ſo farre on his behalfe, that he brake out into theſe * moſt vehement words; A plague vpon you, for curſed whiſperers, malicious backe-biters, wicked counſellors, entreat you ſo for the life of a moſt notorious knaue, who would not ſpeake one word for the life of my neere Kinſman, that moſt noble Knight Earle Thomas? Had hee liued, wee and our whole Realme ſhould haue had ſpeciall need and vſe of him. This fellow the longer hee liues, the more villanies he wil commit, as hauing already filled my Kingdome with his deſperate outrages. By the ſoule of God hee ſhall therefore die the death he hath deſerued.

A.D. 13 King Edward moſt bitterly vpbraids the Earle of Lancaſters death.

* Walſingham them verbis imperj.

(47) By this then it is euident, that theſe tragedies againſt the Lords were exploited by others; in which it is plaine that this King (otherwiſe ſo deuout to God, ſo noble and ſo full of naturall good propenſions) was fatally ouer-wrought by wicked counſell; though hee therein bee inexcuſable, for good nature (as wee call it) cannot ſatisfie for publike errours. But the condemned man was forthwith put to death accordingly; the King being moſt highlie offended, that none had entreated him on the Earles behalfe, whom (ſaith Walſingham) he did inwardlie loue. Neuertheleſſe, he had not long before created the elder Spenſer Earle of Wincheſter, and deckt the plume of his fortunes with a toppe-feather taken out of the ſaid late Earle of Lancaſters eſtate, that is to ſay, with the Caſtle and honour of * Donington, parcell of the Earledome of Lincolne. Having thus farre ſhewed the originall of the miſchiefe, wee will haſten now to the laſt Act or Cataſtrophe of our Edwards tragedie, onely wee will firſt remember ſome intercurring matters.

*Tho. Vv.

(48) You haue heard before, how that the Cardinals ſent from the Pope, had (in fauour of the Engliſh) put Scotland vnder Interdict; wherefore King Robert now at laſt diſpatched the Biſhop of Glaſcow, and Thomas Randolfe Earle of Murrey to Rome, for obtaining releaſe and abſolution, but they returned without effecting it. Whereupon King Robert moued to haue a truce for thirteene yeeres, which King Edward accordingly granted, and the Pope * then abſolued the Scots. The matters of Scotland ſeemed thus to be ſufficiently prouided for during that time, and the rather for that ſomewhat before the motion for truce, the King had cauſed the newly created Earle of Carlile Andrew de Herkley to be degraded, hanged, drawne and quartered for treaſon, which hee was conuinced to haue entred into with the

* Pol. Virg.

Scots

Scots, vpon * whom he had before done speciall ſeruices, as hauing for that cauſe the Caſtle and Citie of Carleil committed to his gouernment. The truce with Scotland being thus confirmed, the King makes his progreſſe through the * Counties of Yorke and Lancaſter, and the Marches of Wales, from whence the late ſeditious had their nouriſhments, taking wiſe & carefull courſes for miniſtration of Iuſtice there, and preuention of like inconueniences, by puniſhing their Authors ſeuerely. And Iuſtices * void of all corruption, were appointed elſe-where.

(49) In the meane ſpace, the new King of France Charles the fifth, a moſt earneſt enemie to the Engliſh mens poſſeſſions there, ſought occaſions of quarrell with King Edward, who while hee conſuled at home how to order that affaire, the yong L. Roger Mortimer, one whom the Diuell (ſaith our * Courtier) reſerued to kindle new diſſention with, and to ſtirre vp a moſt miſerable ciuill warre, hauing corrupted his Keepers, or (as ſome others write) hauing potioned them with * a ſleepy drinke, eſcaped out of the Tower of London, getting ouer clearely without any empeachment into France.

(50) The Spenſers both father and ſonne, the one thus created Earle of Wincheſter, and the other Earle of Gloceſter, aſpiring to the fulneſſe of command, and deſirous to leaue nothing in their eye, which might ſtumble their ſway with the King, failed not to beget immortall enmities both againſt themſelues and the King. The Queene tooke their carriage ſo heinouſly, becauſe (beſides other things) they had abridged her meanes of maintenance, (while themſelues abounded in all riches and magnificence) as ſhee complained * That the daughter and ſole heire of the king of France was married to a gripple miſer, and that being promiſed to be a Queene, ſhee was become no better then a waiting woman, liuing vpon a penſion from the Spenſers.

(51) Thus was the matter, and as it were, the Embrion, of their common deſtruction laid, and begun in the impotencie of a womans will, to helpe out the which with ſhrewd drifts and directions, they encreaſe her ſide with Adam Biſhoppe of Hereford, by ſtripping him out of all his Temporalties as a Traitour, for that hee had ſupported the Mortimers in the Barons quarrell. This Adam (ſaith our Knight) was a man of moſt ſubtle witte, and in all worldly pollicies profound, daring to doe great things and factious withall, who for this cauſe conceiuing deepeſt hate, and therefore eaſily growing deare to the Queene, made a great ſecret party. To which Henrie Burwaſh Biſhoppe of Lincoln, who (for like cauſes) had beene kept from his temporalties (about two yeeres) ioyned himſelfe. Neither would the Spenſers auarice ſuffer them to weaken the multitudes of their enemies, for they ſold the Kings gracious fauour to ſuch as had beene in the Barons quarrell, at ſo great rates that they by granting away lands and Manours to the ſaid Lords Spenſers for their pardons &c. verie many of the Nobles were empoueriſhed. To be ſhort, the royall power being in the hands of the Spenſers, and Roger Baldock Chancellour, or of their Creatures and Fauourites; this other faction had the generall diſcontentments of the Realme to worke vpon for their aduantage.

(52) The King thus guiding himſelfe, and hauing ſent his Brother Edmund Earle of Kent (vpon notice of the firſt troubles) with Forces into Gaſcoigne, who gaue ſome little ſtay for a time to the French proceedings, till they might otherwiſe bee prouided for, it came to this point at laſt: that whereas the King had a purpoſe to haue gone in perſon into France, the Spenſers who were afraid to bee ſeuered from his perſon, the onely reuerence whereof they knew to bee their ſafegard, and yet not daring to attend him thither, or ſtay behind, * perſwaded the King contrary to the minds of all the reſt, that the Queene (who ſought it) ſhould goe and negociate her husbands affaire in France. She did ſo; and whereas before her departure, things were in great extremity betweene the two Nations, inſomuch that all the French were baniſhed out of England, not they who were attendant on the Queen her ſelfe in neereſt place being ſpared, all matters by her negotiation and ſuite were quieted; vpon condition that King Edward ſhould giue to his ſonne Edward of Windſor (afterward King) the Dutchy of Aquitaine, and Earledome of Pontine, for which the king of France was pleaſed to accept his ſaid young Nephewes homage.

(53) This was done, and the Prince ſent ouer for that purpoſe to his mother, to the vtter vndoing of the King his Father, and of all his fauourites. For the heire of England being in forraine parts, among the contrary faction, all the conſultation was (vnder colour of ruining the Spenſers,) to accompliſh farther matters. The Prince, hauing (at Boys de Vincens) done his homage for that Dutchie and County to his vncle Charles de Valois King of France, was (as alſo the Queene his mother) ſent for backe by the King about Michaelmas; but the Queenes conſpiracie being not yet ripe, ſhee deferred to obay, detaining her ſonne ſtill.

(54) There went ouer with the young Prince, among many others, Walter Stapleton, Biſhoppe of Exceſter, who perceiuing into what familiarity the Lord Roger Mortimer was growne with the Queene, which * ſeemed greater then either ſtood with her honour or dutie, and ſeeing both him and other of the Kings enemies, and fugitiues enioy that priuacie in counſell, which was aſſigned to himſelfe, who was now (as being none of theirs) * excluded, returned ſecretly (though vnſent for) into England, faithfully (as it became a good man) declaring his knowledge.

(55) The King now clearely beholding his errour in his dangers * ſolicited the King of France to ſend home his wife and ſonne, but that not ſucceeding, he cauſed them * openly in London to be proclaimed enemies of the Kingdome, baniſhing them with all their adherents out of the ſame. For his more aſſurance alſo hee cauſed the Ports to bee moſt narrowly watcht. Finally, to draw all his dangers to a ſhort diſpatch, there was (as was ſuppoſed) a plot laid for * making away the Queene and Prince, but Gods will was to fruſtrate it.

(56) The Queen, on the other ſide, fearing that the * Spenſers gold had laid traines to blow her whole proceedings vp in France, kept her ſelfe out of the way, till with the Prince, the Lord Roger Mortimer, and other their adherents, they were ſafely gotten into Henault: There might bee ſome other reaſon alſo and neceſſary to moue Queene Iſabel to depart out of France, beſide the doubt of that kind of corruption in the Peeres thereof: as to turne off a warre from thence being her natiue Country, which for her cauſe was afflicted in the Sea-ſtrengthes therof; for Sir Iohn Oturwin, Sir Nicholas Kiried, and Sir Iohn de Felton, with the Nauie of the Ports, and of other places, had by commiſsion from the King ſo ſcowred the narrow Seas, that they within a ſhort time brought into England as lawfull prize, * an hundreth and twenty Norman ſhippes or veſſels. Moreouer, whereas thoſe two Biſhoppes which the Pope had ſent, were returned ſorrowfull out of England, not onely without doing any good on her behalfe, but alſo without hope of doing any, ſhee might eaſily be perſwaded that the ſword muſt doe it, or nothing.

(57) But in Henault ſhee found moſt honourable and louing welcome of the Earle, where, therefore (without the conſent or aduiſe of the Peeres of England) ſhee enſured (ſaith our * Author) that delight and terrour of the whole world, her ſonne, being then about foureteene yeeres old, to Philippa the ſaid Earles daughter, and with the money of her portion waged ſouldiers out of Henault and Germany, to tranſport sport into England. There her friends expected her arriuall dayly, of which the Bishoppes of Hereford and Lincolne were not meanest: Her men and Nauie being now readie, shee with her sonne the Prince, the Lord Edmund Earle of Kent his vncle, * Aimerie de Valence Earle of Pembroke, the Lord Iohn of Henault, the Earle of Henaults brother (a valiant Gentleman) the Lord Roger Mortimer, and many other English-men of name and note, with aboue two thousand and seuen hundred Henowayes and Germans, vnder the leading of the said Lord Iohn, arriued at Orwell in Suffolke vpon the Friday before Saint Michaels day.

* Harding.c. 176.

The kings proceedings after the Queenes arriuall.

(58) Her arriuall being reported to the King (who was, poore Prince, not onely destitute of friends and meanes, but as it seemes, of courage, and counsell also) it did not at first seeme credible. The truth appearing, he demaunded assistance of the City of London, whose answere was, That they would honour with all dutie, the King, the Queene, and Prince, but would shut their gates against forreiners, and traitors to the Realme, and with all their powers withstand them. In this answere the King and his few friends reposing no assurance, he committed an errour worse then that former of sending his sonne out of England, by retiring himselfe into the West, with his inseparable fauourites the Spensers, Baldocke and others there, to raise a force against the Queene: but before hee went, hee left his other sonne, the Lord Iohn (called of Eltham) in the Tower of London with the Coūtesse of Gloceſter, the Kings Neece, wife to the yonger Spenser Earle of Gloceſter, committing the Tower it selfe to Sir Iohn de Weſton, who was well prouided of men and victuals. Hee commanded all men also to destroy and kill the Queenes partakers, none excepted but her selfe, her sonne, and Edmund Earle of Kent, the Kings brother by the Father, and that none, vpon paine of death, and losse of all that they might leese, should aid or assist them: and that hee should haue a thousand pound, who did bring the Lord Mortimers head. Thus tooke hee his last leaue of London, and in a maner also of his Rule or Domination.

(59) On the contrary part, there repaired to the Queene the Earle Marshall, and Henry Earle of Leiceſter, the Bishops of Lincolne, Hereford, Ely, and of Barons, Knights, and armed Souldiers no small multitude, whom aswell to retain, as to draw more, letters and rumors flew about, declaring (though falsly) that the King of France had in the aide of his sister sent so many Dukes, Earles, and others, that England could scarse suffice to feed them. This, for such whom the opinion of warlike strength would winne: but those whom shew of Religion might moue, it was as cunningly, and as falsly spread, that the Pope had excommunicated all such as did take armes against the Queene, and (the more to countenance the fiction) that two Cardinals imployed about the Premisses, were seen in the Queens Campe. Then was it proclaimed that the causes of her comming were to deliuer the Realme from the misleaders of the King, which were named to be the Spensers, Roger Baldock Bishoppe of Norwich, Lord Chancellor and their Fautors; all others to be safe, and that nothing should bee taken from any other subiect without true payment; but finally, that he who broght the yonger Spensers head should haue two thousand pounds. These things first thus ordered, the Queen with her sonne and whole power pursues the King (as it had beene agreede by the Councell of warre) taking first her way to Oxford: where the *whole Vniuersity being called together, in the presence of the Queene, the Prince, Roger Mortimer and the rest of that troope, the Bishop of Hereford (the Queenes bosome Counsellor) preaching to them on this Text, My head, my head aketh*, deliuered to them the reasons of the Queens comming with her Army, concluding (more like a Butcher then a Diuine) that an aking & sick head of a kingdom, was of necessity to be taken off, and not to be tampered with by any other physicke.

*2 Kin. c. 4. v. 19

(60) The Londoners in fauour of the Queene, and hatred of the Spensers committed sundry outrages, besides bloudy sacrilege in cutting off the Bishop of Exceſters head, and some others (whom the King had made Guardian of London) in their popular fury, among the which one of them was a Citizen of their owne Iohn le Marchal, who had beene of the yonger Spensers acquaintance. The Tower of London they get into their possession, placing and displacing the Garrison and Officers therein at their pleasure, vnder the name of the Lord Iohn of Eltham, the Kings second sonne, whom they proclaimed Custos of the City, and of the Land. They also set at liberty all prisoners, which by the popular Queenes commandement was done through the whole Realme: and all banished men and fugitiues were reuoked; who all * flocking vnto London, brought no small encrease to her forces.

(61) Whither in the meane space doth wofull Edward flie? what force, what course, what way takes hee poore Prince? O fearefull condition of so great a Monarches State, when a Wife, a Sonne, a Kingdome are not trusted, and those onely are trusted who had nothing strong, but a will to liue and die with him. The Queene passing from Oxford to Gloceſter (onward to the siege of Briſtow Castle) grew all the while in her strengths like a rowled snow-ball, or as a Riuer which spreades still broader from the fountaine to the Ocean, * vires acquirit eundo. For thither repaired to her (for the loue of the young Prince) the Lord Percy, the Lord Wake, and others aswell out of the North, as Marches of Wales. But Edward (hauing left the Earle of Winchester, the elder Lord Spenser, in the Castell of Briſtol for the keeping thereof) meditates flight with a few into the Isle of Lundie in Seuerne Sea, or into Ireland, & while hee wandreth about not finding where to rest safe, his roiall credite, name, and power, (like a Cliffe which falling from the toppe of some huge rocke, breakes into the more pieces, the farther it rolles) are daylie more and more diminisht as they scatter, till now at last they are come vnto a very nothing. After a weeke therefore spent vpon the Sea, Sir Thomas Blunt forsaking him, and comming to the Queene, he came on shore in Glamorganshire, where with his few friends hee entrusted himselfe to God, and the faith of the Welsh (who indeed still loued him) lying hidden among them in the Abbey of * Neath.

(62) Now had the Queene and her sonne (for his name was abused to all sorts of turne-seruings) taken the elder Lord Spenser at the Castell of Briſtol, who (without any forme of triall) was cruelly cut vp aliue and quartered (saith de la Moore our Knight) being * first at the clamours of the people, drawne and hanged in his proper Armories vpon the common Gallowes without the City: but his grandchild Hugolin stood so valiantly in defence of himself within the Castell of Kerfilli, that hee had his life and the liues of all his assistants saued.

(63) The King not appearing, Proclamations were euery day made in the Queenes Armie, declaring, * That it was the common consent of the realm that hee should returne, and * receiue the gouernement thereof, so as he would conforme himselfe to his people. This (whether Stratageme or Truth) not preuailing, Henry Earle of Lancaster the late Earles Brother, Sir William la Zouch, and Rheſe ap-Howell a Welshman, who all of them had Lands in those parts where the King concealed himselfe, were sent with coine and forces to discouer and take him. The Queene and her people lay in the City of Hereford, the Episcopall See of that great * Arch-plotter of her courses Adam de Orlton, where by aduise and consent of the Lords, her sonne the Duke of Aquitaine was made High-Keeper of England, and they as to the Custos of the same, did sweare him fealty. And here also the Bishoppe of Norwich was made Chancellor of of the Realme, and the Bishoppe of Winchester Treasurer.

(65) What will not money, diligence and faire words doe; with corrupt dispositions, euen to euerting of all bands of either religious or ciuill duties? By such meanes therefore the desolate, sad, and vnfortunate King, * came into his cosen of Lancasters hands, and with him the yonger Lord Spenser Earle of Gloecester, Robert Baldock Lord Chancellour and Simon de Reding, there being no regard had to the detention of any other. The King was conueied by the Earle from the place of his surprise to Monmouth, to Ledburie, and so to the Castell of Kenelworth belonging to the Earle of Leicester, who was appointed to attend him, that is, to keepe him safe. The other three, Spenser, Baldock and Reeding were strongly guarded to Hereford, there to bee disposed of at the pleasure of their most capitall enemies.

(66) Before whose comming to satisfie Roger Mortimer, the Lord Edmund Earle of Arundel, and two Gentlemen Daniel and Micheldene were beheaded at Hereford: The Lord Mortimer was so high in the Queenes fauour, that she could doe no lesse (as weee may suppose) then gratifie him with a few hated heades. But (Mortimer) there will bee a time, when the cry of this, and other bloud sacrificed to thy priuate reuenge (while thou abusest the publike trust) will neuer giue ouer the pursuit, till it hath deseruedly drawne thine in lieu thereof.

(67) The Lord Spenser and the rest, * on whom William Trussell the Iudge gaue sentence of death, being now drawne to Hereford, the said Lord being clad in his coat-armour, was most despitefully dragged to the place of execution, where being first hung vpon a gallowes fifty foot high, hee was afterward headed, and cut into quarters; they who brought him to the Queene, hauing the promised summe of two thousand pounds distributed among them for reward. His head was set vp at London, and his quarters in foure parts of the Kingdome. Simon de Reding was hanged ten foot lower then hee in the same place.

(68) This Execution (saith Walsingham) was done vpon a Munday in reuenge of the death of Thomas Earle of Lancaster, whose bloud was likewise shed vpon a Munday. Robert Baldock late Lord Chancellor was committed to the keeping of the Bishop of Hereford, who after a time caused him to bee brought vp to Hereford-house in London, where the tumultuous people (not without the Bishoppe of Herefords secret approuement as was said) tooke him violently away, and (though he were a Priest) thrust him into Newgate, where they vsed him so vnhandsomly, that albeit they had no accusation, but onely for being faithfull to his Soueraigne, wherewith to * charge him, he not long after died in prison; to whom (saith De la Moore) might be applied that of Quintilian, Torquentem vincit quisquis occidstur.

(69) The mournefull King being at Kenelworth Castle, there repaired thither the Bishops of * Winchester, Hereford, and Lincolne, * two Earles, two Abbots, foure Barons, * two Iustices, three Knights for euery County, and for London, and other principall places (chiefly for the fiue Ports) a certaine chosen number, selected by the Parliament, which then the Queene and her Sonne held at London. The Bishops of Winchester and Lincolne (as it was agreede vpon) came thither before any of the rest, alwell to giue the King to vnderstand what kind of Embassage was approaching, as to prepare him by the best Arguments they could to satisfie the desire, and expectation of their new moulded common-weale, which could onely be by resignation of the Crowne, that his Sonne (whom the body of the then confused State had elected) might raigne in his stead.

(70) When they were admitted to his presence, (the Earle of Leicester being by) they together so wrought him, partly with shewing a necessity, partly with other reasons drawne out of common places, throughly studied for that purpose, that (though not without many sobs and teares) hee finally did not dissent, if his answere were truely reported (which * som doubt of) vnto the Parliament. * For they tolde "him that the Common-weale had conceiued so ir- "reconciliable dislikes of his gouernment, the par- "ticulars whereof had beene opened in the generall "assembly at London, that it was resolued neuer to "endure him as King any longer. That notwithstan- "ding, those dislikes had not extended themselues "so farre, as for his sake to exclude his issue, but that "with vniuersall applause, and ioy, the Common- "weale had in Parliament elected his eldest sonne "the Lord Edward for King. That it would be a ve- "ry acceptable thing to God, willingly to giue o- "uer an earthly Kingdome for the common-good "and quiet of his Country, which they said could "not otherwise bee secured. That yet his honour "should be no lesse after the resignation, then it was "before, onely him the common-weale would ne- "uer suffer to raigne any longer. They finally durst "tell him, that vnlesse hee did of himselfe renounce "his Crowne and Scepter, the people would neither "endure him, nor any of his Children as their So- "ueraigne, but disclaiming all homage and fealty, "would elect some * other for King, who should not "bee of the bloud.

(71) The whole Company sent by the body of State (if it may bee called a Body which then had no Head there) from London, where it attended their returne, being placed by the Bishoppe of Hereford, according to their degrees, in the Presence Chamber at Kenelworth Castle, the King gowned in blacke came forth at last out of an inward roome, and presented himselfe to his vassals, where (as being Priuie to their errand) sorrow stroke such a chilnesse into him, that hee fell to the earth, lying stretched forth in a deadly swown; The Earle of Leicester, and the Bishoppe of Winchester beholding this, ranne vnto him, and with much labour recouered the half-dead king, setting him vpon his feet. As rufull & heauy as this sight was, we read not yet of any acts or effects of compassion expressed towards him at this present; so setled (as it seemed) was the hatred and auersion. The King being now (we cannot say) come to himselfe, but to the sense of his misery, the Bishoppe of Hereford declares the cause of their present Embassie, and running ouer the former points, concludes as before, saying, (as in the person of the commonwealth) That the King must resigne his Diademe to his eldest sonne, or after the refusall suffer them to elect such a person as themselues should iudge to be most fit and able to defend the Kingdome.

(72) The dolorous King hauing heard this speech, brake forth into sighes and teares; and being (saith his * most fauourable reporter) more ready to sacrifice his body for Christs cause, then once to behold the disinherison of his sonnes, or (through his occasion) the perpetuall disturbance of the Kingdome, (as knowing, saith he, that a good shepheard should giue his life for his flocke,) made at the last his an- "swere to this effect. * That hee knew that for his "many sinnes hee was falne into this calamity, and "therefore had the lesse cause to take it grieuously: "That much he sorrowed for * this that the people "of the Kingdome were so exasperated against him, "as that they should vtterly abhorre his any longer "rule and soueraignety: and therefore he besought "all that were there present to * forgiue and spare "him being so afflicted. That neuertheless * it was "* greatly to his good pleasure and liking, (seeing it "* could none other be on his behalfe,) that his el- "dest sonne was so * gracious in their sight, and there- "fore hee gaue them * thanks for chooling him to be "their King.

(73) This being said, there was forthwith a proceeding to the short ceremonies of his resignation, which principally consisted in the surrender of his

(74) The forme of that renunciation, as being obſolete, you ſhall haue in the like * obſolete words of Treuiſa, which was this; I William Truſſel, in name of all men of the land of England, and of all the Parliament Procurator, reſigne to thee Edward, the homage that was made to thee ſometime; and from this time forward now following, I defie thee, and priue thee of all royall power, & I ſhall neuer be tendant to thee as for King after this time. Which being done, Sir Thomas Blunt Knight, Steward of the houſhold, by breaking his ſtaffe, reſigned his office, and declared that the late Kings family was diſcharged.

(75) Edward being thus dekinged, the Embaſſie rode ioyfully backe to London to the Parliament, with the reſigned * Enſignes, and diſpatch of their employment. CHAPTER XII.

THe sickneſſe and wounds which the commonwelth ſuſtained by the raigne of the late depoſed king, vpon the change of her Leach and Phyſitian, recouered not onely health and ſtrength, but beautie alſo and ornament; and the elements themſelues, which in the former times ſeemed to ſuffer and ſympathize with the publike grieuances of the Engliſh, grew * gratious and propitious to the vſe of man, the Aire becomming more healthfull, the earth more fruitfull, as if Nature herſelf were priuie to the worth of the ſucceeding Prince. Mortimers high practiſes.

(4) For albeit the Queene in her outward geſtures pretended nothing but ſorrow for her Lord & husbands diſtreſſe, yet in ſtead of bringing to him her perſon (which the depoſed Prince did wonderfullie *loue) ſhee onely ſent vnto him * fine apparrell & kind letters, but contrary to the lawes of God and man, withdrew her ſelfe from nuptiall dueties, beſtowing them (as the fame went, which will blab of Princes as freely as of meaner Dames) vpon the bloudy Adulterer Mortimar, fathering her abſence vpon the State, which (ſhe fained) would not ſuffer her to come vnto him. The deſolate Prince was hereupon taken from Kenelworth Caſtle, by expreſſe order from the * young King, at their procurement, for that the Earle of Lancaſter (Lord of that peece) was ſuſpected to pitty too much his calamitie. Hee was deliuered by* Indenture, to Sir Thomas de Gournay the elder, and Sir Iohn Mattrauers, two mercileſſe and moſt vnworthy Knights.

(5) Theſe two Inſtruments of the Diuell, hauing conducted him firſt to the Caſtle of Corf, then to Briſtol, and laſtly in great ſecreſie, and with more villanous deſpite, then it became either Knights, or the lewdeſt varlets in the world, as (out of Sir Thomas de la Moore, you may reade at large in the collections of * Iohn Stow) to the Caſtle of Barkley, where after many vile deuiſes, executed vpon him in vaine, they * more then barbarouſly murthered him.

The late King Edward murthered.

(6) Neuer was the fallacie of pointings, or ambiguitie of Phraſe more miſchieuouſly vſed to the deſtruction of a King, or defence of the Contriuers, then in this hainous Parricide, for it is ſaid that a bloody Sophiſme conceiued in theſe words was ſent;

* Edwardum occidere nolite timere bonum eſt

To ſhed King Edwards bloud
Refuſe to feare I count it good.

Where the Comma or pauſe being put after Nolite, bid them not to make him away, but after timere, inſinuates a plaine encouragement to the fact.

(7) The Sphynx who is ſaid to be the Author of this ambiguous Riddle, ſent by the Lord* Mortimar, was Adam de Torleton, who * vtterly denied any ſuch intention, when the Murtherers for their owne iuſtification, produced the writing it ſelfe vnder Queene Iſabels Seale, and the ſeales of the other Conſpirators, and therefore the ſaid Biſhoppe Adam was the cauſe, why Gorney and Mattrauers were with terrible menaces ſhaken vp, purſued and outlawed, who more purſued with the memory and conſcience of ſo hainous a Tragedie, fled out of England. Gorney after three yeeres baniſhment, being diſcouered at Maſſels in France, and apprehended, was conuaied backe, but had his head taken off at Sea, in his paſſage, * leſt he ſhould reueale too much at his arriuall, but Mattrauers lay hidden in Germanie a long time, doing pennance.

(8) This Parricide was committed about S. Mathews day, and (that you may note what confidence they had in their Art of ſecret murther, as alſo an ordinary mockage of the people in like caſes) the noble body was laide forth, and * many Abbots, Priors, Knights, and Burgeſſes of Briſtol and Gloceſter were ſent for to ſee the ſame; vpon which, although there appeared no manifeſt outward ſign of violent death, but the skinne all ouer whole and vnbroken, yet the cry of murther could not ſo bee ſmothered, but the meanes and manner came to light. This happineſſe certainely the poore Prince had, that after his empriſonment hee reformed his life in ſo pious & Chriſtian ſort, that it gaue occaſion when hee was dead of diſputation, whether * hee were not to bee reputed a Saint, euen as (ſay our Authors) there was the like Queſtion concerning Thomas Earle of Lancaſter, though beheaded for apparant Treaſons. His body * without any funerall pompe was buried among the Benedictins in their Abbey at Gloceſter, and ſo (ſaith * our paſſionate author) the ſtately height of the Angels Kingdome receiued this Scholler, and Diſciple of Chriſt, thus reft and ſpoiled of his Engliſh Kingdome.

(9) The yong King was now vpon the borders of Scotland with a puiſſant Armie, where alſo the Queene mother, and Mortimar, with many other Nobles were preſent, and hauing enuironed the Scots (who had pierced into England with inuaſiue armes) in the woods of VVitridale and Stanhope Parke, made ſure account of a certaine victorie; but by the treaſon of the ſaid Lord Mortimer (as afterward was laid to his charge) they were ſuffered to eſcape out of that miſchiefe, and the young King with griefe returned inglorious after an huge waſte of treaſure, and peril of his owne perſon.

(10) For while the Engliſh hoaſt thus held the Scots, as it were beſieged Sir Iames Dowglaſſe in the dead of night, with about * two hundreth ſwift horſe aſſailed the Kings owne Pauilion, and miſſed ſo little of killing him, that a Prieſt his Chaplaine a ſtout and loyall man was ſlaine in his defence, and Sir Iames eſcaped backe without hurt, but not without honor for his bold attempt. In the Scots Campe * one noteth, that the Engliſh found fiue hundreth great Oxen and Kine ready killed, a thouſand ſpits full of fleſh, ready to be roaſted, fiue hundred Cawdrons made of beaſts skins, full of fleſh, ouer the fire ſeething, and about about * ten thousand paire of raw-leather shooes, the haire still vpon them. In King Edwards Armie were (as *some write) thirty thousand Archers, and fiue hundreth good men of Armes, which perhaps is one of the greatest boasts that you shall lightly reade to haue been of our Nation, and the reason was, for that the world conceiued such hope of the young King, that many more went * voluntary then constrained. All which puissance was notwithstanding thus eluded.

(12) About this time died strucken with leprie, Robert Bruce King, and recouerer of Scotland; and the most approued Warriour of the world in that age, by whose losse it was soone found, how much the vertue and fortune of one man are worth in any Nation. But before hee died, that peace was made with the Scots by the meanes of the Queene and the Lord Mortimer, which is so much dispraised by our Writers, and in the end proued capitall to the principall Actor Mortimer.

(13) For at this treaty it was that the King (then in his Minority) sealed Charters to the Scots at Northampton, whose contents were contriued by the Queene, the said Lord Mortimer, and Sir Iames Douglasse, without the priuity of the English. There was also deliuered to them that famous Euidence called the * Ragman Roll, and the King acquited them of all * claime and pretence of right to the Superiority of Scotland, rendring backe sundrie Iewels taken by the English from the Scots, among the which was one speciall, called the Blacke Crosse of Scotland. There was it also granted, that * all Englishmen should leese their lands in Scotland, vnlesse they would inhabite vpon them, and becom Liege-men to the King thereof, besides many other things to the high discontentation (as was the humor of those times) of the English Subiects. Moreouer, vnder the specious colour of restitution of dammages, King Robert was to pay to King Edward thirty thousand Marks sterling, with which (as the meed of treason) the Lord Mortimer was afterward publikely charged, and for the same, and other his crimes was executed as a Traitour. Finally, vpon the seuenth of Iuly, Dauid Bruce Prince of Scotland, a child of seuen or eight yeeres old, and sonne and heire to King Robert, married Ioan, sister to K. Edward at Berwicke: by which peace the English were made obnoxious to some reproaches, the Scottish Nation in scorne, calling the said Lady, Iane Make-Peace.

(14) And therefore saith one of this part of King Edwards raigne: that drawne aside with euill aduise, by reason of his age, hee committed many foule errors in State, at the beginning of his Gouernment: which is also the generall opinion of all our Writers, whereunto this verse is by * some applied;

Væ puer i terra, sæpissimè sunt ibi guerra,

Where Children Rulers are,
There oft is woe and war.

(15) There died likewise about this time Charles the Faire, King of France, (to whom King Edward had not long before done homage for his Dutchie of Gascoigne) the third and last sonne of Philip the Faire, King of France, by whose decease the Crown of that noble Kingdome, deuolued to this our Edward King of England in right of his mother Queene Isabel: And because vpon this * Title king Edward did afterward claime the said Crowne, wee will here once for all instruct you in the iustice thereof.

(16) Three sonnes there were of King Philip the Faire, (to wit, Lewis Hutin, Philip le long, and Charles the Faire) who all successiuely raigned in France one after the other; and none of them leauing any Issue, at such time as king Edward made his claime, the whole right seemed to be in Isabel the onely Child of the said Philip which had any issue, for an other sister which shee had died an Infant.

(17) The case thus seeming plaine, was not for such accepted by the French, who receiued to the Crowne Philip of Valoys, whose father Charles of Valois was yonger Brother to Philip the Faire, aduancing the Brothers sonne before the daughters son, not following the propinquity or descent of blood, but the meliority of sexe, vpon which ground they had also freshly put by Ioan daughter of Lewis Hutin, preferring Philip le long her vncle. The French in barre to her interest, pretended a fundamentall law or entaile, by which * no woman was inheritable to the Crown of France, and in defence of that opinion withstood King Edward afterward with so much losse and calamity, though that very law made Edwards title the stronger (*as himselfe truely pleaded) hee being the Male, albeit his right descended by the Female.

(18) This Title to so glorious a Monarchy though it accrewed to the English, by this match with Queen Isabel, yet doth *Walsingham freely pronounce; That neither that affinity, nor any other contracts with the French, was euer auaileable or brought any benefite to England: which opinion as it may seeme strange, so will it answere a wise Readers paine in the fruit, to obserue through the course of our stories, whether the said graue Writer had iust occasion so to speake or no. Another conceit there was of this Edwards marriage with Philippa the Earle of Henaults daughter, which about this time was consumated, though Philip de Valoys (king of France by intrusion as our Annales repute him) was her vncle, her mother being his owne sister.

(19) There stood now at home against the stream of the Queene, and her Lord Mortimers absolute sway, some great personages, who did not wholy allow their doings, among which was the Kings vncle, Edmund Earle of Kent, whose death they shortly procured. Meane-while the more to despite and dare their ouerlookers, Roger Mortimer was created Earle of the Marches of Wales, at a Parliament holden at Salisburie: at which time also Iohn of Eltham the Kings Brother was made Earle of Cornwall, and the Lord Butler of Ireland Earle of Ormond. From whence the Lord Henry Earle of Lancaster, and sundry other of the Peeres, seeing the King * troden (as it seemed to them) vnder foot, did absent themselues, meditating ciuill armes for redresse, who notwithstanding (by the labour of Simon de Mepham Archbishop of Canterbury) was reconciled: This Archbishoppe very worthily also excommunicated all such as had any hand in the sacrilegious parricide of that * noble and loiall Prelate Walter Bishoppe of Exceter, or any waies violated him, their aiders, complices or abettors whosoeuer. But after the Coronation of Philip the yong Queene, in another Parliament at Winchester, the said Earle Edmund was condemned for conspiring to deliuer his brother, late King of England, whom (likely inough by Mortimers practise) he was drawne into an absurd beliefe to bee still aliue. Thus, for deuising to set a dead man at liberty, this noble Earle Edmund the kings half vncle had his head strucken off, though from * Noone till fiue at night, hee stood at the place of death without the Castle-gates, none being found to behead him, till a base wretch of the Marshal-sea was sent, and did it: so little conscience did the malice and ambition of his potent aduersaries make of shedding the Roiall bloud, which by Gods iuster iudgement was not long vnreuenged.

(20) To supply which losse to the regal stemme, with a very large amends, the young Queene Philip at Woodstocke in Oxfordshire, vpon 15. Iune, being Friday, brought forth her first begotten sonne, the amiable and famous Edward, by-named (not of his colour, but of his dreaded Acts in battell) the Blacke Prince. King Edward not long after with a small companie went into France, and did homage to Philip de Valoys for his Dutchie of Gascoigne.

pace did now approach and ſummon Mortimer to a bloudie account; for the yong King addicting himſelfe to ſerious thoughts, and putting on the Man before his yeeres required, eaſily ſaw his owne perill in the others potencie. The Queene his mother (to the common diſhonour and griefe of the Kingdome) being generally bruted to be with child by Mortimer, hee vpon ripe aduiſe ſodainely and aduenturouſlie ſurpriſed the proud man at Parliament holden in Nottingham; with whom were taken the L. Geofrey Mortimer his ſonne, and Sir Simon de * Bedford, who all three were ſent priſoners to the Tower of London, vnder a ſtrong guard. Which done, the king by common conſent of the Parliament tooke into his hands his mothers exceſſiue Dower, & put her to a narrow penſion of * one thouſand pounds by yeer, circumſcribing her within as narrow * limits for her abode, but doing her yeerely the honour and comfort of once or twice viſiting her, though otherwiſe ſcarce thinking her worthy of life, in regard of her priuacie with Mortimer, and his many heinous practiſes.

(22) Oh, what enchantments are Honour and Power to the minds of men! how ſodainely, and how ſtrangely doe they blow vp the ſame with the contempt of others, and forgetfulnes of themſelues? Certainely the fraile eſtate of mans conſtitution is clearelie ſeene in this high Lord, who drunken with felicitie, and fearing neither God nor man, fell into vtter confuſion when leaſt hee feared. The probable manner whereof is worthy the relating. There was in the Caſtle of Nottingham (and at this day is) a certaine ſecret way or Mine cut through a rocke, vpon which the ſaid Caſtle is built, one iſſue whereof openeth toward the riuer of Trent, which runnes vnder it, and the other venteth it ſelfe farre within vpon the ſurface, and is (at this preſent) called Mortimers hole; through this, the young King well armed, and ſtronglie ſeconded, was conducted with drawne ſwordes, by ſome his truſtie and ſworne ſeruants, (among which was that braue Montacute, whom his vertues vnder this King raiſed to the Earledome of Salisbury, &c.) vp to the Queenes Chamber, whoſe dore (ſo feareles is blinded affection) was vnſhut, and with her was Mortimer (the kings Maſter as the rumor ſpred him) readie to go to bed, whom with the ſlaughter of a Knight, and one or two that reſiſted) they laid hold vpon. This was not reputed a ſlender enterpriſe, in regard that in Mortimers retinue were not fewer (they ſay) then one hundreth and foure-ſcore Knights, beſides Eſquiers and Gentlemen.

(23) The cauſes for which hee was condemned in open Parliament at Weſtminſter, theſe ragged * verſes following comprehend, which without any diſparagement to their makers iudgement, might verie well haue beene in Proſe, but for breuitie and change wee haue here inſerted them.

* Mirr of Mag.

Fiue heinous crimes againſt him ſoone were had,
1 Firſt that he cauſde the King to yeeld the Scot
(To make a peace) townes that were from him got.
And therewithall the Charter called Ragman;
2 That of the Scots hee had bribed priuy gaine.
3 That through his meanes S^r. Edward of Carnaruan,
In Barckley Caſtle moſt traiterouſly was ſlaine.
4 That with his Princes mother hee had lain,
5 And finally with polling at his pleaſure,
Had robd the King and Commons of their treaſure.

But the moſt barbarous murther of the kings father, and ſpeciallie the diſhonourable peace and contract with the then profeſſed enemies of England, were principallie inſiſted vpon as hainous treaſon. He was after ſentence ignominiouſlie drawne to Tyburne, the common place of execution, then called the Elms, and there vpon the common Gallowes was as ignominiouſlie executed, hanging (by the kings commandement) two daies and two nights, a publike & gladſome ſpectacle. There died with him Sir Simon de Bedford Knight, & Iohn Deuerel Eſquier, aſwell for expiation of the late King Edwards death, as in complement, as it were of ſo great a mans fall, whoſe liues doe ſeldome, or neuer periſh ſingle.

(24) Now came Scotlands turne about to ſuffer againe moſt grieuous loſſes and afflictions, an ordinarie effect of Childrens gouernment, whether Children in age, or in diſcretion: for the Lord Edward Baliol hearing of King Roberts death, and the tender age of King Dauid as ſon and heire of that Baliol, to whom king Edward the firſt had adiudged the Scotiſh crown, with ſuch voluntaries as hee could raiſe (though his Father the Lord Iohn had * releaſed his claime to king Robert, and though King Edward in fauour of his ſiſter Ioan Queen of Scotland, would not openly at firſt ſupport him) embarkt himſelfe in Yorkeſhire, and inuaded that Realme, where, vpon his landing, he ſlew Alexander Setoun at Kingorn, and about nine hundred others, putting the reſt to flight. Not long after (that no miſchiefe might come alone) neere to the water of Erne, at a place called Dupline, where the Earles of Mar and March, with two puiſſant armies of Scots, for the defence of their yong King Dauid lay encamped, the ſaid Lord Edward (whoſe ſmall numbers, not exceeding three thouſand Engliſh, the Earles as ſecurely and as fatally contemned, as the Engliſh vnder Edward the ſecond had contemned the Bruce and his Scots) obtained of them a wonderfull victorie. Boetius (who neuer, or rarely, leaues any ouerthrow purely to the manhood of the Engliſh) will needs haue this diſcomfiture effected by a Camiſado, the Baliol and his Engliſh with others paſsing the water of Erne by a Foord in the night, when the enemy little ſuſpected it.

(25) The ſlaughter euen by his report was miſerable: for there were ſlaine (ſaith he) the Earles of Marre and Carricke, and three thouſand of the Noble, beſide Commons. Our * Writers agree that this Foord was paſſed in the night, but that the fight endured from Sunne-riſing till three of the Clocke afternoone, and that, beſides the Earles of Marre, and Carricke, three other Earles, Menteth, Athol, and Murrey, twelue Barons, eight hundreth knights and men of Armes, beſide aboue thirteene thouſand other, loſt there their liues. Of the Engliſh there were onelie ſlaine thirty and three * Eſquiers: ſo that not without cauſe this victory was attributed rather to power diuine then humane.

(26) Yet this was but the beginning of farther calamities to the Scotiſh Nation, which was in it ſelfe diuided into factions, the one for Bruce, the other for Baliol. The Lord Edward making vſe of his good fortune, got himſelfe to bee crowned King of Scotland at Scone. But king Dauid Bruce with his Queen fled into France to Philip de Valois, who raigned there, & entertained them with much compaſſion and honor, giuing them Caſtle Galliard for the place of their abode, till fairer fortune ſhone. Meane-time the Scots ſuſtained new dammages; for a prime man among them, the Lord william Dowglaſſe, was taken priſoner by the Engliſh, not without loſſe of many his men. Before which time by * no honourable meanes the new King of Scotland was driuen to ſeeke his ſafety by flight into England.

(27) King Edward conſidering thoſe foiles which his father had endured, and the oportunity of the time, neither holding himſelfe lyable in honour to that contract made on his behalfe by the predominant ſway of his mother and her Paramour Mortimer, as wherein hee tooke both himſelfe, and the rights of his Crowne to haue beene wronged in his minority, which in point of gouernement hee was more bound to reſpect then his Siſters eſtate, and for that hee was informed that the Towne and Caſtle of Berwicke belonged to the Crowne of his Realme; hee raiſed his power, and hauing with him Edward the new-crowned of Scotland, hee laid ſiege to that Towne and Caſtel in May. But before hee did this, there is who writes, that he ſummoned his bro-brother in law King Dauid to doe homage and fealty vnto him, which when Dauid would not yeeld to doe, nor confesse hee ought, no more then his father King Robert, hee made that a ground for the iustice of his warre, as reputing the Acts and releases at Northampton void.

(28) To the rescues of Berwicke, Archimbald Dowglas Earle of Angus, Gouernour of Scotland for King Dauid, came with a puissant Army, and gaue King Edward battell at Halydon-hill, where with a lamentable slaughter of his people he was vanquished and slaine. This battell deuoured in a manner all the remainders of the Scottish Nobles which preserued it selfe at Dupline by retrait, or by absence from that field. There * perished besides Archimbald, the Earles of Ros, Sutherland, and Carricke, three sonnes of the Lord Walter Steward (whose issue afterward raigned in Scotland, when warre and death had made way to that line, by extirpation of the Male-Competitors in the races of Bruce and Baliol) and at least foureteene thousand others, with the losse (say some) of one Knight, and ten other Englishmen. Our *Writers affirm that the Scots were at this battell, threescore thousand strong, and that there * were slaine eight Earles, 1500. horsemen, and of the common Souldiers fiue and thirty thousand; which is not improbable, for so much as Hector confesseth they were stopped in their flight, and put to the sword vpon all sides without mercy.

(29) Hereupon Berwicke was rendred, which the King of England detained as a supposed parcell of his Patrimony, and dismissed the Baliol to the gouernment of the Scottish Kingdome, with sundrie Lords and others of the English. And now the bloudie tallies and cruell scores seemed euen betweene the two puissant (though then vnkind) neighbour-Nations, and Edward throughly redeemed the dishonour sustained at Bannockshourn by his late father, deliuering his younger yeeres from that contempt, in which his enemies might otherwise haue holden him, as they had done at the entrance of his raign, playing vpon the English with Truffes and Rounds; of which this one is euery where noted;

Long beards heartlesse, Painted hoods witlesse,
Gay coates graceles se, make England thriftles se.

(30) As for the subornation of poisoning Earle Thomas Randal, and the hanging of Sir Alexander Setons two sonnes, contrarie to faith and law of Arms, at Berwicke with the like staines which * one would faine leaue vpon this victorious Prince, wee haue found no colour of warrant but his owne liberty of auouching, which therfore our freedome of not beleeuing him shall as easily take away and cancell. Neither would wee so farre haue touched this iarring string of discord betweene these two Nations, but that each out of their owne harms of old, may haue the more true sense of their felicity, by their new harmonicall concordance.

(31) After that the * Nobles of Scotland had vnanimously confirmed Baliol in the kingdome thereof, and sworne vnto him faith and allegiance at Perth, hee repaired to the King of England at Newcastle vpon Tine, where hee * submitted to Edward King of England, as his Father had done to Edward the first, and with the like successe; for by occasion of such his submission, our Writers say, the Scots (as before they had done) fell off againe, Which auersion, or defection was augmented vpon * priuate quarrels, and titles of inheritance to lands of great value, betweene powerfull Competitors, and by other particular reuenges, to which a people so continually exercised in fight and battels were not slowlie prone.

(32) Notwithstanding all which (the Balliols party hauing once had all the Holds of Scotland at their commandement, * fiue onely excepted, Dumbritaine, Longhlesim, Kildrummie, Frewhart, and the pile of Lowdon) Edward king of England hauing with him the Balliol, and a sufficient Army, preuailed so much, that there was no appearance of rebellion; whereupon hee tooke backe with him the Lord Edward Balliol late crowned king of Scotland (of whose sted fastnes hee was (saith Hector) alwaies iealous, & returned, leauing * Dauid Cumin Earle of Athol, gouernour for the parts beyond the Scottish sea, with sufficient force and authority (as was iudged) to take in such strengthes as yet stood out, but needed not his royall power or presence for their expugnation.

(33) The King of England hoping now that all was well there, had newes brought vnto him not long after, at the Parliament at London, that the Scots were out in Armes againe; whereupon hee obtaines aid of money from his Subiects for repressing their attempts, promising to goe against them in person. * The Lord Robert Stewart, sonne of the Lady Marioric Bruce, daughter of King Robert (vpon whose line the remainder of the Crown of Scotland had beene estated) was the man that first lifted vp the head of his Country in this dangerous, sad, and desolate condition (though put into action vpon a priuate iniurie done vnto him by the Earle of Athol) to whom diuers did adhere, though the quarrel seemed properly to be the said L. Roberts, for that if the Bruces were cut off, his hopes perished in them. The Earle of Murray and he were then chosen gouernours for King Dauids party, but by reason of the diligence and power of Dauid Earle of Athol, they were not able as yet to conuene, or effect any thing against the English: neuertheless it was not long before they slew the said Earle Dauid. At this Parliament the King of England purposed to * goe vpon his owne charge into the Holy-Land, and to send the Archbishoppe of Canterbury to deale with Philip de Valois King of France, for appointing a certaine time, wherein they two with their vnited forces, might take their voyage thither, from which the desire of obtaining the Crowne of France, vpon the fore-mentioned title, did quickly diuert him.

(34) Mean-while, in accomplishment of the Parliaments expectation, King Edward after * Michaelmas marched againe into Scotland with an Armie, and sent his Nauie to the Forth: The Sea-Force whereof, spoyled the Coasts on both sides of the Forth, or Scottish Sea, and putting on land in Saint Colms, they spoyled the Abbey; which Sacrilege, * Hector notes was seuerely punished, the whole Fleete being battered with tempest, and some of the ships perishing. At another time also the like sacrilege being perpetrated there, (hee saith) that the shippe wherein the vnlawfull prize was, sunke sodainely to the Sea-ground without any tempest. The King himselfe comming to * Perth, to order the Scottish affaires, whiles hee abode there, the Earle of Murray one of the Gouernors was taken Prisoner, who was after * deliuered vpon Exchange for the Earle of Namur, (whō the Scots by like Art had taken) or as Hector wil haue it, for the Earle of Salisbury.

(35) By the mediation of the French, the Scots had a short truce granted them. But about the end of May, the King sent his cosen the Lord Henry, sonne to Henry Earle of Lancaster, with a great Army to the aid and seruice of the Lord Edward Balliol King of Scotland, which wasted all the Countries about Perth; where, while they lay, the King with a very small Company came sodainely vnto them, and from thence pierced farther one way then euer his Grandfather Edward had done, suffering fire & death (the common furies of warre) to worke vpon all that might suffer destruction to establish a Conquest. Hee marcht vp as farre as * Elgin and Buquhan, and in his return to Marre, * burnt the Towne of Aberden, in reuenge for * Sir Thomas Rosselin, a Knight, whom the Towne-men thereof had slaine. The Lord Robert Steward had great landes in those parts, for Murrey and Buquhan were his, which also might might the rather moue this ſeuere proceeding: which done, King Edward hauing repaired ſundry Caſtles there, and leauing Scotland to the new King thereof with forces competent, came backe into England. But* at this and other times, the Baliol, in requitall of this aide and friendſhippe, granted to King Edward and his Succeſſors ſundry Caſtles, as Edenbrough, Hedſtone, Pebles, and two thouſannd pounds yeerely rent for the Fee-farme of Rockſbrough, Iedworth, and other places; laſt of all, his whole intereſt in ampleſt manner, reſeruing onely to himſelfe, a certaine yeerely penſion from the King of England.

(36) Who to enlarge the magnificence of his roiall eſtate and amplitude, as meditating farre greater matters then thoſe vnprofitable warres (the bodies and treaſure which were emploied and ſpent therein, being able to compaſſe farre more noble atchieuements) * created Prince Edward his eldeſt ſon Earle of Cheſter, and Duke of Cornwall, and at the ſame ſolemnity ſix other Earles, & * twenty knights, one of which Knights was Thomas de la Moore, whoſe name hath beene often cited as an Author.

The French war in the yolk therof or Embrion.

(37) There was in ſpeciall credite with King Edward, one Sir Robert de Artoys, who being baniſhed by the French King out of thoſe parts, and made (by King Edward) Earle of Richmond, laboured earneſtly (vpon hatred to the French King for his priuate diſcontentments) to draw him to claime the Crown of France as his moſt lawfull right, and as that which would indeed enrich his people with ſpoiles, and treble his owne greatneſſe by the Conqueſt: The motion though by reaſon of the highneſſe and difficultie of the enterpriſe, it did not at firſt preuaile; yet at laſt by the euill fate of France wrought out to it ſelfe a wonderfull allowance. Many conſultations paſſing of the matter, it could not be ſo concealed, but that the ſmoake therof diſcouered the breeding fire. This in the preſent was very happy for the ſtate of Scotland, *which (ſaith Hector) was in appearance ſo enfeebled, that if the King of England had continued his warres, it ſhould haue come without any hope of relieſe to vtter ruine. It was alſo a cauſe, why the French (who hitherto had ſupported the Scots, but not as if it ſo neerely concerned themſelues) put in the more fully and roundly, ſeeking by all meanes to weaken and annoy the Engliſh, aſwell in Scotland, as in Gaſcoigne, and where elſe ſoeuer.

The matters of Scotland for 7 or 8 yeeres ſummarily ſet down.

(38) That wee may with the leſſe confuſion, and fewer interruptions, deliuer our ſelues of the French warre which now approached, wee will here in one view tender vnto you the Scottiſh affaires, from this time for ſeuen or eight yeeres, till about the ſiege of Calis by King Edward, who was ſcarſe alighted in England from the former expedition, but the Bruceã party (vnder their chiefe leader Andrew Murray) iſſued from the Loughes, Mountaines, and other their places of retreat and faſtneſſe, to readuance their cauſe. King Edward once or twice ſent Armies, vnder valiant Generals to ſupport the Baliols poſſeſſion againſt their violence, whoſe ſucceſſe was variable till the death of Murray. After whom the L. Stewart tooke charge for the Brucean ſide, and (vpon the aduantage of King Edwards ſlackneſſe, to finiſh his Scottiſh affaires, the matter of France ſo far preponderating it) endeauoured to prepare a quiet entrance for King Danid. The aide of the Lord William Dowglas to that purpoſe was very auailable, howbeit not alwayes fortunate, being ouerthrowne in a ſet battell by Sir Thomas Berckley at Blackbourne, hauing there with him King Edwards power. To the vp-ſhot, and as it were deciding ſtroke of theſe late miſeries, there arriued great ſtore of munition out of France, at ſuch time as the Lord Robert Steward hauing lien ten weeks at the ſiege of Perth, was almoſt ready to haue abandoned the ſame in deſpaire. Perth being rendred, the Baliol (whoſe the quarrell was) betooke himſelfe into England, hauing ſmall ſtrength of his owne in the hearts and affections of the Scots, who reuolted dayly from him. Vpon ſure intelligence of all theſe matters, king Danid, his Queene, and many honourable French, and Scots, return, and till the quarrell of Philip de Valois put him into vnfortunate Armes againſt the Engliſh, the afflicted Realme of Scotland enioyed a kind of reſt and quiet.

(39) It was not now the iuſtice of his Title to the Crowne of France, which onely made King Edward vnſheath his conquering ſword againſt the French; for Philip de Valois king of France iniuriouſly withheld ſundry Townes and places in Gaſcoigne. To remedy which violent wrongs the king of England had addreſſed * Ambaſſadors, though without any good ſucceſſe.

(40) But, that the world might take true notice of his iuſt proceedings, the main cauſes for iuſtificatiõ of his deſign vpon France (whereby the cõmon cauſe againſt the Turke was neglected) himſelfe in a copious Epiſtle, directed to the Colledge of Cardinals, doth publikely declare to be theſe;

1 *His Title to the Crowne of France, which Philip de Valois vniuſtly detained, for that himſelfe, of any * Male liuing, was the neereſt in bloud to the late king Charles his vncle.*

2 That his Agents and Ambaſſadors deſiring to put the cauſe to ciuill triall, were not onely not admitted to bee heard, but were driuen away with feare of their liues.

3 That the Court of the Twelue Peeres, in giuing the Crowne from him, (who was then vnder age,) did therein leaue the office of Iudges, and were no better then robbers. And therefore their proceſſe made to his preiudice during his minority, was by all lawes void and fruſtrate.

4 That Philip de Valois inuaded the Dutchie of Aquitaine, which belonged to the Crowne of England, and added ſuch places and lands as hee had ſo wrongfully gotten, to thoſe which hee had as wrongfully withholden, detaining all alike.

5 That hee had aided and aſſiſted the Scots in their riſings againſt him, when as by reaſon of neare kindred he ſhould rather haue holpen him; and finally declared by his doings, that his honour, power and life it ſelfe, were hated of him

(41) King Edward neuertheleſſe (knowing that words were little worth in ſuch a caſe) to ſtrengthen his quarrell with friends, by the aduiſe of his counſell, and of * his Father in law, the Lord William Earle of Henault, ſought to confederate and vnite vnto him the High and Low Dutch, Princes and people, which lay moſt commodiouſly for his vſes. But the better to hold them together, hee was aduiſed to ſeeke the amity of the Emperour Lewis of Bauare, with whom hee made (as by the euent was manifeſt) but an * vnprofitable confederation, though for the preſent it ſeemed to ſerue his vſes with the countenance: more to his aduantage were the ſingular endeuours of ſome other his priuate inſtruments, as chiefly of Iames de Artenile, a wealthy Burger of Gaunt, one of a rare dexterity of witte, and ſo popularly acceptable among the Flemings, that he ſeemed to ſway Flaunders more by far then the Earle thereof, whom they had expelled. By the ſpeciall diligence of this Iaques van Artenile, and of one * Siger de Courtray a Nobleman of Flanders, there was prepared among the Artizans of thoſe parts (whoſe chiefe enrichments depended vpon the handling of Engliſh wooll, as Cloth-workers, Weauers, and the like) a mighty party for the Engliſh againſt the French. This amity with England (as moſt profitable for the common benefite, and weale of his Country) the ſaid Iames moſt conſtantly ſupported to the death.

(42) Meane-while King Edward (the life of this high affaire) proceeded in all things with ripe deliberation and iudgement. Therefore to let the Flemings know the want of his friendſhippe, hee had for ſome yeeres before inhibited the tranſportation of his Wools; which, and for that the Engliſh were in

in a manner become all one with them, by king Edwards marriage with the Lady Philip, not a little aduanced the practise of Iames on his behalfe; which was sped at last, by occasion of * an ouerthrow giuen to the French-Flemings, who vnder the conduct of Guy the Bastard of Flanders, brother to the Earle (both of them being wholy French) were placed in the Isle of Cadsant to empeach the arriual of the English, who tooke the said Guy, and slew the most part of his people. This victory was atchieued in the quarrell of the king of England by the Earle of Derbie, the Lord Beauchampe, the Lord Reynald Cobham, the Lord Walter de Manny (an Hennoway) and other of the English Captaines: Of the fame and lucky fortune whereof the said D' Arteuelt, and other of the kings friends, made so wise and seasonable vse, by letting them see the English were able to protect them, that the Flemings (without any great stay) became his firme confederates, in presence of the Earle of Gelder at Gaunt, notwithstanding that at the same time the great K. of France, and their own naturall Lord, the Earle, laboured all they could to the contrary.

(43) But as king Edward was (in the mean space) wholy intent, vpon furnishing himselfe with all conuenient things fitte for his warre, (hauing Captaines and Souldiers, such as his owne noble heart could wish,) so when hee found that the industrious Dutch by their manuall labours, grew to so great strength and opulencie, that their friendshippe bred riualitie in puissant Monarches, hee, like a father, regarding the publike wealeof his Country, ordained that al Clothworkers, who would repaire hither out of forraine parts, and exercise their trades, should haue free accesse and sundry priuiledges. By which inuitation as very many were drawne, so was it the principall cause of aduancing that honest, best and most beneficiall Trade in the Kingdome, to the great enrichment, strength, and honor thereof. The English Nation was very desirous to set forward this warre, and therefore contributed plentifully, and the King made bold with Lombards, and the moueable goods of such Priories in England, as were Cels to Monasteries in France, thereby to make his coffers fuller.

(44) The warre which all this while seemed but to be talked of, did now beginne to blaze (and indeed a blazing starre of 30. dayes continuance, was supposed by some to foreshew it) whose first torch was lighted by the * French at Southampton, which they almost wholy consumed to ashes, but they with losse of their Captaine, (a yonger sonne to the Sicilian King) and about three hundreth others, * were driuen away the next morrow. The French had sundry shippes of warre or Gallyes, which vnder colour of passing to the Holy-Land, the king of France had (with purpose to assaile our Coasts) assembled, as the * king of England chargeth him: which losse, yet was not long vnrequited, either Nation grieuing other with mutuall mischiefes.

(45) To appease and extinguish this deadly quarrell, there came from Pope Benedict the 12. two Cardinals hither; but one of them in a speech to the Clergie, seeming to fauour the French faction; Iohn Archbishoppe of Canterbury immediately stood vp, and protested, that the Cardinals Arguments were vaine and friuolous: whereupon they soone after departed, and it was euery where published through England, that the King had right to the Crown of France, which also hee meant by honourable force to prosecute. Notwithstanding, King Edward for auoiding Christian bloud-shed, gaue instructions to the Cardinals, that vpon certaine equall conditions, hee was willing to make an euerlasting peace with the French, & would haue beene verie glad (the hazards of warre considered) to haue taken any honest or proportionable offers; one impediment whereof was this, that the French would include the Scots within the Treatie, whom King Edward would not admit thereunto, as purposing (when he had singled them from supplies) to make a full and absolute annexation of their obediences to the English scepter: so the labour and hopes of the Cardinals proued vaine.

(46) Philip de Valoys in possession King of France, had sundry great and high motiues to embolden his standing-off. First, the regard of honour, and profite, and the abundant meanes which he had, hauing the whole puissance of France (the fairest kingdome vnder heauen) at his commandement. Then a confidence which hee reasonably conceiued so to diuert, or distract the English forces, by the assured aid of the Scots, as that it should finally ruine the whole enterprise, if not also the principall Actor Edward himselfe. Againe, considering the vastnes of the enterprise, hee iudged King Edwards wealth not to bee proportionable, but did well hope, that a short dalliance would consume his treasures. Moreouer, hee iudged perhaps, that the very thought it selfe of conquering France, was no better in Edward then a young mans dreame, considering the Realm of England was farre inferiour in bigneſse, and multitudes of Subiects, and that there was a Sea betweene, the crossing whereof must double the charge. Lastly, for the friends which King Edward had procured in Dutchland with wonderfull largesse, he knew, would not be held together but with infinite cost and expence, and that by some good meanes or other, hee should make them in whole, or in part vnprofitable.

The French kings reasons for resistance.

(47) For iustification of his cause he had no slender colours, or reasons. As the before alleadged law or custome of France, which they call the Salick, by the which the French exclude * Gyneiocratie, or VVomens Gouernment in chiefe. Then an Act of the whole French State, by which his right was acknowledged and established. Thirdly, King Edwards birth place, by which hee seemed to them a stranger, and for that cause was farre the lesse capable, or rather was directly incapable of popular goodwill among the French. Lastly, for that King Edward in the * beginning of his raigne (though when hee was as yet vnder age,) did in his owne person, both doe his homage to this very Philip de Valoys, as to the king of France, for his Dutchie of Aquitaine, and also * by his Letters-Patents vnder seale did testifie as much. This homage, (the more to bee remembred because * some attribute much of K. Edwards discontentment to the hauty manner of Philip in taking the same) was performed at Amiens in Picardie. It troubled King Edward greatly, to see himselfe making submission to the vsurper of that Soueraignetie, which hee thought belonged to himselfe; but to let the French see what kind of Prince he was, he came in so royall maner appointed, as if he meant to haue strucken them with feare or admiration; Earles, Barons, and 1000. horse hee had in his retinue. At the day, his robe was of crimson veluet, powdered with golden Leopards, his crowne on his head, a sword by his side, and golden spurres on his heeles. To receiue this Duke for the Dutchie of Guyen and Earledome of Ponthieu, Philip de Valoys sate crowned in violet veluet, semined with golden fillies, with all the other Ensignes of royall maiestie, but the homage was done only by word (if * one say true) and not in that full manner which Serres mentioneth. Probable it is, that the haughty carriage of Philip did greatly incense the Spirit of King Edward, being one of the most gallant in the world.

Arguments for iustification of his resistance.

(48) There is among Writers much time, and labour spent in description of King Edwards iourney, stay and contracts of amity made in Dutchland; but in regard that no greater matter was effected thereby, then the purchase of an opinion of magnificence & nobleneſse among the Queenes Countrymen and Dutch-landers, few lines shall serue to comprehend the narration. * The King (hauing first in * Parliament prouided for the gouernance of his Kingdome) with the Queen (then great with Child) the young Prince Edward, many Earles and great Captaines, with a gallant Company of men of war, *sailed to Antwerpe, whom Lewis the Emperour met at the City of Colein, where amity was confirmed, and King Edward was constituted his Lieutenant, with full authority to gouerne in his name on this side Colein. By reason of which Vicegerencie King Edward * made out his commandements, and did many things to his aduantage and profit. Howsoeuer it neither lasted long (for Lewis within a while dishonourably reuoked it,) and did vndoubtedlie scarce quit the cost: for the brauery of that meeting was so exceeding great, as Edward easily wan the generall opiniõ of a very noble & puissant king. * Polydor writes, that Edward refused not the office, yet would not exercise the same, because he would not displease Pope Benedict, whose enemy the Bauarian was.

The King of Englands prerogatiue. Tho. Walsm.

(49) This Emperour (whõm belike the Pope hated, for being as proud as himselfe) tooke it ill, (as report went) that the King of England humbled not himselfe (at their meeting) to the kisse of his foot. But it was answered; that the King of England was a King annointed, and had life and member in his power, and therefore ought not to submit himselfe, so much as an other King that was not annointed. After his returne to Antwerpe with his new power, hee seriously prosecuted his affaire of confederation with the Lords and people of Dutchland, among whom (with great loue and fauour) he and his royall family abode aboue an whole yeere. The principall Nobles which entred into this league against the French were these. The Archbishoppe of Colein Prince Elector; The Duke of Brabant; The Duke of Gelderland, (who had married the Lady Isabel King Edwards owne sister, and about this season was of an Earle created a Duke; The Marquesse of Gulick, &c. And finally, the Hanse townes.

(50) The Flemings, being the most necessary part of this association, in regard of their neerenes to the French, would not engage themselues in an offensiue warre against the Crowne of France, vnlesse King Edward would first assume the Title and Armories of that Realme, as the onely lawfull King therof. This Proposition was throughly debated, and the law of Armes allowing it, hee with the common assent of the Flemings and others, tooke the Stile, and quartered the Flower de Lize with the Leopards, or Lions of England, as here we see annexed; albeit wee see his former Seale also adorned with two Lize or Lillies; whether in token of his mothers French descent, or as a couert note of his own right to the French crown it is vncertaine.

(51) Polydor * Virgil must haue a warie and fauourable Reader, or hee will bee thought to bee of opinion, that William the Conqueror bare his Leopards quartered, then which nothing is more vntrue, nor more vnlikely. Others againe may suppose, that we haue not here described them according to their right bearing, as certainly according to their present bearing wee haue not; but the truth is, the golden Lillies of France, which now are borne in triangle, were in those dayes born, and aduanced Semi.

* In Guliel. 1. l. 9

The Armes of England set before those of France at the first. Sir Robert Cotton hath such a seale of Q. Isabel.

(52) And whereas the Armories of France are placed here in the dexter and more honorable quarter, yet there are probabilities, that it was not so at this their first coniunction For in the * Seale of Queen Isabel (this King Edwards mother) the Armories of England, as being the Armories of the husbands line (and therefore to haue precedence) were marshalled where now the Flower de Luces shine. But whether to gratifie the French, or because that was the more ancient and greater Monarchie, they were in this Kings raigne disposed as here we see.

(53) When King Edward had thus assumed the Title and Armes of that Realme, hee published the same vnder his seale, setting the name of England first, and sent his Letters Patents to the frontiers of the enemies Dominions, fixing them vpon the dores of Churches, aswell to declare the right and reason of his doings, as to exempt such from the danger of the comming storme, who vpon this notice would acknowledge him their Lord and rightfull Soueraigne. These proclamations or admonishments thus diuulged, he burnt and spoiled the North parts of France vp as farre as * Turwin, though the time of the yeere were very vnseasonable, and contenting himselfe therewith for a beginning, gaue place to the sharpenesse of Winter, returning to the Queen his wife at Antwerpe where hee kept a roiall Christmas. In which City this yeere was Lionel (afterward Duke of Clarence) borne.

(54) His affaires growing ripe in those parts, he leaues his Queene and Children in Brabant, as an assured pledge of his returne, and about Candlemas shippes himselfe for England; where in a Parliament at Westminster, he obtained liberall aids for supportation of his intended Conqueſt. In lieu of which louing assistances, hee granted a generall large pardon both for trespasses, and of all Aides for making his sonne Knight, and for marriage of his daughter during all his time; forgiuing also all arrerages of Farmers and Accountants till the tenth yeer of his Raigne, and all old debts due to any of his Predecessors. Finally, hee confirmed that famous Magna Charta, and of the Forest with some other.

(55) There was no talke now but of conquering France; Musters taken throughout the Kingdom, Armourers and trades of warre (to be cherished euen in the secureſt peace) were full of employment, and the desire of battell waxt feruent euery where.

Meane-

Meane while to hold the world in ſuſpenſe of the ſucceſſe, God diſtributed the fortune of attempts diuerſly. Burdeaux (the capitall City of Aquitaine, and then Engliſh) gaue an excellent teſtimony of her loyalty, nor leſſe of martiall witte and valour. For the French Armie comming before her, ſhe to abuſe their hope, ſet open her gates, and diſplayed vpon her Towers the golden Lillies, as if ſhee were theirs; but the French which ſecurely entred, found little good hoſpitality. Sir Oliuer de Ingham was Captain and Lord Warden there for King Edward, who with his Garriſon-Souldiers, and aide of the inhabitants, ſlew of them great multitudes, and preſerued Burdeaux. But in the oppoſite parts, William Montacute Earle of Salisbury, and Robert Vfford Earle of Suffolke,* after many honourable deedes performed for aduancement of King Edwards affaire, were by the French taken Priſoners, while preſuming too much vpon their courages and fortune, they * ran too far into their danger, at the Towne of Lile in Flanders.

(56) But King Edward being ready now to repaſſe the Seas, had certaine intelligence that the French lay in wait about Sluice in Flanders, to intercept him with a mighty Nauie of 400. ſhippes; who therefore prepared accordingly, intending to open his way by force. He ſet ſaile from Harwich vpon Saint Iohn Baptiſts Eue, toward the Coaſt where his enemies attended, ſtrengthning himſelfe with the Northerne Nauie of England, which the L. Robert Morley brought vnto him, ſo as hee had in all about two or three hundreth ſaile. His battels hauing the aduantages of windes and ſunne, hee ſet on the French with incredible furie and force, in the very mouth of the Hauen of Sluice vpon Midſommer day, where beganne a moſt bloudy and terrible fight, the end whereof ſet the Garland vpon King Edwards head. Himſelfe was * wounded in that fight, and loſt * foure valiant Knights (Monthermer, Latimer, Boteler', Poynings) with ſundrie other of his Engliſh ſlaine therein. But the ſlaughters of the French party were lamentable, for thirty thouſand are confeſſed to haue periſhed, not halfe of their ſhippes eſcaped vntaken or vnſuncke. A greater glory then this, the Engliſh are ſcarſe found to haue atchieued at any battell at ſea.

(57) The Crowne of France ſeemed already to bee placed vpon King Edwards Temples, ſo much was attributed to this great victory, but ſuch a Conqueſt was not the worke of one day. Which King Edward well vnderſtanding, refreſhed his victorious Armie, and augmenting it with his Confederates forces (which repaired to him on all ſides) marched forth, hauing one of the moſt puiſſant hoſts that euer any King of England led, as wherein were neere an hundreth thouſand Souldiers Engliſh, and Dutch. Hee had alſo in his Company the Dukes of Brabant and Gelder, and many other potent members of the Empire, and (as * ſome write) the imperiall Eagles diſplayed in the head of his Armie, as hee that was Vicegerent of the ſacred Roman Empire. In this wiſe hee approached the Northerlie parts of France, where expoſing all to ſpoile & fire, he ſate downe with his whole Forces about Turney, meaning to take in the ſame, aſwell to bee a ſeate of Warre, as place of ſure retreat and refuge.

(58) Philip, though iuſtly grieued with his wofull loſſe ſuſtained at Sea, yet to encounter, and cruſh ſo great an euill in the firſt approaches thereof, had prouided ſuch an Armie, as beſeemed the Maieſtie and greatneſſe of that renowned Kingdom. Writers ſpeake of an hundreth thouſand fighting men aſſembled vnder his command, and that beſides Princes, Dukes, Earles, and other illuſtrious Perſons, there was the valiant old King of Bohemia, and * Lewis king of Nauarre. K. Edward hearing the ſame, drew forth his people into the open field with purpoſe to giue battell:

(59) It may ſeeme a thing greatly tending to King Edwards glory, to remember the * offer which hee ſent to King Philip before hee laid his ſiege to Turney. In which, without ſaluting him by any other title then of Philip of Valois, hee challengeth him, for auoiding the effuſion of Chriſtian bloud, to fight with him hand to hand in ſingle battell; or (if that miſliked) then each to bring an hundreth to the field, and trie the euent with ſo ſmall an hazard; or otherwiſe, within ten dayes to ioyne full battell with all their forces neere to Turney. Whereunto Philip made no direct anſwere, neither with his honour could, alledging that the letters were not ſent to him, the King of France, but barely to Philip of Valois. Neuertheleſſe, hee gaue him to vnderſtand, that his meaning was to beat him out of France, hauing hope in Chriſt (from whom hee deriued his power) ſo to doe.

(60) The honour of the warre in thoſe ages cannot bee enough commended, in which the noble old formes of hoſtility were put in practiſe, by defiances, Heraldes, and publike aſſignations of day and place of fight, and not by skulking ſurpriſes and vnder-hand ſtealthes, more neerely reſembling high-way robberies, then lawfull battell.

(61) Theſe two huge hoaſts (which had they beene vnited for the good of Chriſtendome, might haue worthily made the Turke looke pale) being now in ſight, and the cloud of warre ready in a manner to diſſolue it ſelfe into ſhowers of bloud, doe neuertheleſſe without one ſtroke fall off, and returne to their ſeuerall Countries, not without the wonder and reioicement of peaceable men, but not of the Engliſh and German Souldiers, who propounded to themſelues death with glory, or riches by Conqueſt and victory, who now had ſcarſe their wages.

(62) It is not meet that the name of that perſon who did performe ſo bleſſed an office, ſhould bee concealed. It was a woman of honour (but at that time a profeſſed * Nunne in the Abbey of Fontenels) the Lady Iane of Valois, ſiſter to this Philip, widdow of William late Earle of Henault, and mother to King Edwards wife; her charitable endeauors were ſtrongly holpen by * two Cardinals, who ſollicited peace together with her. Great intereſt of mediation ſhe had in either reſpect, here a brother, there a ſonne in law, and ſhee failed not to plie them both. The Truce was concluded; the rather for that King Philip was aduiſed from all parts, not to ſet his whole fortunes vpon the Die and chance of a Battell. And Edward (on the other ſide) meaning nothing leſſe, then not to haue proſecuted the war vpon the encouragement of his late Sea-victorie, was ſo deſtitute of money through the fault of his Officers in England, as hee was the ſooner drawne, if not enforced to embrace ſo honeſt a colour of returning from the ſiege of Turney; which neuertheleſſe did but deferre the miſeries of France, not determine them: & whereas that glory, which the vpper hand in this iourney would haue brought, could not haue beene pure and meere vnto him, becauſe the Dutch (whoſe aide hee vſed) would haue claimed no ſmall ſhare therein, the Engliſh Cheualrie onely had the name and burthen of ſuch great Acts as after followed.

(63) The chiefe Articles of the truce were; That it ſhould endure till Midſommer day then next enſuing, and that the Priſoners ſhould be ſet at liberty without any ranſome on both ſides, vpon condition to render themſelues againe, or pay their ſeuerall ranſomes, if peace were not in the meane time concluded. By vertue of this treaty and truce, the Earles of Salisbury and Suffolke were deliuered. Here it troubled our * Walſingham, that King Edward ſhould bee left ſo deſtitute, and needy by the auarice or fraud of his officers at home, as for that reſpect to giue ouer ſo faire an oportunity, by which hee might as it were by a continued line, and by inſiſting and preſſing vpon the ſteppes of his late ſucceſſe,

(64) King Edward greatly diſcontented with ſuch of his officers, through whoſe default he was thus in a manner conſtrained to let ſlip the preſent proſecution of his deſigne, returned with his Queen into England, to take reuenge of their miſdemeanors, where hee committed * ſome to priſon, put others from their places, and ſo beſtirred himſelfe, that by occaſion thereof much diſpleaſure grew betweene the King and Iohn Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury, who complained of manifeſt violences done againſt the Liberties of the Church and Engliſh Nation, comprehended in Magna Charta. And whereas the King did openly charge the Archbiſhoppe to haue beene a principall perſwader of his entring into league with the Almaines againſt the French, willing him to take no care for treaſure, becauſe himſelfe would ſee him abundantly furniſhed from England, out of the leuie of granted Subſidies, and profits of the Crown: and that through defect of the Archbiſhoppes performance, hee was not onely conſtrained to giue ouer his hold for the preſent, but alſo to embogge himſelfe in the Bankers and Vſurers bookes, the Archbiſhoppe thereunto made anſwere: That hee deſired in open Parliament it might appeare, through whoſe default the City of Tournay was not taken, and directly laid the whole blame from himſelfe and from his, vpon ſuch as were dayly Courtiers, (whom Walſingham calls Anglici regij, Engliſhmen for the King) who ſeruing their owne turnes with the generall abuſe, would expoſe him and his vniuſtly to the enuy of their fact. Yea, ſome there are, who, more then ſo, will haue the Archbiſhop ſeeme to practiſe againſt the kings farther good fortunes in France; which, if it be true, it is no hard matter to find out the principall motiue thereunto.

(65) For certainely the Pope (Benedict 12.) was nothing pleaſed with the ſucceſſes of Edward, at leaſt wiſe with the war it ſelfe, as pretending it was pernicious to Chriſtendome; the blame wherof the French charged vpon the Engliſh, as vnlawfully claiming, as the Engliſh did vpon the French for vnlawfully detaining. This Pope therefore interpoſeth himſelfe, and puts * Flanders vnder Interdict, as hauing diſloyally left their own Earle, and their chiefe Lord Philip, King of France, contrarie to their Oath and Allegiance; but they for their defence and iuſtification anſwered, that Edward was the onely lawfull King of France, and Philip (to whom they had ſworn) a meere vſurper, and therefore notwithſtanding that Interdict, or the Papall deciſion of the controuerſie, they perſiſted ſtill in their adherence.

(66) But the more to draine and weaken the mighty ſtreame of the Engliſh ſupportations, Lewis of Bauar the Emperour, ſodainely (by ſuch practiſes as were vſed on behalfe of the French) recalled his Vicar-ſhippe or delegation, which hee had made to Edward, to exerciſe imperiall power in lower Germanie, offering his beſt helpe notwithſtanding, (as hauing power from Philip to that purpoſe,) to procure him honorable conditions as a Mediator betweene them: The pretence of his falling from King Edward, and concluding amitie with his enemie, was for that King Edward without his priuitie, had conſented to a Truce at the City of Tourney with Philip.

King Edwards anſwere to Lewis Emperour.

(67) To theſe reuocatorie lines King Edward "made this wiſe and noble anſwere; That the Em-"perours zeale to make attonement hee could not "but greatly commend, wiſhing, that at the inſtance "of ſo potent a Mediator, an honourable Peace (if "that were poſſible) might bee made; but his Title "being cleare enough, he meant not to make doubt-"fall by putting it to any arbitration. That it could "not but bee admired, why he ſhould now enter a-"mitie with Philip de Valoys the wrong-doer, ſith, ha-"uing ſeene his apparent right, hee had entred with "him into league againſt the ſaid Philip: That it was "alſo agreed, that he might conclude any tempora-"rie Truce (though not a finall accord) without his "conſent, if need ſhould be, as in this caſe at Turney "it was. That this reuocation ſeemed to bee made "ſomewhat abortiuely, for ſo much as the Imperia-"liſts had promiſed the Vicar-ſhippe ſhould ſtand "good till hee had conquered France, or the greater "portion thereof. Dated thus; Londini, Anno regni noſtri Francia, 2. Regni verò noſtri Anglia, 15. But Lewis of Bauar to Edward thus * inconſtant, and faith-breaking, continued toward Philip ſtedfaſt, without either amending Philips fortunes thereby, or himſelfe increaſing in Iuſtice or honeſtie, that it might eaſily bee ſeene hee was endued with qualities, which ill became the Imperiall height.

(69) And now once againe the French and Engliſh powers were at point to trie their fortunes by battell, vpon ſiding with others Claimes, as erſt they had done for their owne. The quarrell was founded vpon a title to the Dutchie of little Britaine. Arthur Duke thereof had two wiues; by Beatrix his firſt wife, hee had two ſonnes, Iohn (afterward Duke) & Guy; and by Iolant his ſecond wife, he had Iohn of Montfort, Duke Iohn liuing without Iſſue, aſſured to Iane (daughter of his brother Guy who died before him) the Ducall Crowne of little Britaine: vpon which entaile, Charles of Bloys (Nephew to Philip King of France) marrieth the Lady Iane, who in the life time of Duke Iohn, was (by agreement) put into full poſſeſſion: but Duke Iohn being once dead, Iohn of Montfort raiſeth warre as the ſuruiuing heire male. Philip King of France tooke part with Charles of Bloys, and Edward king of England with the Lord Iohn of Montfort.

(70) Great and bloudie miſchiefes ſprang out of theſe ſtrongly ſupported factions, which had now drawne king Edward thither in perſon; and little Britaine (which may well in a ſort bee called Wales in France, the Britons chiefly the Britons Britonant, or ruder Britons, declaring at this preſent by their language, and ſundry locall Names, as Lanion, Triguier, &c.

A kind of Wales in France.

&c. That their kinſmen are in Wales and Cornwall) was become the field of Mars and martiall furies. But the powers of thoſe two mightie Kings being vpon point, before the City of Nants in high Britaine, to cut out their diuers ſhares in fortunes Patrimony, with the edge of the ſword, loe againe God inclined their hearts (as if he would faine haue done nothing but ſhew his vengeance in the ſcabbard) by the carefull diligence of two Cardinals, to accept of a truce, which was concluded Ianuary the 19. at the Priory of Maleſtret, vpon ſundry points, whereof theſe (as to the purpoſe of our Story) are the principall.

(71) That the two Kings of England and France ſhould ſend certaine of their blood royall to the Court of Rome (by a day certaine) there to argue their ſeuerall titles, and rights to the French Monarchy, not as before a Iudge, but as a *friend indifferent to both, and that the King of Scots, and the Earle of Henault, ſhould likewiſe ſend to giue their aſſent for ſo much as concerned them.

(72) That eithers friends, adherents, and ſequels, ſhould be comprehended in the truce, and that the truce ſhould extend it ſelfe to the titlers in Britaine and their ſides; and that the Cardinals ſhould doe their beſt to obtaine abſolution from the ſentence of Interdict executed vpon the Countrey of Flaunders.

(73) That the truce ſhould continue for three yeeres; that priſoners or moueables taken on either ſide ſhould be mutually diſcharged; that traffique and paſſages ſhould bee open; and that all other things ſhould ſtand as they did at the time of the truce made: which being fairely engroſſed in an* Inſtrument, two great Peeres of each part, took oathes vpon perill of the ſoules of their Kings, to obſerue the contents ſincerely.

(74) The poſſeſſion of the City of Vannes in baſe Brittain, the Engliſhmen ſtill kept, that (if ſetled peace followed not vpon this truce) they might haue ſome hold and certaine footing-place, from whence to make head againe, and march into the heart of France. In this warre Robert de Artois Earle of Richmond, a principall inſtigatour of King Edward, died of a wound, and Iohn of Montford did not long ouer-liue this truce, after whoſe death moſt part of Britaine came into the hands of * Charles of Blois.

(75) King Edward returning home after the Truce, neglected not his domeſticke affaires, but enacted the Statute of Prouiſors, vpon this occaſion. Pope Benedict being dead, Clement the 6. ſucceeded; a man of ſingular learning, but extreemely profuſe in giuing, who, by way of Prouiſion, had beſtowed ſundry choice Benefices in England vpon Forreiners. For preuention whereof (as of a thing which the King and Peeres would not endure,) it was made high Treaſon by law, for any to bring ſuch Papall prouiſions into the Kingdome. And for iuſtification of his ſo doing, he directed that* letter vnto the Pope which was ſo * excellently pend, as did not onely moue admiration, but aſtoniſhment; and indeed this pruned age affords few ſo graue and ſolide. In which Parliament alſo the Lord Edward, the Kings eldeſt ſonne, was created Prince of Wales. He was ſo renowned a Gentleman, (why doe we ſay he was, as if he could at any time ceaſe to be, whom fame hath made immortall?) that the high praiſe before giuen by Walſingham to his father, *as * excelling all the Princes which went before him*, may be paralelled in the Sonne, as ſurpaſsing in martiall deeds, all the Princes that haue liued after him.

(76) His noble father King Edward (who had ſtill his eie fixed vpon France as the marke of his Conqueſt) hauing notice among other things, by a meſſenger from the Pope, that Lewis of Bauer had wholly ſubmitted himſelfe, and was fully abſolued from all cenſures, with confirmation vnto him of the Imperiall diademe: the King, (that you may by his courage know him worthie of ſuch a ſonne,) brake irefullie forth into theſe words. Though Lewis take the French kings part, I will fight with them both. And whither he were inuited with the fame of King Arthurs Table, and the Knights aduenterous thereof, or for that he knew honourable Company and exerciſe in Armes, to be the naturall parents of excellent ſouldiers, it is agreed, that he erected a building at his Caſtle of Windſore; which ſhould be called the Round Table, whoſe circumference was ſixe hundred foot, where Knights and men of warre ſhould haue their entertainement of diet, at his charge by one hundred pounds by the weeke, though afterward through occaſion of his warres he abated that ſum to twenty pounds weekely. In emulation whereof, Philip de Valoys (knowing that all this tended but to preparations againſt him,) erected the like in his Court, to inuite the Knights and men at Armes of Almain and of Italie from repairing to King Edward. One thing Philip did ſhrewdly and politickly, in giuing leaue to his ſubiects to fell downe his woods freely for building of Ships, whereby his Nauie was greatly augmented, and the rather wrought much miſchiefe afterward. About this time one of the chiefe ſtarres in the firmament of the Engliſh Cheualry fell into the Graue, William Montacute King of Man, and marſhall of England of * whoſe noble acts to write worthilie were a commendable matter.

(77) But the French King, perceiuing that a terrible tempeſt was likely to fall vpon him from forth of England, waxed cruell in his iealouſie, and* put ſundry principall men of Normandy, Picardy, and Guien to death, for no other crime, but that they were Engliſh in affection; among whom are reckoned Sir Oliuer de Cliſſon, * Bacon, Perſie, and Geoffrey of Maleſtroict, Knights of the beſt note; Sir Godfrey of Harecourt brother to the Earle of Harecourt being alſo ſummoned to Paris, appeared in England, whither he fled, and became a ſpeciall firebrand in the approaching combuſtion.

(78) It was not Pope Clements mediation, or diligence in diſcuſsing the Titles and Pretences of theſe two puiſſant Monarkes, which could preuent the fatall puniſhment of France, yet according to the Articles of the treatiſe at Maleſtroict, either Prince ſent his particular Orators, where the difficulties roſe ſo thicke and intricate, as *Clement diſpairing to cleare them, put ouer their farther view till another time. But King Edward affirming the truce to be manifeſtly broken, * by the beheading & perſecuting of his friends in Normandy & elſwhere, ſignifies ſo much to the Pope, that Battel and not Parlance ſhould determine his right, and title. His prouiſions of men, of ſhips, of weapon, of victuals, of treaſure, of all things, needfull to ſo braue and daring an enterprize, were worthy of the greatneſſe, courage, ſtrength, riches, and maieſty of a King of England. Into Gaſcoigne he ſends that valiant great Lord Henry of Lancaſter, Earle of Derby, with a gallant company of leaders and troups of ſouldiers, where he atchieued many great things, for the defence and enlargement of that Dutchie, taking Cities, Caſtles and Townes of which Iohn the French Kings eldeſt ſonne recouered diuers not long after; and diſcomfited the enemy in battell. The Scots attempting againſt the Weſt Marches of England, by the vigilancy and proweſſe of ſuch as were in truſt for thoſe parts, as the Biſhop of Carlil, the Lords Percie, Neuile, and Lucie, very valiant gentlemen, were forced to * retire into Scotland. It was the practiſe of either Prince to diuert, and diſtract eithers puiſſance, we Philips in Gaſcoigne, and hee ours, by his perpetuall, and conſtant confederates, the Scots. Our Edward notwithſtanding could doe it the leſſe, for that his conſtant friend Iaques van Arteweld (who was become as it were the popular Tribune of Flanders) was * ſlaine in a mutiny by ſuch as were of the French faction.

The most noble order of the Garter instituted friend to life, gaue life notwithstanding about this time to an inuention, which as for the present it serued (he hauing so great vse thereof for his French enterprises) as a vehement Incentiue to martiall valour, and a golden band of vnitie, so the same is continued with likelihood of perennity, and multiplication of splendor in these our daies. It was the foundation of the English order, worthily called the most noble order of the Garter. The causes why our Edward erected it, are not euident, though there could none be greater or better, then those before recited; Honor expressed by externall and illustrious ensignes, deuised by a victorious Author, and appropriated to a fellowshippe of most exemplar and eminent persons, being in nature like a flame, to kindle in the apt and worthy, al heroicke affections. The vulgar opinion is, that whatsoeuer the remoter causes were which moued to this foundation, the neere cause, or the occasion was, a Garter of his owne Queene (or as *some say) of the Lady Ioan, Countesse of Salisburie (wonder of that age for shape and beautie) which slipping off in a dance, king Edward stooped and tooke vp. Such of the Nobles as were present, smiling, and * playing in sport with that action of the Kings, as amouros, hee seriously said, it should not be long before there should Soueraigne honour be done to that silken tie. Whereupon hee afterward added the French Motte, or Symbolicall word HONI SOIT QVI MALY PENSE, aswell in complement of the whole inuention, as in retort or checke of his Courtiers sinister suspition. Polydor Virgil troubleth himselfe to make an Apologie for the courseneſſe of this Originall, if (without iniurie) an office of honorable loue in so renowned a Monarch, may vndergoe the note of courseneſſe; but the same Polydor among his other defences therof truly saith;

Nobilitas sub amore iacet.

A.D. 1350. An.Reg. 24. The Patent of the foundation beares date 22. Reg. Edw. 3. saith Stow, who neuertheleſſe placeth the first feast thereof at this yeare.

There want not some who coniecture, that he entituled it the Order of the Garter, for that in a battell wherein he was victorious, hee had giuen the word Garter, for the word or signe. But if credite may be attributed to the originall * Booke of the Institution, the inuention is deduced from times more ancient, "and that when Richard the first King of England, set "forward against the Turks and Sarazens to Cyprus "and Acon, and waxed wearie of longer delay, while "the siege of Acon was with wonderfull care protra- "cted, courage at the length (by the comming of S. "George among them as it was thought) quickning "in him, it came into his mind to tie about the legs "of certaine his choice Knights, a Garter or small "thong of leather, the onely stuffe fitte for such a "purpose, which hee had then at hand, to the in- "tent that they (as it were by ioint consent) being "mindfull of future glory, if they were victorious, "might bee stirred vp, to demean themselues nobly "after the example of the Romans, with whome "that varietie of Crownes or Garlands giuen for "sundry causes as honourable Ensignes to the Soul- "dier was in vse; to the intent, that by such incite- "ments, they might shake off sloath, and the spirite "of courage might rise, and breake forth the more "feruently.

* Vt militarem virtutem honoribus, præmijs atque splendore decoraret

(81) There was in the Castle of Windsor (the ordained seat of the Order now first to be consummated) before King Edward did accomplish his intention, in honour of God, * our Lady, and S. George, a * Chappell erected by King Henry the first, and other Progenitors of Edward, with an allowance for eight Canons, to whose Colledge this Prince added a Deane, fifteene Canons more, and twenty and foure poore impotent Knightes, with other officers and seruants, as appeareth by his Charter. These were to pray for the good estate of the Soueraigne and Brethren of the most noble Order. The Soueraigne and Knights themselues had their particular lawes and constitutions, which they were by solemn oath bound to obserue, of which one * was, That they should defend and assist one the other: which afterward made Alphonse Duke of Calabria receiue the habite of that Order with so exceeding reuerence at Naples, as erroniously thinking himself secured therby from the French, who claimed that Kingdome. But that custome of mutuall assistance (saith * Polydor) was then worne out of vse, and discontinued euery where; for those Italian Potentates who (within the memory of Polydor) being driuen forth of their Country, and imploring aid of those orders, whereof themselues were companions, found no supporture, either from the French or Burgundians, who had formerly elected them. Besides laws and Officers, King Edward also deuised particular Ceremonies & distinctiue habites and enlignements, whereof the principall was the azure Garter, wherein the French Motte of the Order was wrought in letters of gold, and the Garter it selfe fastned a little vnder the left knee with a buckle of gold, in * token of Concord. There are speciall Manuscript Bookes of the Constitutions, and other things peculiar to this Order, to which (this place being not aptly capable of their recapitulation) wee must referre the curious. Saint George the * esteemed patterne of Christian fortitude, is intituled to the Patronage of this Order, & the beauteous Chappell in Windsor Castle (where his * day is yeerely celebrated) consecrated by King Edward to his memory. The fortune of this inuention hath beene such, that the most mighty Princes of the Christian world haue thought themselues most highly honoured, in being chosen thereunto, so that there haue beene about two and twenty forraine Emperors and Kings (besides many others of most noble quality) since the first institution thereof, elected and admitted Companions of the Garter. The Kings of England are in their seuerall times Soueraignes of the Order, and the whole number of Knights is circumscribed in twenty and six, whereof the Soueraigne is one. The names of the first twenty and sixe (who are also styled Founders of the Order) you shall finde intabled in our Mappe of Barkeshire.

(82) Our *Edward hauing thus honoured S. Georges memory, assigned to his Image mounted in Armour vpon Horsebacke a siluer Shield with a crosse Gules (* the deare remembrance of his dying Lord) and * appointed his Souldiers to weare white coats or lackets, with a red Crosse before and behind ouer their Armor, that it was not onely a comely, but a stately sight to behold the English battels, like the rising Sunne to glitter farre off in that pure hew; when the Souldies of other Nations in their baser weedes could not bee discerned. The glory therefore of this Order seemed such to one, no * vnlearned Poet, that in an Apostrophe to Windsor, speaking of the Garter, hee breakes forth into these scarse Hyberbolicall verses.

- Cappadocis quanquam sis clara Georgi

Far spreads thy fame, wherewith S. Georges knights Hath made thee glorious; where rich-robed Peeres, Whose manly legs the golden garter dights,

As worthlesse: all macht with thy George, are base.

(83) Let vs not dwell too long in the lesser things: It was the moneth of Iulie, and King Edward was now vpon the Sea with about a thousand Saile,

* Saile. No man is said to know whether he bent his course, so well he could trust himselfe, and so wisely free his Councels from the possibility of discouerie. He went not to warre by rote, but by book; wisdome was Herbenger and marshall of his valour; who shall say he knew not how to conquer? It was not long but he came to anchor in the Hauen of Hogy Saint Vast, in Constantine, a great cape of land or penile in Normandy. His* land forces did muster twenty and fiue hundred horse, and thirty thousand foote, most of which were Archers. The lights, and glories of his Armie, were the Prince of Wales (then about sixteene yeers old, who was then by his father knighted) many braue Earles, Lords, Knights, and expert Cheifs, the English going cheerefullie, as hauing gotten such a King as answered their warlike dispositions. The Earle of Huntington had charge of his Nauy: himselfe takes seuere reuenge for the blood of his friends vpon the Norman Townes and people, protesting he sacrificed them * to Clisson, Baro, Percie, and the rest. Their heads were set vpon the chiefe Gate of Carentine, for which cause hee slew all that could be found therein, and turning the whole town into Cinders gaue it to their funerall. He tooke the populous and rich City of Caen, & with his dreadfull host burning and spoiling round about, marched vp almost as farre as the very walles of Paris, brauing King Philip so neere.

(74) Who had not slept all this while, but was * pursueied of one of the fullest armies which euer were seene in France. King Edwards people rich with spoile seemed not vnwilling to return. They were now in the enemies Country between the two good riuers of Sein and Some, for they had passed the Sein at Poissie, whose Bridge (as all other betweene Roan and Paris) had beene broken downe by the French, and now (notwithstanding any opposition) in a short space repaired. It was thought fit to seeke passage out of these straights, which could not be by Bridges, for they were broken by the French. This search for passage, was by the enemy interpreted a kind of flight, and Edward could not but be willing to nourish their temerity, to draw them on securely to destruction by such a seeming feare.

(85) The riuer of Some, betweene Albeuille and the Sea, at a low water hath a passable and grauellie foord, knowne by the name of Blanch Taque; this was discouered to him by one Gobin a prisoner. But the French King (best acquainted in his owne Countrey) to empeach this passage, had before sent thether a Norman Baron of speciall note, one Godmar du Foy, and a 1000. thousand horse with at least 6000. foot; but Edward, (whom as obstacles made impetuous, so nothing could dismay,) enters himselfe into the Foord, * crying, He that loues me let him follow me, as one that resolued either to passe, or die. Who can tell the efficacy of such a Generals spirit, but they, who haue had the happinesse to follow vnder the conduct? The passage wan, and Du Foy defeated in a manner, before he was almost fought with, (the incomparable courage of his enemies appalling him,) he brought to King Philip fewer by a paire of thousands, then he carried forth, besides terrour, and an euill signe of that which followed. The English, who knew not what it meant to run away, but were before resolued to liue & die with such a Souereigne, had reason now much more to resolue the same.

(86) King Edward was neere to Cressie in the County Ponthieu, lying betweene the riuers of Some and Anthy (which vnquestionably belonged vnto him in right of his mother,) there most vigilantly prouides he for his defence. King Philip, set on fire with this disaster, precipitates to battell for accomplishment of Gods anger against France; being the rather drawne, by the vnruly vanity of his huge multitudes, (for by what other words doe * an hundred or six-score thousand men deserue to bee called?) who neuer left ouer-taking one the other, till the view of the English banners and battels put them to stand. We professe that the nature of our vndertakings will not brooke descriptions at large; you shall haue it as we may, that is, as remembring, that innumerable great atcheiuements rest behind, somewhat impatiently attending their relation.

The English put into battell.

(87) Therefore, the holy name of God first ritely inuocated, King Edward, without shewing the least signe of perturbation, but full of an Heroick assuredneſse, had ordered his people in three battels, with their wings and succours. The Vaward disposed into the forme of an Hearse, where the Archers stood in front, and the men of armes in the bottome, was vnder the yong Lyon of Wales, Prince Edward, and with him many of the prime and sagest Captaines: Beauchamp Earle of warwick, Godfrey of Harecourt, The Lords, Stafford, Lawarre, Bourchier, Clifford, Cobham, Holland, &c. In the second battell were, The Earles of Northampton, and Arundell; the Lords, Rosse, Willoughby, Basset, Saint Albine, Multon, &c. The third and last battell was commanded in cheife by King Edward himselfe, with the residue of his Nobles and people. In euery one of these battels, beside the wings, were a iust proportion of men at armes and Archers, but nothing so thinne and few as some of our * writers alledge, who mention not aboue 9000. all together, who were at least thrice as many in their whole numbers, and not without need.

(88) King Edward closed his battels at their back, (as if he meant to barricado them from flying,) by felling and plashing of Trees, placing his carriages there and other impediments whatsoeuer, hauing commanded * all men to put from them their horses, which were left among the carriages. Thus all waies of safety by flight being preuented, the necessity did vndoubtedly double their courages. Thus placed to the best aduantage, King Edward visiteth the ranckes in person, riding vpon a pleasant * Hobby, (hauing onely a white rod in his hand, as if hee would chastise fortune,) betweene the two marshals of his field; whose very presence, with a few seasonable and vnenforced words on behalfe of God and his right, in steed of long Orations, did inspire the faintest hearts among them with freshest vigour and alacritie.

(89) Our writers describe not vnto vs the quality or face of the gound of Cressy where this battel was determined (though verie much doth depend vpon choise of place,) neither the exact figures, or seuerall numbers of euery seuerall battel, their distances, wings or other warlike formes, nor finally what Pallisado, trench, or other deuise was in this or that quarter vsed, to keepe-off and breake the furious charge of men of Armes, before they came at the Archers, principall workemen at this bloody iourney. But thus lamely are things commended to Posterity, where the Actors themselues take no care to see the particulars orderly and according to the truth delineated; but either are vnlearned, or giue themselues to the bodily fruition of their passed trauels, rather then to exercise their minds in profiting themselues and others by such relations as are made with life and art. This we find, that the place of the Englishmens battels was the Towne of Cressie, and Foreſt, and therefore apt with small labour to be made inaccessible, or at leastwise difficult for horse to enter vpon; that also the English battels were marshalled to the most aduantage for giuing succour one vnto the other; and that there were * Shields or Pauises to shelter our Archers from the Genowaies shot.

Wee need not deſcribe the order of the French, where diſorder was a principall Actor: The * King of Bohem, and Charles Earle of Alenzon, King Philips brother German, had charge of the point or vantgard, King Philip himſelfe was in the maine battell, and the Earle of Sauoy had chiefe command in the Rere.

(92) That is almoſt ridiculous, which * one writes of the etymologie of the Oiliflame (as he cals it) aduanced at this battell, as a ſigne of taking none to mercie, no more (as he ſaith) then Oile doth vſe to extinguiſh fire; when indeed it was an hallowed * Banner of red ſilke, whereof the French had a wonderfull high conceit, as of that which was ſent from heauen, and called Oreflame or Auriflames. King Edward on the contrary ſide, is reported for ſigne of like rigour, to haue erected there his vnconquered Standard of the Dragon-Gules. Lewis of Luxemburg, the moſt valiant old King of Bohemia, being either blind or verie badly ſighted, hearing in what goodly order the Engliſh (like ſober Spartan ſouldiers) attẽded the charge, ſaid plainelie (contrary to their ouer-weening iudgements who had giuen out of their flight,) Here will the Engliſh end their daies or conquer. And euen as the firſt wounds were ready in a manner to bee giuen and taken, behold, God, to let them know he was awake, and that there was one aboue to whom ſo many thouſands ſhould within a few minutes appeare, to giue an account of their whole liues till that preſent; hee cauſed the blacke cloudes to poure down vpon them ſtore of funerall teares, enarching the ayre with a ſpatious * Raine-bow, and diſcharging ſundry tire and peales of thunder: the Sunne alſo, at the ſame time drawing neere to ſet, would gladly haue hid his face, by thruſting it vnder a partill * Eclypſe; but God (who meant good to the Engliſh) would not ſuffer him to withdraw his more neceſſary office, ſo that freed from that temporary ſhadow, he ſhone directly into the Frenchmans eyes. At the ſame time alſo * ſholes and cloudes of balefull Rauens, and other birdes of prey and rauin, as foreſhewing the harueſt of carcaſes at hand, came flying ouer the French hoaſt.

(93) The ſigne of battell being giuen by King Philip, and entertained with ſhoutes and clamors, all things ſhewing the horror of war, Drums & Trumpets ſounding to a charge, Banners flying in the winde, and euery where ſhining weapons, menacing braue extremitie, reaſon her ſelfe acknowledged it onely ſafe to leaue them to their brute faculties, paſſion and furie, and the euent it ſelfe to God. The French calamities began at their Genowayes, who vnder * Carolo Grimaldi, and Antonio Doria their Coronels, being all of them Croſſe-bowmen, were to open a way for the French horſe with their ſhot. This was the ſucceſſe of their ſeruice: Their Croſſe-bow ſtrings wet with the late raine, their bodies wearie with a long march, their rankes (after the Engliſh had intercepted vpon * targets their firſt volue,) filled with innumerable gappes, occaſioned by the fall of their fellowes ſlaine, or ouerthrowne with home-drawne arrowes, were laſtly moſt outragiouſly ſcattered by Charles Earle of Alanſon, at whoſe commandement (deriued from K. * Philip himſelfe) his horſe gaue in among thẽ, to driue them by plaine murther from the honour of hauing the point, vpon onely pretence that they hindered their race. This hote young Count (contrary to good diſcipline,) had alſo otherwiſe vniuſtly diſcontented and diſgraced them, euen when they were ready to ioin in battell, whoſe bodies (being as moſt write about twelue thouſand) by bearing the firſt brunt might haue beene of great vſe, if in nothing elſe, but in ſeruing as buttes and quiuers, to take into them the chiefe firſt ſtormes of the Engliſh arrowes. Whereas now they themſelues were not onely thus moſt miſerably troden vnder foot, and put to the ſword, but many of the French Gallants by that occaſion mingled among them, were ouerthrowne by the Engliſh arrowes, who equally purſued the deſtruction both of French and Genowayes, ſhooting thickeſt where the tumult and confuſion were greateſt. Some * raſcals alſo following the Engliſh Armie, as they ſaw opportunity, ſtept in among them, and holpe to cut throates, ſparing neither Lord nor lozell.

The Genowayes defeated.

(94) The French men of Armes halfe out of breath with headlong haſte, and terribly diſordered with the perpetuall ſtormes of ſinging arrowes, were now at hand-ſtrokes with the Princes battell; neither was it long, but that the ſhining Battell axes, ſwords, lances, and other weapons of our nation had loſt their ſplendor, being couered with humane gore, which hauing thirſtily drunke out of enemies wounds, they let fall in bloudy teares. The fight was ſharpe and fierce: but to what purpoſe ſerues writing, if the high reſolution of the king of Bohemia ſhould be vnremembred? he (as onely ſeeking an honourable graue for his old age) put himſelfe into the firſt ranke of his owne horſemen, and with full randome charging the Engliſh, was ſlaine with ſword in hand, the troupe of his faithfull followers with their ſlaughtered bodies couering him euen in death. There lay this Trophea of the Engliſh Cheualrie, by whoſe fall (euidently ſeene in the ruine of the Bohemian Standard,) his noble ſonne, the Lord Charles of Boheme (lately elected Emperor, whileſt Lewis was as * yet aliue) was wiſely warned to prouide for himſelfe, the matter appearing deſperate. For now was Philip himſelfe in perſon, with the ful power of his Armie, come to the reſcues of his brother and friends, who were hard at worke (while they had breath) about their dreamed victorie, but finding the mettall infinitely more tough which they had to deale vpon, then they could poſſibly haue ſuppoſed, were beaten to the earth in great numbers. The young Prince neuertheleſſe was not without danger, though now the ſecond battell of the Engliſh, for preſeruation of their Prince, daſhing in among the enemies, fought moſt couragiouſly.

(95) Therefore King Edward himſelfe was ſent vnto, whoſe battel houered like a tempeſt in a cloud, ouer which, vpon the hillocke of a Windmill, with his helmet on, (which neuer came off till all was done) he iudiciouſly watcht, beholding the whole field, and ready to enter into the conflict when iuſt neceſsity ſhould inuite. You ſhall heare a moſt noble anſwere: The meſſenger diſpatched from the Earle of Northampton and others, * vpon a tender reſpect to their young Princes ſafety, hauing declared to the King, that the Lords required his preſence, for that his ſonne was in danger, * he bad him return and ſay; Let them ſend no more to mee for any aduenture that may befall, while my ſonne is aliue; but let him either vanquiſh or die, becauſe the honour of this braue day ſhall bee his, if God ſuffer him to ſuruiue.

(96) The Meſſenger returned, and though hee brought not men to their ſuccours, hee brought ſuch acceſſion of courage and ſpirite, as hee that ſhould ſay that King Edward failed them at their neede, ſhould neither vnderſtand what belongs to magnanimitie, nor the effect of ſuch a checke from ſo excellent a Generall: who neuertheleſſe, was maturely watchfull ouer the good of his childe and people: on the other ſide King Philip (whoſe quarrell it was) did not forſake the duety of a noble Chiefe: but ſo long contended in his owne perſon, till his horſe was * ſlaine vnder him with arrowes, himſelfe * twice diſmounted, and wounded both in the necke and thigh: but then the Lord Iohn of Henault, Earle of of Beaumont, (who had long ſince quit King Edwards ſeruice) ſets him againe on horſebacke, and the French (out of a loyall deſire to his preſeruation) cried to retire him out of the fight, who rather ſeemed willing to end his dayes in ſo noble companie: which voice was as it were the vp-ſhot and laſt Gaſpe of that moſt cruell conflict, where none as yet were taken to mercy vpon any termes.

After their King had preſerued himſelfe, the whole power of the French gaue away, and ſought to ſaue it ſelfe by flight, whom the Engliſh, warely fighting vpon the defenſiue, and loath to hazard ſuch a victory, by breaking their rancks to purſue the enemie too farre in the night time, (which now was come vpon them,) ſuffered them to be holden in chaſe by their owne iuſt feare, contented to make good their ground, by ſtanding ſtill vpon their guard according to true diſcipline. For they ſaw not as yet the bottome of their danger, and knew that there were ſo many eſcaped, as might well ſerue to ouerwhelme their Army with their multitudes.

(97) King Edward ſeeing the coaſt for the preſent cleare of all his enemies, aduanceth with his vntoucht battell towards his victorious ſonne, & moſt affectionately embracing and kiſſing him, ſaid; Faire Sonne, God ſend you good perſeuerance to ſo proſperous beginnings; you haue nobly acquit your ſelfe, and are well worthy to haue the Gouernance of a Kingdome entruſted vnto you for your valour. To which the moſt cheualrous of young Princes replied in ſilence, moſt humbly falling on his knees, before his triumphant father.

(98) Here there may be ſome controuerſie, whether the exemplary manhood of the Engliſh, or their ſingular pietie, were more to be commended: but who will not infinitely preferre the latter, chiefly in Souldiers, among whom it is vſually moſt wanting? Great was the victorie, great was their prowceſſe, & great the glory; but they like true Chriſtian knights and Souldiers, forbare all boaſt, referring the whole thankes and honour of their preſeruation to God the true Author thereof. The night was ſo very darke, as if it had mourned for the day times bloudſhed, therefore they made * ſtore of fires, lighted torches, and candles, carefully tending their wounded companions, and modeſtly reioycing in their owne faire aduenture.

(99) But the next morning preſented new work; for ſuch a miſt hauing ouerſpread the earth, that they could ſcarſe ſee hard at hand, yet were * new ſwarms of French abroad, who came from ſundrie Cities and good townes, as Roan, Beauois, &c. to haue ioyned with King Philip in the deſigned ſpoile of the Engliſh; theſe being mette with by King Edwards people, were in ſundry places ouerthrowne and ſlaine, and multitudes of ſuch as had loſt their way in the laſt flight, were ſeuerely put to the ſword, as the Engliſh chanced vpon them, * where they lay lurking in hedges, buſhes, and by-wayes: The Earles of Northampton, * Suffolke and Norfolke, * had the execution of the French which fled from this laſt ouerthrow, for the ſpace of about nine miles Engliſh from the ground where they encountred.

(100) There was leaſure now to take an account of the ſlaine; which vpon the enemies ſide amounted, not onely in the number to very many, but in their quality to very great. For ſearch hereof, king Edward cauſed certaine principall commanders, & three Heraldes, (who by the Coat-Armours might iudge of the perſons, it being then a thing perpetuall and ſolemne not to fight without thoſe ſignes of Nobleſſe,) to take an exact view of the field, who about ſupper time returning, made report to the King, that they found the dead bodies of * eleuen great Princes, and of Barons, Knights, and men of Armes, aboue * one thouſand, and fiue hundreth. Among the owners of ſuch bodies as were beaten to the Earth vpon the firſt day, theſe are worthily reckoned chiefe: The * King of Bohemia, the * King of Maiorca, * Charles Earle of Alanſon, brother-German to King Philip, the Duke of Lorraine, * the Duke of Burbon, the * Earle of Flanders, the * Earle of Sauoy (both great Princes,) * the Dolphin of Viennois, ſonne to Himbert, the Earle of Sancerre, and Harecourt (whoſe brother Godfrey in pitty of his houſe, his two Nephewes being ſlaine with their father, forſooke the King of England after this battell, and returned into Grace with the French,) the * Earles of Aumarl, Neuers, &c. ſixe Earles of Almaine; beſide others of great account of all ſorts. Vpon the ſecond day, the Grand Prior of France, who with his Archbiſhoppe of Roan, had on the behalfe of their Prince and Country put on Armes. Of the Commons, in * both of theſe blacke dayes, there fell about thirty thouſand, and ſome ſay, foure times more in this laſt, then in the other.

(101) We finde not one man of honour, or note ſlaine vpon the Engliſh ſide, ſo that this victorie may ſafely bee accounted among the wonderfull. The * ſpoiles of the Enemies bodies and carriages, King Edward gaue wholy to his well deſeruing ſouldiers. The rule of their ſafety (they being in a moſt populous enemy Countrie) would not permit them to vſe much curteſie to others, as that which might haue proued cruelty to themſelues, but vpon the ſecond day they tooke many * priſoners, though none of great name, for they were ſpent in the day before. It pleaſed the conquerour to proclaime a truce now for three dayes in the Country about, that the people might come in to burie their dead; but the bodies of the moſt noble, hee himſelfe cauſed to be conueied to Monſtreal, and there (in his March towards Calais) enterred.

(102) Thus by Gods fauour, and the vnreſiſtable force of the Engliſh Archers, (who in a manner did * onely fight) was King Edward put into a full and peaceable poſſeſſion of a perfect victory; which after hee had one night onely enioyed in the Forreſt of Creſtie, hee diſlodged with his conquering hoaſt, & marched ſtraight toward Calais, which hee * preſently inueſted, hating decreed neuer to riſe with his Armie from before it, till without aſſault hee had carried the ſame. For which cauſe he entrenched and fortified his Camp on all ſides, built vp * Sheds couered with Reed and broome, and other places and offices as to dwell in, and ſtopping all reliefe by Sea, (whereof hee was Maſter) with his Nauie. There commanded in Calais for the French, Sir John de Vienne, * Marſhall of France, and the Lord Dandreghan, with a very ſtrong Garriſon, who concluded like good men of war, to trie all extremities, rather then to ſurrender the Piece, which was ſo ſtrong, that to aſſault the ſame, otherwiſe then with famine had beene friuolous. Theſe great Captaines ſeeing King Edwards reſolution, thruſt forth of the Towne (for ſparing of food) their poorer people, aboue fifteene hundreth; whom hee, like a true Chriſtian Prince, turned not backe vpon the Towne, but releeued for Gods cauſe with freſh victuals, and two pence ſterling each; permitting them freely and ſecurely to paſſe through his Camp, to his great glory, and (vndoubtedly) profite alſo, hauing their hearty prayers for his happy ſucceſſe, and God for pay-maſter, and rewarder of ſuch his Beneficence.

(103) Many wayes were thought vpon by king Philip to raiſe this obſtinate ſiege: two principall; an Army of French to fight with King Edward, and a diuerſion by inuaſion, wherein the Scots (their perpetuall allies) were forward. Both in their ſeuerall times, were put into execution: That of the Scotiſh inuaſion was firſt, but with ſuch ſucceſſe, as well declared it was Gods will (all people hauing their encreaſings, zeniths, and declinations) that the Engliſh name ſhould now be brought to the verticall point thereof, without any thing being able to reſiſt it.

France,

France, and foule vpon his returne.

(109) Neuer was the English Name ſo great, and glorious as at this time, nor did England herſelfe in any foregoing age enioy a King more renowned for wiſdome, chevalrie, and felicity in actions; the iuſt brightneſſe of his irradiant vertues, not onely adorning her with Garlands, conquered Spoiles, and Trophees, but ſeeming alſo (ſuch was the abundance of all things) to infuſe fertility into the earth it ſelfe, like ſome * new ſhining ſunne. Meane while faire France (whoſe wofull turne it was) ſate mournfullie weeping, and with great anxietie of mind prouided the beſt ſhee could againſt ſuch a deluge of calamities. Neither yet was King Edwards glorie at the higheſt, for God was inclined to make him yet more bounden and beholden. Howbeit as it is a mighty worke to aſcend to ſuch an eminencie of renown, yet when the moſt of man is knowne and done, let none therefore loue themſelues, or admire others, for neither hath this world any thing permanent to truſt vpon, and to God alone belongs the honour. This was found and felt when the celeſtiall maieſtie ſaw the abuſe of his good gifts. It rained from Midſommer till Chriſtmas, and ſo terrible a plague ranne through the world, that the earth was filled with graues, and the aire with cries: which was ſeconded with murren of Cattle, and dearth of all things. The plague beganne among the Turkes, and pierced by degrees into France, where it mowed downe many thouſands. In London it had ſo quicke and ſharpe an edge, that in one yeeres ſpace, there were buried in * one Church-yard (commonly called the Ciſtertian, or Charter-houſe) aboue fifty thouſand. The French notwithſtanding practiſe to recouer Calais by briberie, but treaſon being not true to it ſelfe, King Edward came ſodainely in perſon, and preſerued the ineſtimable Iewell by policie, and princely manhood, killing many of them who came vpon that blind aduenture.

(110) This inuincible King (one great Act ouer-taking another) hearing that certaine Spaniſh men of warre, who had in the yeere before cruelly * ſlaine ſundrie Engliſhmen, and taken away their Wines and other wares, were come into his Seas, hee like a Martiall Neptune encountred them not far from Winchel-ſea in perſon, with ſuch ſhips as could then bee had; and after a moſt bloudy fight, (for there was few or none eſcaped vnmarkt) tooke twenty and ſixe of their principall veſſels, ſunke others, and draue the reſt away. The gallantrie & ſpirit of the Spaniards was ſuch, that diſdaining to ouerliue the diſgrace of hauing preſerued their liues by yeelding, they * all of them to a man either died vpon the Engliſh weapons, or were drowned in the waues. Thus was King Edward dignified with another Nauall Crowne. In this * yeare Philip de Valois hauing raigned about three and twenty yeeres, died. And the yeere enſuing, King Edward, as formerly hee had changed the ſtampe of his Seale, ſo changed the ſtampe of his Coines, coining (by aduiſe of William de Edingdon, Biſhoppe of Wincheſter, and High Treaſurer of England) the groat, and halfe groat, whereas before there was * no ſiluer coine, but the ſteelings onely.

(111) Let vs draw King Edwards manifold actions cloſer togethet: vnder his fortune and auſpicie, Sir Walter de * Bendeley had in little Britain (whereof hee was * Warden) a faire day of the Marſhall of France, putting his puiſſance to flight with much ſlaughter. Thirteene Lords, one hundreth and forty Knights, one hundreth Eſquiers, & ſtore of common Souldiers were killed: nine Lords, and one hundreth, and forty Knights and Eſquiers taken priſoners; which bred great aſtoniſhment among all King Edwards enemies. Neither had the French in other places better fortune, ſauing that ſomewhat before Sir * Raoul de Cabors ſlew in a skirmiſh the thrice valiant Sir Thomas Dagworth, and about one hundreth men of Armes with him. Henry Earle of Lancaſter and Derbie, in honour of his princely bloud, and reward of ſeruice, was created Duke of Lancaſter: the new Dukes firſt peaceable employment, was his iorney together with Richard Earle of Arundel, the Biſhops of London and Norwich, & Guy de Brian to the Romane Court, there to ſee that Inſtrument of a finall peace, which had been drawn and ſworne vnto betweene the two Kings, confirmed (as it was agreed) before the Pope; but by the Couen of the French (as our * Writers impute) and the Popes Conniuencie, who fauoured the keeping of France entire, all proued but vapour, and the voyage fruitleſſe. King Edward greatly kindled herewith, determined to take deepe reuenge, and (as Walſingham and others write) entred then preſently with an Armie and waſted France.

(112) The Staple of Wools which had beene in Flanders, King Edward about this time reuoked, eſtabliſhing the ſame in Weſtminſter, Canterbury, Chicheſter, Briſtol, Lincolne, and Hull. Hee did not this, (as is probable) without ſome ſpleene, aſwell for the * death of his deare friend Iaques Arteuill, as for that the young Earle of Flanders had diſhonoured him, by * flying into France out of Gaunt, when he ſhould haue married his daughter.

(113) It had moreouer beene ſignified to King Edward, that Iohn the new King of France (his Father being dead) had giuen to Charles the Dolphin the Dutchie of Aquitaine: whereupon being exceedingly incenſed, hee beſtowed the ſame vpon his owne ſonne, the Prince of Wales; commanding him to defend that right with his ſword againſt his aduerſaries. All things being ready for his voyage, and hauing the Earles of Warwicke, Suffolke, Salisburie, and Oxford; the Lords * Chandoys, Audley, * Buteſort, Lile, &c. a thouſand men of Armes, as many Archers with others, hee ſet ſaile towards Aquitain, where hee betooke himſelfe to do things worthie of his Name and courage.

(113) On the other ſide King Edward, ſtirred with a falſe Alarum, croſt ouer the Seas, in hope to find his enemie King Iohn at Saint Omars, but failing thereof, he burnt vp to Heſdin, and came backe into England to recouer Berwicke, which the Scots had gotten with * mutuall ſlaughter by ſurpriſe. He called a Parliament at Weſtminſter, where toward the furniture of his hoſtile deſignes, hee had extraordinarie Subſidie granted vnto him for ſixe yeeres next to come. But Berwicke before King Edward could preſent himſelfe before it with his mighty hoaſt, was * burnt and diſmantled, and then by the Scots abandoned. The French had ſent into Scotland fortie thouſand Crownes of the Sunne, and ſome men of Armes to maintaine them in enmity againſt the Engliſh, while as yet their King Dauid the ſecond was priſoner; but King Edward, not contented to haue regained his owne, vnleſſe hee made his aduerſaries ſmart for their prouocations, proceeded in hoſtile manner againſt the Scots both by land and ſea. At Roxbrough the Baliol * ſurrendred to King Edward all the right and title which hee had to the Crowne of Scotland, or any the appurtenances, reſeruing only to himſelfe a yeerely penſion of * two thouſand and fifty pounds.

(114) The Prince of Wales as it were in emulation of his Fathers glorie, doth wonders in France; for with his victorious Armie, he recouered multitudes of Townes and Priſoners (while the * Earle of Gloſter with the Engliſh, on behalfe of Charles king of Nauarre, preuailes greatly in Normandy, piercing like a thunderbolt through Languedoc, till hee came to the City of * Narbon, in ſight of the Mid-land ſea, which City (being little leſſe then London) he tooke by force, as (beſide many others) he had done Careaſſon, which for bigneſſe, ſtrength and beautie, exceeded (ſaith our Author) Yorke in England. The dammage done to the French King in this voyage was exceeding great, for out of theſe Countries he drew a yeerely reuenue of about foure hundreth thouſand sand old Crownes. The Pope sending a Messenger from Auignion, with an ouerture to intercede for a peace, had answere, that the message must bee sent to the King his father, for he could not meddle without commandement from him. Mean while hee disposed of things without impeachment, and returnes laden with honor and spoiles to Burdeaux, where the winter being spent, he sets forth to new aduentures. Hee had in his Armie about eight thousand braue, expert, and well disciplined Souldiers, and with them aduanceth through Perigort, & Limosin into the bosome of France, vp to the verie gates of Burgesse in Berie; the terror of his name flying before to his great aduantage. Thus satisfied for the present, hee wheeles about with purpose to returne by Remorantine in Blasois (which hee tooke) and so through the Country of Turain, Poictou, and Saintoin to his chiefe City Burdeaux. But Iohn King of France (hasting to goe beyond his father in misfortune) hauing assembled a compleat hoast, followed, & about the City of Poictiers ouertooke the inuincible Prince.

The English victory at Potiers, 19. Sep. 1356.

(115) When the Armies (with the ods of six to one against the English) were embattelled, two Cardinals sent from Pope Clement*, laboured (as they had done before) to take vp the quarrell without stroke, whereunto the Prince was with reason yeelding enough, but King Iohn fatally presuming on his aduantage, propounded such conditions, as if in a manner the Prince of Wales had already beene at his commaund; which with iust indignation were reiected. It came hereupon to a most bloudy triall, where (if euer) the Prince and English gaue full experiment of their valour; for after long conflict and absolute discomfiture of al the 3. French battels, (the least of which exceeded al the Princes nũbers) the King himselfe valiantly fighting, and Philip his *yongest sonne (who with such boldnesse and zeale defended his distressed father, as it purchased vnto him the Honourable surname of Hardie) were taken prisoners.

(116) The English whose valiancy was most conspicuous, were the Earles of Warwicke, Suffolke, Salisburie, Oxford, and Stafford, the Lords Cobham, Spenser, Audley, Berkley, Basset, &c. of Gascoigne, subiects to the Crowne of England, the Capitall de Beuf, the Lord Pumier, Chaumont, with others of lower title, but not of vnequall valour. * Iames Lord Audley wanne immortall renowne at this bloudy battell, where hee receiued many wounds, and shared the Princes gift of 500. Markes land in Fee simple, to his foure Esquiers, who had continued with him in all the brunt and fury of danger. It is the misfortune or glory of the French Nobles, that in all great battels the losse fals heauily vpon them. In this most disasterous ouerthrow, there fell *fifty and two Lords, & about seuenteene hundreth Knights, Esquiers, and Gentlemen bearing coates of Armes: The chiefe Lords were Peter of Bourbon Duke of Athens high Constable of France, Iohn Clermont Marshall, George of Charney Lord great Chamberlaine, &c. and as many other as made vp the former account. *Sr. Reginold Camian, who that day bare the Oriflamb, was likewise slaine: of the common Souldiers there died about sixe thousand: Great God of victories, how abundantly diddest thou in these dayes blesse thine English? The list of Prisoners comprehended these great names, Iohn King of France; Philip his sonne, afterward Duke of Burgoin; The Archbishop of Sens; Iames of Burbon Earle of Pantheiu; Iohn of Artois Earle of Eu; Charles his brother Earle of Longueuile; Charles Earle of Vendosme; The Earles of Tankeruile, Salbruch, Nassaw, Dampmartine, La Roch, and many other great Lords, and about* two thousand Knights, Esquiers, and Gentlemen bearing Armories. (117) Now albeit nothing wanted to the title of a perfect victory, yet in two points the incomparable Prince out-went that fame and merite; for hauing vanquished the person of the French Monarch by force of battell, hee much more ouercame his heart with true and princely curtesie, deliuering his mind in a stile and kind of eloquence so ponderous, proper, graue, and naturall, and with that statelie humility, as onely the best soule with the best breeding could be capable of; and yet * hee spake not more officiously then he performed really. More then all this. The next day causing his Chapleins and the other Priests of the Armie, to celebrate diuine seruice, hee put off from himselfe the whole glory, and gaue it most deuoutly to * God; which being first done, he, in the sight and hearing of the Prisoners, highly commends, and most heartily thankes his Souldiers, with speeches full of sincerity and life, sealing his words to euery one, as his present meanes would permit, with liberall deeds & largesse.

(118) Then hauing setled all other things, hee marcheth with ioy and iust triumph to * Burdeaux, the Archiepiscopall See, and chiefe Citie of his dominions in France. How the newes were entertained in all places of the English Empire, is not hard to coniecture, but specially by King Edward, who tooke speedy order by Simon Archbishoppe of Canterburie, that eight dayes together should be * spent in giuing God the thankes and glory. But the Prince hauing sufficiently refreshed, and rested his people, set saile for England with his Prisoners, where hee happily arriued in * Plimmouth, and was most ioifully welcome euery where. At his comming to London (where at that time a magnificẽt Citizen, Henry Pitard, hee who afterward at one time so noblie feasted the 4. Kings of England, France, Scotland and Cyprus, was Lord Maior,) which receiued him with exquisite honour; the multitudes of people comming to see the victorious Prince, the French King, and his sonne the Lord Philip, and the rest, were such, that they could hardly get to Westminster, betweene three of the clock in the morning and noon: but who will thinke the humour of the gazing vulgar worth the noting?

(119) Great Edward, sauing that hee forgat not the Maiesty of a Conquerour, and of a King of England, omitted no kind of noble curtesie towards the Prisoners. King Iohn and his sonne were lodged vnder a sure guard at the Sauoy, being then a goodly Pallace belonging to Henry Duke of Lancaster; the rest in other places: Dauid King of Scots was at this time straitly kept at the Castle of * Odiam, but not long after, when hee had endured about eleuen yeeres imprisonment, at the incessant suit of Queen Ioan his wife (sister to king Edward,) was deliuered: his * ransome was one hundreth thousand Markes striueling, and a condition to raise certaine Castles.

To her birth France was slenderly beholding, as being about this time in most wofull and broken state, through occasion of that title which the English challenged by her, it suffering more by farre vnder their puissance, then * euer it did since the times of the Romans. Charles* the Dolphin, Duke of Normandie, who had escaped from the battell of Poitiers, gouerned during his fathers imprisonment; but by the dangerous practises of Charles King of Nauarre, and bad disposition of the Parisians, toward the deliuery of their Soueraigne, hee was lamentably encumbred, and beset with mischiefes, not being able to worke as yet his fathers liberty. Moreouer, the English vnder Sir Robert Knowles, Sir Iames Pype, and Thomalin Foulk, and others, did commit great wasts, and heaped huge wealth by incursions, ransomes, and other warlike licence, in Britaine, and Normandy, dy, vnder the title of seruing the Nauarrois. To bee briefe all France swarmed with dissolute souldiers of sundry Nations, which hauing no Generall, made hauocke at their pleasure. They were called people without an head, and by innumerable insolencies made the wretchednesse of Anarchy apparent. In England also swarmed another sort, no lesse burthenous to the commonwealth and Church, which were the foure orders of Franciscan Friers, whom the * English Clergy found to be so pernicious to the regiment of the Church, that they selected that renowned Clerk, Richard Fitz-Ralph (who was Chancelour of the Vniuersity of Oxford, Archbishop of Armagh, and Primate of Ireland) to appeare in person before the Pope, and there alleage the * intollerable harmes by them accrewing to the Laity, the Clergy, and the Vniuersities, together with their disobedience to Gods word, their auarice, and pride. All which that noble Prelate learnedly performed, as appeareth by the handling of his 9. propositions against them, which are extant. In his second proposition, he sheweth, how ordinary a matter it was with them, to allure youth, without consent of their parents, to enter their Orders; which made men withdraw their sonnes from the Vniuersities, least the Fryars should so steale them away; whereby (saith he) it came to passe, that * whereas in his owne time there were thirty thousand Students in Oxford, soone after there were left but sixe thousand. But how infinitely these Friarlie swarmes encreased in all lands, may appeare by that *strange offer made by the Generall of this one Order, to Pope Pius, who promised to bring him (being then about a Turkish Expedition) thirty thousand cunning warriors, out of the number of Saint Francis Fryars, and yet enough should remaine at home to performe the deuotions. But the Pope had such vse of those Fryars, that Armachanus preuailed not in the matter, * though he proued the cause stoutly and manifestly against them, because (ah for pity, saith our Authour,) the Clergy stucke not close as they promised, and the Fryars had great store of money to procure fauour in the Court of Rome. But here in the English Court, two Cardinals, (one of them, hee of Pierregost, who had so diligently trauelled for a conclusion at the battell of Poictiers) could not with two yeeres labour, draw any thing to such an head, as the French would, for their Kings deliuerance, performe; which put King Edward into a new resolution against France.

(121) King Edward (houlding himselfe deluded by the French) with a fleete of eleuen hundred Saile passeth ouer from Sandwich to a new inuasion. Hee arriued at Calais, from whence he set forward in three great battels, whereof the first, being least, was vnder Henry Duke of Lancaster, the second being greater, vnder the braue Prince of Wales, and the last which was greatest, was led by King Edward himselfe. They marched through * Artois to the Citie of Rheims in Champain, where the Kings of France vse to be crowned and annointed. The City of * Sens (an Archbishops See) and Neuers doe yeeld without resistance. The * Duke of Burgundy, for two * hundreth thousand florens of gold, obtained that all Burgundy was spared from sackage or spoile. It was told the King, that the Normans had landed at Winchelsea in the time of diuine seruice, and among other their most impious outrages, a like execrable villanie, as that which Gibeonites, (sonnes of Beliall) are recorded to haue committed vpon the * Leuites wife, was more wickedly perpetrated by them in the Church it selfe, where the woman, being of singular beautie, was by their insatiable violations murthered; and they got backe to their Ships before the Countrey could rise vpon them to take due vengeance. Hereupon * King Edward presently raised his Standard, and set forth out of Champain, (where not farre from the City of Rheins hee had * kept his Christmas) toward Paris.

(122) He came before it with his armie diuided into * nine Battalions, where hee honoured foure hundred Esquires and Gentlemen with the Order of Knighthood. Charles the Dolphin, Regent of France, was within Paris with a great force, but could not by any meanes bee drawne to hazard battell. There were ample conditions in humble manner tendred to Edward, but he was as yet inflexible and deafe against any other, then such as himselfe (like a Conquerour) propounded. Paris (vp to whose * very wals King Edward ranne) not being sesible, he * retires into Britaine to refresh his Army, but vpon his returne finding it stronger then before, he turnes his wrath into the very bowels of France, exercising hostile Actions vp as farre as * Charters, and * Orleans, and as yet continued inexorable. God was displeased thereat, and to let Edward know so much, he caused the Minister of his wrath, a terrible tempest, to assaile his Hoast, and * to kill therein many both men and horses. King Edward is * said, vpon this occasion, to be so wounded with remorse, that repairing to our Lady-Church of Charters, he prostrated himselfe to God, and sorrowing for the bloodshed and wast-full burning which hee had made, vowed to giue quiet to the Christian world vpon equall conditions. This, and the Duke of Lancasters perswasions, softned him so, that finally (by mediation of the Popes * Legat one Simon de Langres) a peace was concluded at Bretagnie neere to Charters vpon the * eight of May; and in Nouember following K. Iohn himselfe was transported to Caleis, and there by King Edward (according to the Capitulations of the Treatie) set at liberty, after he had been a prisoner aboue foure yeeres.

(123) Articles of this accord, so necessarie for the distressed Estate of France were these. 1 *That (to the intent these conditions which the French condescended vnto, should be more forceable, and not seeme to be extorted by aduantage, nay; or inquitie of the times) the two Edwards, Father and Sonne, should for euer release to K. Iohn and to his heires, all the right and claime which they had to the * Crowne of France, * to the Dutchy and Estates of Normandy, Anion, Turain, and Main, as also to the homages of Britain Armorick, and the Earldome of Flanders.* 2. That King Iohn and his sonne, for them and their heires, should by a day certaine restore, and release to King Edward and his heires, &c. the whole Countrey of Aquitain, enlarged with the bordering and spacious Countreys of Santoin, Poicton, Pierregort, Limosin, Quercie, Angolesme, Rouergne, &c. with all the Cities, Castles, and appurtenances, to be holden free, without any dependencie but of God. 3. *That the * County of Pontheiu* (the proper inheritance of Isabel late Queene Dowager of England mother of King Edward) the Townes, Countries, and Lordships of Calais, Guines, Mountril, Haim, Wale, Oye, Merck, S. Valary, &c. and all the Ilands which either the English then held, or which lay before any of the Premisses, with only certaine limitations concerning priuate mens interest, should remaine in like freedome as the rest of the premisses to the Crowne of England. 4 That King Iohn should pay for his ransome (part thereof to be in hand, and part vpon daies) *the summe of * thirty hundreth thousand scutes of Gold, euerie two of which should be * sixe shillings and eight pence sterling. And that for assurance there should be assigned certaine number of Hostages (by King Edward named) to remaine in England.* 5. That the French should not aid, nor assist the Scots against the English, nor they the Flemings against the French. 6. That it should bee lawfull for either King notwithstanding to aid the Tytlers for the Dutchie of Britaine at their pleasures. There were sundry other Articles, as in cases of so transcendent qualitie must needs happen, but, as these were principall, so the most of them might haue beene well left out here, vnlesse they had more exactly beene obserued by the French. Yet were they ratified with hands, seales, and Oathes at * Calais, where the two Kings, in stead of kissing the Pax at masse (either hauing for honors sake refused to take it first) * saluted each the other with a most brotherlie embracement and louing kisse.

Three kings visit King Edward.

(127) The estate of our great Edward thus flourishing, hither (vpon sundry occasions) Iohn King of France, Dauid King of Scots, who had lately both of them beene Prisoners in England, and Guy of Lusinian, King of Cyprus came in person. The French kings affaire was, the more commodiously to transact for the remaine of his ransom, the discharge of his pledges, and other things. * Guy of Lusinian King of Cyprus (by that right which as you haue *heard before, his Ancestor had by donation and inuestiture from Richard the first, King of England) negotiated his own reliefe, vnder the iust Title of the common cause of Christianity, so fearefully by the prenailing Turkes empaired in the Easterne world, and not long after departed hence. Iohn King of France * had promised to Pope Vrban (at Auinion) his personall aide in the holy warre, but was preuented by death, which * seised vpon him here in England at the Sauoy. From whence by the pietie of Charles his sonne, then king of France, his body was in most royall manner conuaied to Douer, at the King of Englands voluntarie charge, and entombed among his forefathers at S. Denys with all funerall maiesty, not farre off from the Soueraigne City Paris, seat of the French Monarches, as the other their place of Sepulture. Likewise Iane Queene of Scots comming into England (with her husband belike)* deceased here.

This Pope Vrban saith Walsingh. was an Englishman by birth, meaning belike that he was born vnder the obedience of the King of England, when Limosin was English, of which country, he was saith Platina.

(128) That King Edwards fortune was not onely auaileable to himselfe, or to his Lieutenants, but also to his friends and fauourites, appeared in the great quarrell about the title of Britaine Armoricke, which about this time was determined by the death of the Lord Charles Earle of Bloys, head of the one faction, (but willing to haue ended it by word, not by the sword, if hee could haue preuailed with his wife) who was slaine in an encounter made against the Lord Iohn de Montford, head of the other side, where the *Lord William Latimer, * Sir Iohn Chandos, Sir Hugh Caluerley with other of the English which stucke to Montford, wanne much honor. This field was fought at Aurpy not far from Vannes in low Britaine. After * which (hauing performed certaine estates to the widow of the L. Charles, a man of singular sanctimony and integrity of life) he did homage to Charles king of France, and was accepted Duke of Britaine, with consent of the King of England, his speciall raiser and protectour. The * losse was great vpon the enemies side; for there were slaine besides the said Earle of Bloys, (Montfords competitor) the Lord Iohn his brother, and sixe Lords with many other of speciall note, Walsingham* saith about a thousand men of Armes & Esquiers: and there were taken Iohn and Guy the Earles sonnes, and nine other Lords, and of those whose fame for cheualrie counteruailed half the rest: Sir Bertram de Glequin Marshall of France, vnder the banner of Sir Iohn Chandoys.

(129) In the * mean space, from what part of the World did not the English bring testimonies of their valour? for such as had warred vnder the Cypriot King against the Turkes, and taken a part of Alexandria in Ægypt, returned with much riches in cloths of gold, veluets, & precious stone. About these times and long after also, Sir Iohn * Haucut (or Hareskroyd) that valiant man of Armes, made his owne name, & his Countrimens the English very honourable by martiall vertue in sundry parts of Italie. And as their valour was one way seene beyond the Alpes, so there fell out occasions not long after, which made it knowne another way beyond the mountaines Pyrenen.

(130) The family of the Lord Edward, Prince of Wales who liued in Burdeaux, was now with great honour encreased: for his dearely loued wife, who the last yeare bare vnto him Edward his first borne, (which liued but seuen yeeres after) bare vnto him a second sonne, for whom Richard King of Nauarre, and * Iames King of Maiorca vndertooke as Godfathers, giuing him to name Richard. The companies of Souldiers, most of whose Chiefes were English by birth or obedience, hauing now no employment, because the warres of Britain were appeased for the present, ranged desperately ouer France; but it was not long before Sir Bertram de Glequin (hauing paid his ransome) had meanes to draw the more part of that military Pestilence into another Coast: for, by the assistance of Peter King of Arragon, the banished Earles and the power of Glequin, with the floting Bands, called the Companions or Aduenturers; Peter King of Castile and Leon was driuen out of his kingdome, his bastard brother Henry chosen and crowned King of Spaine at Burgos.

(131) This Peter was *sonne to Alfonse the eleuenth King of Castile, and had to wife a French Lady called Blanch, daughter to Peter Duke of Burbon, who was father also of Ioan the French Kings wife. His tyrannical cruelties by the Spanish Stories, are reported so foule, and so many, that they * scarce suffer Nero or Caligula to goe before him; though he were otherwise a Prince, who had such parts of mind (saith Rodericus) as doe set forth and adorne the Owner, but cannot make him happy. His naturall blood-thirstinesse was encreased, and precipitated, some say, by the magicall practises of Maria de Padilla his concubine, who (calumniously * charging the Queene with that which her ſelfe acted,) by meanes of a Iew ſo enchanted a rich Girdle of King Peters, which Queene Blanch had giuen him, that the next time hee ware it, the ſame * appeared to himſelfe and the beholders like a ſnake. This curſed diſciple of * Iannes and Iambres hated the vertuous Queene, for that ſhee had ſo preuailed with Don Pedro her husband, that no Iew was ſuffered to beare office, or enioy any fauours in Court, neither wanted ſhee much of expelling them wholly out of Spaine. But by this practiſe Maria de Padilla (who * ſome erroneouſly ſay was a Iew) got al the king to her ſelf, and ſo perſecuted the innocent Queene, that it was not long before ſhee died, the Popes interceſſions failing to effect any good with the Tyrant. The Nobles of Spaine who laboured to haue brought her againe into deſerued grace, are by him purſued as fautors of her ſuppoſed witchcrafts. Other things alſo whetted him to ſauage, and Turkiſh Butcheries, as thirſt of Gold, and ſomewhat which had by diueliſh arts beene fore-told him concerning his end. His brothers, kinſfolke, Nobles, and others, he cauſeleſſely maſſacreth or forceth to ſeeke their ſafeguard by flight, among which the Lord Henry, his foreſaid baſtard brother was one. Peter notwithſtanding was in the trueth and right of blood King of Spaine, but his ſaide brother (a Gentleman in whom nothing was to bee taxed, but that which he was not to be blamed for, his birth) being worthily popular and potent, had now obtained both the Title of King and poſſeſſion of the Crowne.

(132) Peter, before this hapned, ſo ſoon as his wife Queene Blanch was dead childleſſe, * married his late Concubine Maria de padilla a woman of a noble houſe, though not ſo rarely honeſt, as to refuſe the vnlawful loue of a King: who hauing iſſue by her Alfonſo a ſonne (who dyed yong) and three daughters * Conſtance, Beatrix, and Iſabel, made to her and them the beſt amends he could for what was paſſed. It is the fitter this truth ſhould appeare, for that within a few yeeres after Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, one of the ſonnes of England, married Conſtance the eldeſt ſiſter, claiming the Crowne of Caſtilia in her right, as * the Earle of Cambridge had another, and for that * ſome (either through hatred of a wicked Tyrant, or through haſt or miſinformation) haue in many points foullie erred, and in particular, vntrulie leauing vpon the Lady the Title of a Strumpet, who was honeſted by lawfull matrimonie. Diuers notwithſtanding of * the Spaniſh Lords, like good ſubiects acknowledged their duty to Peter (though a moſt violent Prince) nor could the vſurper Henrie, but by deepely impairing the reuenewes of the Crowne of Spaine with immoderate gifts, winne anie of them. Peter thus driuen from his kingdome, with his wife, children, and (if * ſome ſay true) but one ſeruant, repaires to the Prince of Wales (at * Bayon) that is, to honour and humanity it ſelfe: who ſeeing it a dangerous preſident againſt all lawfull Kings, that any one ſhould be ſo dethroned, and not looking into his vices but his right; ſignified the ſame to his father: who enioines him to aid Don Peter, ſo that now the Prince, (burning with deſire of renowne) (vpon truſt of pay for his Armie and of other commodities by King Peter, when hee ſhould be reeſtabliſhed in his throne) is ready to paſſe into Spaine.

(133) Hee makes his way through the famous ſtraites of Rouncevallux in Nauarre by permiſſion of the King thereof, who * yet ſuffered himſelfe (as moſt men write) to be taken priſoner by the French, and carried into Caſtile, that he might not in perſon ſeeme to croſſe the French Kings deſignes on the behalfe of the vſurper Henry. The Prince of Wales had with him an armie of about thirtie thouſand men, and in his company beſides moſt of all the prime Captaines of the Engliſh, there were in perſon two Kings, Peter of Caſtile, whoſe the quarrell was, and the King of Maiorca and Iohn Duke of Lancaſter who ſome while after Don Pedro his death writ himſelfe King of Caſtile and Leon. On the other ſide K. Henry, for defence of his new Diadem, had aſſembled a very great number aſwell of French (vnder Glequin their famous Captaine) as of Caſtilians and other both Chriſtians and Saracens, not fewer then foureſcore, or an hundreth thouſand. Vpon the Borders of Caſtile it came to a battell: where the Prince of Wales obtained a veric great victorie, killing many thouſands of his enemies. Henrie himſelfe * was wounded in the groine but eſcaped. There were taken the Earle of Dene, * Bertram de Glequin himſelfe (who ſhortly after by paying a great ranſome had liberty) the Marſhall Dandrehen and manie others. Neither was it leſſe worth to King Peter then a kingdome; for the moſt noble Edward left him not, til he had ſet him in Burgus vpon his throne againe.

*Tho. Wal. in Edward 3. *Paul. Emy. Iohan. Tillius.

(134) But his falſhood and ingratitude were monſtrous: For the Prince notwithſtanding his ſo great goodnes extended towards him, was enforced to returne to Burdeaux without mony wherewith to pay his armie, which was the cauſe of exceeding great miſchiefe to himſelfe, and to the Engliſh dominions beyond the Seas; as if God had beene diſpleaſed for ſuccouring ſuch a Tyrant. The Prince to pay his ſouldiers (who were not able to tarry King Peters leaſure) coined euen his plate, and when all would not ſerue, ſought to lay vpon his Subiects in Gaſcoigne and thereabout, a new taxation, which bred a moſt dangerous reuolt. God notwithſtanding found out Peter, for it was not long but his baſtard brother Henry returned with new forces, and by the aid of Glequin and the French, hee both thruſt him againe from the Throne, and * murthered him alſo with his owne hand. The Prince of Wales himſelfe was in this iourny ſo poiſoned (as * was thought) he neuer after had his health. Duke Iohn his brother is not freed * from the ſuſpition of hauing haſtened the Princes end, but whether it is meant of anie practiſe at this time or no, appeares not. Now notwithſtanding he is ſafe as yet within Burdeaux.

(135) Now beganne the peace between England and France to vnſettle and vntwine. For whiſe King Edward reioyced in the excellent vertues and actions of his ſonnes and people; Charles the fifth, king of France, warned by ſo manifold calamities, as his Dominions had ſuſtained by the Engliſh in faire warre, & yet moſt earneſtly coueting to recouer the honor of his Nation, betakes himſelfe wholy to other arts and traines; neuer aduenturing his owne perſon, but executing all his deſignes by Deputie, wherein the ſeruice of Bertram de Gleſquin Conſtable of France ſtood him moſt in ſteed: neither neglected hee before hand to lay vp colours wherewith to ouer-paint his * colluſions and deuiſes for ſauing his honour; inſomuch that when it came to ſcanning, the loſſe was clearely vpon King Edwards ſide, and the cauſe of the breach made at leaſtwiſe doubtfull. His practiſes notwithſtanding were palpable, and it muſt bee confeſſed that our truly noble King (without ſuſpition of craft) repoſing himſelfe vpon the rules of * magnanimitie, did not reape the ſtable effects of ſo great and important victories, nor of a peace ſo ceremoniouſly made, that (in the worlds opinion) it might neuer bee infringed without the manifeſt breach vpon one ſide of all bonds both diuine and humane. The Prince of Wales by letters aduiſeth his father not to truſt to any faire words, nor ouertures of farther amity made by the French, becauſe he ſaid they entertained practiſes vnderhand, in euery place againſt him. But the Prince was * iudged to ſpeake out of a reſtleſſe humour delighting in warre, and therefore preuailed not. The effects diſcloſed that his words were true.

buſe the King of Englands credulitie, till hee had gotten before hand as farre as diſſimulations could aduance: hee Courts the good old Prince with louing letters and preſents, while in the mean time his plots ripen abroad, and the County of Pontieu (the king of Englands vndeniable inheritance) was firſt ſurpriſed before King Edward heard thereof. And whereas the Prince of Wales had at a Parliament in Gaſcoigne propounded a demand for fowage, or of money to bee leuied by the chimney, the Earles of Armignac and Cominges, and other Lords the Princes ſubiects, bearing no ſound affections toward the Engliſh Empire (the leſſe for that by the pollicy of Glequin, and the Chancellor of France * Dourmauns, all or moſt of the Countries and Townes (which by vertue of the peace made at Bretigney) were annexed thereunto, were cũningly wrought to return to their old Lords) repaire to the French Court at Paris, there to purſue an appeale for redreſſe of this oppreſſion againſt the Prince (who was not ſo happy as to follow the counſell of Sir Robert Knols and other wiſeſt Captaines who diſſwaded this impoſition,) pretending that hee was to anſwere before King Charles as before his ſuperiour Lord, of whom (they ſaid) he held by homage and fealtie. This practiſe of the diſloyall Lords (for what could they bee elſe? ſeeing King Edward and his heires were abſolutely freede (by vertue of the ſaid Treatie) from all manner of ſeruice for any of their Dominions in France) King Charles did openly at laſt entertaine, and (vpon hope to recouer by ſurpriſe, and plot, what the Engliſh had won by dint of ſword and perfect manhood) proceeded to ſummon the Prince of VVales to Paris, there to anſwere ſuch accuſations as his ſubiects made againſt him.

* Inuentorie of France in Charles the 5. Serres

(137) To encreaſe the indignitie of theſe deuiſes, you ſhould hear the French kings Orators before the Pope and Emperour, to whom king Edward had ſeuerally ſent Ambaſſadors, full of complaints againſt King Charles, laying wholie vpon the French, the blame of the new warre, as vpon open breakers of faith, and violaters of the league, moſt confidently on the contrary part charge the Engliſh.

Paul. Aemyl. in Car. 5.

" We had ſuffered the French hoſtages to viſit their " friendes at home vpon the French Kinges word, " that they ſhould come backe by a day, contrary to " which word, they, nor any of them, either were " or are returned. That not ſo much as the Law of " Nations was kept with vs, which ties Princes to " demaund reſtitution by their Officers of Armes, " or vpon deniall to defie them, but where (ſay we) " are the *Heralds which King Charles did ſend? We " ſay, that without notice hee ſurpriſeth by ſtealth " the Earledome of Ponthieu, King Edwards vnque- " ſtionable right, and hath diſſeiſed vs in Aquitaine, " which doth no leſſe belong vnto vs then Pontheiu. " That * Margaret the Inheritrice of Flanders, which " had beene promiſed to the Lord Edmund, one of " our Kings ſonnes, was by their iniurious practiſe " wonne away, and beſtowed in marriage vpon Phi- " lip Duke of Burgundie. Finallie, wee ſay, that Lew- " is Duke of Anion, one of the pledges, making " an eſcape by that, contrary to honour, and the " league, was by them receiued, and not returned, " which points being all of tranſcendent qualitie, are " (ſay wee) directly contrarie to the Treatie and " ſworne agreement at Bretigny.

Serres raſhly affirmes he did.

*Pol. Virg. in E. 3.

The French hereunto anſwere, and charge vpon vs, to ſhew the fault of firſt breach, not theirs, but ours.

The points charged vpon the Engliſh.

" That we by vertue of the ſaid Treaty were bound " immediately to withdraw our Armie out of France, " which yet (they ſaid) we did not during all the raign " of Iohn their King.

" That the peace was made thereby more noyous, " and hurtfull then the warre, and that they were " faine to purchaſe the departure of our Souldiers " with a greater charge then would haue maintained " a very gallant Armie: That this breach was ours, " becauſe the Souldiers were ours. That King Ed- " ward was bound in an open aſſembly of the States " of both Realmes, to renounce his right in the " Crowne of France: when (ſay they) was this done?

In Charles Seres.

Thus they, and Serres ads that the Eſtates of thoſe Countries which had beene aſſigned by the Treatie to the Engliſh aſſeuered, that it was againſt the fundamentall laws of France to alien anie part, & that they neither could, nor would ceaſe to be members of that Crowne.

(138) So ye behold that the fortune of the great is neuer to want friends to ſpeake for them, nor occaſions to ſlip out or in, whenſoeuer profit and aduantage doe inuite. Memorable (if true) is that part of the Frenchmens defenſe, in that polite and learned Italian, P. Aemylius, where it being obiected with what honour and clemencie King Iohn was vſed by vs, they breake out and affirme, that wee (being their Beneficiaries or Free-holders for ſuch Countries as wee held in France) tooke more gold for the onely ranſome of King Iohn, then they paied to redeeme S. Lewis their king, & his brother, the Peeres, and whole French Army captiuated in the Chriſti. an warres by the barbarous Soldan. But (good Aemylius) ſay that were ſo, yet cannot you ſay, that the ſumme wee tooke was worth the leaſt Countrie in France, and when all France was ours, was it not great bountie to take ſo ſmall a pittance? If you replie that we had many Countries beſides, wee reioine and trulie ſay, that wee quit more then we acquired. But let vs proceed: for now all claimes & quarrels were as open, as if no obſtacle had euer beene interpoſed: the ignominie of their late terrible foiles wounded all true French hearts, and they deſire (king Edward growne aged) not to ſeeme by ſitting ſtill vpon ſo many thornes of diſgrace, and loſſe, to haue beene outwarred, though ouer-warred, and though in two or three battels inferior, yet not to haue beene clearely debellated.

No great matter as then enſued. * Thomas Beauchamp Earle of Warwicke comming ouer in hope to haue worke for his Curtelax, for the French affronted our armie vnder the conduct of Duke Philip le Hardy (though at this time ſcarce ſhewing himſelfe worthy that ſurname) but roſe vpon the Earles arriuall, and retired, accuſed the Lords for ſloath, and ſware he would abroad among them to find fighting, while Engliſh bread was as yet vndigeſted in his ſouldiers ſtomacks. Somewhat he did, but death by a peſtilentiall dart preuented the reſt. This Earle had with him a learned man (as Scipio had Polybius) to regiſter the acts which hee ſaw done: A worthy example ill followed by poſterity. turnes were ſerued with publicke loanes. Neuertheleſſe, * after Midſomer day, that renowned Captaine Sir Robert Knols, whom martiall vertue had raiſed from the loweſt rancke to the higheſt reputation (though ſome alſo affirme him * borne noble) was ſent by King Edward into France with an Armie, where (while obedience laſted to his direction) all things proſpered. But by the inſtigation of one Sir Iohn * Menſterworth the yong Lords Grandſonne, and Fitzwalter, and other vainelie ſcorning to be vnder Knols, for that they held themſelues his betters, and thereupon diuiding themſelues after they had done ſundry exploits, marching vp euen to Paris, were beaten and foild by the French vnder Glequins conduct, but Knols wintred ſafe in Britaine. Menſterworth comes into England, and knowing accuſers haue the vantage, complaines to King Edward of Knols: but not altogether beleeued: he ads treaſon to vntruth, and turning French becomes a wicked enemy to his King and Countrey, * promiſing the French to procure the Caſtilian Nauie to inuade England, for which being in the laſt yeere of King Edwards raigne taken, hee by due courſe was condemned and cutin pieces, dying the death he had deſerued. He was laid hould vpon in the City of Pampeline in Nauarre, and from thence conueighed to London, vpon whoſe bridge his wicked head ſtood Sentinell.

(141) *Pope Vrban the fifth, comming from Rome to Auinion with purpoſe to vnite theſe two mighty Kings, their wils, and mights againſt the common enemy of Chriſtendome, put off mortality at Marſils, and ſo that holy intention ceaſed for the preſent: but the ſame being * continued by his next ſucceſſor Gregory 11. yet tooke no effect, no more then that which the Emperour to like cauſe would haue vndergone: which the * French impute to King Edward, who confident by reaſon of his former atchieuements, would trie it out by the ſword. Wherein he ſeemed to forget the mutable condition of warre, the fearneſſe of his bodie, and the greenneſſe of his Grand-Child yong Richard, who was to ſucceed, if the Prince of Wales died, as ſhortly after he did. Neither did God ſeeme to approue his opinion herein, for that croſſes came faſt vpon him, both at home and abroad. There is no greater wiſdome nor happineſſe then to know when we are well, and then to preſerue without hazard or empairment, that honour wealth or quiet which we already haue.

(142) Among the States and Townes (aſſigned to the Engliſh by vertue of the treatie at Bretigny) which had reuolted to the French, was the Citie of Limoges in Limoſin, whither the Prince marcheth, & ſits down with his armie before it. Thither * came vnto him out of England his brethren the D. of Lancaſter & the Earle of Cambridge, with a freſh ſupplie of valiant Chiefs and Souldiers. The City ſtood it out to the vttermoſt, and was forceably entred, where mercy had nothing to ſaue nor ſpare, the ſword and fire for terror to other killing and defacing in a manner all. Hee * who writes that the Prince flew vp neere to Paris, and ſcarſely, by reaſon of Glequins valour, got backe to Burdeaux, ſeemes to haue miſtaken therein, as in many other things concerning vs of great importance. After this ſeruice, the Prince, (health failing him more & more) leaues his Brethren in Aquitaine, and ſailes into England.

(143) The French in the meane time wonne towns and places in Aquitaine, gathering new hopes after ſo long and perpetuall infelicities. The loſſe of that expert Captaine Sir Iohn Chandoys (vnfortunately ſlaine) was a great aduantage to their deſires, whoſe whole care for warre reſted vpon Glequin (not long before aduanced for his military vertue from low eſtate to ſo great eminencie, as to bee Conſtable of France, the chiefeſt officer for warre which that Kingdome hath) and he a man of much proofe, in good and euill fortune, ſo tempered his courage with diſcretion, that he onely firſt bad his Country riſe againe, and endeauor in deſpite of euill fortune to reflouriſh.

(144) The Prince of Wales (wanting health) vpon comming to his fathers ſight, rendred vp the Dutchie of Aquitaine, to bee diſpoſed of, as to his roiall pleaſure ſeemed good. While King Edward was at Clarendon, there repaired to him the factious king of Nauarre, whoſe errand was to make an ouerture of aſſociation againſt the French; but as his offers were acceptable, ſo his cautions not ſeeming ſufficient, hee returned (after great entertainement) without concluding.

(145) Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, and his brother the Earle of Cambridge, doe now returne out of Aquitaine, with the Ladies Conſtance and Iſabel daughters of Don Pedro late King of Spaine, whom they married: The Duke thereupon inſtiling himſelfe King, and his wife Queene of Caſtile and Leon. Nor was the Engliſh name onely encreaſed in titularie honors; for about this time, the Flemings (who had prouoked vs) were vanquiſht by the * Earle of Hereford at ſea in a ſharpe fight, * about twentie and fiue of their ſhippes being taken, and all the men ſlain. The ſweete of this victory was ſowred not long after with a grieuous loſſe: for the French hauing beſieged the ſtrong Citie of Rochel in Santoin, with the aide by ſea of Henry King of Caſtile; to relieue the Engliſh, Iohn Earle of Pembroke was ſent with about forty ſhippes, men, victuals, munition, and mony, to the value of twenty thouſand marks, for the vſes of the warre; but being ſodainely aſſailed with the Spaniſh Armado, which conſiſted of many great ſhippes, vnder the command of Ambroſe Buccanigra and others, the Engliſh after a long and cruell conflict were vtterly diſtreſſed, the Earle taken priſoner, and almoſt all the reſt either taken, or put to the ſword. * Rochel held out notwithſtanding, to whoſe reliefe while King Edward himſelfe in perſon, with an extraordinary force ſet ſaile, the wind (alwayes till that time fauourable to his voyages for France) came Eaſterly, and draue him backe into England with great griefe, and the waſte (they write) of * nine hundred thouſand pounds ſterling. Neither did hee ſo giue ouer the care of that ſtrong Peece, which the Engliſh moſt manfully made good againſt the enemie.

(146) * Rochel thus perſiſting in loyall reſolution, Iohn Duke of Britaine (who had married the Lady Marie daughter of King Edward) a Gentleman of much gratitude toward the Engliſh, the authors of his fortunes, reſolues to aduenture his ſtate in their quarrell; ſhips away for England: hath aide miniſtred vnto him: hee returnes, and warres with various euent. But Iohn Duke of Lancaſter with a very great Armie comes to Callis, and from thence marcheth ouer the whole face of France, and (though with loſſe of many thouſand * horſe in the deſert countries of Auuergn throgh famin) came ſafe, but with an almoſt-hunger-ſtarued Army to Burdeaux. Not long after hee drew into the field, and a day was appointed betweene him and the Duke of Anion the French Kings brother, to haue tried the quarrell of their Nations by ſet battell, before the City of Tholouz in Languedoc, but by an vntimely & a pernitious ſhort truce (to which K. Edward yeelded becauſe his ſon the Prince lay dangerouſly ſick) the hoped victory not onlie ſlipt out of the Engliſh mens hands, but almoſt all aduantage alſo of doing any thing elſe ſeaſonably. The French boaſted * themſelues as of a Conqueſt, who notwithſtanding did helpe out their valiancy with policie. Glequin makes his vſe of all occaſions, and workes much harme to the Engliſh party in Guien and Britaine: But in Britaine * Sir Robert Knols did ſo nobly acquit himſelfe on the behalfe of his Souereignes ſonne in law the Duke, that he only ſeemed a fit parallel to Glequin, like as hee ſtopt the current of his fortune.

Neuertheleſſe the doings of Glequin are ſo extolled by the French, that Tillius enters them into his Chronology with theſe words, victoria, &c. the victories, fortunes and triumphes of Bertrand Glequin in Aquitaine and Britaine, though their owne ſelues make no mention of any defeate of the Engliſh, which afforded them matter for the ſhadow of ſuch gloriations.

An.D.1374. (147) The next yeere the Duke of Lancaſter returned into England, after whoſe departure all Aquitaine almoſt reuolted, and fell to the French, who by the aduantage of King Edwards age, the Princes pining maladie (which ſome ſay was not poiſon but a *dropſie) and the ſucceſſe of their practiſes more then of their valour, were growne braue againe: A treatie of peace was holden at Bruges, all was but painted: for euen then the French moſt of all prepared vnderhand for new attempts. Chiefe commiſſioners for the Engliſh at that conference was Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, and for the French the Duke of Anion. The effects hatched nothing but a ſhort truce for our euils to breed in.

*Serres.

A.D. 1375. (148) Among the parties which were preiudiced by this hurtfull truce, the Duke of Britaine was chiefe. He had obtained great aſſiſtance from King Edward, and was now with *the Earles of Cambridge, March, Warwicke, and Stafford, with many other noble gentlemen and ſouldiers returned into Britaine, making to themſelues a faire way for their maine enterprize, which was to ſettle the Duke, and by the commodity of his Dutchies ſituation to annoy the common enemy, and the better to recouer the Engliſh dominions in Aquitaine: But this treatie did that which Glequin, their indeed braue Generall, had not as yet in any ſort effected; for the Duke of Britaine had* driuen the French Kings army out of his territories. But who wonders at this truce? The Prince of Wales was likely to die; plots one foot at home; the Duke of Lancaſter had an eye to the Succeſsion; things grew troubled: the Kings age was abuſed by dame Alice Peirs (a moſt buſie Court-flie) who (after Queene Philips death) kept the old man warme, and the French ſaw all theſe matters and ſlept not.

(149) King Edward calling a Parliament, vnfoulding his eſtate, and wants, with demand of ſupplies, the bodie of the aſſembly in ſtead of contributions exhibits complaints, directly chargeth the Kings Officers with fraud, and humbly praieth, that Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, the Lord Latimer, then Lord Chamberlaine, Dame Alice Peirs (whoſe* behauiours they painted forth as moſt intollerable, for that ſhee, reſpectleſſe of her Sexes frailty, would in perſon, ſaid they, come into all Courts of Iuſtice, and ſometime ſitting by the Iudges or Doctors, would alſo after a moſt inſolent manner perſwade or diſſwade for her moſt aduantage) and with theſe one Sir Richard Sturry might be remoued from the perſon of the King. Neuertheleſſe the Parliament made offer, that if the King were indeed out of money, they would liberally aduance toward his vſes. (150) While this Parliament (called the Good) laſted at Weſtminſter, the noble ſoule of Edward Prince of Wales vpon Trinity Sunday (which euerie yeere he vſed to celebrate with the greateſt honour that might be in due veneration of ſo diuine a myſtery) was preſented to the holy and bleſſed Trinity, after he had liued therein* about 46. yeeres. In ſteed of Epitaph or mention of obſequies, the words of Walſingham ſhall ſerue vs for the preſent, of whoſe death he writes thus. Quo obeunte, &c. With whom dying, died all the hope of Engliſhmen; during whoſe life, the Engliſh feared no inuaſion of the enemy, nor any encounter in Battell: For he aſſailed no Nation which he ouercame not; he beſieged no City which he tooke not. And when this lampe was put out, the effect of this Parliament was extinguiſhed. His mortall parts were interred at Canterbury, where his monument ſtandeth, but the renowne of his inimitable vertues haue as large an extent, and ſpace to moue in, as the wide world. The King of France moſt* reuerently celebrated his Exequies within the Chappell of his Palace at Paris. But in England there was a generall ſorrow, as for one whoſe worth had begotten a iuſt hope that hee would out-goe* his Anceſtors in glorie. Death preuenting that experiment of him, he is notwithſtanding in full poſſeſsion of loue and praiſe* among all men for that which was paſſed. The cauſe of this domeſticke mourning encreaſed with the effects of his loſſe, which forthwith diſcloſed themſelues. Finally, the good old King, to comfort himſelfe in honouring the liuing image of his nobleſt Child, the late Prince Edward, and to giue the minde of his Grand-Child a feeling of future maieſtie, that by the ſodeine inſolency of the ſplendor, it might not afterward too much abuſe his tender iudgement, and to make his vncles acquainted with reſpect of his perſon, he cauſed him to ſit openly at his Table aboue all his owne Children in Chriſtmas.

(152) About this time the famous Doctor Iohn Wiclef a man of ſharpe wit, profound learning, and great iudgement, did in the Vniuerſitie of Oxford publikely maintaine ſundry propoſitions and dogmatical points againſt the Church of Rome, of which the Pope (foreſeeing the hazard hanging ouer his triple Crowne) condemned * three and twenty as hereticall; whereupon the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and Biſhop of London hauing attached the body of the ſaid Wiclef, did in the preſence of the Duke of Lancaſter and the Lord Henry Peircie (*his great fauourers,) declare the iudgement of the Pope concerning Wiclefs doctrine, which had then taken deepe roote both in the vniuerſity, Court, and Countrey. So for a while all was quiet. But (vpon ſome ſecret encouragements) he held not peace long. His followers were, in the phraſe of thoſe darke daies, called* Lolards, whereas, in truth, they endeauoured to extirpate all pernitious weeds, which through time, ſlouth, and fraude, had crept into the field of Gods Church. The Duke of Lancaſter (the rather, ſome thinke, vpon priuate emulations againſt Courtney Biſhop of London) was engaged ſo farre in his protection, that he and the Lord Percy hardly eſcaped the fury of the Londoners, who would without queſtion haue hewed them in pieces in reuenge of ſome diſgracefull ſpeech vttered by him againſt their Biſhop. He notwithſtanding diſſwaded all violence, and kept them from firing his palace of the Sauoy, but they neuertheleſſe did in moſt deſpitefull manner reuerſe his Armories in the open Market: A diſhonour not to be borne, as that in which the dignitie airy of his royall bloud was empaired. By this outrage the people (a most dangerous and heady water when once it is out) made known, what he, and the Lord Rosse were to have hoped, if they could have fingred them, before they had gotten to Kensington to Prince Richard, who there remained with his mother: The Duke for this bare the Londoners much euill will, neither rested till (for a commencement of reuenge) hee had procured the Maior and Aldermen to be thrust from their places, and substituted others in their stead.

(153) France in the meane time erected with new hopes, breathes nothing but warre. Prouisions in that respect were not neglected here. One of the last publike acts of the old kings life, was the triumphall celebration of Saint Georges feast at Windsor, where himselfe had founded the order of the Garter; and at this solemnitie hee bestowed vpon his dearest Grandchild Prince Richard the dignitie of Knighthood, which onely thing in all the patrimonie of honour could not discend vnto him.

(154) Not long after ensued the sentence of diuorce which God pronounced betweene the soule and body of this mighty and martiall king, who left the world in the moneth of Iune at his Manour of Shene in Surrey: his Acts may giue you a perfect Character of his mind: few Princes that had so great and heroicke vertues, had fewer vices: therefore it was a fault of those times, which abounding in learned men, (and among them Geffrey Chaucer Prince of Poets) afforded no better an Epitaph then that which we are faine with pitty to reade vpon his Monument at Westminster: the stuffe neuertheless is worthie, though the forme bee rude.

No man of his time could by better experience teach, what a vaine thing worldly glory (to the height whereof hee had aspired) ought to seeme. His mind (by sundry great checkes of Gods prouidence) recalled to consider of the foure last things, Death, Iudgement, Heauen and Hell, made him betake himselfe to Acts of benignity and deuotion. The Chappell at the end of the Abbey-Church at Westminster (since most magnificently enlarged by King Henry the seuenth) was of his building. The holy quiet of studies, and aduancement of good Arts, hee so prosperously fauoured, that besides other great priuiledges granted to the Vniuersity of Oxford, (*where himselfe had in his youth beene trained vp vnder the learned Walter Burley) * he conferred the chiefe rule of that whole City vpon the Chancellor of the Vniuersity, subordinating the Maior and Citizens to his gouernment, in regard of their iniuries offered to the Students. This most mighty Monarch that euer ware the Crowne of England, in many other felicities excelled his Ancestors, as in the victorious valour of his Children, their obedience to him, and loue among themselues. A Lady to his wife (their mother) of such excellent vertue and gouernment, as that thē K. Edwards fortunes seemed to fall into Eclypse when shee was hidden in her Sepulchre. His Wife.

(155) Philip, wife of King Edward, was daughter of William Earle of Hainalt and Holland, sister of Earle William the last of that house, and of Margaret the Empresse that succeeded him; her mother was * Ioan sister of Philip of Valois king of France, daughter of Charles Earle of Valois, who was sonne to King Philip the Hardy. Shee was married vnto him at Yorke, Ianuary 24. crowned at Westminster the first Sunday of Lent following, 1327. His Issue.

(156) Edward, their eldest sonne and first child, borne at Woodstocke, Iuly 15. in the third yeere of his Fathers raigne, Anno 1329. was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Aquitaine and Cornwall, and Earle of Chester, hee was also Earle of Kent in right of his wife Ioan (the most admired Ladie of that age) daughter of Edmund Earle of Kent, brother, by the fathers side, to king Edward the second. Shee had beene twice married before, first to the valiant Earle of Salisburie, frow whom shee was diuorced, next to the Lord Thomas Holland, after whose decease, this Prince passionately louing her, did marrie her: by her hee had Issue two sonnes, Edward the eldest, borne at Angolesme, who died at seuen yeeres of age, and Richard borne at Burdeaux, who, after his father was Prince of Wales, and after his Grandfather King of England. This Prince had also naturall Issue, Sir Iohn Sounder, and Sir Roger Clarendon Knights; the latter being attainted in the raigne of Henry 4. is thought to haue been ancestor to the house of Smythes in Essex. Hee died at Canterbury on Trinity Sunday, Iune 8. ætat. 46. of his fathers raign 49. and was buried at Christ-church there, 1376.

(157) William their second sonne, and fourth child, was borne 1335. 9. of his fathers raigne, at Hatfield in the County of Hertford, taking his Christian name from William Earle of Hainault his Grandfather, and his surname from the place of his Nativity; is reported to haue deceased in his childhood, & to bee buried at Yorke.

(158) Lionel, their third sonne and fift child, was borne at the City of Antwerpe, 29. Nouemb. 12. of his fathers raigne, Anno 1338. hee married first Elizabeth, the daughter & heire of William Burgh Earle of Vlster in Ireland, in whose right hee was first created Earle of Vlster; and because hee had with her the honour of Clare in the Counties of Tenmond, as parcell of the inheritance of her Grand-mother Elizabeth, (the sister and coheire of the last Earle Gilbert Clare, hee was in a Parliament, Anno 1362. created Duke of Clarence, as it were of the Country about the Towne Castle and honour of Clare: from which Dutchie the name of Clarentieux (being the Title of the King of Armes for the South parts of England) is deriued. This Duke had Issue by her one onely daughter named Philip, afterward wife of Edmund Mortimer Earle of March, mother of Earle Roger, Father of Anne Countesse of Cambridge, and shee was the mother of Richard Duke of Yorke, Father of King Edward the 4. the second marriage of this Duke was in Lombardie at Millayne, with the Lady * Violanta daughter of Galeacio the second Duke therof; but through intemperance, he lined not long after.

was borne at Gaunt the chiefe Towne of Flaunders, Anno 1340. and 14. of his fathers raigne. In his Childhood he was created Earle of Richmond, which title was afterward recalled in, and bestowed vpon Iohn Duke of Britanny, who married his sister, to whose Dutchy it had formerly belonged. Hee had three wiues; the first, Blanch, daughter and Coheire, and in the end the sole heire, of Henry Duke of Lancaster (sonne of Edmund surnamed Crouch-back) in whose right he was at the first Earle, and after Duke of the same, and with that Dutchy also Earle of Leicester, Derby, and Lincolne, and high Steward of England. He had issue by her, Henry of Bullingbrooke Earle of Derbie, after Duke of Hereford, and lastly King of England, named Henry the fourth, who first placed the Crowne in the house of Lancaster; Philip, wife of Iohn the first, King of Portugall; and Elizabeth, married first to Iohn Holland Earle of Huntingdon, (brother of Thomas Duke of Surrey) and after him, to Sir Iohn Cornwall Baron of Fanhope. His second wife was Constance, the eldest daughter of Peter King of Castile and Leon, in whose right for the time he entituled himself King of both these realmes; by her he had issue one onely daughter, named Katherine, married to Henry the third, sonne of King Iohn, in possession before, and in her right, after, King of both the said realmes. His third wife was Katherine the widow of Sir Hugh Swinford, a Knight of Lincolnshire, eldest daughter and Coheire of Payn Roet a Gascoigne called Guien King of Armes, for that Countrey, * his yonger daughter being married to Sir Geoffrey Chaucer, our Laureat Poet. By her hee had issue (borne before matrimony, and made legitimate afterward by Parliament holden in the twentieth yeere of King Richard the second,) Iohn Earle of Sommerset, Thomas Duke of Exeester, Henry Bishop of Winchester and Cardinall; and Ioane, who was first married to Robert Ferrers (Baron of Wemme and Ouesley, in the Counties of Salop and Warwicke) and secondly to Raph Neuil the first, Earle of Westmerland. Shee and all her brethren were surnamed Beaufort, of a Castle which the Duke had in *France where they were all borne,) in regard thereof bearing the Porculleys of a Castle for the cognizance of their family. This Duke in the thirteenth yeere of his Nephew King Richard, at a parliament holden at London, was created Duke of Aquitaine, but in the sixt yeere after, hee was called home, and this Title recalled in, and in the third yeere after, the sixtieth of his age, Anno 1399. he dyed at Ely house in Holborne, and lyeth honourably entombed in the Quire of Saint Paul.

The Earledomes also of Essex and Northampton, and the Constableshippe of England, fell to him by right of his wife Eleanor, the only daughter and heire of Humfrey de Bohun Earle of Hereford and Essex. Hee was a man of valour, wisdome, and vigilancy for the behoofe of the King his Nephew and the State, but those noble vertues (distempered with too much wilfulnesse & froward obstinacy) bred him, first Enuy, and after ruine. For the King surmising him to bee a too seuere obseruer of his doings, consulted with Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolke how to make him away; whom Mowbray vnawares surprizing, conuaied secretly to Calis where he was strangled 1397. 20. of his Nephewes raigne. CHAPTER XIII.

RIchard of Burdeaux, sonne to that Great Star of English Cheualrie, Edward, by-named the Blacke Prince, and grand-child to the most renowned Edward the third (both of them lately deceased) was crowned in the eleuenth yeare of his age, and vpon the sixteenth day of Iuly. Seldome hath been seen so magnificent a Coronation, as that of this young King, but the thing which gaue a better lustre of hope at his beginning; then the shine and maiesty of that publike Act, was the wise course which in this his childhood was taken; to wit, the reconciliation of the Lord Iohn Duke of Lancaster, and the Citizens of London, with the restitution of Sir Peter de la Mare Knight, Speaker in the late Parliament, (whom King Edward had committed to prison, at the instigation of Dame Alice Peeres now banisht, and confiscated) not onely to former liberty, but likewise to fauour and honor extraordinary.

Coronation King.

(2) At this Coronation, (which, as matters not vnworthie to bee kept aliue, wee following the immethodicall order of the Record, haue here for perpetuall memory thought good to abridge out of authentike Monuments) Iohn the Kings eldest vncle, vnder the stile of Iohn King of Castile and Leon, and Duke of Lancaster, by humble petition to the King, claimed to bee now Steward of England, in right of his Earledome of Leicester; and as he was Duke of Lancaster, to beare the Kings chiefe sword called Curtana; and as Earle of Lincolne, to cutte and carue at the royall Table before the King. His petitions being found iust, were confirmed to him, and to his Assignes, the two Earles of Derby and Stafford, the first to beare the Sword, while the Duke should be busied about other offices as Steward, and the other to cut and carue. The Duke then in great estate, held this the Kings high Court of Stewardship in the White-hall of the Kings Pallace at Westminster, Seruices by reason of tenures at the Coronation found and allowed in that Court.

The Court of high Stewardship.

neere to the Chappell of the ſaid Palace, vpon the Thurſday, before the Coronation, which was alſo vpon a Thurſday. There Thomas of Woodſtocke the Kings vncle, was admitted to exerciſe the office of Conſtable of England, in right of his wife, one of the daughters and heires of Humfrey de Bohun, late Earle of Hereford, and Conſtable of England. Henrie de Percie (Lord Percie) was by the Kings conſent and writ authoriſed to exerciſe the place of Marſhall of England for that time, ſauing to euerie one their right, for that by reaſon of the times ſhortneſſe, the claime, which Margaret daughter & heire to Thomas of Brotherton, late Earle of Norffolk, and Marſhall of England, laid thereunto, could not bee diſcuſſed. Robert de Veere Earle of Oxford, though then in minority, being notwithſtanding found to haue right in Fee, was by the Kings ſpeciall conſent allowed to haue, and vſe the office of Chamberlaine. Hee was alſo admitted to his right of powring out water for the King to waſh with, when hee went to meate, at the Coronation. Iohn Wiltſhire Citizen of London, by reaſon of certaine tenements (heretofore the poſſeſſion of Iohn Picot) being a Moitie of the Mannour of Heydon, and holden in Serieantie, had his right, to hold a Towell for the King to wipe with, when hee went to meate, found and allowed, and Edmund Earle of Kent appointed to ſerue as his Deputie. Thomas Beauchampe Earle of Warwick was found to haue right, and admitted thereupon to beare the third ſword of eſtate before the King at the Coronation, as alſo to exerciſe the office of Pantler, and to enioy all ſuch fees as to the ſame appertained. Sir Iohn de Argenthem knight, by reaſon of the tenure of his Mannour of Wimondley in the County of Hertford, was admitted to ſerue the King at his Cuppe, vpon the day of the Coronation, and for his Fee to haue that * Cuppe of ſiluer wherewith hee then ſerued the King in his royaltie. William Lord Furniuall for his Mannour of Farnham and Hamlet of Cere, was proued to haue right to ſupport the Kings right arme, when it held the Scepter royall therein at the day of Coronation; which ſeruice beeing firſt * honourably knighted by the King at Kenington, hee was admitted accordingly to performe. Anne late wife of Iohn de Haſtings Earle of Pembroke for her Manour of Aſhele in Norfolke, was admitted by her Deputie Sir Thomas Blunt Knight, to vſe the office of Naperer, and to enioy the fees thereof. Edmund, Earle of March, was aſſigned to carry the Kings great gilt Spurs, ſauing to euery one their right; for Iohn, the ſonne of Iohn de Haſtings late Earle of Pembroke, claimed that office to bee his, as William le Marſhall his Anceſtor held the ſame at the Coronation of King Edward the ſecond; but by reaſon hee was vnder age, and in Wardſhippe, the King for that time diſpoſed it to the Earle of March. Who alſo, with the ſaide Spurres was aſſigned to beare the ſecond Sword before the King; for which, the ſaid young Earle of Pembroke, and the Earle of Arundel (in the right of his Anceſtor the Earle of Surrey) contending, it was adiudged to Pembroke, for his Caſtles and Townes of Pembroke and Tenby, &c. but the execution of that honourable place was aſſigned by the King as before. Richard Earle of Arundel, for the Manour of B. in Kent, was admitted to bee chiefe Butler at the Coronation, for that (after the ſale thereof) the Earles Anceſtors had exerciſed that office at Coronations, and the claime of Edmund Staplegate, who then had that manour as ſonne and heire of Edmund Stapulgate (ward to Ieffrey Chaucer, who had freed him for one hundreth and foure pounds) for that time put off, his right to him in the meane time ſaued notwithſtanding. The Lord Maior and Citizens of London (ſuch as were choſen for that high dayes ſeruice among themſelues) were found by good Record to haue their ſeuerall rights. The Maior to attend in his owne perſon as chiefe Cuppe-waiter, (charged with the Cupbord-royall) aſwell in the hall at dinner, to ſerue the king in a cuppe of gold with ſpices, and for his Fees to haue the ſaid Cuppe, and a * Water-ſpowt-potte of gold thereunto belonging, when he tooke his leaue at night. The Citizens, to helpe their Lord Maior in his office of chiefe Pincern or Cup-waiter, and to miniſter or ſerue the Lords aſwell at Dinner in the Hall, as in the Chamber after dinner. Whereupon the King (ſaith the Record) perpendens gratitudinem magnam & ſubſidium quæ Progenitores ſui, &c. weighing with himſelfe the great gratitude and aide, which his Progenitors had heretofore abundantly found in the Citizens aforeſaid, and hoping himſelfe to finde in them the like gratitude and aide hereafter, and to the intent that they might with the more ioyfull hearts performe loyall obedience to the King, and more earneſtly helpe him in his occaſions, he being heartily deſirous to content them, did will and ordaine that the ſelected Citizens ſhould exerciſe their ſaid attendance. Sir Iohn Dymmocke Knight, in the right of Margarite his wife, for the Manour of Scryuelby, and Sir Baldwine de Freuile Knight, as coſen and next heire to Philip Marmion, by Lionneſſe daughter of the ſaid Philip, for the Caſtle of Tamworth in the Countie of Warwicke, contended each of them to haue the office, & fees belonging to the Kings Champion vpon that roiall day; but becauſe the ſaid Iohn ſhewed better Records then Baldwin, and for that King Edward and the late Prince of Wales, were often heard to ſay that Iohn ought to doe that ſeruice for the ſaid manour of Scriuelby, hee was admitted for that time, and day was giuen to Baldwine to ſhew farther cauſe of his claime within three weekes after the feaſt of S. Hilarie next, or elſe for euer to bee vtterlie excluded.

This Champion is to haue for accompliſhment of that ſeruice (and the ſame alſo for his fees) one of the beſt horſes of warre and capariſons, which the king hath, one ſaddle plated with Iron, and one complete armour with the whole furniture, in ſuch ſort as the King himſelfe vſeth, when hee is to goe into a mortall battell (Sil deuſt aler, ſaith the Record, en une battaile mortele) in which ſort being mounted, he is to ride before the King in proceſſion to his Coronation, and to crie thrice to the people before all the world. That there is no man of high or low eſtate, who will ſay, that our liege Lord Richard, Couſen and Heire of Edward, late King of England, ought not to bee crowned King of England, againſt whome hee the Champion is not ready with his body to maintaine, and will maintaine that hee doth falſly lie as a Traitour. William de Latimer, and Iohn the ſonne and heire of Iohn Mowbray of Axholm, the Kings Ward, iointlie petitioned at the ſame Court, to bee admitted in the right of William Beauchampe of Bedford (whoſe lands the king held in right of the ſaid Wardſhippe, and William de Latimer in his owne right,) to haue the office of Almoner at the Coronation, and to enioy the Fees thereof. And becauſe in the redde Booke of the Exchequer it appeared, that the ſaide William Beauchampe (late deceaſed) vſed the ſaide office; William de Latimer was there admitted, aſwell for himſelfe, as for the ſaide heire to exerciſe the ſame, and for his Fee to haue the ſiluer platter of Almes which ſtood before the King as hee ſate at the Table vpon that day; and if afterward it ſhould reaſonably appeare, that they likewiſe ought to haue an * Hogſhead of wine, they ſhould haue it.

William Bardolf ſhewed by petition (as all the reſt did) to the right noble, and right redoubted Lord, the King of Caſtile and Leon, Duke of Lancaſter, and Steward of England, that certaine of the ſaid William his Fee-ſimple lands in his towne of A. were holden of the King in chiefe by Serieantie. The words of the petition, ſhewing the ſeruice, which we (fearing to erre) leaue for other to interprete, are theſe. De trouuer le iour due Coronement noſtre treſredoubte Seigneur le Roy, vng homme de faire vne meſſe queſt appelle Dilgirunt, & ſi apponatur ſanguineum adonques il eſt appelle appelle Malpygerynen la Cuisin de Roy. And accordingly the laid William was admitted to that seruice by his Deputy. Richard Lyons, as Tenant of the Manour of L. which Iohn de Lyston and his ancestors held by the seruice of making wafers for the King at the day of Coronation, was accordinglie thereunto admitted. The Barons of the Cinque Ports, vpon their petition and claime, the matter being euident, were admitted to beare (and to haue for their Fees) the Kings Canapie of cloth of Gold (or of what other stuffe elsse it pleased the King) vpon foure staues of siluer ouer the kings head vpon the day of Coronation, and also to sit at meat in the hall at the highest Table on the kings right hand. Iohn Fitz-Iohn, in right of his wife, shewed, that the Manour of S. in Norfolke was holden of the King by the seruice of Chiefe Larderer at his Coronation, and that Geffrey Burdeleys did exercise the same at the Coronation of King Edward the third; whereupon Iohn Fitz-Iohn was admitted to exercise that office by himselfe and his Deputies. Richard Hering for the Mannor of C. in the County of Surrey, in the right of Agnes his wife, claimed to be Vsher of the Kings Chamber; but because that claime did no way concerne the Coronation of the King, hee was left otherwise to pursue his interest if he so thought good. These are the seruices which were then claimed before the D. of Lancaster, Steward of England, which he with his owne hands deliuered into the Kings Chancery there to bee enrowled. At the same Coronation also Thomas of VVoodstocke youngest sonne of the late king was created Earle of Buckingham, Thomas Mowbray Earle of Nottingham, Guychard d' Angolem Earle of Huntington, and Henry Percie Earle of Northumberland. Thus the bounty of the young Monarch imparted large rayes of his imperiall Splendor to these eminent persons of his Kingdome. Howsoeuer, these and the like honours haue not in our Common-wealth either alwayes beene fortunate to the Receiuers, or without repentance to the Donors.

(3) But the generall State of the kingdome beeing implicated, before the late king Edwards decease, by reason of that opportunity and aduantage to their designes, which the neighbour enemies of the Crowne of England found in the old age of that victorious Monarch, was now no lesse entangled through the contempt of king Richards youth. For before his Coronation, the French with fifty ships (as Walsingham cals them) thrust into the Hauen of Rie, the towne whereof they rifled, and consumed with fire. The Crowne of England was scarse setled on his head, when the Scots at the other end of England set fire vpon the Town of Rockesbrough: but the French (encouraged by their late exploit at Rie) arriued in their Gallyes, and tooke the whole Isle of Wight, the Castle (which Sir Hugh Tyrell manfully defended,) only excepted, leuying vpon the inhabitants one thousand Marks in lieu of sparing their houses from the rage of warre, and flame. Neither was it long before they landed at Winchelsey, though being from thence repulsed, they burnt the Towne of Hastings at that present.

(4) These petty braues thus giuen to the king, were farther fortunated with a little victory. For they, emboldened with such successes (dishonourable and dangerous to King Richard, who seemed to haue lost the soueraignty of the English Ocean, where Pyrates durst so reuell, and also to haue had as little counsell, courage or forces left about him vpon the land) come on Shore at Rotingdene in Sussex. The Prior of Lewis with some slight tumultuarie Forces, rashly aduentures himselfe against them, where he with two knights, & some few others were taken prisoners, and about 100. English slaine, but of the French many more, who returned with their Prisoners to their Nauie.

(5) The chiefe charge of affaires lay vpon the Duke of Lancaster, the Kings vncle, or vpon some such as he did put about him, through whose want of care, things declining to a shamefull change, and the glorious atchieuements of the two late Edwards falling vnder Eclypse, there was onlie found one priuate Citizen of London, that (without regard to the enuie of the slothfull Lords, or his owne hazards, or of any thing elsse, so much as the good of his neglected Countrey) put his whole strengths to support the same. This was the worthy Iohn Philpot, who at his owne charges mans out a Fleet to the Sea, raignes by them therein, and guardes both water and land from their intollerable violences. Nor did his so great pietie faile of happy euent, for God (who fauours all vertuous actions) had put into his hands within a short space 15. Spanish Ships fraught with rich merchandize, which the right of warre made his, wherby his great charges were abundantly repayed. Let vs see his Statue erected now at last, with the Statues of Walworth, and other honourable Citizens in London.

The immortall deserts of Sir Iohn Philpot Citizen of London.

(6) What therefore the loue of their Prince and Countrey could not stirre vp in the Lords, that very shame and indignation doe. There is consultation had, and the King of Nauarre (an vnquiet subiect of the Crowne of France) morgageth the Hauen Towne of Cheirbrough in Normandy to King Richard. The occasion was the rather not omitted, for that, by thrusting into it a good Garrison (which was forthwith done, and first Sir Robert Rous, then Sir Iohn of Harleston, both worthy Knights, made Captaines there) the same would at all times serue to giue quiet entrance to an inuasion of France which now was meditated.

(7) How loosely, the meane while, the affaires of the State and Iustice were managed, by reason of the vnripe yeeres of the King, may appeare by a bloody outrage then perpetrated and vnreuenged. The occasion this. In the warres of Spaine, (which Edward the late Prince of Wales made for restoring Peter to the Crowne,) the Earle of Dean was taken and adiudged Prisoner (from all others clayming that honour) to two valiant Esquires Robert Haule and Iohn Shakell, who both of them belonged to that martiall Knight Sir Iohn Chandos. They free the Earle, taking his sonne and heire for assurance of performances. This young Gentleman (vtterly neglected hitherto by his dishonourable Father,) was now demanded of them in the Kings name, by the Duke of Lancaster, with a purpose (as was thought) the rather either to aduance thereby his (the said Dukes) title to the Crowne of Spaine, or to make a peace there, with the better conditions. The Esquires refuse, and shift their Hostage out of the way; are thrust therefore into the Tower of London; but escaping from thence, take Sanctuary in Westminster. Thither with fifty armed men doth Sir Alan de Bruxhull secretlie repaire, drawes Shakel by a wile out of the priuiledge of the Church, and expostulates the matter with Haule in the Kings name; vpon whom (protesting against the abuse offered to that Maiestie in his tender yeeres, and freely taxing his Counsellours with iniustice, auarice, and euill aduice,) while they sought to lay hands, he with his short sword valiantly made them all flie off, but in the end they most wickedly murthered him in the Chancell: commending himselfe, in his last words, to God reuenger of such iniuries, and to the liberty of our holy mother the Church. With him was murthered a seruant of his thrust in with a Iauelin at the backe. This is that Haule whose body lies buried vnder a brasse-plated stone in the Abbey Church at Westminster, whose blood (by the violence of the said Duke) found not that fulnesse of legall vengeance, which so hainous an homicide required.

The sacrilegious murther of Robert Haule.

(8) The North parts of England were about this time greeuously visited with the stroake of pestilence, and their lamentable affliction encreased by the inroads and outrages of the Scots; who had now surprized Berwicke killing Sir Robert Beynton Knight

Berwick surprized and recouered within nine daies.

Knight the Conſtable thereof; which yet the Earle of Northumberland vpon the ninth day after recouered by force, putting thoſe, who had ſurprized it, to the ſword.

A.D. 1379.

(9) Neither was the ſpirit of the Engliſh (after it began to requicken) idle elſewhere; for as Sir Robert Rous had diuers wayes vexed the French, and taken Oliuer (the brother of that renowned Bertrand de Glequin) priſoner, ſo Sir Iohn de Harleſton, Captaine of Cherbrough after him, ſlew and took diuers French in a skirmiſh. Theſe the few foregoing drops of greater approaching ſhowers. For Sir Hugh Caluerlee and Sir Thomas Percy, made admirals of the narrow Seas, tooke many rich prizes, and exploited ſundry other things very praiſeworthily, bringing home the acceptable newes of the diſlike which the Britons had conceiued againſt the French Kings Gouernment; for he commanded them to render vp to him all their ſtrengths, Caſtles, and walled Townes, and many of them, who refuſed to obey, hee put to death.

The Britons diſlike of the French Gouernment: matter of new troubles.

(10) Theſe emploiments, and freſh deſignes for other like, found need of pecuniary ſupplies; whereupon, in a Parliament holden at London, it was agreed, that for ſupply of the Kings wants, the Commons ſhould be ſpared, and the burthen be wholie vndergone by the able. The rates then of that taxe were theſe; Dukes, Archbiſhops, Earles and Biſhops at ten marks each, mitred Abbots at as much, beſides fortie pence for euery Monke vnder their ſubiection. Briefly (ſaith Thomas Walſingham) there was no religious perſon, man or woman, Iuſtitiar, Sheriffe, Knight, Eſquire, Parſon, Vicar, or * Chauntry Prieſt free from this taxe rated according to the value of their yeerely receipts.

The commons ſpared in the ſubſidie.

*Simplex Capellanus. Walſing.

(11) We formerlie mentioned, how Iohn Shakell (the other companion of Robert Haulee ſo execrablie murdered in Gods-houſe) was taken. He now vpon condition that the King (beſides 500. markes in money) ſhould giue him lands to the yeerely value of one hundreth markes, and ſhould alſo found and ſufficiently endow, at the Kings coſts, a Chantrie with fiue Prieſts for their ſoules, whom the kings Officers had wickedly murthered, he rendred vp his Hoſtage, the eldeſt (but naturall) ſonne of the ſaid Earle of Dean. At the diſcouery and bringing-forth of whom, all men were ſtroken with wonderfull loue and admiration: for the yong Gentleman (hauing giuen his faith not to diſcloſe himſelfe,) appeared in the ſhape of a baſe groome, in which (vnknowne to all the world but his Maſter) hee had of his owne accord lurked. An example of ſuch a point of perfect honeſtie as cannot be forgotten without iniurie.

A memorable example of a noble young gentlemans faith-keeping.

(12) The ſame yeere, the Lord Iohn Mountford, whom the French had driuen out, being inuited home by his Barons, returned into his Dutchy of Britaine, accompanied with the valiant Knights Caluerley and Percy aforeſaid, where he, his friends, and followers were receiued with ſingular honor. Soone after Sir Iohn of Arundell, brother to the Earle of Arundell, being ſent into Britaine to aid the Duke, was with many other valiant Knights and Eſquires drowned. It is imputed by our Author to a iuſt effect of Gods anger againſt the ſaid Sir Iohn, and his houſhold, for their manifold vices and outrages, practiſed by him and them, before they ſet out from England, for which they had the bitter curſes of the people; and the Angell of deſtruction to execute thoſe imprecations vpon the delinquents.

Aids ſent into Britaine drowned.

(13) But the action of aiding did more deepely import, then that it ſhould bee abandoned for the loſſe of that vnfortunate fellowſhip, and the exceeding riches which were with them: therefore the Lord Thomas of Woodſtock Earle of Buckingham, with Caluerlee, Percy, Knols, Windleſhores (or Windſor) verie valiant knights & other competent forces, was ſent to aſſiſt the Duke of Britaine. But becauſe the French Galleys houered vpon the narrow Seas, they landed at Calleys, and from thence march through France, ſpoiling Countries, burning townes, the French not *daring to empeach them, and killing people, till they and their whole equipage came ſafe into Britaine.

Other aids paſſe into Britaine from Calleis by land.

An.D.1380.

(14) There were about theſe times ciuill diuiſions in France; for the Duke of Burgundie, younger brother of King Charles (lately dead) being made Guardian of the perſon and dominions of his Nephew Charles then in minority, had the Duke of Anion (being an elder brother to the Duke of Burgundie) a mortall enemie. Their bloudy quarrels fell out luckily for the Engliſh aides in the Dutchie of Britaine, out of which as Duke Iohn had beene driuen for adhering to his father in law the late king Edward, ſo the Engliſh did their beſt to vphold him in it, as there was cauſe.

(15) The French in theſe extremes are releeued by their ancient diuerſion: for the Scots entring about that time with fire and ſword into Cumberland and Weſtmerland, and the forreſt of Inglewood, draue away much Cattle, ſlew the Inhabitants, rifled the booths and houſes of Perith in the Faire time, killing and taking many, and driuing away the reſt. The Earle of Northumberland preparing a bloudy reuenge, was (not without wonder) prohibited ſo to doe by letters from the King, that is, from ſuch as were about the King.

(16) But how coldly ſoeuer the publike affaires were followed, the want of money for ſupplies was ſtill pretended. And therefore in a Parliament holden at Northampton, was granted to the King a generall ſupplie of money; the pretended occaſion of monſtrous miſchiefe which followed, by reaſon of a clauſe in that grant of Subſidie, that euery one of ech ſexe, being aboue a certain age, ſhould pay by the head, or per Pol as they call it, twelue pence.

(17) The Engliſh Cheualry began now againe to diſplay it ſelfe farre off, to gratifie the priuate ends of Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, who claimed the Crown of Caſtile and Leon, in right of Conſtance his wife: For Iohn King of Portugal had a defenſiue warre againſt Iohn then King of Caſtile, who challenged the Crowne of *Portugall in right of Beatrix his wife, (by whom hee had no iſſue) the onely daughter of Ferdinand king of Portugall, which this other Iohn (a baſtard ſonne of Ferdinands) had by faction vſurped. There were ſent to his aide the Lord Edmund de Langley Earle of Cambridge the Kings vncle, and ſundry Knights and others of good experience with an Armie. Theſe arriuing in Portugall valiantly defended the ſame for about two yeeres, and were the chiefe cauſe of giuing the Spaniards an ouerthrow in battell, where they loſt * ten thouſand men. At laſt the two Kings agreeing together bare the charges of conueighing home the Engliſh in common, that their Countries might bee freed from them, being both alike iealous of their puiſſance. In this time Edward ſonne to the Earle of Cambridge vncle to Richard king of England, married the daughter of the king of Portugall, but afterward neither would the Earle leaue his ſonne behind, as ſuſpecting the Portugeſes faith, nor the other entruſt his daughter to the Earle, ſo as they remained diſioined in body, howſoeuer vnited by Ceremonie.

(18) Not long after the time of that Earles imployment into Spaine, there fell out accidents which doe plainely conuince their error to bee great, who thinke that any madneſſe is like that of an armed & vngouerned multitude, whereof theſe times (by a kind of Fate proper to childrens raigne) gaue a moſt dangerous document. The extreme hatred borne by the people to Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, calling himſelfe king of Caſtile and Leon, and the diſcontentment taken at an extraordinary taxe, leuied per Pol, vpon all ſorts of people, who were aboue ſixteene yeers of age, which (as all other the euils of the time) they imputed to the Duke (the maner being to count them the authors of euils, who are ſuppoſed to haue the greateſt power of doing them) moued the enraged ged multitudes vpon ſlight and ſmall beginnings to runne together in ſo fearefull a Torrent, that it ſeemed the King and kingdome were ſodainely falne vnder their moſt wicked fury. There were in this moſt rebellious inſurrection, the Commons and Bondmen (who aſpiring by force to a free manumiſſion) principally thoſe of Kent and Eſſex, whoſe example was followed in the Neighbour Shires of Surrey, * Suffolke, Norfolke, Cambridge, and other places by incredible heards and droues of like qualified people: who (ſpecially in Norfolke) forced ſundry principall Gentlemen to attend them in their madding.

(19) They of Kent embattelled themſelues vnder two Banners of Saint George, and about threeſcore and tenne Penons vpon Blacke-heath by Greenewich, and from thence came to London, where, the generality of people inclining to them, they are maſters. The Priory of S. Iohns without Smithfield they kept burning for about ſeuen dayes, and the goodlie Palace of the Sauoy, belonging to the Duke, with all the riches therein, they conſumed by fire, in a kind of holy outrage, for they threw one of their fellowes into the flame, who had thruſt a peece of ſtolne plate into his boſome. The Rebels of Eſſex came to Lambeth, burnt all the Archbiſhops goods, and defaced all the Writings, Rowls, Records and Monuments of the Chancerie, as hauing a ſpeciall hatred to the Lawyers, little to their diſgrace, for that they ſhared herein with good men alſo, whom they hated. But their deſperate wickedneſſe extended it ſelfe beyond the ſpoile of houſes and ſubſtance, laying bloudy hands vpon the moſt eminent and worthy men in the kingdome, for that they had diſſwaded the King to put himſelfe into their hands at Greenwich, where hee talked with them out of his Barge, and thereby had their maine deſigne diſappointed. Simon Tibald Archbiſhoppe of Canterburie, and Chancellour of England, a right worthy Prelate, and Sir Robert Hales a Knight of high courage, Lord Prior of Saint Iohns, and Treaſurer of England, with others, they without reſpect to the Maieſtie of the King, or priuiledge of their moſt honourable dignities, moſt barbarouſly murthered by beheading them vpon Tower-Hill, among infernall ſhowtes & diueliſh yels. For the Tower it ſelfe (from whence they had haled them, the young King being there in perſon) was open to their execrable inſolencies. Neither doth the authority of * Polyd. Vergil, affirming that they were not haled forth, but onely ſtayed by the Rebels, to whom (hee ſaith) they were ſent, induce vs rather to credite him, then Authors liuing about thoſe very times. There was no little ſtore of other innocent bloud ſhed by them in theſe tumults. Nor was the Kings own perſon without manifeſt perill, againſt whoſe life they had damnably conſpired. It were long to reckon vppe the kinds of ſuch villanies as they wrought, but endleſſe to recount the particulars. The common *Annals ſet forth this whole Tragicall buſineſſe very diligently.

(20) They had many Captaines of miſchiefe, but two principall, Wat Tyler of Maidſtone in Kent, (whom Walſingham pretily cals the Idoll of Clownes) and Iacke Straw, who together had followers to the number (as they were eſtimated) of about one hundreth thouſand, and at one Sermon made to them by Iohn Ball, Walſingham ſaith, there were about twiſe as many. Their Petitions were full of pride and malice, but eaſily granted by the King, the neceſſity of the times extorting them. They had a Chaplaine as graceleſſe as themſelues, one Iohn Ball an excommunicated Prieſt, who with his wicked doctrine nouriſhed in them their ſeditious furies to his own iuſt deſtructiō in the end: but when a great multitude accepting the Kings mercy were gone, Wat Tyler and his Campe departed not, but vpon pretence of diſliking the Articles of peace, ſought to winne time till he might put into full execution his incredible Treaſons, which (as Iacke Straw at the time of his execution confeſſed) were vpon that very night of the day, wherein Wat Tyler was ſlain, to murder the King, and chiefe men, and to erect petty Tyrannies to themſelues in euery ſhire: and already one Iohn Littiſtar a Dyer in Norwich, had taken vpon him at Northwalſham in Norfolke, the name of the King of the Commons, and Robert Weſtbroome in Suffolke, to whom Iohn Wraw another lewd Prieſt had aſſigned it.

(21) Neuer was the kingly race and commonweale ſo neere to an vtter extirpation, as at this preſent, which was (wee may truly ſay) miraculouſly preuented. The yong king in theſe feares and dangers repairing to Weſtminſter, moſt deuoutly commended his Crowne, Life, and whole eſtate to God, nor that in vaine. For wat Tyler with his Campe of Raſcals eſteemed to bee ten or twenty thouſand (according to the Kings Proclamation, attending in Smithfield, but cauilling of purpoſe vpon the conditions of peace, as hee that meant a farther miſchiefe, though they of Eſſex were returned) was entreated to ride to the king, who alſo ſate on horſebacke before Saint Bartholmewes, in whoſe company was that renowned Lord Maior of London, William Walworth, with many other men of birth and place.

(22) Wat Tyler ſcarſe at the laſt comming behaued himſelfe ſo inſolentlie, offering to murther one of the Kings knights, Sir Iohn Newton, for omiſſion of ſome punto of reſpect, which he arrogated to himſelfe in more then a kingly manner, was (vpon leaue giuen him by the king) boldly arreſted with a drawn weapon by the Lord Maior, a man (ſay Writers) of incomparable courage, which blow was ſeconded by the ſaid Lord, and others ſo ſpeedily, that there this prodigie of a Traitor was felde and ſlaine. A death too worthy, for that he died by the ſwords of honourable perſons, for whom the axe of an Hangman had beene far too good.

(23) The Commons perceiuing the fall of their Captaine, prepared to vſe extreme reuenge, when the moſt hopefull young king with a preſent witte and courage (it being for his life and kingdome) ſpurred forth his horſe, and bad them follow him, without beeing grieued for the loſſe of a ribauld and traitour, for now hee himſelfe would be their Captaine. Hereupon they thronged after him into the field, there to haue whatſoeuer they deſired. But the moſt worthy of all Londoners, Walworth, ſpeeds with one man onely into the City, raiſeth a thouſand Citizens in armour, brings them (being led in good array by Sir Robert Knolles and others) with Wat Tylers head (which the Lord Maior had commanded to bee chopt off from his dead carcaſe) borne before him vpon a Speare to the king. That verie head, the curſed tongue whereof had dared to ſay, That all the Lawes of England ſhould come out of his mouth.

(24) This act reſtored the Crown (as it were) and Realme to King Richard, for the Rebels ſeeing themſelues girt in with armed men, partly fled, partly fel vpon their knees, and (throwing away all hope in weapon) they anſwerably to their baſeneſſe, begged their liues, who but euen now reputed themſelues maſters of the field, and of the king. And albeit there was a generall deſire in the hearts of loyall men to expiate ſo many villanies with the bloud of the Actors, yet things abroad in the Realme being as yet vnſetled, they had a generall Charter of pardon ſealed, and were ſo ſent home into their Countries.

(25) Certainly although the Citie of London (the moſt noble and able part of the Engliſh Empire) hath otherwiſe deſerued of the Kings of this land very well, yet the honour of this ſeruice worthily ſtands higheſt in the many great praiſes therof. Which the King did thankefully and publikely teſtifie by knighting Walworth, and by beſtowing vpon him (when hee modeſtly excuſed his vnworthines and inability) one hundreth pounds land by the yeere in fee ſimple. Hee alſo at the ſame time beſtowed the ſame honour vpon that right worthy Citizen and Patriot, Sir Iohn Philpot, and two other Aldermen, Sir Nicholas Brember, & Sir Robert Laund, to each of which he gaue a like eſtate of 40. pounds. There be who write that hee then alſo knighted Nicholas Twiford, and Robert Gayton Cittizens. The memories of theſe and other ſuch, deſerue and ought to be honoured with ſtatues, aduanced in the moſt conſpicuous place of that great City, leaſt otherwiſe ſhee bee holden ingratefull to them, from whom ſhee deriues ſo honourable ſplendor. That the beauteous Armories of London were at this time augmented with that weapon which wee ſee in the dexter Canton thereof, in remembrance of this ſeruice done by Walworth is affirmed by * ſome, but with what warrant let themſelues ſhew.

*Holinſhed in Richard 2.

(26) The young King, after this fortunate concluſion giuen to ſo helliſh vproares about his principall City, repaired in good array to * Tower Roiall or the Queens ward-robe, a palace then in the boſome of London. There the Queene mother had remained in very great feare and griefe for the ſpace of three daies, and two nights; but the ſight of her ſonne, and relation of his good ſpeed, blotted out of her memory the ſorrowes formerly ſuſtained.

*Survey of London.

(27) It was not long, but that the King (ſurpriſed before with that popular innundation) had ſure notice that the diueliſh rebels were in all other places diſsipated, but neither till themſelues had done much miſchiefe, and ſuffered iuſt puniſhment. Memorable was the ſeruice of Henry le Spencer the ſtout Biſhop of Norwich againſt the Bondmen and Peſants of Norfolk, whome he draue out of their Trenches, ſlew diuers, and cauſed their muſhrom King Iohn Litteſtar to be hanged, drawne and headed. But that which vniuerſallie moſt of all preuailed to the reduction of theſe audacious wretches to due obedience, was the death of Wat Tyler, and the certaine newes of their diſsipation, who were aſſembled about Londō, where for a few daies they had moſt barbarouſly tyrannized. In Hertfordſhire at Saint Albans, Barnet, &c. in Suffolk, Cambridgeſhire, and the Ile of Elye the popular outrages were now in a manner appeaſed. Yet wonderfull is it, that all theſe execrable furies, being in ſo many ſeuerall places, with ſo great forces in each, (for at Bury, where Iohn Weſtbroome kinged it, they are reported to haue beene about fifty thouſand, making it their ſauage ſport, to cauſe the heads of great perſons, which they had cut off and fixed on Poles to kiſſe and whiſper as it were one in the others eare) laſted not in the high ſpeed and full rage thereof the ſpace of eight daies, (being not long before Midſommer, as if it had been a ſyderall infection or generall Lunacy) and the whole time thereof from the beginning to the end, is accounted, by Act of Parliament, but from the firſt of May till Midſommer the Feaſt of Saint Iohn Baptiſt.

Statut. An. 6. Rich. 2. Seſſion. 1. cap. 13.

(28) The royall power which had thus beene foilde, and trodden vnderfoote, could not longer brooke ſo intollerable debaſement, but to repaire and eſtabliſh it ſelfe, there was proclamation made, that all men who had horſe and armour, and loued the King, ſhould forthwith come to London in their beſt manner. There were neuer ſeene together ſo great a multitude of horſemen in England. The muſters were taken vpon Black-heath, where the king himſelfe, being mounted on a goodly courſer among the armed men, and hauing his Standard royall aduanced before him, daily rode forth to view his people, reioicing to bee ſeene among them, and acknowledged their Lord. It is ſaid, that within three daies ſpace there appeared vpon that heath for the Kings ſeruice, not fewer then forty thouſand horſemen moſt brauely appointed.

The royall power like the Sunne after a long darknes puts forth it ſelfe againe.

Forty thouſand Engliſh horſemen in field together.

(29) This force had beene employed againſt the Kentiſh-men, euen to the vtter rooting out of all the guilty, who againe beganne to ſtirre, but that the King was perſwaded by the Nobility and Gentlemen of that Countie, to proceed by ordinarie iuſtice; which was done. The Kings peace was alſo proclaimed in euerie place according to his letters dated at London 17. Iune, in the fourth yeere of his reigne, to the great encouragement of good ſubiects, and confuſion of the wicked. There were executed about one * thouſand and fiue hundreth in all places, beſides fiue of a new forlorne Companie, which hauing deſperatelie dared to gather head againe in Eſſex about Billericai, had tendered to the King certaine inſolent demands, which were iuſtlie reiected, and they ſlaine. The Lord Thomas of Woodſtock Earle of Buckingham the Kings vncle, with Sir Thomas Percy brother to the Count Northumberland, were ſent with force againſt them. The Rebels being manie in number, were notwithſtanding broken at the verie firſt with a Charge made vpon them by a ranck in front of ten men of Armes or Lances. There were taken eight hundreth horſes belonging to the Rebels. Sir Robert Treſilian was principall Actor in the matters of Iuſtice, which hee rightly and ſeuerely adminiſtred. The King himſelfe had ſo great a force of horſemen with him, that (as Sir walter at Lee knight ſaid in his ſpeech to Saint Albans-men) there was neither graſſe nor blade of Corne old or new left within fiue miles compaſſe of the kings perſon.

*Holinſh. in Rich. 2.

(30) And leaſt the miſchieuous multitude ſhould to the kings diſhonour and common hurt of the Church and kingdome, enioy any the leaſt benefit by their late vnſpeakeable villanies; the king, by aduiſe of his Councell, ſent letters reuocatorie into the Shires about, by which he commands, that no man ſhall enioy anie freedome or profit by vertue of anie extorted grants, during the time of the Inſurrections: but yet that his maieſties purpoſe was by the aduiſe of his Councell to grant to his ſubiects (notwithſtanding their ſo heinous treaſons) ſuch mercie, as ſhould bee pleaſing to God, and profitable to him, and to the kingdome. After which ſundrie executions were done at Saint Albans, and elſewhere. And this end for the preſent had theſe infernall attempts of the baſer people, in which we may cleerelie behold the hideous face of Anarchie and Plebeian furie.

(31) Which fearefull convulſion in this State, ſome imputed to Gods wrath on this land for the generall coldnes and neglect of their duties in the chiefe Prelates of the kingdome; others to the great vices, and irreligious tyrannies of the great ones; others to the abounding ſinnes of the common people. But * our Author iudgeth, that the full heape of thoſe cauſes of Gods vengeance, was made-vp by the begging Fryars, who (ſaith he) to purchaſe wealth contrary to their owne Oathes, did ſooth the great men in their vices, and nouriſhed the vulgar in their errors, feeding on the ſinnes of both: calling good euill, and euill good, ſeducing Princes by flatteries, and the common ſort with lies, carrying both headlong with themſelues aſtray. For their outward profeſſion of truth they haue ſo defiled with their wicked life, as that it is now in euery mans mouth a good Argument, holding in matter and formes; This is a Fryar, Ergo a lyar; euen as true as to ſay: This is white, Ergo it is colour de.

* Walſ. ymag. 2. p. 266.

(32) The Duke of Lancaſter, at the firſt breaking forth of theſe Rebellions, was vpon the borders, about ſetling of a truce with the Scots, who therefore did ſhut vp the matter ſpeedilie before the Scots had anie intelligence, ſetling a two yeres abſtinence from Hoſtilitie. The Scots (though they were ſorrie that by the peace ſo concluded, they had loſt an opportunity of making a dangerous impreſsion vpon the Engliſh,) vnderſtanding the Dukes perill, offred him twentie thouſand men to defend his honor, but he loyally refuſing that, they gaue him leaue to come and goe at his pleaſure with all other rites of ſacred Hoſpitality.

(33) After

(33) After Christmas King Richard tooke to wife the Lady Anne, daughter to the Emperor Charls the fourth, and sister to Wenceslaus king of Bohemia, and called Emperour; which Lady by the Duke of Tassill, was in the name of her said Father, formerlie promised and assured vnto him, as one whom the King did specially affect, though the daughter of Barnabas Duke of Millaine was also offered with a farre greater summe of gold. Shee was with great pompe and glory at the same time crowned Queen, by the hand of William Courtney (a yonger sonne of the Earle of Deuonshire) Bishoppe of London, lately promoued from London to the See of Canterbury. The Nuptials and Coronation of the beauteous Queene being, the Parliament (which by this great Ladies arriuall was interrupted & prorogued) began againe. Where many things concerning the excesse of apparrell, transportation of Coine, &c. were wholesomely enacted. Sed quid iuuant Statuta Parli-
"amentorũ, &c. but to what purpose (saith Walsingham)
"are Acts of Parliament, when after they are once past,
"they take no manner of effect? For the king with his priuate Councell, was wont (saith hee) to change, or abolish all things, which by the whole Commons and Nobility of the Kingdome had in former Parliaments beene agreede vpon.

(34) Neuertheless, it was then prouided, that such as had done any thing in their owne defence against the Rebels, or to their suppression, without the ordinarie formes of processe in law, should sustaine no dammage thereby, but for euer bee as cleare as if they therefore had enioyed their particular pardons; and that all releases, feoffments, and other acts done in the late rebellions, (during the hurling times, for so they were called) by way of constraint or duresse, should be vtterly void.

(35) With the good liking of this Parliament, Sir Richard Scrope Knight, was made Chancellor of the Realme, and Sir Hugh Segrane Treasurer; but it was not long before the Chancelour denying to passe such large gifts vnder the Great Seale, as the king in his youthfull humor had imprudently granted, therewith to gratifie his still craving Courtiers, fell into the kings vndeserued displeasure. For albeit he alledged important causes of such his deniall, (as, that the King was greatly in debt) and therefore such largesses were fitter to bee imployed in discharging some of his Creditors, that knowing how the King was intangled with Creditors, such crauers were not truely well affected to him, as regarding their own priuate auarice more then the kings profite, or the publike wants; that those selfe same crauers, had formerly receiued such gifts of his Maiesty, as were (at least) answerable to their deseruings; and that himselfe, if he should seale those grants (made in the Kings childhood) was like to haue small thanks of him, when he should come to riper iudgement; yet thereupon he was twice or thrice willed to send the Seale to the King, who comming in person "surrendred the same, with such like words, That "hee would alwayes bee loyall and true to his Maiestie,
"but neuer beare any office vnder him againe. Not long after which surrender, Robert Braybroke Bishoppe of London was made Chancellor in his place. This act of the Kings was displeasant to the whole Realme, and one of the first things by which hee fell into dislike, it being among the infelicities of King Richard, that those times were too full of sower and impatient censors, for a Prince of so calme a temper, and as yet vnseasoned yeeres.

(36) Henrie le Spenser the warlike Bishop of Norwich, being drawne on by Pope Vrban to preach the Crusado, and to be Generall against Clement (whom sundry Cardinals and great Prelates had also elected Pope) hauing a Fifteenth granted to him for that purpose by Parliament, (after strong* opposition of almost all the Nobles who resisted this businesse of the Crosse) went with Forces into Flanders to support the cause of Vrban against the Antipape; from whence after hee had performed sundry things very happily, taken Graueling, Burbrough, Dunkirke by assault, and beene victor in a set battell against thirty thousand abettors of Clements claime, hee was enforced to returne, as destitute of those farther succours which were expected out of England. But the king vpon pretence that hee had not obeyed his royall mandate, by which hee required him, (before hee transported) to returne, for a while seised vpon all his temporalities.

(37) But K. Richard hauing before giuen the realm discontentment, by remouing Scrope from the Chancellorshippe, encreased the same by some manifest signes of leuity and prodigality toward Strangers, then which nothing makes a Prince lesse pleasing to the English: for, in the progresse which with his beloued Queene hee made to Bury, Thetford, Norwich, and other places, gifts were taken on all hands by the King, and they againe through the Queene were powred forth to enrich her Bohemians.

The kings enrichment of the Bohemians displeasant.

(38) John Duke of Lancaster embarkt himselfe for France, where hee concluded a truce to endure betweene the two Nations English and French, from the present Christmas till Midsommer. At his return, he and his brother Thomas of Woodstocke Earle of Buckingham, went with an Armie into Scotland, to reuenge the breach of truce: but as it seems by some, the Duke had rather an hoast of men, then an hostile mind; for hee so ordered the matter (as not forgetfull perhaps of curtesies shewed to him in his late dangers, when the Commons were out in Armes,) that the Scots hauing had time inough to withdraw both their goods and persons, and his army suffering farre more losse by penurie and cold, then it could inflict vpon the enemy, returned* fruitlesse and inglorious.

An. D. 1384.

* Ioh. Stow.

(39) Not long after his returne, hee was encountred with a more capitall and dangerous enemy, then those in Armes: for a certaine Carmelite Fryer, by birth an Irishman, deliuered to the King (in the time of Parliament at Salisbury) a writing which contained therin a heinous accusation of the Duke of Lancaster, that he had conspired to murther the King, and to crowne himselfe. The accuser discouered, the day, place, and other circumstances, to induce a beliefe of the pretended intention, and tooke his oath vpon the Sacrament, which that day hee had receiued, that no one word in that scroll was vntrue. The Dukes Apologie and fauour with the King, preuayled aboue the accusers confidence; whereupon the Fryer is committed, at the Dukes request, to the L. John Holland (the Kings halfe brother by his mother) and a day appointed, wherein the accuser was to shew a cause of his crimination.

The Duke of Lancaster acculed of highest Treason.

(40) But in the night which next forewent the designed day, the said Lord John Holland (if a man may beleeue, that a thing so villanous could be done by men of honour) and one Sir Henry Green knight, are reported to haue trussed vp the Fryer in a cord by the necke, and parts of generation, laying vpon his breast a stone of great weight to breake the chine of his backe; and that they also scorcht the soles of his feet. By which miserable and quadruple manner of death, without triall or conuiction, (as also without* recantation of any thing which hee had vttered against the Duke) he is said to haue breathed his last. Neither was his death smothered, for the next day they caused his strangled carcase to bee dragged through the City, that it might not bee thought hee had perished vniustly. But the Lord Thomas of Woodstocke (the same who was afterward Duke of Glocester) went farther, for hee rusheth into the Chamber where the King was, and bound his "words with a terrible oath, That hee would kill a-"ny one liuing who durst lay treason to his bro-"thers charge: neither did hee except the king himselfe. In which speeches, as piety and zeale for his brothers honor and saferie were not wanting, so certainly duty to his Prince was exceedingly forgotten.

* Ioh. Stow.

(41) That

(41) That which followed, may giue vs iuſt cauſe to ſuſpect the truth of that Fryers accuſation: for the Lord william la Zouch was alſo by the Fryer accuſed, of hauing been the Inuenter, broacher, and prouoker of him, to ſet downe all that which was comprehended in the accuſation; who thereupon ſent for to Salisburie (though then very ſicke of the gowte) repaired thither in an horſe-litter, where hee was compelled to anſwere to all ſuch points as were obiected, like a felon, or a traytour ſtanding bare-headed: but the priuitie, or leaſt thought of any ſuch matter as the Fryer affirmed againſt the Duke, hee confidently forſware, and was thereupon acquitted and diſmiſſed. Howbeit (ſaith Walſingham) La Zouch was from that time forward a profeſſed enemie, not onely of Carmelites, but of al other orders of Fryers whatſoeuer. But theſe diſgraces came vnſeaſonably vpon the Duke, whoſe head was vndoubtedly full of deſignes, and of cares, how to atchieue to himſelfe the crowne of Spaine.

(42) There were then ſundry incurſions made by the Engliſh and Scots, each into the others country, the Earle of Northumberland being leader to the Engliſh, with little aduantage to either. But to take away the very cauſe of this continuall bad neighbourhood, or to leſſen it by an eſtabliſhed peace with France, the Duke of Lancaſter layled to Callis, about the beginning of Auguſt, there to treat with the Duke of Berrie, on behalfe of the young French King Charles 6. but after he had in that voyage expended (as was ſaid) fifty thouſad Marks, he brought into England nothing backe, except onely a truce, to continue till the firſt day of May next. His deſire to haue procured a ſurer peace both with the French and Scots, ſeemes to haue beene great, that ſo hee might the more freely purſue the conqueſt of Spaine which he intended.

Iohn Cumber-towne once Lord Maior of London, confined and confiſcated.

(43) Whiles hee was abſent in this Ambaſſage, there enſued the arraignement of a great fauourite of the Dukes, Iohn Northampton, alias Comberton, whom his aduerſaries by-named Cumber-towne. This man is by them reported to haue exceedingly troubled the City of London, during his late Maioralty there, nor leſſe afterward; for that being followed with many abettors, hee publikely diſturbed Sir Nicholas Bramble his ſucceſſor, (but a * bloudy minded man by report,) and wrought other maiſteries, till Sir Robert Knowls cauſed one of the buſieſt companions to bee drawne out of his houſe, and (as ſome ſay) ſhortned by the head. This Comberton was by his houſhold Clerke accuſed, as priuie to ſome practiſes, in preiudice as well of the King, as the City; and when ſentence was to bee pronounced in the Kings preſence (being then with great ſtore of his Nobles at Reading,) hee durſt (as is ſaid) affirme, That ſuch iudgement ought not to proceede againſt him in the abſence of his Lord the Duke. This againe vnraked the burning coales of enuie, and ſuſpition againſt the ſaid Lord Duke; and perhaps malice to the Duke procured this hatred againſt his fauourite. Whereupon hee was confined to the Caſtle of Tyntagel in Cornwall, and all his goods ſeiſed vpon by the Kings Seruants, whom Walſingham expreſſeth, by calling them after the name of thoſe Poeticall rauenous Birds, Harpyes.

*Them. VValſing. Ypod. p. 539.

Polydor. Vergil. not to be raſhly beleeued.

(44) That here which Polydor Vergil (aſsigning cauſes to actions, not alwayes ſuch as are, but ſuch as ſeemed to him moſt probable, not ſeldome confounding and changing perſons, times, names, and things) telles vs concerning a combate within liſts, betweene Sir Iohn Aunſley Knight, and one Carton hath little ground, (ſo farre as wee can find) in hiſtorie. He ſaith they were teterrima capita, both very wicked men, & that there was a real plot to murther the king. We can neither find the crime nor the mē: there had beene a ſolemne combat long before betweene ſuch a knight and one * Katrington an Eſquire, in which the knight was Challenger and victor, but the crime was not treaſon againſt the kings perſon, nor for any thing done in his time, but in his noble Grandfathers. Neither was Anſley, teterrimum caput, but a valiant and loyall man of Armes. The crime which he obiected to that Eſquire (his kinſman) was, that for money he had traiterouſly giuen ouer the Caſtle of Saint Sauiour in the Land of Conſtantine in Normandie, when he had ſtore of victuall and munition. The Eſquire was vanquiſhed in faire fight and died frantick the next day. Polydors errour therefore is ioyned with manifeſt wrong to the knights name, wherein wee ought to bee very circumſpect, for that, honour is ineſtimable and deſcendeth to poſterity. There was indeed, at the time he ſpeakes of, another combat, fought alſo within liſtes before the king, (for Duels then were performed, not on priuate choice or quarrell, but on publike appointment) betweene one Iohn Welſh an Eſquire of England, and one * Martilet a Gentleman Nauarrois, who in reuenge againſt Welſh, for hauing at Cheirbrough (where the ſaid Eſquire was vnder-captain) cōmitted (as Martilet ſaid) adultery with his wife, accuſed him of high treaſon againſt the King and Realme. But Welſh preuailed; and the Nauarrois, at his execution (for hee was *drawne and hanged after he had beene foild in battel,) confeſſed the cauſe of his euill will, and the innocency of Welſh in the matter of treaſon.

Sir Iohn Anſleys reputation redeemed from ſlander.
* Rothton hee is called, Ypod. Neuſt. An. 1380.

(45) The Scots had this while by practiſe and money gotten the Caſtle of Berwick, whereof the Cuſtody belonged to the Lord Henry Percy Earle of Northumberland. The Duke of Lancaſter was not ſad at this, but ſo purſued the matter, that the Earle (as if by his negligence and priuity the ſame royall Caſtle had beene loſt) was condemned in Parliament. But the king relieued him with extenſion of fauour. This was a great cauſe of confirming the rancour alreadie kindled in the hearts of theſe two principall Peeres. But the Earle to wipe away all blemiſhes of diſgrace, encloſeth the Caſtle with a ſiege both of forces and large proffers, ſo that after ſome time ſpent therein, he had it redeliuered vpon paiment of two thouſand marks.

(46) The Flemings had heretofore in the fifth yeere of this King, ſent Ambaſſadors at the time of Parliament, to ſubmit themſelues and their Country to his dominion, renouncing alleageance to their naturall Lord the Earle, whom they had by force of Armes expelled, vpon pretence of oppreſsion vſed by him, and for other cauſes; but becauſe they ſeemed not either perſons ſufficient, or ſufficiently inſtructed with authority, to tranſact with the King in a matter of ſo high nature, they were commanded to returne, and fetch more ample power, and to bring certaine men of euery good Towne in Flanders. Now againe, the Citizens of Gaunt, though they had in battell againſt the French King, (who was there in perſon on behalfe of the Earle,) * loſt twenty * thouſand men not long before, delired of K. Richard, that they might haue an Engliſh Generall to command in their warres; to whom was ſent a wiſe and valiant Gentleman, the Lord Edward le Bourſer, who demeaned himſelfe in that charge with much commendation. And when afterwards he went more abundantly and ſtrongly to haue ſupported them, they ſodeinely turnd French, ſhewing Seneſcire (ſaith * Walſingham) vni amico, vel domino, fidem diuſeruare.

(47) The Duke of Lancaſter (whoſe, or the like greatneſſe may perhaps ſeeme more, then can ſtand with the narrow limits of England, which, without danger to the common wealth, can hardly afford ſuch a proportion of eſtate to any Subiect) was about this time enformed, that the King had a purpoſe to arreſt his perſon, and to trie him vpon capitall points before Sir Robert Triſilian, his Chiefe Iuſtitiar, a man ready, (vnder the Kings protection) to deliuer iudgement without reſpect to Titles. The King was nouriſhed in this *deliberation by yong men, who combined againſt the Dukes life. This being diſcouered, the Duke (a potent Prince) withdrawes vpon his guard to his Caſtle of Pomfret in the the North; neuertheleſſe the hopes of wicked men, delighting in their Countreys miſeries, and ciuill combuſtions, were made void by the great diligence of the Kings mother, the Princeſſe Ioan, who ſpared not her continuall paines and expenſes, in trauailing betweene the King and the Duke, (albeit ſhee was exceeding tender of complexion, and ſcarce able to beare her owne bodies weight through corpulency) till they were fully reconciled.

(48) It had indeed beene a moſt wretched time for a ciuill warre, not only becauſe the French Admirall, Iohn de Vienna, had beene ſent with forces embarcked in fiftie ſcore ſaile of Ships, to be employed out of Scotland againſt the Engliſh, but for that the French prepared a generall inuaſion of England, hauing in hope already as it were deuoured it. There reigned at that time in France Charles the ſixth, a yong and fooliſh Prince, (ſaith Tilius) who hauing in his treaſury, left to him by his prudent father, * eighteene millions of Crownes, (and not only eighteene hundred thouſand, *as ſome, fearing perhaps that the other ſumme might ſeeme incredible, haue written,) and being moreouer ſet on fire with an inconſiderate loue of glory, rather then vpon any ſound aduiſe (though * ſome impute the Counſell to the ſaid Admirall) would needs vndertake the conqueſt of our Countrey. Theſe newes ſtirred all the limbs and humors thereof, though the euent (God not fauouring the enterprize) was but like that of the Mountaine, which after long trauaile brought forth a ridiculous mouſe, neuertheleſſe it had beene a moſt deſperate ſeaſon for a ciuill warre to haue broken forth in England.

(49) The preparations of the French doe hold notwithſtanding, and the generall Rendeuou of their huge forces was at Sluſe, in the Port whereof, and other places about, there were aſſigned to aſſemble for their tranſportation, * twelue hundreth ſaile of ſhips. At the ſame time (as if the two young kings had beene riuals in ſhew of men) Richard raiſeth ſo great an army to ouerrun Scotland, as the like for beauty and number was neuer ſeene together, conſiſting wholy of Engliſhmen. But may wee beleeue that England could ſpare three hundreth thouſand men, and as many horſes for the vſe of a warre? Certainely a needleſſe multitude, but only to terrifie the French with the fame, for there might haue beene fewer, for any great Act which Richard (full of iealouſie againſt his vncle of Lancaſter, wherewith his head and heart were full,) effected. But we may the rather beleeue the account, for that Walſingham voucheth * Serieants at Armes (if he meane not Heralds by thoſe words) whoſe office (he ſaith) it was to number the Hoſt, and they affirmed the ſame. This is ſure, that * among other the arguments vſed by the Duke of Bury (one of the French Kings vncles) to fruſtrate this enterprize, he alleaged, that the King of England had muſtred ten thouſand horſemen, and one hundreth thouſand Archers for his defence; whereas the Admirall Iohn de Vienna affirmed, that hauing ſeene the forces of the Engliſh, they were but eight thouſand horſemen and threeſcore thouſand foot; and he might well ſay hauing ſeene: for, though Æmylius bring him in ſpeaking to the French King, and vaunting that he had encountred them, yet nothing is truer, then that the Engliſh returned out of Scotland without the leaſt offer of battell. The Admirall was willing indeed to haue fought, but when he ſaw our Armie from the hil-tops, his furie gaue place to reaſon.

(50) While the Armie was vpon the way toward Scotland, the Kings halfe-brother the Lord Iohn Holland wickedly ſlew the Lord Stafford, ſonne to the Earle of Stafford not farre from Yorke, being vpon his iourney to the Queene, whoſe fauoured Knight he was. For which heinous homicide the King ſeiſed vpon his whole eſtate, denying to his mothers moſt earneſt praiers any pardon or grace for his brother. Which was to her ſo greeuous, that within fiue or ſixe daies after ſhee gaue vp the Ghoſt at Wallingford. The young Lord tooke Sanctuary at Beuerley, and the King by his iuſtice herein wanne the hearts of the ſaid Earle of Stafford, the Earle of Warwick, the Lord Baſſet, and other great men of Staffords kindred and friends; neither did this empeach at all the preſent voyage.

(51) The Scots and French in Scotland, ſeeing themſelues vnable to withſtand ſuch forces, had ſo retired themſelues and all their goods, that when the Engliſh ſhould come, they, (as Walſingham pleaſantly ſaith) could ſee no quicke things left but onlie Owles. That which was greene in the fields, the horſes deuoured or trampled down, yet ſuch harme, as the materials of buildings were capable of, was done. Edenburgh alſo and the * noble Abbey of Mailroſſe were fired. The Duke of Lancaſter perſwaded the King to march beyond the Frith or Scottiſh Sea (as his great Anceſtors had done) to ſeeke out his enemies; but he, very ſuſpicious that the Duke gaue him this counſell with a purpoſe to betray him to deſtruction by famine, and want, which he was there to looke for, expreſſed much diſpleaſure and returned. The Dukes wordes notwithſtanding and behauiour were tempered with much duty and modeſty; but that would not ſerue, till the Lords peeced their affections together by interceſſion in the beſt manner the time would ſuffer. But the Engliſh hoſt was ſcarce returned and diſcharged, when the Scots and French ſodeinely powred themſelues forth vpon our Countrey, and did whatſoeuer hurt the ſhortnes of time in their incurſion could permit.

(52) To reſiſt and endammage the French, there were appointed Admirals for the narrow Seas, the Maſter of Saint Iohns, and Sir Thomas Percie Knight, (the Earle of Northumberlands brother,) who did nothing worthy their fame or place. Only the Townesmen of Portſmouth and Dart, maund forth a few ſhips at their owne perill and charge, wherewith entering the riuer of Sein (vpon which the renowned Cities Roan and Paris are ſituated) ſuncke ſome of their enemies ſhips, tooke others, and among them one of Sir Oliuer de Cliſſon's, the goodlieſt that France had. The ſucceſſe anſwered their hopes, and they were enriched with the ſpoiles of their aduerſaries, whom thus they compelled to beare the charge of their proper miſchiefe.

(53) Meanewhile that the French lay at Sluſe, attending the approch of their kings vncle the Duke of Burie, (who fauoured not this enterprize of inuaſion, but ſought * aſwell by delaies, as by perſwaſion and authority to make it fruſtrate,) they of Gaunt had gotten the Towne of Dam by the good liking of the Inhabitants, to whom the French gouernment was odious. For recouery whereof, the French King drew his armie (prepared againſt England) to the ſiege of Dam, which (the ſame being firſt ſecretlie abandoned, after a moneths ſiege and many repulſes giuen to the French) was by him recouered. This, and other things, did ſo protract the great expedition intended, that (after waſt of infinite treaſure) Charles returned home, without hauing ſeene England, which was by theſe meanes moſt graciouſlie freed by God, from ſo dangerous, and greatly-feared an impreſſion. But that the Engliſh might the better endure the ſame, Iohn King of Portugall, hauing lately in a great and bloodie battell (where ſome of the Engliſh deſerued well of him,) ouerthrowne the Caſtilians, and thereby ſetled his eſtate, ſent into England ſixe Galleys throughly well appointed, for Sea-ſeruice, though (as God would) there was no need of them.

(54) Of thoſe French, which (after the Cloude of warre at Sluce was diſperſed into ayre,) paſſed ouerland into their Countreys, many were taken and ſlaine by the Gauntiners. Their nauie was not leſſe vnfortunate; for at one * time the Engliſh of Calis tooke of them eighteene, and the rage of weather brake and ſunke diuers, ſo that this Bravado was not onely coſtly to the French, by reaſon of the charges, but hurtfull in the loſſe of time, men, ſhippes, and hoped glorie. Such are the euents of humane enterpriſes, where God is not pleaſed to giue ſucceſſe. The Engliſh thus deliuered from feare make a road into France out of Callis, and with a prey of foure thouſand ſheepe and three hundreth head of great cattell, beſides an hundreth good priſoners, returned ſafe to their Garriſon.

(55) The multitude of memorable things which preſent themſelues to vs in the liues of our Engliſh Monarches, is ſuch, that if wee did not vſe choiſe, and in their relation breuity, wee ſhould not relieue our Readers of that moleſtation, with which the vaſte volumes of former labours doe oppreſſe the memorie. The Laitie, at the Parliament now holden at London, had yeelded to aide the King with a Fifteenth vpon condition, that the Clergie ſhould ſuccour him with a Tenth and an halfe; againſt which vniuſt proportion, William de Courtney Archbiſhop of Canterbury moſt ſtifly oppoſed; alleadging that the Church ought to bee free, nor in any wiſe to bee taxed by the Laitie, and that himſelfe would rather die then endure that the Church of England, (the liberties whereof had by ſo many free Parliaments in all times, and not onely in the raign of this King been confirmed, ſhould be made a bond-maide. This anſwere ſo offended the Commons, that the Knights of the Shires, and ſome Peeres of the land, with extreme fury beſought, That Temporalities might bee taken away from Eccleſiaſticall perſons, ſaying, that it was an Almeſdeed and an Act of Charity ſo to doe, thereby to humble them. Neither did they doubt, but that their petition which they had exhibited to the King would take effect. Hereupon they deſigned among themſelues, out of which Abbey, which ſhould receiue ſuch a certaine ſumme, and out of which, another. I my ſelfe (ſaith * a Monke of Saint Albans) heard one of thoſe Knights confidently ſweare, that hee would haue a yeerely penſion of a thouſand Marks out of the Temporalities belonging to that Abbey. But the King hauing heard both parts, commanded the Petitioners to ſilence, and the Petition to bee razed out, ſaying, He would maintain the Engliſh Church in the qualty of the ſame ſtate or better, in which himſelfe had knowne it to bee, when hee came to the Crowne. The Archbiſhop hereupon hauing conſulted with the Clergy, came to the King, and declared, that hee and the Clergy had with one conſent, willingly prouided to ſupplie his Maieſties occaſions with a Tenth. This grant the King tooke ſo contentedly, as he openly affirmed, hee was better pleaſed with this free contribution of one Tenth for the preſent, then if hee had gotten foure by compulſion.

(56) Robert de Vere Earle of Oxford (a young Gentleman in ſpeciall grace with the King) was at this Parliament created Marqueſſe of Dublin in Ireland, which moued great deſpight againſt him, thoſe rough times being impatient to beare the vnequall aduancement of fauourites. Neuertheleſſe, though the gentle King was thought herein to pleaſe his owne fanſie, rather then to reward merite, yet did hee ſo ſweetly temper it, as there was no iuſtice, nor reaſon to enuie to him that ſolace which hee tooke in his friends encreaſed honour; for at the ſame time hee aduanced two of his vncles, Thomas of Woodſtoocke, Earle of Buckingham to the title of Duke of Gloceſter, and Edmund of Langley Earle of Cambridge, he created Duke of Yorke, allotting ſeuerall proportions of penſion to be paide out of his Exchequer. In Vere there was ancient Nobilitie to iuſtifie his new degree the better; but in making the Lord Chancellor Michael de la Poole Earle of Suffolke, with the yeerelie penſion of 1000 Markes, was matter of more enuie; becauſe he was not deſcended of ſuch honourable Parents: a defect (if it bee a defect) which none more willingly vpbraid to men of worth, then who themſelues are not alwayes the moſt worthy. The firſt raiſer of this familie of De la Pole was Edward the third, who made William de la Pole, of a braue Merchant, a * Knight Baneret, and gaue him great poſſeſſions, in requitall of an extraordinary and voluntary loane of treaſure, aduanced by him to ſupply the King in a time of ſpeciall neceſsity, when money could ſtand him in more ſteed then a thouſand men of Armes: no little merite in a ſubiect, nor a ſlender reward of a moſt munificent Prince.

The first Marqueſſe made that euer was in England.

(57) Henry Spenſer the martiall Biſhop of Norwich found grace with the King at this Parliament, to bee reſtored to his temporalities, at the ſpeciall ſuite of Thomas Arundell Biſhoppe of Ely: whiles the Biſhoppe of Ely thus beſought his Maieſty of Grace, the ſaid Michael de la Poole (Lord Chancellor and Earle of Suffolke) ſtood by, and brake out with much offence into theſe words. What is that (my Lord) which you aske of the King? Seemes it to you a ſmall matter for him to part with that Biſhops temporalities, when they yeeld to his Coffers aboue one thouſand pounds by yeere? Little neede hath the King of ſuch Counſellors, or of ſuch friends, as adviſe him to acts ſo greatly to his hinderance. Whereunto the Biſhop of Ely not leſſe truly, then freelie replide. What ſaith your Lordſhip, my Lord Michael? Know that I require not of the king that which is his, but that which hee (drawne thereunto either by you, or by the Counſell of ſuch as you are,) withholds from other men, vpon none of the iuſteſt titles, and which (as I thinke) will neuer doe him any good: as for you, if the Kings hinderance bee the thing you weigh, why did you ſo greedily accept of a thouſand markes by yeere, at ſuch time as he created you Earle of Suffolke? The Chancellour was hit ſo home with this round retort, that hee neuer offered any further to croſſe the reſtitution of the Biſhops temporalties.

(58) After this the King being with his Queen at their manour of Eltham in Kent, there came thither Leo King of Armenia, a Chriſtian Prince, whom the Tartars had expelled out of his Kingdome. The pretence of his negotiation was to accord the realms of England and France; that the Princes thereof might with ioint forces remoue the common enemy from Chriſtendome. Therein hee could effect nothing, but his iourney was not otherwiſe vnfruitful to himſelfe, for King Richard (a Prince to ſpeake truly, full of honour and bountie) gaue him beſides a thouſand pounds, in a * ſhip of gold) letters Patents alſo for a thouſand pounds yeerely penſion during life.

(59) The time now was come, wherein K. Richard ſhould ſee himſelfe deliuered of all that feare and iealouſie, which the greatneſſe of his vncle the Duke of Lancaſter ſtirred in him. His Forces were now ready, and his Nauie (encreaſed with * ſeuen Gallies, and eighteene ſhippes ſent out of Portugall) attended at Briſtoll, to tranſport him toward Spaine, (for Caſtile is high Spaine) the crowne whereof hee claimed in right of Conſtance his ſecond wife, daughter of Dom Peter the cruell. Before hee ſet forth, the newes came that ſuch Engliſh as were already in Portugall with their friendes had ouerthrowne the Spaniards, French, and Britons, at a battell in Spaine. This was a ſpurre to quicken the Dukes enterpriſe, which Pope Vrban the ſixth (by granting plenarie remiſſion of ſinnes to all ſuch as gaue the Duke aid) did ſpecially fauour, as againſt them who did partake with his enemy the Antipape; * but the frequent grant of ſuch pardon and releaſement, was now growne ſo vile and contemptible amongſt the people, that few were found open handed towards this Cruceata. Admiral of this Fleete was Sir Thomas Percie, Sir Iohn Holland (who had married one of the Dukes daughters afterward created Earle of Huntington) was Conſtable of the hoſt, and Sir Iohn Mereaux (who had to wife one of the Dukes illegitimate children) was one of his Marſhals. There were in this noble and excellently-well appointed Army, the Lords Talbot, Baſſet, Willoughby, Fitz-walter, Poinings, Bradſton, Fitz-Warren, warren, Beaumont, Beauchampe, the Lord Pomiers a Gascoin, &c. with very many worthy knights & valiant Esquiers, and a choise number of men of Arms, Archers and other Souldiers, to the number of *twenty thousand. The Duke tooke also with him his wife, the Lady Constance, and two daughters, which hee had by her, as * one relateth.

(60) It was now the moneth of May, when the great Duke of Lancaster comming to take leaue, had of the kings gift a Diademe of gold, and his Dutchesse of the Queene another: he also commanded the English to call, and hold his vncle for a King, and to doe him answerable honour. But after all this, hee lay for a wind so long, till his whole prouisions were almost spent; at length yet, hee set forward. The first land they touched was neere to Brest in Britaine, where Sir Iohn Roch the Gouernour against the French, complained of two Forts built about him to empeach his quiet egresse; whereupon the Duke of Lancaster caused thē to bee assaulted; so both of them being taken by surrender, were razed to the ground, though some English first lost their liues, among which, was * Sir Robert Swinarton, a valiant Knight of Staffordshire, and Iohn de Bolton a couragious Esquier of Yorkeshire, whom the sodaine ruine of a Tower (ouerturned by mining) whelmed and slew outright. Sharpened with the successe of this victorie, they commit themselues to God, and the Sea, and prosperously arriue with the whole Fleet in the Port Corone, or the Groyne, * in August.

(61) The French (belike) thought England could not furnish an other Army for France, as she had for Spain: wherupon there was now no false nor vain rumor spread again, that the French would besiege Calis. The King to secure that pretious transmarine part of his Dominions, sent thither store of men and of all prouisions. The most eminent person was Henry Lord Percie, sonne to Henry Earle of Northumberland. This was hee whom the Scots by-named Hotspur, a young Gentleman, in whom (saith Walsingham) the patterne of all vertue and martiall prowesse shined: and indeed his nature did answere his by-name; for hee made such ridings into the quarters about Calis, that they could neuer wish a worse neighbour. After which, when the fame went that the French king would not delay, or (as they call it) beleaguer Calis, but rather inuade England, hee returned to bee present where the greatest danger was expected. At this time, the English Seamen of warre, brought two French prizes to Sandwich, in which was taken a part of an huge strong Timber-wall, which the French king, preparing now for Englands inuasion, had caused to bee built in length three miles, in height twenty foot, which had at euery twelue paces a Tower (ten foot higher) and each capable of ten men, the whole to be a defence for the French encampments against our shot, and a shelter for theirs, there was also in the same Ships the Enginer and master workeman, who was an Englishman, and great quantities of powder, and store of Ordinance, together with the French Kings Master * Gunner.

(62) There was in this time a great resemblance betweene England and France in the chiefe points of State. As England had Richard, so had France her Charles, both young Kings. Charles with an huge armie had prepared to inuade England, but did nothing: Richard with no lesse forces entred Scotland, and did no great thing. Richard had vncles which bare great sway in the Realme; so had Charles. Richard had his vncle Iohn more potent then the rest; Charles had his vncle Lewis. Iohn vpon his wiues title claimeth the kingdomes of Castile and Leon; Lewis by the gift of Ioan the Queene, claimes the Kingdomes of Naples and Sicil. Lewis went with an Army of * thirty thousand horse into Italie to atchieue his claime; with what force Iohn set forth you haue heard. But Lewis died without obtayning; Iohn preuailed so farre as to settle his child by marriage. The King and great Lords of France were glad (with any charge) to enioy the absence of Lewis, and Richard and his fauourites were not sad, that the Realme was for the present rid of Iohn.

(63) The forces of the French prouided for this inuasion of England, were reported in open Parliament (which the King held about Michaelmas in London) to consist of * 15 Dukes, 26. Earles, two hundreth Lords, & an hundreth thousand souldiers, and a thousand Ships, assembled about Sluse, with full purpose to take reuenge of all the euils which the English nation had formerly wrought in France, and to destroy the English kingdome. But though these reports were not fained, (for the French attended nothing in a manner but a faire gale of winde to bring them,) yet could not the King, without Capitulations made by the Duke of Gloster, obtaine any aides of money; so that, whereas it seemed to the King, that by the Duke of Lancasters departure, he was become more free, yet had he left behind spirits much more stiffe and intractable. O deare Countrey, hadst thou not then beene apparantlie in Gods protection, (for the French hauing stayd for a wind till Hallowtide, and then hauing it halfe-way, were beaten backe, and the voyage made vtterly voyd) certainely thy ruine had then beene certaine. What shall wee thinke or say of those popular Lords, by this gentle King armd (to his owne bane) with power and greatnes, who vnder the specious pretext of reforming abuses, did satisfie their enuie and inbred insolency?

(64) The King tels them, that England is, as they saw, in manifest danger, and prayes their succour in money: what is the answere? That the Duke of Ireland (for now the Marquesse of Dublin was made a Duke,) and Michaell at the Pole (so they scornfully called the Earle of Suffolke) and other must be remoued. Things are badly carried at home, say they; (and they perhaps said truly;) but where was now the care of our Countrey? God indeed turned from vs the mercilesse point of the French sword: but here began the seeds of innumerable worse miseries, neuer to be remembred without sighes and teares.

The first seeds of the ciuil warrs.

(65) The seedes (we say) of those fearefull calamities were then first here sowne, whose sum a flourishing * Writer in our age (willing neerely to haue imitated Lucan, as hee is indeed called our * Lucan) doth not vnfortunately expresse, though hee might rather haue said he wept them, then sung them; but so to sing them, is to weepe them.

And bloudy factions of a mighty land;
Whose people hauty, proud with forraine spoiles,

Like Ensignes, all against like Ensignes band;
Bowes against Bowes, a Crowne against a Crowne,
While all pretending right, all right throwne downe.

But Robert de Vere, saith Thomas Duke of Gloucester and his party, was vnworthily created Duke of Ireland, and De la Pole the Lord Chancellour seemed to the onely great Lords (for so they would seeme) to be in the Kings debt. Strange colours for Subiects to capitulate with their King; vpon giuing their ioynt aides against the common enemy, now ready with one destruction to ouerwhelme them all. The time they tooke to worke this pretended amendment in state, was not well fitted. It sauoured of somewhat else besides the loue of common-weale. Priuate ambitions and passions could not bee wanting in such oppositions. This is some mens iudgement, let the sequels shew how iust.

(66) There were called vp at this Parliament for defence of the Realme innumerable people out of al Shires, which forces lay about London within twentie tie miles round, and had no pay but liued vpon ſpoile. Theſe at laſt were licenced to depart to be ready at warning. There was alſo the Lord Chancellour accuſed, of (we wot not what) petty crimes (for the abuſes of following ages haue made them ſeeme ſo,) as for paying to the Kings Coffers but *twentie markes yeerely, for a fee-farme, whereof himſelfe receiued threeſcore and ten, and ſome ſuch other. To pacifie theſe great Lords, the Lord Chancellour is diſgraced, and the ſeale taken from him, againſt the Kings will, and giuen to Thomas Arundell Biſhop of Elye, and then the houſes of Parliament yeelded to giue halfe a Tenth, and halfe a Fifteenth, but vpon condition that it ſhould be diſpoſed of, as the Lords thought fit, for defence of the Realme. The money was thereupon deliuered to the Earle of Arundell to furniſh himſelfe for that purpoſe to the Sea. But to rid the Duke of Ireland out of the realme, the Lords were willing he ſhould haue thoſe thirtie thouſand markes, for which the heires of Charles of Blois, (who heretofore challenged Britaine) were tranſacted to the French, vpon condition that the ſayd Duke ſhould paſſe into Ireland before the next Eaſter.

*Tho. Walſing. in Rich. 2.

(67) The Parliament was no ſooner diſſolued, but the King recals the Earle of Suffolk to the Court, keeps both him, the Duke of Ireland and Alexander Neuile Archbiſhop of Yorke about his perſon, in greater fauour then before. Inſomuch that at Chriſtmas he made De-la-Pole to ſit at his owne Table not in the vſuall garment of a Peere, but Princely robed. Surely therein not well; for ſome of thoſe great Lords, (though not by ſo ſweet meanes as were fit) did deſire to waken him out of Courtly drowſineſſe, and (as men that knew not what peace meant) to put him into actions worthy of his name and greatnes. Theſe other perſons were not ſo friended, or qualified, that they could ſupport a King againſt an vniuerſal miſlike. But the King vpon a ſtomacke doth it; ſo that (ſaith Walſingham) here firſt grew the Kings hatred againſt the Peeres, that from thence forth he neuer, as it is ſaid, regarded them but fainedly. So much more dangerous ſometime is the remedy then a very greeuous maladie.

*Ypod. Neuſt.

(68) King Richard (whoſe age and place ſtood in need of wiſer inſtructions). not thus contented to haue whetted the diſpleaſures of the greater Peeres, as if he had ſaid to himſelfe, Rumpatur * quiſquis rumpitur inuidiâ; is further drawne, as was ſaid, to plot the death of his vncle, Thomas of Woodſtocke Duke of Gloſter, and other enemies of De-la-pole; who together being inuited to a feaſt (by the bloody deuiſe of Sir Nicholas Brambre late Lord Maior of London) ſhould together haue periſhed. But the preſent Lord Maior Nicholas Exton (whom the conſpirators would haue had their Partaker, if it may be beleeued) honeſtly refuſed to aſſent. The Lords hereupon hauing admonition, refrained to come.

(69) The perſons which were in the publike enuie for their ouer-ſwaying grace with the King, were (as you haue heard) Robert de Vere Duke of Ireland, Michael de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, the ſaid Archbiſhop, Sir Simon Burley Knight, and Sir Richard Stury: Theſe men hearing that Richard Earle of Arundel and Thomas Earle of Nottingham, Marſhall of England, * had encountred with a great Fleete of Frenchmen, Flemmings, Normans, and Spaniards, and taken aboue one hundreth ſaile of ſhips, and in them nineteene thouſand tunnes of wine, deprawed the victorie, ſaying, that the vanquiſhed were but Merchants, whoſe loues had beene more profitable to our Countrey, then ſo to ſtirre them to inexorable hatred. But theſe (ſaith * one) who thus iudged, were rather the *Knights of Venus then Bellona, fitter for a Canapie then a Campe, for language then a lance, as they who were awake to diſcourſe of martiall actions, but drowſie when they ſhould come to doe them. Such therefore conuerſing with the King (not * without ſuſpition of fowle familiaritie) neuer tooke care to put into his mind any matter which beſeemed ſo potent a Prince, wee ſay not (quoth our Authour) as concerning the vſe of Armes, but not euen concerning thoſe very recreations, which moſt of all become great ſpirits, as hunting, hawking, and the like.* But the Earles did more then meddle with Merchants (who yet were able to make dangerous reſiſtances) for they landed at Breſt in Britaine, and with great difficulty deliuered it againe from ſo bad neighbours as the two woodden Forts neerely built, where the other had ſtood, one of which they fired, and the other they mand with the Engliſh Garriſon of Breſt. Then ſtuffing it with all ſorts of prouiſions for a yeere, and furniſhing the wants of the Souldiers with all neceſſaries, they returned, hauing worthily wonne the loue and praiſes of the people. Which, as they were alſo due to them from the king, yet comming to his preſe nce, they (by theſe mens euill offices) had ſo cold entertainement, as they eſtſoones withdrew themſelues from Court to liue quietly vpon their owne at home. After them the braue young Henry Hotſpur, Lord Percy was ſent (ill prouided) to the Sea; neuertheleſſe he ventred, and returned (when his commiſsion was expired) with honour.

Tho. VValſin. in Richard 2. ad A.D. 1386.

(70) One thing done by the Duke of Ireland was ſurelie full of wickedneſſe and indignitie. For he hauing to wife, a young, faire, and noble Ladie, and the Kings neere kineſwoman, (for ſhee was Grandchild to king Edward by his * daughter Iſabel,) did put her away, and took one of Queene Annes women, a Bohemian * of baſe birth, called in her mother tongue Lancecrone. This intollerable villanie offered to the blood royall, King Richard did not encounter; neither had the power, ſome ſay, who deemed that by witchcrafts and ſorceries (practiſed vpon him by one of the Dukes followers) his iudgement was ſo ſeduced and captiuated, that he could not ſee what was honeſt or fit to doe. But where Princes are wilfull or ſlouthfull, and their fauorites flatterers or time-ſeruers, there needs no other enchantments to infatuate, yea and ruinate the greateſt Monarch.

(71) The Duke of Gloceſter tooke the matter more to heart, reſoluing to be reuenged for the infamy and confuſion, which was brought thereby vpon his noble kinſewoman. Meanewhile the king, as if he meant to conduct his deare friend, the Duke toward Ireland, went with him into Wales. There the King deuiſeth with him, the Earle of Suffolke, Sir Robert Treſilian and others; (who were equally affrayd of the Lords) how to deſtroy the Duke of Gloceſter, the Earles of Arundel, Warwicke, Derby, Nottingham, and ſuch others, as from whom they thought fitte to bee cleare. Much time being trifled thus away in Wales, they come together (as if the Dukes appointed voyage, or rather baniſhment into Ireland; were quite forgotten) to the Caſtle of Nottingham, there more freely to deliberate. A fearefull eſtate of a Monarchie. Hee among a few, generally ill beloued, and ill aduiſed, and ill prouided; for their whole ſtrength was the king, and theſe emulations made that force feeble both to him and them: the Lords, potent, martiall, rich, and popular; he at Notingham, they not neere him: but abroad farre-off, the Duke of Lancaſter with the flower of the Engliſh forces, and mighty neighbours watching for the ruine of all. The courſe agreed vpon by the King and that ill-choſen Senate, was firſt to haue the opinion of all the Chiefe Lawyers concerning certaine Articles of Treaſon, within whoſe nets and ſprindges they preſumed the reforming Lords were; and if the Lawyers (who ſeldome faile Princes in ſuch turnes,) did conclude, that thoſe Articles contained treaſonable matter, then vnder a ſhew of iuſtice they ſhould bee proceeded againſt accordinglie. Theſe Lawyers (who were the very men, which in the laſt ſeditious Parliament, gaue aduiſe to the Lords to doe as they did) now meeting, were demanded, whether by the law law of the land, the King might not disanull the Decrees of the last Parliament: they iointly *answered: he might, because hee was aboue the lawes: confessing, that themselues had in that Parliament decreed many things, and giuen their iudgement, that all was according to law, which now they acknowledged to be altogether vnlawfull. The King thus enformed, appointeth a great Councell to be holden at Nottingham, and sent for certaine Londoners, some of them such as were beholding to the King for mercie in cases of attaindour, to be there empanelled for Quests of Inquirie. The Sheriffes of Shires (being questioned) denied, that they could raise any competent forces against the Lords, their whole Counties were so addicted in their fauour: & being further willed to suffer no Knights to be chosen for the Shires, but such as the King & his Councell should name, they answered, that the election belonged to the Commons who fauoured the Lords in all.

(72) Vpon the 25. of August there met before the King at Nottingham these Lawyers, Robert Trisilian his chiefe Iustitiar, Robert Belknap chiefe Iustitiar of the common Pleas, Iohn Holt, Roger Stilethorpe, & William Burgh Iustitiars in the same Court, and Iohn Lokton the Kings Serieant at Law: all which being vpon their allegiance charged to deliuer their opinions, whether such * Articles as were there in the Kings behalfe propounded (which Articles comprehended all the points of aduantage taken against the proceedings of the last Parliament, and the displacing of the Lord Chancellor, Michael de Pole) contained matter of treason, they all of them answered affirmatiuely, and subscribed; which afterward cost them deare. Iudge Belknap foresaw the danger, and therefore was very vnwilling to put his seale to the answeres; saying; there wanted but a hurdle, a horse, and a halter, to carrie him where hee might suffer the death hee deserued; for if I had not done this* (quoth he) I should haue died for it, and because I haue done it, I deserue death for betraying the Lordes. The King in the meane space puruaies himselfe of people to fight, if need required.

(73) The Duke of Gloucester (sadded with these newes, sent the Bishoppe of London to bring his purgation vpon oath to the King, who inclining to credite the same, was in an euill howre diuerted by De la Pole. The Duke makes his and their common danger known to the Earles of Arundel, Warwicke, & Derby, eldest sonne to the Duke of Lancaster. They seuerally gather forces, that vnited they might present their griefes to the King, who to keep them from ioyning, sends the Earle of Northumberland to arrest the Earle of Arundel at Reygate in Surrey, where hee abode. But by reason of Arundels power, it was too dangerous a worke. Northumberland returnes, and Arundel (admonished by the Duke of Gloucester of his farther perill) escapeth in post to Haringey, where the Duke and Earle of Warwicke had store of people.

(74) As yet no bloud was drawne. Peaceable men procured that the Lords should repaire safe to Westminster, and there be heard. Thither approaching they are aduertised by the Bishop of Elie and others (who had sworne on the kings behalfe for good dealing to be vsed during the Interim) that, at the Mewes by Charing Crosse, a thousand armed men (which without the Kings priuity Sir Thomas Triuet and Sir Nicholas Brembre Knights were reported to haue laid for their destruction) attended in ambush. The King sweares his innocency, but the Lords come strong and trust no longer. The King royally adorned keepes state in Westminster Hall with manie his Prelates and Peeres about him; the Lords present themselues vpon their knees, and being required by the Bishop of Elye the Lord Chancellour (for the Lord De la Pole neuer had that place againe) why they were in warlike manner assembled at Haringey Parke, contrary to the lawes, their ioint answere was, That they were assembled for the good of the King and kingdome, and to weed from about him such Traitors as hee continually held with him. The traitors they named to bee, Robert de Vere, Duke of Ireland, Alexander Neuile Archbishoppe of Yorke, Michael at the Pole Earle of Suffolke, Sir Robert Tresilian that false Iustitiar (quoth they) and Sir Nicholas Brambre that false Knight of London. To proue them such, they threw downe their gloues, as gages of challenge for a triall to bee had by the sword. The King hereunto replied, as knowing that they were all hidden out of the way: This shall not bee done so, but at the next Parliament (which shall be the morrow after Candlemas) all parties shall receiue according as they deserue. And now (saith hee) to yee my Lords; how or by what authority durst you presume to leuie force against mee in this land? did you thinke to haue terrified mee by such your presumption? haue not I men of Armes, who (if it pleased me) could enuiron, and kill you like Cattle? Certainely in this respect I esteeme of you all no more, then as of the basest scullions in my Kitchens. Hauing vsed these, and many the like high words, hee tooke vp his vncle the Duke from the ground, where all this while hee kneeled, and bad all the other rise. The rest of the conference was calme, and the whole deferred till the next Parliament, then shortly to be holden at Westminster. In the meane time (that the world might see how little able the King was to equall his words with deedes) a Proclamation is set forth, in which the King cleareth the Lords (before any trial) of treason obiected, and names those persons for vniust accusers, whom the Lords had before named.

The kings reply.

(75) The factious Lords neuertheless thought not good to seuer themselues, but to keepe together for feare of the worst, which fell out to their aduantage; for the Duke of Ireland (with the Kings priuitie) had gathered a power in Wales and Cheshire, which they intercepting neere to Burford and Bablake, slew Sir William Molineux leader of the Cheshire men, and some others, and made the Duke to flie in great feare. Among the spoiles of the Dukes carriages there were found (as the Diuell would haue it) certaine letters of the King to the said Duke of Ireland, by which their counsels were plainely discouered. The Lords hereupon march with speede vp to London, hauing an Armie of about forty thousand men. The King shuts himselfe vp in the Tower, but is glad before long to admit them to his presence. There they (vnreuerently inough) obiect mutability to him and his vnderhand workings; they obiected also, that hee had secretly practised to flie with the Duke of Ireland into France, and to deliuer vp to the French Kings possession Callis, & such pieces as the Crowne of England held in those parts. to proue which dishonourable act, they (as some write) produced the French packets intercepted. This wrung teares (perhaps of disdaine) from the King, and hee yeelded to come to Westminster vpon the next day, there to heare and determine farther. The King in signe of amitie stayed his Cosen the Earle of Derbie (the same who afterward dethroned him) to supper. O where was the courage of a King? The Lords in their owne quarrell could draw vp fortie thousand men; but in the generall danger of the Realme, when the Commons were vp, and the French hung ouer their heads, with no lesse hatred then preparations, no such numbers appeared. Was it for their honour or praise, that their most rightful King should by their violence be driuen to consult vpon flight out of his proper Kingdome? The Citie of London was also in no little perill at this present by their accesse, which drawne by iust feare was contented to open the gates and harbour the Lords and their partakers. These Lords, who so often are called here the Lords, are named in our * Statute bookes to be but these fiue; The Duke of Gloucester, the Earles of Derbie, Arundel, Warwicke, and Marshal.

The Lords charge the king with sundry matters.

*Stat. Ann. 11. c. 1.

(76) The next day, hee would haue deferred his repaire to Weſtminſter. This being ſignified to the Kings Lords (for ſo they might bee called, as being more Maſters then the King) they labour not, by humble words, and dutious reaſons to perſwade the vſe or neceſſity of his preſence in that place, but contrarie to their allegiance, and all good order ſend him word, That if hee came not quickly according to appointment, they would chooſe them another King, who both would, and ſhould obey the counſell of the Peeres. They had him indeed amongſt them, whom (belike) they euen then meant to haue ſurrogated, that is to ſay, the before ſaid Earle of Derby, heire to the D. of Lancaſter. The Lords certainely had ſo behaued themſelues towards the King, that they well ſaw they muſt bee maſters of his perſon and power, or themſelues in the end periſh.

The rough and harſh behauiour of the Lords.

(77) The King (after a prepoſterous and inuerted manner) attending his Subiects pleaſures at Weſtminſter, heauily and vnwillingly is drawne to diſclaime Alexander Neuil Archbiſhoppe of Yorke, the Biſhops of Dureſme and Chicheſter, the Lords Souch and Beaumount with ſundry others. Neither was the Male-ſexe onely ſuſpected to theſe curious pruners; the Lady Poinings, and other Ladies were alſo remoued, and put vnder baile to anſwere ſuch things as ſhould bee obiected. Sir Simon Burley, Sir William Elmham, Sir Iohn Beauchampe of Holt, Sir Iohn Salisbury, Sir Thomas Triuet, Sir Iames Berneys, Sir Nicholas Dagworth, and Sir Nicholas Brambre knights with certaine Clerks were apprehended, and kept in ſtraite priſon, to anſwere ſuch accuſations (what if meere calumniations?) as in the next Parliament at Weſtminſter ſhould be obiected.

Perſons remoued from about the King.

(78) The Parliament began at Candlemas, where the King was vnwillingly preſent: The firſt day of the Seſſion, all the Iudges Fulthrop, Belknap, Care, Hott, Burgh, and Lockton were arreſted as they ſate in Iudgement on the Bench, and moſt of them ſent to the Tower. The cauſe alleadged was, that hauing firſt ouerruled them with their counſels and directions, which they aſſured them to bee according to law, they afterward at Nottingham gaue contrarie iudgement to that which themſelues had fore-declared. Tryſilian the chiefe Iuſtice preuented them by flight, but being apprehended, and brought to the Parliament in the forenoone, had ſentence to be drawne to Tyborne in the afternoone, and there to haue his throat cut; which was done accordingly. Sir Nicholas Brambres turne was next. This Brambre (ſaith Walſingham) was ſaid to haue imagined to be made Duke of new Troy (the old ſuppoſed name of London) by murthering thouſands of ſuch Citizens, (whoſe names hee had billed for that purpoſe,) as were ſuſpected of likelihood to reſiſt him. Then Sir Iohn Salisbury, and Sir Iames Bernes two young Knights, Sir Iohn Beauchamp of Holt, Steward of the Houſehold to the King, and Iohn Blake Eſquier, were likewiſe ſacrificed to reuenge. Sir Simon Burley onely had the worſhippe to haue but his head ſtrucken off. Loe the noble reſpect which the gentle Lords had to iuſtice and amendment. This was no age (wee ſee) for a weake or ſlothfull Prince to ſit in quiet; for now the people, and then the Peeres, foile and trample the regall authority vnder foote: the Duke of Ireland, the Archbiſhoppe of Yorke, the Earle of Suffolke and others, had their eſtates confiſcated to the kings vſe by Act of Parliament, as in the * booke of Statutes may bee ſeene, together with a great part of the whole proceedings.

* An. 10. & 11. Rich. 2.

(79) Theſe troubles boiling and burning within, in the Bowels of the State, the Scots abroad had opportunity to inuade the North of England, vnder the conduct of Sir William Dowglaſſe, a noble young knight, a parallel and riuall in the honour of Armes to Henry Hotſpur, Lord Percy, whom Hotſpur fighting hand to hand ſlew in battell: but the Earle of Dunbar comming with an exceſsiue number of Scots, tooke Hotſpur and his brother priſoners, killing many Engliſh, not without ſuch loſſe to themſelues, that they forthwith returned.

(80) But theſe vnneighbourly hoſtilities ſoone after found ſome ſurceaſe, there being a meeting at Calis betweene the Engliſh and French, about eſtabliſhing a peace: and albeit, becauſe the French would haue the Scot and Spaniard included therein, the concluſion was deferred, yet ſhortly after it was reſolued vpon for three yeeres, the Scots being comprehended therein.

(81) King Richard (being now of age) declares himſelfe free to gouerne of himſelfe, without either controlement, or help of any other, then ſuch as hee ſelected to that place, and in token that he was at liberty, he takes the Great Seale of England from Thomas Arundel Archbiſhop of Yorke, (Alexander Neuill being attainted and fled) and departs out of the Councell Chamber. After a while hee returnes, and giues it backe to William Wickham (the * renowned Biſhoppe of Wincheſter) who was vnwilling to haue accepted the ſame. Hee alſo puts out ſundrie Officers, ſubſtituting ſuch others as beſt liked him. From the Councell Table hee remoued his vncle Thomas of Woodſtocke Duke of Gloceſter, the Earle of Warwicke, and others; which (as it might) encouraged the Dukes enemies about the King, to doe euill offices betweene them. Yet the king did not preſently credite what was whiſpered into his eare, concerning a purpoſe ſuggeſted to be in the Duke, to raiſe forces againe; but acquainting him withall, was ſatisfied. Neuertheleſſe, he would not ſuffer the Duke to purſue an orderly or any reuenge vpon the Authors, whom indeed it had beene wiſdome to haue puniſhed in an exemplary manner.

(82) Michael de la Pole late Earle of Suffolke (whom the popular Lords had made moſt odious to the Engliſh) died at Paris in exile, bequeathing ſuch goods as hee had there to Robert Duke of Ireland, who alſo breathed out his griefes in baniſhment, and died at laſt in Brabant.

(83) The Duke of Lancaſter the meane while, returnes into Gaſcoigne out of Spaine, and not long after into England. The ſucceſſe of that voyage (being made to claime the Crowne of Caſtile and Leon) was briefly this. Iohn King of Caſtile * alledged that Conſtance the Dukes wife, was not right heire, but he. For, albeit the Lady Conſtance was eldeſt daughter and heire to Peter ſonne of Alfonſe, whoſe father Fernand the fourth was ſonne of Sanchez the fourth, and he ſonne of Alfonſe the tenth, all Kings of Spaine ſucceſſiuely; yet, that neither Conſtance, Peter, Alfonſe, Ferdinand, nor Sanchez had the right. His reaſon was; for that Alfonſe the tenth, (choſen Emperour of Almaine) had, before he begat the ſaid Sanchez, an elder ſonne called Ferdinand de la Cerda, who married Blanch the daughter of Saint Lewis King of France, from whom deſcended Alfonſe de la Cerda (who entituled himſelfe King, but died without iſſue) and Fernand, who had a daughter married to Iohn, ſonne of the Infant of Portugall Emmanuel, mother to the Lady Ioane, wife of King Henry the ſecond, father of Iohn King of Caſtile defendant.

(84) This Apologie made by the Caſtilian, would not ſerue; for kingdomes are not vſed to be pleaded for by Bil and Anſwere; The Engliſh and Portugals ioine their forces. To the Duke (by reaſon of his wiues preſence,) manie did voluntarily ſubmit themſelues; all did not; for Don * Alnarez de Perez on the behalfe of his Lord, the King of Spaine, offred to ſtop the Duke in his march to Burgos, and was ouerthrowne. Other aduentures that warre afforded, but ſickneſſe hapning in the Engliſh Armie, conſumed * many of the principall, and among them the Lord Fitzwalter, with other Lords, Knights, Eſquires, and men of armes, almoſt three hundreth. Moreouer the penurie was ſuch, that ſundrie reuolted to the enemy to get reliefe, which being * ſeene of the King of Portugal, he told the Duke he would ſet vpon them as Enemies, but hee ſaid no, for that he knew they did it onely for lacke of foode. Thus hauing ſaid, he held downe his head, as he ſate on horſebacke, and wept moſt bitterly, ſecretly powring forth his praiers to almighty God, and moſt humbly beſeeching mercy. From which time forward his affaires in Spaine ſucceeded happily.

(85) The warres had beene * ſharpe and tedious, but the end acceptable. For Don Iuan king of Caſtile, a Prince of no euill conſcience, ſeeing the right which the Duke of Lancaſter vrged, and foreſeeing what calamities might happen hereafter, if (as was feared the French ſhould match with him, ſought and obtained a firme peace. The Principall conditions were: That the Lord Henry, his ſonne and heire, ſhould marry the Lady Katherine, daughter and heire to the Duke and Conſtance his wife; That the Lord Henry (during his fathers life) ſhould be called Prince of Aſturia, and Katherine his wife Princeſſe: That * for default of iſſue betweene the young Princely couple, the Crowne ſhould come to the Lord Edward Duke of Yorke, who had married the other daughter of King Peter. That the king of Spaine ſhould lade eight Cars with wedges of gold for the Duke, or (as ſome write) pay two hundreth thouſand nobles, toward the defrayment of the Dukes huge charges; That finallie, he ſhould giue ſufficient Caution for an Annuitie of ten thouſand pounds, during the liues of the ſaid Duke and Dutcheſſe, to be duly paid to their vſes at the City of Bayon in Gaſcoigne.

(86) The King, at ſuch time as the Duke of Lancaſter returned, was at Reading, whither he had commanded the Peeres to repaire. To that meeting the Duke makes haſt, aſwell to preſent his dutie to his Soueraigue, as to be an authour of loue and peace betweene the king and Lords, againſt ſome of whom the King was not thought to be verie fauourably diſpoſed. Which he gratiouſly effected, as ſeeming to addict his mind to offices of piety and publike benefit. Certainely the wiſdome and moderation of the Duke of Yorke his brother, were ſuch, in all the late, and other tumults, that he is not ſo much as once named among the factious; which Chriſtian ſpirit if it had raigned in all the reſt, England had neuer beene polluted with ſuch infinite bloodſhed of her nobleſt Children; neither had the goodlie fabricke of ſtate, laden with innumerable trophees, falne vnder that moſt hideous Chaos, which ſucceeding ages ſaw and ſighed for.

(87) The King vpon the Duke of Lancaſters returne, whether hee felt the keeping of Aquitaine an vnprofitable burthen, or the abſence of his vncle the Duke, a thing worthie to be purchaſed at anie rate, certaine it is, that in a Parliament held at London, he veſted in him that famous Dutchy, by deliuering the Cap of State, and Ducal Rod; whither hee ſhortly went to take poſſeſsion. His ſonne, Henrie of Bullingbroke Earle of Derbie, loath to ſpend his houres in ſloath, but deſirous to purſue renowne by martiall Acts in forreine parts, ſailed ouer to the warres in Pruſsia, where in ſundry enterprizes againſt the Lithuanians, he wan great honor, which, by compariſon of King Richards Calmnes, prepared a way for him in the Engliſhes affections, to points more eminent.

(88) The Pope now vnderſtood, that the Engliſh State began againe to be ſenſible of Romiſh encroachments; and as in a * former Parliament they had enacted againſt all Collations of Biſhoprickes and dignities by the Pope, with baniſhment to all which did accept ſuch Collations, and death to al that brought in any excommunications from the Pope, to hinder the execution of that Act; ſo in this laſt Parliament, *another ſeuere Act was made, againſt ſuch as went to the Pope to procure any ſuch proviſions. A Proclamation alſo was made at London, * that all beneficed men then being in the Court of Rome, ſhould returne by a day prefixed, or looſe all their liuings. The Pope himſelfe (ſaith Walſingham) troubled with * ſo great a thunderclap, ſent with all ſpeed into England, to perſwade the King, that ſuch Statutes as had beene thus made in their preiudice, who followed the Court of Rome, and ſuch other clauſes as tended to the dammage of that See, ſhould be made void; whereto the Kings anſwere was, that the Popes Nuntio muſt expect till the next Parliament. At which Parliament the King, as alſo the Duke of Lancaſter, ſeemed to haue ſome reſpect to the Pope, (whoſe meſſenger was their Preſent) but the* Knights of the houſe would not in any wiſe giue their conſents, that ſuch Rome-gadders ſhould without due puniſhment purſue their wonted courſe, longer then till the next Parliament. To furniſh the Duke of Lancaſter into France, to treat of a peace, and vpon condition that the King ſhould that yere inuade Scotland, large contributions were there made, both by Clergy and Laity. Hereupon the Lord* Henry Percy, Hotſpur (who had redeemed himſelf) was called from his charge at Callis, and made Warden of the Marches againſt Scotland; Thomas Mowbray Earle of Nottingham ſucceeding in the Captaineſhip of Calys. The Dukes chargefull emploiment in France bare no other flower, then a yeeres ſhort truce.

(89) The Kings wants ſtill encreaſing with his imploiments, the Londoners (carried away with euill counſell) did a thing moſt vnworthy of their Citie and themſelues, and it might to them haue proued as hurtfull, as it was vnworthy, at ſuch time as the King * deſired the loane but of one thouſand pounds: which was not onely churliſhly denied, but a certaine Lumbard, honeſtly offering to lend the ſame, was badly vſed, beaten, and almoſt ſlain. Their liberties for that and other *diſorders are ſeiſed, and their proper Magiſtracy diſſolued, (Guardians being giuen them, firſt Sir Edward Dallinging, then Sir Baldwin Radington) and their Maior, and ſome chiefe Citizens layed in priſons farre off from London. The puniſhment brought the fowleneſſe of their errors to their ſight; but by the Duke of * Gloceſters interceſſions (who did not vnwillingly lay hold vpon ſuch occaſions of popularity) the king and Queene are wonne to enter the City, which gaue them triumphall entertainement. The ſea is not ſodainely calmed after a tempeſt, neither a Princes anger. By degrees yet, and not without deare repentance, they were at laſt reſtored to their former condition in all points.

(90) The king declaring his purpoſe to croſſe into Ireland, had an aide of money conditionally granted: foure yeeres truce by the trauaile of the two Dukes of Lancaſter and Gloceſter being concluded in France. This yeere was farther notable for many great Funerals. Conſtance Dutcheſſe of Aquitaine and Lancaſter, a Lady of great *Innocency and deuotion: the Counteſſe of Derby her daughter in law, Iſabel the Dutcheſſe of Yorke, and a Lady noted for too great a fineneſſe and delicacy, yet at her death ſhewing much repentance and ſorrow for her loue to thoſe peſtilent vanities, left this preſent life. But all the griefe for their deaths did in no ſort equall that of the kings, for the loſſe of his owne Queene Anne, which about the ſame time hapned at Sheene in Surrey, whom he loued euen to a kind of madneſſe: but Ladies onely died not; for Sir Iohn Hawkwood, whoſe cheualrie had made him renowned ouer the Chriſtian world, did in this yeere depart an aged man out of this world in Florence, where his aſhes remaine honoured at this preſent with a ſtately Tombe, and the ſtatue of a Man at Armes, erected by the gratitude of that State and City, which chiefly by his conduct, courage and valour (to this day admired amongſt them) was preſerued. (91) The King doth the like for Ireland; where that ſort of the Iriſh which are called the wild, had greatly inueſted the Engliſh Pale, and other good Subiects there, to the great dammage of the Crown of England. In the times of Edward the third, Ireland yeelded to the kings coffers* thirty thouſand pounds yeerly, but now things were ſo grown out of order, that it coſt the King thirty thouſand Marks by yeere To reduce the rebellious, himſelfe conducts thither an Armie, attended vpon by the Duke of Gloceſter, the Earles of March, Nottingham and Rutland, all the Iriſh being commanded to auoid out of England. The terror of the preparatiõs, & ſhining preſence of a king (which aboue al worldly things is pleasãt to the Iriſh) had ſuch effects that ſundry great men were compelled to ſubmit themſelues. To ſupply the Kings wants, growne in the Iriſh expedition, Edmund D. of Yorke, the Kings vncle, and Cuſtos or Warden of England, called a Parliament at London (whither the Duke of Gloceſter repaired to declare the Kings wants) and hath contributions granted. Neuertheleſſe, ſo ſtrong a party againſt the Clergy, & Fryarly abuſes of thoſe times diſcouered it ſelfe therein, that the Archbiſhop of Yorke, the Biſhop of London, and others, preſt ouer Sea to the King at Dublin, beſeeching him to returne, the ſooner to repreſſe the Lollards (ſo called they the embracers of Wicliffes doctrine) and their fauourers, who ſought not onely (as they vntruly pretended) to wring away all the poſſeſsions of the Church, but that which was worſe, to abrogate and deſtroy al Eccleſiaſticall conſtitutions, whereas they aimed onely at the redreſſe of exorbitancy in the Papal Clergy. The King hereupon returnes: by whoſe arriuall and authority, thoſe conſultations of the Laity were laid downe. Sir Richard Storie a ſeruant of his had been forward againſt the Prelates; of him therefore hee takes an oath vpon the holy Goſpell, that he ſhould not hold ſuch opinions any longer. The Knight takes that oath, and we (ſaith the King) doe ſweare, that if thou doeſt breake it, thou ſhalt die a moſt ſhamefull death. The reſt hearing the Lion roare ſo terribly, drew in their hornes, and would be ſeen no more.

(92) The King cauſed the body of the late Duke of Ireland to bee brought into England. His exceeding ioue to him was ſuch, that he commanded the Cypreſſe cheſt wherein his body lay embalmed, to bee opened, that hee might ſee, view, handle, and openly expreſſe his affection. The dead remaines of that noble young Gentleman, (by his birthright Earle of Oxford, and by race a Vere) were buried at the Priorie of Colne in Eſſex, there being preſent the King himſelfe, the Counteſſe Dowager of Oxford, the Dukes mother, the Archbiſhoppe of Canterburie with many Biſhops, Abbots, and religious perſons, but few of the Lords, for they had not as yet digeſted the hate they bare him.

(93) The Duke of Lancaſter was this while in Aquitaine, where he had ſought to winne the people with incredible largeſſe, to accept of his Soueraignty, according to the tenor of King Richards grant. Little did he then thinke, that within leſſe then ſixeſcore and three yeeres after, an * Ambaſſador of King Henry the 8. ſhould write thus of Burdeaux it ſelfe, the Capitall City of Gaſcoign and Guien: Anglorum nulla ferè veſtigia remanent, &c. There are (ſaith that learned Gentleman) ſcarſe any foot-prints of the Engliſhmen remaining. In the Churches, and other places newly refreſhed and reedified, ſuch Armories of the Engliſh as ſtood, were vtterly blotted and defaced: yet in the Church of the Fryers Preachers, the Armories of the Duke of Lancaſter ſtand entire in a Glaſſe-window, and in the eldeſt wall of the City thoſe alſo of England, though conſumed in a manner with age: The Lawes, Statutes and Ordinations which were made by the Engliſh, are notwithſtanding obſerued at this day.

But the Dukes eye could not looke ſo farre into the times to come. Neuertheleſſe wee that ſee theſe things muſt confeſſe, that the beſt kingdome vnder heauen is not ſo worth the getting, as that with the wilfull contempt of God and conſcience any man ſhould ſeeke to purchaſe it.

(94) But while the Duke was thus buſied in Courting the Gaſcoignes good will, * who had ſent into England, to ſhew cauſes why they ſhould not atturne to the Duke, (and yet were wrought at laſt to the point of yeelding,) hè receiues a commandement from King Richard to returne, that he might goe with him into France; which he obayed. The King keeping his at Langley in Hartfordſhire, the Duke was there entertained with more honour (as it was thought) then loue. Being licenced to depart for a time, he repaired to Lincolne, where he a widdower, married his old loue the Lady Katherine Swinford, now a widdow. Men did wonder at it, but hee therein obeyed the remorſe of a Chriſtian conſcience, without reſpect to his owne vnequall greatnes; for hauing had ſundry Children by her in his former wiues time, he made her and them now the only ſufficient amends, which the law of God or man enioineth. And further in a Parliament held the yeere following, the Duke procured an Act to paſſe, by which, ſuch children as he formerly had by his new Dutcheſſe, were legitimated; and ſurnamed them Beufot, being * foure of them, John, Thomas, Henrie, Ioane; the ſecond of which was by the Kings bounty created Earle of Sommerſet.

(95) The King, being ſpecially accompanied with thoſe his vncles of Lancaſter and Gloceſter, at a moſt ſumptuous and chargefull enteruiew between him and Charles King of France, in the parts of Calis and Gynes, eſpouſed the Lady Iſabell, daughter of the ſaid Charles. At the deliuery of her, King Richard, in the preſence of all the greateſt Princes, Peeres, and Ladies of either nation, gaue the King his father in law great thanks for a gift ſo noble and acceptable, adding, he tooke her vpon the conditions made betweene the two nations, to the intent that liuing in peace and reſt, they might attaine to the eſtabliſhment of a perpetuall amitie, for auoyding the effuſion of Chriſtian blood, which would in likelyhood haue followed, had not at that time affinitie beene contracted betweene them. The young Lady was not aboue ſeuen or eight yeeres old, but the truce was taken for thirty yeeres. Her perſon therefore was committed to the Dutcheſſes of Lancaſter and Gloceſter, and other great Ladies, who conducted her to Callis. From whence, after a ſhort ſtay, the King, his young Queene (with whom he had great riches) and all the glorious companie came ouer into England. Their perſons arriued ſafe, but the Kings gorgeous Pauilions, and a great part of his ſtuffe was caſt away by tempeſt in the tranſportation. This iourney (beſides his loſſes at Sea) coſt the King aboue forty thouſand markes.

(96) The outward felicitie of England ſeemed at this time verie great, and the rather ſeemed ſo, becauſe it was likelie to continue. In the Duke of Gloceſters perſõ that bright proſperity was firſt ouerſhadowed. He, Vir ferociſſimus & præcipitis ingenij (as * Polydor cenſures him,) a moſt fierce man, and of an headlong wit, thinking thoſe times, wherein he had maſtred the King, were nothing changed, though the King was aboue thirty yeres old, forbare not, roughly, not ſo much to admoniſh, as to checke and ſchoole his Souereigne. The peace with France diſpleaſed him, that therefore he calumniates. The King had reſtored Breſt in Britaine to the Duke, vpon reemburſements of the money lent; he tels the King that hee ſhould firſt conquer a Towne, before he parted with any; yet the King anſweres, that he could not in conſcience detaine the ſame, now that the Duke had repaid his loane. There were other things which could not ſo well be anſwered. For a vaine rumor *that he ſhould be choſen Emperour, put him belike into ſuch a vaine of ſpending, as carried a proportion with that maieſty; his coffers in a ſhort time ſounding like empty Caske, there was no great monied man in whoſe debt he was not, nor any in a manner ſo meane to whome hee was not burthenous.

(97) The King had heretofore complained of this vncle to the Earle of Saint Paul a Frenchman, (then in England,) whoſe iudgement was, that ſuch inſolency was to be reuenged; but complaining to his other vncles of Lancaſter and Yorke, they wiſely aduiſed the King, not to regard his words but his heart, which he and they knew ſincere vnto him. Neuertheleſſe, partly to weaken the intollerable humor of their brother, who like a conſtant Admirer of his owne waies, thought nothing well done, but what himſelfe either did or directed, and partlie to auoid the ſcandall of the Kings bad courſes, they withdraw their preſences from the Court. The King notwithſtanding is the ſame man ſtill, as the Duke of Gloceſter thinks; wherefore, he breakes his minde to ſuch as he durſt truſt. Arundell in Suſſex is appointed the Conſultation-place, where the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Earles of Arundell, Warwicke, Marſhall and others, take an Oath of Secrecy, and conclude to raiſe a power to remoue* the Dukes of Lancaſter and Yorke, and ſuch other as they thought beſt, from about the King, ſo to enact a reformation.

(98) They are charged by * ſome to haue plotted the impriſonment of the King and Dukes, and the death of all other Councellours: which, howſoeuer it was perhaps no part of their intention, might yet haue beene a neceſſarie conſequent. The bluſtring Duke had breathed out dangerous words; as,* that he would put the King (of whoſe courage he ſpake contemptiblie) into ſome priſon there to ſpend his daies in eaſe and peace, as himſelfe thought beſt. His brethren hearing hereof, brotherlie admoniſh him to beware; but, as it ſeemes, they found him deafe on that ſide. This though ſome of the late Authors write, yet there are both old and new, who mention no ſuch matter, but the contrary, not obſcurely teaching vs, that the Dukes ruine was but an effect of old malignities.

(99) Thomas Mowbray Earle of Nottingham and Marſhall, a party in the reported plot, though ſonne in law to the Earle of Arundel, reueileth the ſame to the King. The Duke of Gloceſter is hereuppon ſurprized by Mowbray * (lying in wait in the woods where hee was to paſſe) ſent to Calis (where Nottingham was Captaine) and there impriſoned; the Earles of Arundel and Warwicke, the Lord Iohn Cobham, and Sir Iohn Cheiney, are arreſted. Proclamation is then made that they were not committed for anie old matters, but for hainous things newly contriued, as in the next Parliament ſhould be made manifeſt; though the euent (as * Walſingham truly ſaith) declared the contrarie. But the Duke of Gloceſter, and the two ſaid Earles are endited at Nottingham. The King to maintaine the accuſation of treaſon obiected, had (as ſome ſay) ſuborned Edward Earle of Arundel, Thomas Earle Marſhall, Thomas Holland Earle of Kent, Iohn Holland Earle of Huntington; Thomas Beaufort Earle of Somerſet, Iohn Montacute Earle of Salisbury, Thomas Lord Spencer and Sir william Scroope Lord Chamberlaine.

(100) In September begins the Parliament at London, where the king had a great guard of Cheſhire men to ſecure his perſon, and the Lords attended alſo not without ſufficient numbers. The Kings chiefe Agents were Sir Iohn Buſby, Sir William Bagod, and Sir Henry Greene knights. In the firſt act (after the liberties of the Church and people confirmed,) we find theſe* words. The commons of the Parliament haue ſhewed to our Soueraigne Lord the King, how in the Parliament holden at Weſtminſter, the firſt day of October, in the tenth yeere of his reigne, Thomas Duke of Gloceſter, and Richard Earle of Arundell, traitours to the King and his Realme and his people, by falſe imagination and compaſſing cauſed a Commiſſion to bee made, &c. and that the ſaid Duke of Gloceſter, and Earle of Arundel, did ſend a great man and Peere of the Realme in meſſage to our Lord the King; who of their part ſaid, that if he would not grant and aſſent to the ſaid Commiſſion, HEE SHOVLD BE IN GREAT PERIL OF HIS LIFE: and ſo, as well the ſaid Commiſſion, as the ſaid Statute touching the ſaid Commiſſion, were made by conſtraint, &c. Wherefore the Commons pray their Soueraigne Lord the King, that the ſaid Commiſſion &c: be vtterly anulled, as a thing done TRAITEROVSLY, &c.

(101) The ſanctuary of former lawes, and all particular Charters of pardon being now taken away from the Duke, Earle, and others, they lay open to manifeſt ruine. The* Duke of Lancaſter ſate in iudgement as High Steward vpon Richard Earle of Arundel, where, for no other but for the old attempts, (though the other accuſations ſeeme to haue been auerred by the eight Appellants) by which, as ye haue heard, ſo many were diſplaced and put to death, hee adiudged him to die that foule death of a common Traitor: but the King ſatisfied himſelfe with onely his head, which was at one ſtroake taken of at Tower-hill. That he was a traitour either in word or deede, he vtterly did deny, and died in that deniall. The conſtancy of this Earles carriage aſwell at his arraignement, paſſage, and execution, (as in which he did not diſcolour the honour of his blood with anie degenerous word, looke, or action) encreaſed the enuie of his death vpon the proſecutors. The Earle of Warwicke confeſſed with teares, (and as ſome ſay, drawne by faire hope of life) that in adhering to the Duke of Gloceſter in thoſe ridings and aſſemblies hee was guilty of treaſon. The ſame ſentence was therefore pronounced vpon him. The King neuertheleſſe did only baniſh him into the Ile of Man. But the Duke of Gloceſter (whom, as the peoples darling, it ſeemed not ſafe to bring to a publike triall) was ſecretlie ſmothered at Calis with pillowes and featherbeds.

(102) The great Parliament (for ſo it ſeemes to haue beene called, by reaſon of the extraordinarie numbers of Peeres, and their retinues, which came thereunto) was holpen by adiournment at Shrewſbury. In it, thoſe Iuſtitiars, who were partly put to death and partly baniſhed, but all attainted (at ſuch time as the Duke of Gloceſter and the reſt were in armes,) doe all of them ſtand thereby cleared from diſhonor, and ſuch* Articles as they ſubſcribed, (being, together with their anſweres, ſet downe in the Act) are publikely ratified, and the offendors againſt them pronounced Traitours. Amongſt theſe Articles, one, conteining theſe great Lawyers iudgements concerning the orderly proceedings in al Parliaments, is very obſeruable: That after the cauſe of ſuch aſſembly is by the Kings commandement there declared, ſuch Articles as by the King are limitted for the Lords and Commons to proceed in, are firſt to bee handled; but if any ſhould proceed vpon other Articles, and refuſe to proceed vpon thoſe limitted by the King, till the King had firſt anſwered their propoſals, contrary to the Kings command; ſuch doing herein contrary to the rule of the King, are to be puniſhed as Traitors.* But the King, to content all parts, and to kindle new lights in the place of ſuch as he had extinguiſhed, hauing firſt created himſelfe * Prince of Cheſter, made his coſen Henry Earle of Derby, Duke of Hereford; the Earle of Rutland Duke of Aumarl; the Earle of Nottingham Duke of Norfolke; the Earle of Kent Duke of Surrey; the Earle of Huntington, Duke of Exceſter; the Earle of Somerſet Marqueſſe Dorſet, the Lord Spencer Earle of Gloceſter; the Lord Neuile Earle of Weſtmorland; William Scrope Earle of wiltſhire; Thomas Percy Earle of Worceſter. The King alſo (ſaith Walſingham) added to his Scucheon Royall, the armories of Saint Edward King and confeſſor.

(103) The formoſt in this goodly ranke, being Henry Duke of Hereford, not long after accuſed Thomas Duke of Norfolke, of certaine words ſounding to the kings diſhonour, which hee ſhould priuately vtter to the ſaid Henry. Polydor (though very negligently hee makes Mowbray the Accuſer, and Hereford Defendant) may yet be heard in reporting the effect of the words, as That King Richard held the Peeres of the land in no account, but as much as lay in him ſought to deſtroy them, by baniſhing ſome, and putting others to death. That hee neuer troubled his mind with conſidering how his Dominions were diminiſhed through his Idleneſſe. Finally, that all things went to wracke, as well in peace as war. But the Duke of Norfolke, (who vnleſſe it had beene to feele how the Duke of Herefords heart was affected to the king, had little reaſon ſo to complaine) moſt conſtantly denying that euer he ſpake ſuch wordes; it ſhould haue come to a combat within liſts; but the king to auoid (as hee pretended) ſuch deadly fewds as might riſe in the families of two ſuch potent Peeres, but (indeed to bee rid of an enemie with the loſſe of a friend) baniſhed Norfolke for euer, and Hereford firſt for ten yeeres, then for ſixe. Walſingham ſaith that this cenſure was giuen againſt Norfolke, vpon that very day in which the yeere before, he (by the kings commandement) had taken order for putting to death the Duke of Gloceſter at Callis, whereof the ſaid Duke of Norfolke had the Captaineſhip.

Hee remembred not how broken an eſtate hee had in England, where the peoples hearts were ſtrongly alienated, not onely for the death of the late great Lords, and baniſhment of the Duke of Hereford, (whoſe calamitie encreaſed his popularity) or for the like paſſed exaſperations, but for that (to furniſh his Iriſh voyage) he had extorted money on al hands, taking vp carriages, victuals, and other neceſſaries, without any recompence; whereby the hatred of his gouernment grew vniuerſall.

(106) But the euill fortune which hung ouer his head, laid forth an alluring baite to haſte his deſtruction, by occaſion of the Duke of Lancaſters deceaſe, which hapned about Candlemas, and the abſence of his baniſhed ſonne and heire Lord Henry. The king (moſt vniuſtly) ſeizeth vpon the goods of that mighty Prince his vncle, & as if all things now were lawfull, which but liked him, he determines to baniſh the new rightfull Duke of Lancaſter Henrie, not for a few yeeres, but for euer; for which cauſe hee reuoked his Letters Patents granted to the ſaid Henry, by which his Atturnyes were authoriſed to ſue his Liuerie (and to compound for the reſpite of his homage at a reaſonable rate; whereby he made it ſeem plaine to the world, that hee had not baniſhed him to auoid diſſentions, but (as many ſaid) to fill vp the breaches which his riote had made in the roiall treaſures, with plentifull (though an vndue) Eſcheate, as that of his deceaſed vncles fortune.

(107) The one ſtedfaſt baſe and buttreſſe of all lawfull Empire, is Iuſtice; that ſupports the kinglie throne. This he ouerthrew, and how then could himſelfe hope to ſtand long? He lands at Waterford in Ireland with a Nauie of * two hundreth ſhips, hauing with him the ſonne of the late Duke of Gloceſter, and of the now Duke of Lancaſter, to ſecure himſelfe the rather. * His forces conſiſted much of Cheſhire men. But that king is deceiued, who repoſeth his ſafetie in violence. It was no great matter hee did there, that which fell out to bee done elſewhere, was great indeed. His warre in Ireland was more dammagefull, then fiſhing with an hooke of gold, for here the baite and hooke was not onely loſt, but the line, rod, and himſelfe, were drawne altogether into the depthes of irrecouerable ruine. Duke Henry ſees the aduantage which King Richards abſence gaue him, and vſeth it. In his Companie were Thomas Arundel the baniſhed Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury, and his Nephew the ſonne and heire of the late Earle of Arundel, and not aboue fifteen Lanciers. His ſtrength was (where the Kings ſhould haue beene) in the peoples hearts. Neuertheleſſe, the Duke did not ſodainely take land, but houered vpon the Seas, ſhewing himſelfe to the Country people in one place now and then in another, pretending nothing but the recouery of his rightfull Heritage.

(108) Edmund Duke of Yorke, whom King Richard had left behind him to gouerne England, hearing this, cals vnto him Edmund Stafford Biſhoppe of Cheſter, Lord Chancellor, the Earle of Wiltſhire, Lord Treaſurer, and the Knights of the Kings Councell, Buſhie, Bagot, Greene, and Ruſſell. Their concluſion was to leuie a force to impeach Duke Henries entrance. The aſſembly was appointed to bee at S. Albans, which came to worſe then nothing, for the proteſtation that they would not hurt the Duke, whom they knew to bee wronged was generall. This made the Treaſurer Sir Iohn Buſhie, and Sir Henrie Greene flie to the Caſtle of Briſtoll, Sir William Bagot to Cheſter, from whence he got ſhipping into Ireland. Meane while Duke Henry lands at a village heretofore called Rauenſhire, to whom repaired Henry Earle of Northumberland, his ſonne Henry Lord Percie, lands at Neuill Earle of Weſtmerland, and many others, who (ſaith Walſingham) greatly feared King Richards tyrannie. With an Armie of about threeſcore thouſand (multitudes offering their ſeruice) they come to Briſtoll, beſiege the Caſtell, take it, and in the ſame the foreſaid Treaſurer Buſhie and Greene, whoſe heades (at the cries of the Commons) were the next day after their ſurrender ſeuered from their bodies.

(109) King Richard was in the City of Dublin, when theſe moſt heauie newes arriued. His courage which at no time ſeemed great, was ſhortly none at all. Somewhat muſt bee done: hee leaues the ſons of Duke Henry, & of his late vncle of Gloceſter (which hee retained as pledges for his owne indemnity) in the Caſtell of Trim, and returnes himſelfe into England, entending to encounter the Duke before his force ſhould bee too much eſtabliſhed. The great names which accompanied him, were his late noble Creatures, the young Dukes of Aumarle, Exceſter, and Surrey, the Biſhops of London, Lincolne and Carleol, and many others. There had beene ſome more hope for vpholding his right, if hee had not made the worlde know, that tenne yeers ſpace was not able to burie in him the appetite of reuenge, which made many forget their owne loyalty to him, and the Crowne. Princes ſee in him the vſe of obliuion: but ſome conſcience of euill deſerts ſeeming to haue taken from him all confidence, he diſmiſſeth his Armie, bidding his Steward Sir Thomas Percy & others to reſerue themſelues for better dayes.

(110) His laſt refuge is in Parlea. For that cauſe there repaired to him, at the Caſtell of Conway in Northwales, (for thither he was now come) the late Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury, and the Earle of Nor-

Northumberland at the Kings appointment: The ſum of his demaundes were, that if hee and eight, whome he would name, might haue honourable allowance, with the aſſurance of a quiet priuate life, he would reſigne his Crowne. This Northumberland did ſweare ſhould be: whereupon he forthwith departs to the Caſtle of Flint in their company. After a ſhort conference there had with the Duke, they all ride that night to the Caſtell of Cheſter, being attended by the Lancaſtrian Armie. If, to ſpare his peoples bloud, he was contented ſo tamely to quit his royall right, his fact doth not onely not ſeeme excuſable, but glorious; but men rather thinke that it was ſloth, and a vaine truſt in diſſimulation, which his enemies had long ſince diſcouered in him, and for that cauſe, both held his amendment deſperate, and ran themſelues into theſe deſperate Treaſons.

(111) The King did put himſelfe into the Dukes hands vpon the twentieth day of Auguſt, beeing but the forty and ſeuenth from the Dukes firſt landing. From thence they trauell to London, where the King lodged in the Tower. Meane while writs of Summons are ſent out in King Richards name, for a Parliament to bee holden at Weſtminſter, Craſtino Michaelis. The tragicall forme of Reſignation, you haue * had already in Edward the ſecond, of whom this King is a Parallel. There are named to haue been preſent at this wofull-ioyfull Act, Arundel Archbiſhoppe of Canterburie, Richard Scrope Archbiſhoppe of Yorke, Iohn Biſhoppe of Hereford, Henry Duke of Lancaſter, (who in this ſerious play muſt ſeeme as if hee were but a looker on) the Earles of Northumberland, and Weſtmerland, the Lords Burnell, Barckley, Ros, Willoughby, and Abergeuenie, the Abbot of Weſtminſter, &c.

(112) In their preſence Richard as yet a King, and in his Tower of London, but not otherwiſe then as a priſoner, reades the Inſtrument of his ſurrender, with a ſeeming chearefull countenance, as if he were glad the hower was come, in which hee might taſte what it was to be a priuate man, and (hauing otherwiſe firſt done and ſaid what then he could to put all right out of himſelfe) ſubſcribes it with his hand; but prayes, that his Coſen the Duke of Lancaſter might ſucceed him in the regall gouernement, and in token that it was his deſire (for he muſt ſeeme to deſire what hee could not hinder) hee * plucked off his Signet ring, and put it vpon the Dukes finger. Then did he conſtitute the Archbiſhoppe of Yorke, and Biſhop of Hereford his Procurators, to declare to the whole Body of Parliament what he had done, & how willingly, where euery one (*except the loyal & magnanimous Biſhop of Carleol) being particularly asked, did particularly accept of the reſignation. Neuertheleſſe, it was not thought inough to haue his Crowne, vnleſſe they alſo publiſhed his ſhame. Thirty * and two Articles are therefore openly (but in his abſence) read; of all which, it was ſaid (for then men might ſay what they liſted) that he had confeſſed himſelfe guilty. In the front was placed his abuſe of the publike treaſure, and vnworthy waſte of the Crown-land, whereby he grew intollerably grieuous to the Subiects. The particular cauſes of the Dukes of Gloceſter and Lancaſter, the Archbiſhop of Canterburie and Earle of Arundel filled ſundry Articles. They charged him in the reſt with diſſimulation, falſhood, loſſe of honour abroad in the world, extortions, rapine, deniall of Iuſtice, raſures, and embezelling of Records, diſhonourable ſhifts, wicked Axiomes of ſtate, cruelty, couetouſneſſe, ſubordinations, laſciuiouſneſſe, treaſon to the rights of the Crown, periuries, and briefly with all ſorts of vnkingly vices, and with abſolute tyranny.

(113) We may be aſſured, that nothing could then be obiected ſo vntrue or incredible, but would haue gone for current and vndenyable with affections ſo throughly prepared. Hereupon it was * concluded, that in all thoſe thirty and two Articles, hee had broken the Oath of Empire taken at the Coronation, & al the States of the Kingdom (ſtrange that ſo many ſhould ſo concurre in diſloyalty vnder pretence of equity) being asked what they thought; did hold that thoſe cauſes ſeemed notorious, and ſufficient to depoſe King Richard. Commiſsioners were therefore nominated by conſent of the whole houſe, to pronounce the ſentence of Depoſition; which were, the Biſhop of Aſaph, the Abbot of Glaſſenbury, the Earle of Gloceſter, the Lord Barkly, William Thyrning, Chiefe Iuſtice of the common Pleas, and ſome others. The forme of pronuntiation was, IN THE NAME OF GOD, AMEN. We Iohn Biſhop of Saint Aſaph, Iohn Abbat, &c. Commiſsioners ſpecially choſen by the Lords ſpirituall and temporall of the Realme of England, and Commons of the ſaid Realme, repreſenting all the States of the ſaid Realme, ſitting in place of iudgement, &c.

(114) The definitiue ſentence of Depoſition giuen thus in open Parliament, there were further named certaine perſons, amongſt whom William Thirning Chiefe Iuſtice* of the Comon Pleas was thoght the fitteſt man, by whoſe lawleſſe mouth that vniuſt doome ſhould be deliuered to the King, and who on the behalfe of the Realme, ſhould renounce to the ſaid Richard the fealties and homages heretofore made vnto him, and to make relation of the whole manner and cauſes of their proceedings. The Regall ſeate was now reputed void; whereupon Duke Henrie riſeth from his place, and ſtands vpright, that hee might be ſeene of the people, then * ſigning himſelfe with the ſigne of the Croſſe vpon the forehead and breaſt, and inuocating the name of Chriſt, he challenged the Crown and Realm of England, with all the members and appurtenances. His words are ſaid to be theſe.

* Ypod. Neuſt.

* Ypodigma. Neuſt.

In the name of God, Amen. I, Henry of Lancaſter, claime the Realme of England, and the Crowne, with all the appurtenances, as comming by the blood royall from King Henry, and by] that iuſtice which God of his grace hath ſent to me, by the helpe of my kinſolke and friends, for recouery of the ſaid Realme, which was in point of perdition, through default of Gouernment and breach of lawes. Ypod. Neuſt.

(115) Which challenge and claime being thus made, all the States of the Kingdome doe with one conſent grant, that the ſaid Lord Duke ſhould reigne ouer them. The Archbiſhop of Canterbury (brother to the late Earle of Arundel) takes him then by the right hand, and the Archbiſhop of Yorke (the late Earle of Wiltſhires kinſeman) being his aſsiſtant, placeth him in the royall throne, with the generall acclamation and applauſes of the people. Laſtly, in full complement of the preſent ſolemnity, the Archbiſhoppe of Canterburie (that we may ſee how the Diuinity as well as the Law of thoſe times were degenerated into temporizing Policie) made a Sermon vpon theſe words in Samuel, A Man ſhall raigne ouer the People. By occaſion whereof * hee deſcribeth out of the holy Scriptures, the happineſſe of that Kingdom which is gouerned by a man, and the infelicity of thoſe Reaimes where a Child (whether in age or diſcretion) weeldes the Scepter. The euill whereof as they had dangerouſly felt vnder the late King, ſo they hoped abundantly to enioy the other in King Henry. To all which the whole Auditorie ioyouſly anſwered Amen. Then roſe the affable new Monarch, & among a few other words, hee gaue the world to vnderſtand, that none ſhould thinke hee would as by way of Conqueſt, diſinherite any man, certaine bad members onelie excepted.

* Fab. 1. Concord. Hiſt. Holinſh. ex Fab.

A neceſſary proteſtation.

(116) From henceforth hee was taken for King, and all Writs iſſued, and went forth in his name; which diſorderly matters being orderly related to the depoſed Prince in the Tower, by Thirning the Chiefe Iuſtice, hee onely vſed theſe words; That hee looked not after ſuch things, but (quoth he) my hope is, that (after all this) my coſen will bee my good Lord and friend. The Archbiſhop (otherwiſe inexcuſable in thoſe proceedings) yet in his ſaid Sermon ſeemeth gravely gravely and truly to haue described the cause of this effect; for (quoth hee) the child or insipient (which are with him æquiparable) drinketh the sweet and delicious words vnaduisedly, and perceiueth not intoxication, which they beene mingled with, till hee bee enuironed and wrapped in all danger, as lately the experience thereof hath beene apparant to all our sights and knowledges, and not without the great danger of all this Realme. Being thus brought downe to the show, and littlenesse of a priuate man, wee leaue him to draw his comfort out of holy meditations, as one whose violent death ensued before long, and turne ouer to his politike and martiall Successor.

(117) Yet in our way, wee may not quite ouerpasse a cursory consideration of the affaires of the Church vnder this King, which, for auoiding often interruptions of other argument, we haue put off to this last place. For albeit the Kingdome indured great crosses in the affaires of State, yet * some haue thought, that it found as great blessings in matters of religion, which in those daies tooke so deepe root in this our land, by the preaching of Iohn Wicliffe, that the branches thereof did spread themselues euen * ouer the Seas: Nor were the common people only allured with his doctrine, (though the * Londoners fauouring of him is thought by Walsingham to haue deterred the Prelates from proceeding against him, and a scholler of his in Leicestershire, is said to haue drawn by his preaching, * all the Laymen in that Countrey) but (as the same Authour reporteth) sundrie of the Fryars themselues fell to him and imbraced his opinions, amongst whom one * being also the Popes Chaplaine, so discouered by preaching the murders, luxuries and treasons of Fryars of his owne Habit, that the common people were astonied with the horror thereof, and cried out to haue them all vtterly destroied; which his accusations he particularlie iustified by publike writing, professing he came forth of that Order, as out of the Diuels nest. But that which Walsingham much more * admires, is, that Wicliffes opinions were not onlie entertained in ordinary Cities, but euen in the Vniuersity of Oxford it selfe, where was * the very top of wisdome and learning: and where not only two Chancellors successiuely. * Doctor Nicholas Hereford, and * Robert Rugge were most earnest maintainers of Wicliffes doctrine, but also, when the pope (to suppresse the same doctrine) sent his * Bull to the Vniuersity threatning the priuation of all their priuileges, the Proctors and Regents thereof were very doubtfull, whether they should receiue the Popes Bull with honour, or rather reiect it with open disgrace. Yea, the whole body of that glorious Vniuersitie (as the Pope there cals it in his Bull) gaue a glorious * Testimony (vnder their publike seale) of Wicliffes religious life, profound learning, orthodoxe opinions, exquisite writings, all farthest from any staine of heresie.

(118) And therefore no marueile, if not onely the Duke of Lancaster, with * sundry Peeres and great ones, but King Edward 3. himselfe, were (as Capgraue testifieth) a fauourer of him, and * King Richard 2. and the whole Parliament did (according to his instructions) much labour to abrogate the Popes Transcendent power, which was a principall cause of the Popes hatred against him. Notwithstanding to discountenance the truth which he taught, in defence of Regall Supremacy against Papall Vsurpation, (as also against the Masse, Transubstantiation, Merit; against Adoration of the Hoast, of Saints, Images; and Reliques; against Fryarly Orders, Pilgrimages, Indulgences,) many lewd opinions by misconstruction (as his bookes * yet extant, euince) are fathered on him, yea some so monstrous and diabolicall (as, * that Men ought, yea, * that God himselfe ought, to obey the Diuell) that that any man which heareth them, will presently beliue (without further perswasion) that they are but malicious figments. This famous Doctor * dying of a palsie, hath this charitable Eulogie or Epitaph bestowed on him by a * Monke; *The Diuels Instrument, Churches Enemy, Peoples Confusion, Heretikes Idole, Hypocrites mirrour, Schismes broacher, hatreds sower, lyes forger, Flatteries sincke; who, at his death dispaired like Cain, and stricken by the horrible iudgement of God; breathed forth his wicked soule to the darke mansion * of the blacke diuell*: Whereby, Gods best children may learne, not to regard, whiles they liue, the malice of the wicked, nor to respect after their death ought else but their slanderous rancor. And thus we conclude the raigne, though not the life of King Richard:

His first wife.

(119) The first wife of King Richard the second, was Anne, daughter vnto the Emperour Charles the fourth, and sister to Wenceslaus Emperour, and King of Bohemia, who was crowned Quene the 22. of Ianuary 1384. Hauing beene tenne yeeres his wife shee dyed, without any issue, at Sheen in the County of Surrey, 1394. whence her body was conuayed and buried at Westminster, the seuenth of the Ides of Iune.

His second Wife.

(120) Isabell, daughter vnto Charles the sixth, King of France, was a virgin about seuen yeers of age, when shee was affianced vnto King Richard, 1396. Neither had her husband (it seemeth) anie nuptiall fruition of her, by reason of her tender age, before such time as his traiterous Lords, (to compasse their owne disloyall purposes, and gratifie an vsurpers ambition) had dethroned him. What became of this young Ladie, we shall further see in the ensuing storie.

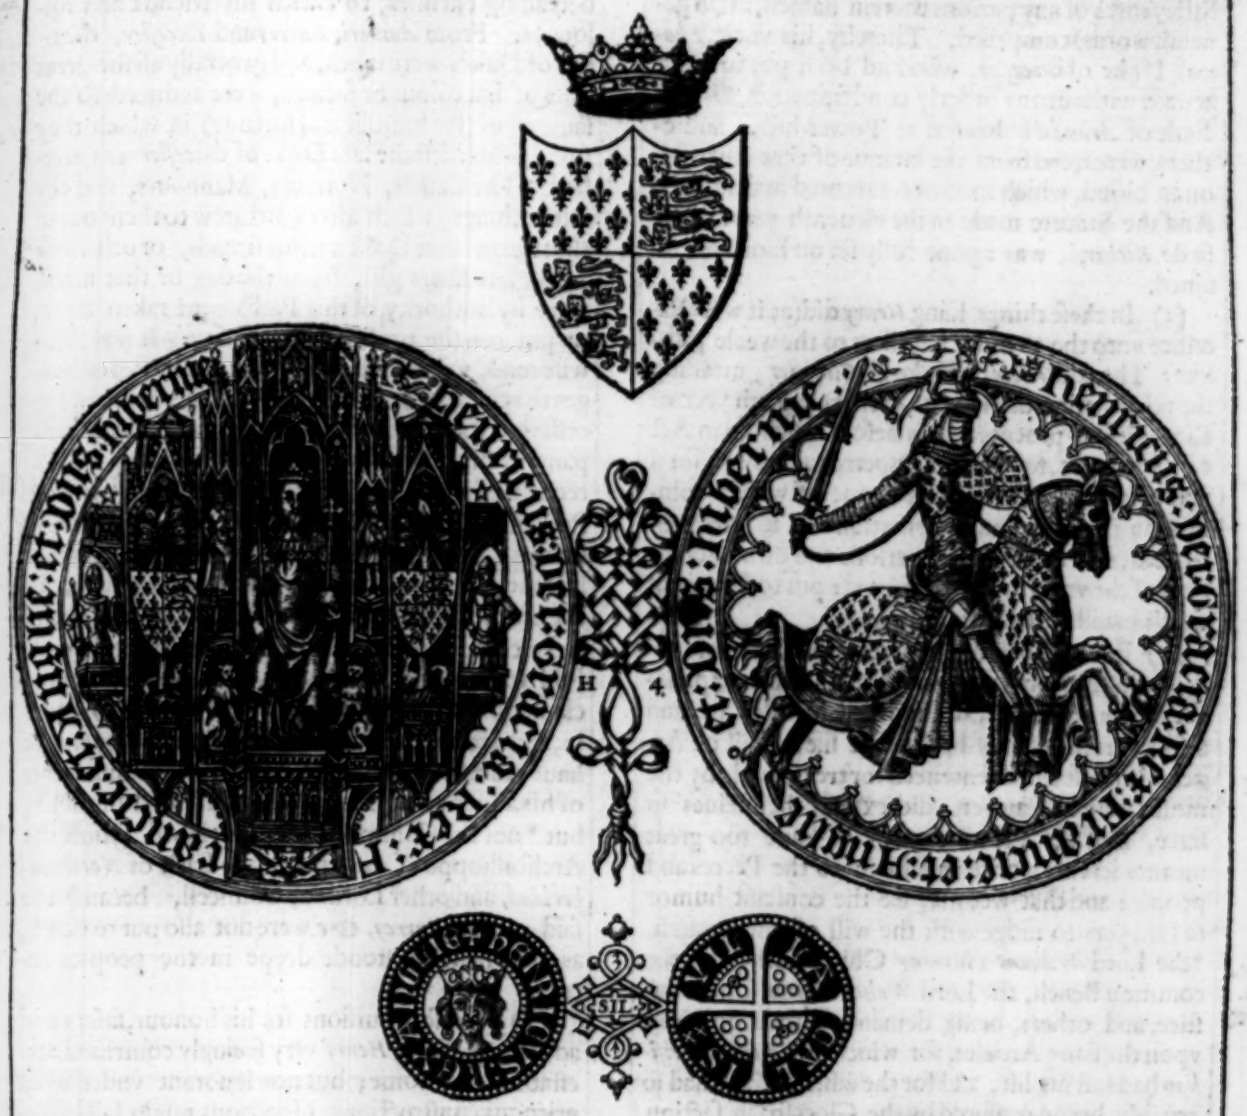
HENRIE THE FOVRTH. KING OF ENGLAND, AND FRANCE, LORD OF IRELAND, THE FIFTIE ONE MONARCH OF ENGLAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSVE.



CHAPTER XIII.

HENRIE of that name the fourth, hauing thus obtained the title of king, in full accompliſhment of all rites peculiar to Maieſty, had the Crowne of England ſet vpon his head, with all worldly magnificence and honour at Weſtminſter, by Thomas Arundel Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury, vpon the * ſelfe day twelue moneth, in which hee had formerly beene baniſhed vnder Richard the ſecond. Power and fauour can ſet vp and maintaine a King, though they cannot create aright! But ſuch tranſcendent courſes deuiating from all due regulation of Iuſtice, haue been too frequent in this Kingdome. What right had William ſurnamed the Conquerour? what right, (we ſpeake of a right of Equity,) had his ſonnes William the ſecond, and Henry the firſt, while their elder brother liued? what right had that valiant and princely Stephen? what was the intereſt of Henry the ſecond, during the life of his mother Mathildis? or that of King Iohn, till his Nephew Arthur Duke of Britaine died? yea, or that of Henry the third, till Arthurs ſiſter died in her priſon at Briſtow? Howbeit, in this preſent caſe, not only Richard the late king, but the houſe of Mortimer, claiming from the oncly daughter and heire of Lionel Duke of Clarence (an elder brother of Iohn D. of Lancaſter) doubly might haue withſtood the legall challenge of this Prince? That obſtacle which grew by Richard, was in apparance greateſt, but the other was onely dangerous. Richard had no iſſue but the line of Mortimer (engraffed by marriage into the houſe of Yorke) feeling it ſelfe vnable to preuaile, and during Richards life time, hauing no right, ſecretly foſtered in it ſelfe thoſe fires, which afterward brake forth, and taking hold of the roofe-tops of both the royall houſes, neuer left burning, till no one principall timber was vnconſumed in either, all the Male-Iſſues which could claime by a direct line, vtterlie lopt downe by mutuall massacres and extinguished.

(2) But this wise and valiant Prince Henry, besides all other helpes toward the possession of the Crowne in present, had as much strength, as the vnordinate affections and siding of a factious greater part could giue, for translation of a right from one familie to another; which strength (as the basis of his vniustly reared building) he endeauoureth by all the politike meanes he may, to make perpetuall. During therefore the former Parliament, (for Parliaments, as Kingdomes, giue their voice with power, and he who hath the force, doth commonly carry the effect of right) he* prouided for their indemnities, who either came in with him, or did afterward adhere to his sides, and doth vtterly abrogate, and make void the Acts made in the one and twentieth yeere of the late King Richard the second, for so much as concerned the Attaindors disinherisons, or other forfeytures of any persons therein named, or (in generall words) comprised. Thereby, his vncle, Thomas Duke of Gloceſter, who had been put to death at Cales without any orderly condemnation, Richard Earle of Arundel beheaded at Tower-hill, and others, were freed from the infamie of that corruption in bloud, which followes executed malefactors. And the Statute made in the eleuenth yeere of the saide Richard, was againe fully set on foot and reuiued.

* Lib. Statut. An. 1. Hen. 4. c. 2. 3. 4.

(3) In these things King Henry did (as it were) sacrifice vnto the people, aswell as to the weale publike: The said Thomas Duke of Gloceſter, meaning the reformation of the State, in that eleuenth yeer of King Richard procured (as is before touched) an Act of Parliament, to * settle a Superroyall power for a yeere, in certaine Peeres, by vertue of which commission the intended reformation was so farre prosecuted, that sundry great persons and others (fauorites of the vnfortunate King) were put to shamefull death banished and confiscated.

* Lib. Statut. An. 11. Ric. 2. cap. 1.

(4) But Richard * afterward (by the Duke of Aumarls instigation) reexamines all the former passages and proceedings, and satisfied his pleasure and displeasure, as already hath beene shewed; The Articles in those times sentenced for treasonable by the most eminent Lawyers, did extend themselues so farre, that the Prince seemed to haue too great meanes left to worke mischiefe to the Peeres and people: and that wee may see the constant humor in Lawyers to iudge with the will of the greatest, *the Lord William Thirning Chiefe Iustice of the common Bench, the Lord Walter Clopton Chiefe Iustice, and others, being demanded their opinions vpon the same Articles, for which Sir Robert Trisilian had lost his life, and for the which others had so terribly beene censured by the Gloceſtrian faction, affirmed (as Tresilian and others did) that the said Commission was against the royall Prerogatiue, and the procurers therof were all Traitors.

* An. Reg. 21.

* So is he and the rest called. Lib. Statut. An. 21. R. 2. cap. 11.

(5) King Henry therefore, in this his first Parliament, reduceth the state of treasons (being crimes of the highest and fowlest nature) to a more certaine head, vtterly abolishing all such as were established by the late King Richard. The words of the * Statute it selfe are; Whereas, in the Parliament holden the one and twentieth yeere of the late King Richard, diuers paines of treason were ordained by Statute, in as much as there was no man which did know how he ought to behaue himselfe, to doe, speake or say, for doubt of such paines. It is accorded, and assented by the King, the Lords and Commons, that in no time to come any treason bee iudged otherwise, then it was ordained by the Statute, in the time of his noble Grandfather, King Edward the third, whom God assoile. So was that net broken, the perilous estate of Subiects relieued, the people well gratified, and the King hereby became gracious and popular.

* An. 1. H. 4. c. 10.

King Henry createth his sonne Henry Prince of Wales.

(6) And that his indulgent magnificence might aswell appeare, as his ciuill prudence, hee (in this Parliament) created Henry his eldest sonne Prince of Wales, Duke of Aquitaine and Cornwall, & Earle of Chester, by * assent of all the States. To his friend the Earle of Northumberland hee gaue the Isle of Mann, as that which he had atchieued by Conquest, (so the * cited Record speakes) of Sir William le Scrope Knight Earle of Wiltshire, beheaded at Bristol. The Earle of Northumberland had it granted to hold by the seruice of bearing Lancasters sword on the left hand of the King at the Coronation. Vpon the Earle of Westmerland, hee bestowed the Earledome of Richmond. Lastly, as a binding knotte, hee causeth the * Crowne to bee entailed vpon the heires of his body, hauing at that time foure sonnes aliue, Henrie Prince of Wales, Thomas, Iohn and Humfrey.

(7) Now, as in the workes of nature, what the Sea drawes from one Coast, it casteth to another; so, others were diminished, as these encreased; the King bereauing enemies, to enrich his friends and followers. From Aumarl, Surrey and Exceſter, the titles of Dukes were taken, and generally all the great ones of that colour or faction, were reduced to the same estate (for honour and fortune) in which they stood, when first the late Duke of Gloceſter was arrested. The Castels, Honours, Mannours, and the rest of things, which afterward grew to them out of the ruine of that Duke and his friends, or otherwise by the late Kings gift, from the day of that arrest, were by authority of this Parliament taken away, or put into the present Kings mercy. It was likewise made vnlawful for them to giue liueries or badges to reteiners, or to keepe any about them but necessarie seruants: They were also forbidden, vnder paine of high Treason, to goe about by any way to reenable the late King against the authority of this Parliament, in which the sentence of his depolition was giuen and enacted. Finally, (a thing which laid them open to infinite vexations) whereas, in the time of their late greatnesse, they and theirs were charged to haue done, and patronized manifold wrongs and oppresions, all people (vpon proclamations to that purpose) were willed to come in, and declare their griefes, to the intent they might haue redresse and remedie. With these punishments of his aduersaries, King Henry contented himselfe; but * not the Commons who inueighed against the Archbishoppe of Canterburie, the Earle of Northumberland, and other Lords of Councell, because the said Aumarl, Surrey, &c. were not also put to death, as persons who stoode deepe in the peoples hatred.

* The Ma.

(8) These prouisions for his honour, safety and aduantage, King Henry very seeingly contriued, and established at home; but not ignorant vnder what grieuous constructions his actions might fall in forrain parts, sends honorable Ambassadors to * Rome, France, Spaine, and Germany, to giue a reason of his doings. To * Rome, the Bishoppe of Hereford, Sir Iohn Cheney Knight, and Iohn Cheney Esquier. To France, the Bishoppe of Durefme, and the Lord Thomas Percie Earle of Worceſter, and * William Heron to Spaine, the Bishop of Saint Asaph, and Sir William Par Knight. To Germany, the Bishoppe of Bangor, and others. These were armed with all sorts of instructions for iustification of their new aduanced King.

(9) In France * was worthily found the greatest difficulty of giuing satisfaction, for that the French Kings daughter (the designed wife of the late King) did thereby leese the honour, profite and pleasure of a Monarchies fruition. Shee was as yet scarse twelue yeeres of age, and therefore, * till shee attained to more maturity, the late King had the rather absented himselfe in Ireland. France therefore tooke these newes roughly, and it seemed that matters tended to Armes, which yet came to nothing, for that King Charles relapsed into his old disease of frenzie, and a warre to bee made against so politicke a Captaine as King Henry, required a sober man, and not a mad a mad one. Certainely, in the death of Richard which shortly followed, all those tumultuous designs for reuenge, immediately expired.

(10) They of Aquitaine (among whom the vnfortunate Richard was borne) bare the late king great loue, as being their Countriman. These discontentments were so publike, that Burdeaux (the capitall Citie and Presidentiall seat) stucke not openly to say, (as * Polydor hath it) *that since the world began ther was neuer a more cruel, vnreasonable, nor wicked fact done; that the good Prince was betrayed by * faithlesse men, and that all law was violated.* Thus do they exclaime, calling to God for vengeance with one voice. Neuertheless the French were deceiued in hoping to conuert these popular passions to their aduantage; for partly by the chiefe * Magistrates wisdome, and principally by the comparison which the people made of the two sortes of gouernment, English and French, that of the English being farre the more sweet and gentle, they continued firme. Much good labour, and many faire promises Lewis Duke of Burbon was forced to spend in vaine, who by such baites cast into the troubled wits of the Gascoignes, trauailed to draw them to a reuolt. The mischiefe was the better, and more strongly encountred, by the arriuall of Sir Thomas Percy * Earle of Worcester with competent numbers of men, sent thither to withstand the French practises, and cure the peoples affections, by applying to them the soueraigne balme of reason, or with force to compell obedience.

(11) The first prouocation which was giuen to King Henrie was by the Scots, who during the last Parliament exercised themselues in England, and took the Castle of Warcke; whose Captaine Sir Thomas Grey at that time gaue his attendance at Parliament about the common affaires; and the whole North of England being also infested with pestilence; the Scots had the more oportunity to range vnencountred. Cause of other ensuing enmities which afterward brake forth, was (as it * seemeth) for that King Henry tooke into his protection George Earle of Dunbarre and other Scots, who fled out of Scotland to auoide the displeasure of Robert their King, and partly to take open vengeance for wrongs done vnto them. Such oftentimes is the corruption of humane nature, that it will not pardon priuate iniuries for the publike benefite, but thrust the pietie due to our Country vnder the inferior respect of particular interesses. Princes also vpon oblique reasons of state (so bad men call them) which is neuer well founded vpon iniustice, are (for their owne seeming good) contented to hold their neighbours in awe, by possessing meanes of their disturbance, which when time serueth also, they are not slacke to vse, the profite whereof is seldome or neuer durable.

(12) But King Henry was scarce warme in his new atchieued soueraignty, when a nest of powerfull enemies beganne to hatch his destruction vnder the shadow of his owne winges. The deposed Richard was yet aliue, and howsoeuer rough and headstrong men of the Kingdome approued his downethrow, all others did not; for some moued by neerenesse of bloud, as the Earles of Kent and Huntington his halfe brothers by one mother; some doubtlesse in conscience (because howsoeuer Richards actions were vnworthie of the Scepter, yet the right was onely his, and besides Henrie seemed to them not the next heire) others transported with enuie at Henries supereminency, and not a few with remembrance of receiued benefites, or hope of bettter fortunes in the change of times, inclined to set him againe vpon the English throne. But they whosoeuer seeke the deliuerance of a Captiue Prince, doe commonly nothing else but hasten his death.

(13) It was our purpose in many great things to haue forborne the testimony of Walsingham (otherwise a great light of these times) as one who dedicating his workes to King Henry the fifth, sonne to this Henry, may be feared to speake the best and most he can, for setting forth the honour of that line; but the leuity and dissonance of later writers, enforceth vs (though with some warinesse,) to follow his light, for that, concerning this great conspiracy it selfe, our late Authours doe fondlie encounter one the other, and some of them (as it must needs be) the truth. The principall Conspirators (if such in so iust a cause may be so enstiled) were such, whose liues in the last Parliament had beene spared, though manie lockes in their periwigs of worldlie honour were plucked away. John Holland Earle of Huntingdon, Thomas Holland Earle of Kent, and (as *some say) Edward Earle of Rutland, (three the late Dukes of Exceter, Surrey, and Aumarl,) Iohn Montacute Earle of Sarisbury, Thomas Lord le Spencer, late called Earle of Glocester, the Bishop of Carleol, Sir Bernard Brokas, Sir Iohn Shenele, (or Shelley) Knights, Iohn Maudler, the Pseudo-Richard, or * Counterfet King Richard, whose Chaplaine hee had been, and resembled him verie neerely. The * Abbat of Westminster is (by some) not only named a Conspirator, but the first wheele of all the practise, as mouing the rest; and with him they adde to the former, Sir Ralph Lumley, Sir Thomas Blunt, Sir Benedict Celie Knights. There were sundry others, but those Earles and others first named, were vndoubtedly the chiefe.

(14) The maine point of the plot was to * kil king Henry and his sonne, and thereby to restore Richard to his rightful dignity; which the more powerfully to effect, (because, though Henry were murthered, yet they were assured that the businesse would not take end in a day, or a death) they resolued * to call the French into their succors, which they had reason to expect, for that the young Queene Isabel daughter to the French king remained at that present in England. There was nothing feeble or improbable in all this deuise; the difficulty was how to come so strong into the presence of King Henry, that they might ouerliue the Assassinate, thereby to finish their enterprize, which as they could not hope for, but with the helpe of a multitude, nor a multitude bee assembled without conuenient Colour, it was resolued, that the pretence of some extraordinary shew in Christmas was the fittest.

(15) Not long before the time of intended execution, the whole Coniuration was discouered, some say by the late * Duke of Aumarl, and afterward by the Maior of London. Discouered it was, but with so short a warning, that the King scarce found himselfe out of danger, when the Earles of Kent and Salisbury, (not vnderstanding that the bad odour of their conspiracy was come to the King) enter with 400. armed men about * twylight into Windsore Castle, from whence hee was departed to London. But God (whose peculiar Wards and Pupils Princes are) hauing deliuered the King out of that most certaine perill, did also sodeinely dissipate the further enterprises of the Conspirators. The Lord Iohn Holland Earle of Huntington, one of the chiefe, was not in this defeat at Windsore, but houered in London, attending the successe, there to raise meanes and men, and to worke such other maisteries as he could, and afterward (for we credit Walsingham who liued in that time, and neere the place, and saw, and diligentlie noted things, rather then some * others) vpon the certaine report of the Kings safetie sought to flie away by water.

(16) The two Earles missing their hoped pray, though greatly greeued, yet necessitie and new hopes bid them to dare farther. They therefore come to Sunnings. There the young Queene (King Richards spouse) lay; where hauing spoken certaine big words, to little other purpose then to giue the poore Ladie a short comfort, and taken King Henries Badges from such as wore them, saying King Richard was at libertie, and in the midst of an army of one hundreth thousand thousand friends at Pomfret; they proceed to Wallingford, then to Abingdon, and so to Circester. The rumors vsed by them to encrease their numbers were; that Henry of Lancaster (meaning the King) was fled with his sonnes and friends to the Tower of London, and that King Richard was escaped. Maudlen also, one of Richards Chaplains, tooke vpon him the *person of his said Lord, the more strongly to seduce the multitude, by so bold and perilous a fiction. Thus seemed they to fit their words and sute their Arts to the place. At Sunning, Richard (they said) was at Pomfret, for there the guile had beene transparent; but at Circester, Richard was not at Pomfret, but present.

*Ex Anonym. apud Io. Stow. Annal. Holinsh p. 515. Polyd. Verg. lib. 21.

(17) Howbeit the successe was not answerable to the deuise; for, besides that King Henry was in the heart of his strengths at London, where sixe * thousand men were put into a readines, and would come vpon them like a storme, the Townesmen of Circester assailed the Lords, tooke them, and (becavse their Town was fired of purpose by some of their followers, the better to recouer them while the quenching found the people employment,) haled them forth, and without longer tarriance seuered their heads from their bodies: The Earle of Huntington, with a trustie Knight of his, Sir Iohn Sheuele, hauing (after the faile at Windsore) in vaine attempted to escape by Sea, was taken by the Commons at* Pitwel (perhaps Prittlewel) in Essex, brought first to Chelmsford, and lastlie to Pleshie, the house of the late Duke of Gloucester (whose Ghost a tragicall Poet would suppose did haunt his persecutors for reuenge,) where, partlie also by this Earles instigation, the said Gloucester was first arrested. The Commons (out of whose hearts the image of that Duke was not vanished) at * the Countesse of Herefords instigation who was the Dukes widdow, tooke satisfaction vpon the Earle, with the escheate of his head, which there was sundred from his shoulders. The Lord Spencer called Earle of Gloucester (one of the Conspirators) had like execution done vpon him by the Commons at Bristol. Some other of them were put to death at Oxford, and some at London; where Iohn Maudlen (the Counterfeit Richard, who as it seemes was a beautifull and goodlie person) and one William Ferby were drawne, hanged and headed. The Bishop of Carleol neuertheless was by the Kings clemencie preserued aliue after the condemnatory sentence. There were * nineteene in all (whereof two had beene Dukes) put to death for this conspiracy, most of which were men of speciall note.

(18) The designes and misfortunes of King Richards friends being made known vnto him, could not but worke strongly in a soule oppresst with griefe; but whether so strongly as to make him resolue by voluntary abstinence to starue himselfe (as* the fame went) may bee doubted, though it be past doubt that King Henry was not sorrie hee was dead howsoeuer. That he was starued seemes verie plaine; though, as it is not certaine, (neither yet vnlikely) that King Henry was priuy to so foule a patricide, so neither is it knowne, but that Richard might as well be starued of purpose, as starue himselfe. Master Stow (a man for honest industry very praisworthie) saith that king Richard was fifteene daies and nights together kept in hunger, thirst, and cold, till hee died. How true that was in the circumstance, who knows? but in the point of staruing hee is clearelie with Walsingham: and a *Knight liuing about those times calleth it a death neuer before that time knowne in England. *Harding also, liuing vnder King Edward the fourth, agrees of the rumour of staruing.* Master Cambden saith of Pomfret Castle, that it is a place principum cæde & sanguine infamis, but seemes to insinuate, that some other torments were most wickedly practised vpon this King, as made out of the way with hunger, cold, and vnheard-of torments. * Polydore therefore may in this bee beleeued, who writes of this poore deposed Monarke, that, (which may well be called vnheard-of torments) his diet being serued in, and set before him in the wonted Princely manner, he was not suffered either to taste, or touch thereof. Idle therefore seemes * his dreame, who writes hee was murthered in the Tower, and not more credible *theirs, who tell vs of Sir Peirs of Extons assault, and the murther basely by him acted vpon this most miserable Princes person: but much more are* they to blame who negligently for credit of the fable quote Walsingham, in whom no syllable of such a thing is found. Onely * Hector Boetius wils vs to believe that Richard fled disguised into Scotland, was discouered to King Robert, and honourably entertained, but Richard who would no more of the world, gaue himselfe wholy to contemplation, and both liued, died, and was buried at Strueling. Which fond fable hath neuertheless somewhat in it, for that some personated Richard might so doe is neither impossible, nor improbable, and indeed it was so.

*Lib. 16.

(19) The late King Richard thus cruelly and heinously murthered (for in regard of pining death the seeming fable of his fight with Sir Peirs of Exton was a sport, it being both noble and full of comfort, for a man of honour and courage to die with weapon in hand) King Henry causeth his dead body to bee brought vp to London. O Henry, if thou wert Author, or but priuie, (though for thine owne pretended safetie, and for that errors cause which is lewdly mis-called reason of state) of such a murther; we doe not see, how the shewing of the people his vncouered face in Pauls, did either conceale or extenuate the execrable crime. But to let the world know that there was no hope nor place for a Richard, that course was vsed, which may the rather confirme the truth of his enfamishment: for a violent death by braining could not but deforme him too much: and it is most probable that such a death would bee sought, as might least appeare. Surely he is not a man, who at the report of so exquisite a barbarisme, as Richards enfamishment, feeles not chilling horror and detestation; what if but for a iustly condemned galley-slaue so dying? but how for an annointed King, whose Character (like that of holy Orders) is indeleble? The tragicall spectacle of his dead body (perhaps because it moued too much both pittie and enuie) was after a while transported without honor to Langley in Hartfordshire, where the last rites were performed by the Bishop of Chester, the Abbats of S. Alban and Waltham, but neither King Henry present, (as at the exequies in London) and the great Lords and such other as were had* not so much as a funerall feast bestowed on them for their labour. But Henry the fifth, in the first *yeere of his raigne with great honour did afterward cause those royall remaines to be interred in the Sepulture of his Ancestors at Westminster. Among the riming Latine verses of his Epitaph, ye may maruell to reade these, considering vpon what points he was triced out of Maiestie and State;

Ecclesiam fauit, elatos suppeditauit,
Quemuis prostrauit, regalia qui violauit.

Fabians English of them.

The Church he fauoured, casting the proud to ground,
And all that would his roiall State confound.

The said Author therefore Robert Fabian, obseruing the scope of those lines (to dampe their force) doth vnderwrite and annex this Stanza, with much greater discretion then elegancie:

But yet alas, though that this meeter or rime,
Thus doth embellish this noble Princes fame,
And that some Clerke which fauoured him sometime,
List by his cunning thus to enhance his name,
Yet by his Story appeareth in him some blame:
Wherefore to Princes it surest memory,
Their liues to exercise in vertuous constancie.

More

More tart and ſeuere is the cenſure of Gower vpon this Prince, one of whoſe verſes * Stow giues vs thus,

So God doth hate ſuch rulers as, here vicioufly do liue.

That beautifull picture of a King ſighing, crowned in a chaire of eſtate, at the vpper end of the Quier in Saint Peters at Weſtminſter, is ſaid to be of him, which witneſſeth how goodly a creature he was in outward lineaments.

(20) King Henry to diuert the humors and eyes of the people from the remembrance of this Tragedie, prepareth now a puiſſance, therewith to inuade Scotland; ſome ſubiects whereof, together with their Admirall Sir Robert Logon a Scotiſh Knight, were taken at Sea by certaine Engliſh ſhips. But K. Henry may ſeeme to haue done any thing rather, then to haue made a warre; for albeit hee did ſome hurt by * waſting the Country, yet did not the Scots offer battel, and the reſt will wel appear in theſe words of *Boetius. He did ſmall iniuries to the people thereof: for he deſired nought but his banner to bee erected on their wals. He was euer a pleaſant enemy, and did great humanity to the people in all places of Scotland where he was lodged. Finally, hee ſhewed to the Lords of Scotland, that hee came into their Realme rather by counſell of his Nobles, then for any hatred he bare to Scots. Soone after hee returned into England. Whether the remembrance of the curteſies ſhewed to his Father Duke Iohn, or the feare of his owne great ſtate ſo neere to an ouerthrow by the late furious conſpiracy, wrought theſe gentle effects, it was not long before the euent ſhewed, that his prouidence in not creating new acerbities was therein needfull.

(21) For albeit the face of England ſeemed ſmooth, yet God thruſt a thorne into King Henries ſide, when and where he little expected; for the Welſh, whom former Kings of England had ſo yoaked, and ſubiected, did contrary to all mens expectation, breake forth into open acts of hoſtility, vnder the conduct of a Gentleman of that Nation ſurnamed Glendowr, of the Lordſhip of Glendowr in Merionithſhire, whoſe owner he was; the wrath and iuſtice of heauen is alwayes ſo well furniſhed with meanes to exerciſe the mightieſt, thoſe chiefly at whoſe amendment God aimes by chaſtiſement. The originall of ſo great an euill was in the ſeed but little, as but this: Owen Glendowr, * whom the Welſh call the ſonne of Gruffith Vachan, deſcended of a yonger ſon of Gruffith ap Madoc, Lord of Bromfield, was at firſt a Student of the common laws, and an Vtter Bariſter, (but not therefore an apprentiſe of law, as Doctor Powell miſtakes, for an apprentiſe of the law, is hee that hath been a* double Reader) did afterward ſerue the late King Richard in place of an Eſquier, & was well beloued of him, but in King Henries time (retiring himſelfe as it ſeemes to his Mannour of Glendourdwy, the L. Gray of Ruthen entred vpon a peece of common, which lay betweene Ruthen and Glendowr, which Owen (deſpite the Lord Gray while Richard continued King) had formerly holden, though not without contention. Owen (a man of high courage, and impatient of force) armes hereupon, and encounters the Lord Gray in the field, where he ſcattered the ſaid Lords people, and tooke him priſoner, as hereafter will elſe-where bee touched.

(22) It ſeemes herein that hee had forgotten the lawes which he had formerly ſtudied, and wherin hee had been a licentiate; for ſhortly after, as hee had troden law vnder foot, ſo did he alſo caſt off loyaltie, burning & deſtroying the Lord Grays inheritances, and killing ſundry his ſeruants. The King aduertiſed hereof, paſſeth with an Army into Wales, burnes, kils, and takes ſuch reuenge as that time would permit. Meanewhile, Owen (whom pride & folly armed to the farther ruine of his Country) with his truſtieſt friends (which were not few) withdrawes into the inexpugnable faſtneſſes of Snowdon, where during this tempeſt, he kept his head ſafe. Shortly after the King with ſuch riches and ſpoiles as thoſe Parts had afforded, returnes, His next moſt noted action was peaceable. For one of the houſe of Paleologus, and Emperour of Conſtantinople, came into England to pray ſome ſuccour againſt the Turke, and vpon the day of S. Thomas the Apoſtle, was met at Blackeheath by King Henry, highly feaſted, richly preſented, and his charges borne till departure. But as Tilius * ſaith of his ſucceſſe in France, verbis & promiſſis tantum adiutus eſt, ſo here his ſpeed was not much better, the point of armed aides, being only therein aſſiſted with words and promiſes.

(23) In a Parliament held the next yeere, * by reaſon of the numbers of Lolards, (ſo called) encreaſing, the puniſhment for them enacted, was burning. And in the ſame yeere alſo, the Articles of peace beeing firſt agreed vpon betweene the two Nations, Engliſh and French (notwithſtanding that they had denied to match with the young Prince of Wales, * becauſe the former marriage with Richard thriued ſo badly) the Lady Iſabel who had beene crowned Queene of England, as Spouſe of the late King, was now ſent backe into France after a moſt princely maner, ſhee being not as yet * twelue yeeres old, had * no dowrie allowed her in England, for that the marriage was neuer conſummated. Before ſhee was reſtored to her friends, the Lord Henry Percie, before the Ambaſſadors of both the Nations, where they were met betweene Caleis and Boloigne, proteſted, That the King of England his Maſter had ſent her to be deliuered to her Father cleare of all bonds of marriage, or otherwiſe, and that hee would take it vpon his ſoule, that ſhee was ſound and entire, euen as ſhee was the ſame day ſhee was deliuered to King Richard, and if any would ſay to the contrary hee was ready to proue it againſt him by combat. But the Earle of Saint Paul ſaying, hee beleeued it to be true, the Lord Percie tooke her by the hand, and deliuered her vnto the Earle, and then the Commiſſioners of France deliuered certaine letters of receipt and acquitall. She was afterward married to Charles Duke of Orleance.

(24) Owen Glendowr perſiſting in his pride and diſobedience made incurſions vpon the Engliſh, doing them great harme, and returning himſelfe without any; but K. Henries danger was greater at home; for treaſon had crept into his moſt ſecret Chamber. In his bed there lay hidden a Galtrop or Engine with three ſmall yron pikes, long, ſlender and paſſing ſharpe all of them with their points ſet vpward, but (God ſo diſpoſing it) the King before hee laid himſelfe downe, perceiued them, and thereby auoided that hidden miſchiefe, but who was actor therein it doth not appeare.

(25) This appeares that the ſplendors of his new regality had drawne vp many thicke and poiſonous cloudes of enuie and practiſe, to darken if it were poſsible the farther brightneſſe thereof. Neither was it long before it grew to ſome extremity. For Owen Glendowr vpon the cauſes beforeſaid, waſting the Lord Reynald Grayes lands, was encountred by him, as preſuming that Owen and his friendes might eaſily be ouercome, but the contrary hapned, for there in fight hee loſt very many of his companie, and was himſelfe taken Priſoner. This fortune made the ſwelling mind of Owen ouerflow in vaine hopes, who compelling the ſaid Lord to marry his daughter, yet obtained hee not his liberty the ſooner, but died (ſay *ſome) in the power of Owen, if perhaps our Author miſtake not the Lord Gray for Edmund Lord Mortimer Earle of March, who indeed did marrie ſo after hee was alſo ouerthrowne by the ſaid Owen with the ſlaughter of aboue a thouſand principall perſons of Herefordſhire, aſſembled vnder his conduct, to reſiſt the Welſh inuaſions, and there alſo himſelfe was by trecherie taken priſoner.

(26) Walſingham doth * write, that about this time ſundrie conſpiracies were diſcouered in the yolke (as it were) or embrion; the whole hopes whereof reſted vpon calumniations, and forgery, for VVarre against Turks neglected by the weſterne Princes.

The late king Richard though dead, ſuffers not K. Henry to reſt.

by the firſt they *traduced (in libels) Henries actions, ſo to make him hatefull, and by the ſecond they diuulged that* Richard was ſtill aliue, thereby to raiſe an head of ſeparation. Henry thus galled in his honour, and endangered in the main, reſolued to ſpare none, vpon whom the crime or concealement was found. The firſt of them that fell vnder his iuſtice, was a Prieſt of Ware, with whom was taken a liſt, or roll of names which hee had gathered, ſuppoſing them ſuch as in regard of benefites receiued, would liue and die for King Richard, which vanitie of his created trouble to many, till it appeared that he had therein wronged them, as perſons who were vtterlie ignorant both of the man and matter. Whereupon hee was drawne and hanged. The like fate had Walter Baldocke Prior of Lawnd, who confeſt that he had concealed others counſels againſt the King, though himſelfe had acted nothing. A Frier Minor alſo being taken with ſome other of his Order for like intendments, was asked, what hee would doe if King Richard were aliue and preſent? hee confidently anſwered, that hee would fight for him till death againſt any whoſoeuer; which coſt him his life, being drawn and hanged in his Fryars weeds. Neither did this hard fortune fall onely vpon the Clergy, for Sir Roger Claringdon Knight, (reputed the baſe ſonne of Edward, late Prince of Wales) together with an Eſquier and ſeruant of his, finiſhed the affection which they bare to the deceaſed Richard by hanging. Not long after eight Franciſcan Fryars, or Minorites were taken, conuicted, hanged, and headed for the like cauſes, which made the King an heauy Lord to that whole Order. It is ſaid that ſomewhat before this knot was diſcouered the diuell appeared in the habit of a Minorite at Danbury Church in Eſſex, to the incredible aſtoniſhment of the pariſhioners; for, at the ſame time there was ſuch a Tempeſt & thunder with great fire-bals of lightning, that the vault of the church brake, and halfe the Chancell was carried away.

Thom.Walſ.Ypod. The Diuell appeares in Eſſex.

(27) But howſoeuer theſe out-branches were pared away, the rootes of all the practiſe lay deeper out of ſight, for the* Percies, Henry Earle of Northumberland, Thomas Earle of Worceſter, and Henrie Hotſpur Lord Percy, becauſe perhaps they thought they had done wickedly, in helping to ſet vp Henry, * beganne to imagine that bloudy miſchiefe, which afterward was proſecuted. This malice, the late ſucceſſe of Owen Glendowr againſt the Lord Mortimer Earle of March, (taken priſoner, as is ſaid, with no little ſlaughter of his Herefordſhire men) did perhaps nouriſh; for that hee ſaw an enemie appeare, who was not vnlikely to proue an able member of a greater rebellion. Certainely the King hauing in September led an Armie into Wales to take reuenge vpon his Rebels was in great danger to haue periſhed with ſodaine ſtormes and raines, the like whereof none of his people had euer felt or ſeene, ſo that after he had done ſome waſts vpon the Country hee returned. The common fame went that Owen was a Coniurer, and had raiſed thoſe hideous tempeſts by helliſh arts; they ſeemed ſo exceſsiue, which (whether true or falſe) did yet impart no little ſtrength to the Welſh faction.

*Pol.Verg.lib.21.

(28) The Kings fortune was happier in the North, where his Lieutenants had two faire victories, the one at* Niſbet, and the other at Halidowne-hill, neere to a village called Woller. And although the firſt was not a ſmall one, yet the other deſerued the name of a iuſt battell and garland. To the Scots, hauing with aboue ten thouſand men (vnder conduct of Archibald Earle of Dowglas, whom the Scots nick-named Tyne-man, becauſe he neuer wanne field, though no ſort of true manhood was wanting in his perſon) made great ſpoiles in England as farre as to Newcaſtle, and were now vpon returne; Henrie Percie Earle of Northumberland, the noble Henry Hotſpur Lord Percie his ſonne, and George Earle of Dunbar (who fled as you haue heard out of Scotland) with the forces of the Countries there about, not meaning to let them to paſſe in ſo ſlight a ſort, oppoſed themſelues. The chiefe feate was wrought by the Engliſh Archers, who firſt with their ſtiffe, cloſe, and cruell ſtormes of arrowes made their enemies footmen breake, and when the noble Dowglaſſe deſcended to the charge with his choiſeſt bands, himſelfe being in a moſt rich, and excellently tempered armour, and the reſt ſingularly well appointed, the Lord Percies Archers making a retreat, did withall deliuer their deadly arrowes, tam viuidè, tam animoſè, tam grauiter (ſaith our Monke) ſo lively, ſo courageouſly, ſo grieuouſly, that they ranne through the men of Armes, bored the helmets, pierced their very ſwords, beate their lances to the earth, and eaſily ſhot thoſe who were more ſlightly armed through and through. There were taken priſoners the Earle of Dowglas himſelfe, (who notwithſtanding his armour of the beſt proofe, had fiue wounds, and loſt an eye,) Murdake Stewart Earle of Fife (eldeſt ſonne to Robert Duke of Albanie,) George Earle of Angus, the Earles of Murrey and Orkney, the Lords Montgomerie, Erskin, and Graam, with about fourſcore Knights, beſides Eſquiers and Gentlemen. There were ſlaine the Lords Gourdon, and Swyntoun (Belinden Boetius cals them Knights) with ſundrie other men of honour and marke, beſide ſtore of common ſouldiers. The riuer Tweed, to ſhew it ſelfe meere Engliſh, did likewiſe fight for them by ſwallowing about fiue hundreth in his vnknowne depthes, as they, who fled from the battell, ſought to paſſe. This victory hapned vpon Holyrood in haruеſt. The troubles which afterward hapned, did not onely hinder the Lord Percie from farther proſecution of ſuch a victorie, but eclypſed the honour hee had gotten now, and gaue his dayes a bloudy & foule Cataſtrophe.

(29) The Lord Edmund Mortimer Earle of March next generall heire in bloud to the Crowne of England after the death of Richard the ſecond, hauing through feare of Owen (whoſe priſoner hee was) or hope of recouering his right, or for reuenge (becauſe the King did not ranſom him, married Owens daughter, by which hee muſt neceſſarily declare himſelfe an enemie to King Henrie, entertained intelligence with his neere kinſmen the Percies, and ſundry other his friends in Cheſhire, and elſewhere, to what purpoſe will ſhortly appeare. The night in which this Lord Mortimer (though ſome referre it to Owens birth) was born, all the horſes in his fathers ſtable, are ſaid to haue bin found ſtanding Belly-deep in bloud. A fearefull prodigie, as euen then it ſeemed, but verified afterward in the farre more fearefull euents, when (vpon the quarrell of Mortimers title, by which the houſe of Yorke claimed,) the horſes of warre did not onely ſtand belly-deepe in bloud, but alſo ſwam therein. The miſchiefe was already begun: for Henry Earle of Northumberland (when now his owne and his houſes ſtrengths were mightily encreaſed by this late victory againſt the Scots, which he vnder-hand ſeemes to haue conuerted to his ſecret priuate ends,) cloſely * animated his brother the Earle of Worceſter, and his fiery ſpirited ſon, againſt the King, to both their confuſions.

(30) The King tooke to wife the Lady Iane of Nauarre, widdow of Iohn de Mortfort Duke of Britaine named the Conquerour (*who died the yeere before) by whom ſhe had iſſue both ſons and daughters, but by the King none. He met, and married her at Wincheſter, and crowned her Queene at Weſtminſter. The King was not truſted with the cuſtody of any her three ſonnes, Iohn, Richard & Arthur, who remained in France.

(31) Euents are the beſt interpreters of propheſies and prodigies. Strange was that which * Walſingham hath written of a fatall Spectrum or Apparition in the ſummer time betweene Bedford and Bickleſwade, where ſundry monſters of diuers colours, in the ſhapes of armed men were often ſeene to iſſue out of the woods at morning and at noone; which to ſuch as ſtood farre off ſeemed to encounter one one the other in moſt terrible manner, but when they drew neer, nothing was to be found. Of another nature were the fiery attempts of the Percies. The firſt of them who diſcouered in armes his mortall hatred, was the noble Hotſpur, who (vnder *colour of the Scottiſh warre) made head about Cheſter and the marches of Wales. To him (by the priuitie of Hotſpurs father,) repaires the naughtie old man the Earle of Worceſter, leauing the young Prince of Wales and the Princes houſhold, ouer both which (for their better Gouernment) the King had placed him. Now was the torch of warre lighted vp, and began to blaze, for though the chiefe plot-maſter the Earle of Northumberland was not ioined to them, as hee did intend, yet were their numbers growne mightily, with which they meant to enter the Towne of Shrewſbury, to make thereof a Seat of warre.

(32) Colourable cauſes of their armes were the ordinarie paintings of the like attempts. Care of common-wealths reformation, and their owne ſafeties; for hauing firſt proteſted their intentions not to be the breach of loyaltie, they pretend and by letters ſent about, doe ſignifie. 1. *That * the publike monie was not employed vpon the pretended defence of the kingdome, but vnduly waſted.* 2. That by reaſon of bad tongues about the King they durſt not approach him, to declare their innocency, vnleſſe the Prelates and Peeres of the Realme did firſt intercede for them. 3. That they tooke armes onely to guard their owne heads, and to ſee the Kingdome better gouerned. Theſe Articles had the place of the Huske, but the kernell of the enterprize had principallie theſe. 1. To thruſt King Henry out of his ſeat, and conſequently to depriue him of life. 2. *To aduance the title of the Lord Mortimer Earle of March their * neereſt Allie:* for the Earle of Northumberland had married Elizabeth the daughter of the Lord Edmund Mortimer the elder, Earle of March, by Philip daughter to Lionel Duke of Clarence. 3. To take reuenge of King Henry, for ſeeking to drawe the chiefe benefit to himſelfe of the victory at Halidowne hill, whoſe principall priſoners he required, and for ſuch other priuate grudges. 4. To ſhare the Kingdome betweene Mortimer, Percy and Owen Glendower. Concerning which partition it is in ſome found written, that Indentures tripartite were ſealed, ſhowing that South-England ſhould remaine to Mortimer, North-England to Percy, and Wales beyond Seuern to Glendower. But Archembald Earle of Dowglas (who did his Countrey good ſeruice by making one in our Combuſtions,) by common conſent was allowed for his ſhare to be free from ranſome, and to haue Berwicke.

(33) This (in our Engliſh Adages) is called to reckon without our hoſt, or to count our chickens before they are hatched. But though at this time God would haue it ſo, yet who doth not eaſily ſee what a wild horſe a kingdome (ſo gotten) is, and how hard to ſit, and not to manage onlie? Yet it ſeemeth, that if Mortimer, hauing ſo iuſt a title to the Crowne, had openlie profeſſed the cauſe of his attempt againſt King Henry, it might iuſtlie haue beene exempted from all ſtaine of diſabilitie. But this partition is * ſaid to haue beene wiſely built vpon a ſound Welſh propheſie of Merlins: as if King Henry were the Mowldwarp curſed of Gods owne mouth, and Mortimer, Percy and Glendower, the Dragon, Lyon, and wolfe, which ſhould diuide this Realme betweene them. Surely the Welſh hauing any hand in ſuch a partition, it is not likelie they could thinke it had the right feete, if it ſtood not vpon the ſuppoſed Merlins his ridiculous coſenages and riddles. The Engliſh (not to be behind in leaſings,) doe in the meane time euery where ſpread that * Richard was ſafe aliue and in the Caſtle of Cheſter. Who can wonder that this name ſhould be ſo gratious, as if alone it were enough to haue ſhaken Henry out of his State? when Nero himſelfe had ſo many fauorites, that twenty yeeres after his death an obſcure fellow faining himſelfe Nero, was ſo backt and countenanced by the Parthians, and others, * that not without much difficulty the Romans could get him into their hands.

* Suet. in Ner. lib. 6. capolt.

(34) On the other ſide King Henry aſſailed with ſo vnexpected ieopardies, defends his cauſe by letters, and ſtrongly puts the blame vpon the accuſers, ſaying, That he maruelled exceedingly, ſeeing the Earle of Northumberland, and Henry his Sonne had the greateſt part of the publike moneys deliuered to them, for defence of the borders againſt Scotland, why they ſhould make that a quarrell, which was a meere calumnie. And to take away all pretence of feare from the Conſpirators, hee ſends to the Earles of Northumberland and Worceſter, and to the hot Lord Percie, a ſafe conduct vnder his roiall Seale, by which he ſecures their acceſſe, but vnbridled raſhneſſe (ſaith Walſingham) deſpiſing the roiall clemencie, did put on the rigour of rebellion. Meane while the King armes with all ſpeed againſt the enemie, the rather at the counſell of George Earle of Dunbar, who (like a valiant man at Armes, and a wiſe friend) aduiſed him ſo to doe, before their aduerſaries numbers were too mightily augmented. The King with his ſonne the young Prince of Wales, and a very noble fellowſhip, was now aduanced within ſight of Shrewſbury, as the gallant Percie ſtood ready to aſſault the Towne. But ſo ſoone as the roiall Standard was diſcouered, that enterpriſe was left off, and he drew out his people (being about fourteene thouſand choice and hardie bodies of men) to try the fortune of war againſt a well tride warrior.

(35) Peace notwithſtanding (by the exceeding tenderneſſe of the King) had enſued, but that the miſcheeuous Earle of Worceſter, by miſreporting and falſifying his Soueraignes words, did precipitate his Nephew into ſudden battell. If there were any praiſe or good example to bee drawne out of ſo deteſted bloodſhed, as that of ciuill warre, we would willingly deſcribe vnto you the order and actions, but we cannot too ſoone paſſe ouer ſuch mournfull obiects, which are rather to bee celebrated with teares then triumphes. There is no doubt but Percie, Dowglas, and the reſt fought terrible. Why ſhould we admire that in them? So doe Lyons, Tygers, & Beares, and yet wee admire them not. Where was dutie, where conſcience, where the other reſpects, of which onely we are called men? Let none of vs honour, or imitate them, in whoſe eyes the price of Engliſh blood is ſo vile, as that (for priuate fanſies) they can bee content to confound all regards, and make ſport for common foes, with mutuall maſſacres. Therefore wee will content our ſelues with the knowledge of Gods part in this daies worke, who gaue the garland to the King, though the firſt arrowes flew from the Percies Archers.

Thomas Percie Earle of Worceſter cauſe of the battell at Shrewſbury.

(36) The Kings courage was not ſmall in the fight as neither was the danger, the yong Prince of Wales alſo (being then firſt to enter himſelfe into the ſchoole of blood and battell,) gaue no ſmall hopes of that perfection which afterward ſhone in him, being wounded with an arrow in the face. The Lord Percy and Earle Dowglas (then * whom the wide world had not two brauer Champions) in ſteed of ſpending themſelues vpon the multitude, ſet the point of their hopes vpon killing the King, as in whoſe perſon they were ſure ten thouſand fell. For this cauſe they moſt furiouſly ruſhed forward with ſpeares and ſwords; but the noble Earle of Dunbarre, diſcouering their purpoſe, drew the King from the place which he had choſen to make good, and thereby in likelyhood for that preſent ſaued his life, for the Standard royall was ouerthrowne, and (among other valiant men) the * Earle of Stafford, Sir Walter Blunt, the Kinges Knight and the Standard-bearer himſelfe was ſlaine, ſuch was the fury of theſe ſodaine thunderbolts. That day the Dowglas ſlew with his owne hands three in the Kings Coat-armour, (perhaps ſome in Heralds Coats) though * Boetius yet ſaw a fourth. Sure it is, that manie of the ſubiects thought the King was ſlaine, and not a few * ranne out of the field. Who notwithſtanding, like a valiant Prince, did reenforce the fight, performing maruels in armes with his owne hands. The ſlaughter could not be ſmall on both ſides, the Archers ſhooting ſo continually, and the men of armes doing their vtmoſt for about the ſpace of three whole houres.

(37) That which gaue an end to this wofull worke was the death of Hotſpur, who ryding in the head of the battell in defiance of danger and death, was (by an vnknowne hand) ſuddenly killed, with whoſe fall (as if his whole army had had but one heart) the courages of all others fell into feete, which now altogether they truſted to. But the King abhorring to make farther execution of the miſguided multitude, ſuffered them to ſhift for themſelues. The Earles of Worceſter and Dowglas, Sir Richard Vernon, the Baron of Kindlaton, and diuers others were taken. Of the Kings ſide was ſlaine (beſides the Earle of Stafford) ten new Knights, whoſe names (as dying in an honeſt cauſe) deſerue immortality, and were Sir * Hugh Shorly, Sir Iohn Clifton, Sir Iohn Cokain, Sir Nicholas Gauſel, Sir Walter Blunt, Sir Iohn Caluerly, Sir Iohn Maſſie, Sir Hugh Mortimer, Sir Robert Gauſell, and Sir Thomas Wendeſley, who dyed of his hurts not long after, as moſt of the other did about the Standard; all which fighting for their ſpurs, (as being knighted but that morning) bought them with the honourable loſſe of their whole bodies; there were alſo ſlaine many Eſquires, & Gentlemen, and about one thouſand and fiue hundreth common ſouldiers, beſides three thouſand ſorely wounded. On the other part, (omitting that ſecond Mars, the Lord Percy (who drew a ruine after him ſutable to his Spirit and greatneſſe) there fell moſt of all the Eſquires and Gentlemen of Cheſhire, to the number of two hundred, and about fiue thouſand common ſouldiers. This battell was ſtricken neere to Shrewſbury vpon a Saturday, the one and twentieth of Iuly, and the Eue of Saint Marie Magdalen.

(38) The Earle of Worceſter (the ſeducer and deſtroier of his noble Nephew Hotſpur, and therefore if but for that, very worthy to haue dyed) Sir Richard Vernon Knight, and the Baron of Kinderton had their heads cut off vpon the Monday following. Hotſpurres body had beene buried by permiſſion, but vpon other aduiſe, the King cauſed it to be drawne out of the graue, beheaded, quartered, and the parts ſent into diuers Cities of the Kingdome. The Earle of Northumberland (pretending to come with forces to the Kings aide) was empeached by the Earle of Weſtmorland, and Robert Waterton who had raiſed a great hoſt. Northumberland taking neither of them for friend, wheeles about, and returnes to his Caſtle of Warkworth. But what can be ſecure to a ſubiect againſt the victorious armie of a martiall King? The Earle knew as much, manifeſtly feeling the irrecouerable maimes of his houſe in the loſſe of his ſonne and brother, and therefore ſhaped his courſe accordingly. The King therefore being altogether as prudent as fortunate, hauing ſetled the ſtate of things in the Marches about Shrewſbury, ſets forward to the City of Yorke, from thence to take order for ſuch perils, as he foreſaw might happen. He ſetled himſelfe the more ſeriouſlie and entirelie to this needfull worke; for that his Ambaſſadors had effected an abſtinence from warre with France, till the firſt of March, which paſſing ſpace though it might ſeeme little, was not a little welcome to the King, the Realme of England being then ſo full of dangerous perturbations. While hee was at Yorke, he commands the Earle of Northumberland to come thither in perſon, which he accordingly did vpon the morrow after the day of Saint * Laurence, and that alſo with a ſmall traine in the nature of an humble ſutor. He could not in reaſon hope for the wonted familiar fauour of the King, neither had he yet, for it was accounted matter of grace, that his life was pardoned, though his meanes and liberty was abridged, the King allowing only neceſſary maintenances. The life of Princes is like a perpetuall motion. The Northerne Countreys are now ſetled, but hath the King therefore any the more reſt? Nothing leſſe; for Wales & the troubles thereof call him thither. What ſhould he doe? Money the Cement and ſoldure of all ſuch actions, (for Armies cannot otherwiſe bee held together) vtterly failes. The Archbiſhop of Canterbury ſees the needs and vſes of his Soueraigne, and like a Father ſupplies him with a Tenth, which the Clergy at their Metropolitans motion, conſent to giue: vpon the ſtrength whereof, the King knowes how farre hee may proceed againſt the Welſh in his good time.

(39) Toward the reliefe of theſe his neceſſities, the valiant exploits of William de Wilford an Eſquire, who was in the meane time abroad for the King vpon the narrow Seas, brought ſome aſsiſtance, certainely ſtore of contentation; for he tooke forty lawfull prizes laden with yron, oyle, ſope and Rochell wine, to the number in all of a thouſand tunne vpon the Coaſtes of Britaine, and in his returne ſet fortie ſaile on fire; and to make the Britains know that hee was not only a man of his hands at Sea, he comes on ſhore at Penarch, burnes Townes and houſes about ſixe leagues into the Countrey, and afterward did as much for them at the Towne of Saint Mathewes, which he conſumed with flames and waſted the land for three miles about. The French not to ſeeme ſlow to like miſchiefes, land at the Wight, but were compelled with loſſe to betake themſelues againe vnto their Fleet, with farre worſe ſucceſſe then the Britons vnder the conduct of the Lord of Caſtell had not long before, who landing at Plimmouth inuaded, tooke and burnt it.

(40) The King hauing humbled the Earle of Northumberland in ſuch ſort as you heard, lookes againe vpon him with an eye of compaſsion and fauour, not without a ſecret reſpect to his owne ſafety; and he had little appetite to augment enmities, but to allay them rather, whereas by this gratious vſage of that Earle, (for he reſtored him fully to all) he now thinkes thoſe North parts ſufficiently ſecured. This reſtitution was made to the Earle in the Parliament holden at London about the midſt of Ianuary, where the King obteined an vnuſuall Taxe or Subſidy, of which (that it might not be drawne into example) no record, nor writing was ſuffered to remaine. Some part of the gold which the king thus drew into the Eſchecquor, he had occaſion to beſtow at this time. For, there preſented themſelues vnto him, a boiſterous troupe of plaine Weſtern-men, who brought to the kings view three Lords, and twenty knights of note; Theſe were priſoners, whom the Countrey people about Dartmouth in Deuonſhire had gotten in plaine fight. The king was therefore giuen to vnderſtand, that the Lord of Caſtel the Briton, who had formerly burnt Plimmouth, thinking to doe the like at Dartmouth, came on ſhore with his forces, where theſe and the like people fiercely encountred him; at which time their Women (like Amazons) by hurling of flints and pebles, and by ſuch other artillery, did greatly aduance their huſbands and kinſefolkes victory. The Lord of Caſtel himſelfe and many beſides were ſlaine, theſe other were ſaued as more of them might haue beene, but that the ignorance of language alike confounded the cries of indignation and pitty. They therefore in reward of this hazard and ſeruice, doe pray they might reape ſome commodity by their Captiues. It was but reaſon; wherefore the King, who tooke pleaſure to talke with the luſty Weſtern-men, himſelfe, cauſeth their purſes to be ſtuft with golden Coyne, reſeruing the priſoners to repay himſelfe with aduantage out of their ranſomes. The like good fortune againſt Owen Glendowr and the Welſh would haue gladded him indeed; but they burne and deſtroy the Marches, they kill and captiuate the people, and partly by force, partly by fraud, get many Caſtles, ſome of which they raſe, and fortifie others.

The King vſeth his victory mercifully.

(41) It is more strange that King Richard was not suffered to be dead, after he had so long a time been buried. Serlo, who had beene a Gentleman of his Chamber, hauing heard that King Richard (his royall and gracious Master) was secretly abiding in Scotland, left the fauour of the French Court to see him, but it was not worth his so much loue and labour; for hee that bare the name, was but an Impostor. Loath yet to let the opinion die, because it might do King Henry harme; Serlo affirmes that Richard was aliue. What cunning madnesse is so great which hath not some great fooles or other to support it? The old Countesse of Oxford (mother to the late Duke of Ireland) will needs perswade her selfe and others in Essex, that Richard was aliue: certaine it is, that shee desired it might be true. To make others more firmly beleeue the same, she secretly gaue siluer and gilt Harts (the badges which King Richard vsed to bestow vpon his followers) as tokens. Hitherto the deuise held out, for it had no great danger in it; but Serlo seeing the necessity of greater friends, which appeared not, grew weary, and knowing that Sir William Clifford knight, Captaine of Berwicke had receiued sundry fauours from King Richard, hopes by him to bee furnished with money, to beare his charges out of Scotland into France. Clifford farre otherwise minded, seizeth vpon Serlo, as a fit meanes to reconcile himself with the King, in whose high displeasure he stood, (for that hee had continued his charge in Berwicke contrary to expresse commandement) and carrieth him to the King, who was then come to the Castle of Pomfret, beeing weakened with these rumors, and suspecting that the chiefe nest of danger lay in the North; whither the Earle of Northumberland brought his grandchildren (as pledges) to assure the King of his loyalty: thither also Sir William Clifford brings poore Serlo, who both confesseth the practise, as also that hee had a guiltie hand in the murther of the Duke of Gloucester, which made him farre more odious then the other forgery. The crimes being manifest, Serlo is drawn frō Pontefract beginning his pain, where he had his doom, & at London knits vp the Tragedie in an halter. The Countesse of Oxford for this falshood lost al her goods being moreouer committed to close prison. To make this imposture the more probable & passable, Serlo had caused K. Richards signet to bee counterfeited, wherwith he sealed sundry consolatorie and exhortatory letters to his friends, indited in K. Richards name; wherupon many in Essex gaue credit to the Countesse, & among the rest som Abbots of that Countie. Into this smoke did al the deuise euaporate.

(42) And no lesse smokie was both the deuise & successe of certain in the Parliament (held this year at Couentry, & called the lack learning Parliament*, either for the vnlearnednesse of the persons, or for their malice to learned men) where, to supply the Kings wants, a bill was exhibited against the Temporalties of the Clergie; but by the courage of the Archbishop of Canterburie, (who told them, it was the enriching of themselues, not of the King, which they respected in their sacrilegious petitions) and by the gracious care of the King, (who vowed to leaue the Church in better state then he found it, rather then in worse,) their motion vanished to nothing, but the infamous memory of the attempters. It is obserued, that a Knight* the chiefe speaker in this bill against the Clergy, had beene himselfe a Deacon, and so himselfe first aduanced by the Clergy. With great reason therefore did our forefathers distinguish the people into the learned and lewd, infetring truely that such commonlie were lewd, who were not learned, and that lewd and wicked were but two words of one signification, as in this Parliament well appeared, whose Commons might enter Commons with their cattel for any vertue which they had more then brute Creatures.

(42) Twise after this, betweene Christmas and Palmesunday, the King assembled the States againe, once at London, and then at Saint Alban, for the cause of money, but with much distast, the Peeres of the land rising from the last Session thereof meanely contented, as it well appeared not long after, though to the enterprisers ruine. Thomas Mowbray Earle Marshall, one of the chiefe men which disliked the carriage of publike matters, drawes Richard le Scrope Archbishoppe of Yorke into a conspiracy, in ful hope that Henrie Percie Earle of Northumberland, the Lord Bardolf, the Citizens of Yorke, and the common people would assist their cause, which was glosed with the specious pretence of redressing publike abuses, hapning through the Kings default. The Earle of Westmerland hearing of this attempt, wherein the Earle Marshall and the Archbishoppe were leaders of the people, gathers a force to encounter them, but perceiuing himselfe too feeble, he betakes himselfe to fraud, and by faining to like the quarrell, got them both into his power, and presented them as an acceptable oblation to the King, who about Whitsontide comes to Yorke, where (albeit the Earle of Westmerland had promised them their liues) aswell the Archbishoppe, as the Earle Marshall were beheaded. But the next yeere the Pope excommunicated all such as had a hand in putting the Archbishoppe to death. It was said of Tiberius Caesar* in a Satyricall libel,

-regnabit sanguine multo,
Ad regnum quisquis venit ab exilio.
Who, first Exilde, is after crown'd,
His raigne with bloud will much abound.

(44) This the King verified in his person, who comming out of banishment, could not support his Title and estate, but by shedding much bloud of subiects. For not contented with those two liues, he pursueth the Earle of Northumberland and Lord Bardolf with an inuincible Armie of seuen and thirty thousand men: but they vnable to make head against so mighty a force, take Berwicke for refuge. Thither the King marcheth, at the sound whereof, they both distrustfull of their safety, flie into Scotland, where the Lord Flemming entertaines them. Berwicke vpon hope of succours out of Scotland, (which gladly nourished the English miseries, and the Englisn theirs) refused to render, whereupon the King plants a battering piece against a Tower in the wall; which as it threw downe the halfe thereof with one shot, so did it quite ouerthrow all the defendants courages, who presently yeelded the place vpon hard and desperate terms, for they were partly hanged, and partly emprisoned. After Berwicke* was thus recouered, the king takes Alnwicke, & all other Castles belonging to the Earle, and thinking the like happines would shine vpon him in Wales, he crosseth ouer thither, where it fell out far otherwise, not by the manhood of the Welsh, but by the sodaine rage of waters which destroied his carriages and about fiftie wains (as was said) laden with much treasure: therfore he returns to Worcester. Owen Glendowr the chief captain of the Welsh natiō, expecting & fearing a reuenge had before this time confederated himselfe with the French, who in 140. ships arriued at Milford hauen to the aid of Owen, hauing well neere first lost all their horses in the passage for want of fresh water. The Lord Berkley and Henrie de Pay (by what meanes appeares not) burnt fifteen of that number in the harbour. They made the entrance of their warre by laying siege to the Towne of Carmarden in South-Wales, which, the Garrison being permitted to depart with bagge and baggage, was yeelded.

(45) The King being againe in need of money, after long vnwillingnesse and delay, the Parliament furnished him, rather ouercome with wearinesse in contradiction, then for any great good will. Some of his treasure was employed, as it seemes, vpon secret practises with the Scots, that the Earle of Northumberland, and the Lord Bardolfe might bee deliuered into his hands, in exchange for some Scots, whereupon they fled into Wales, and the Scots missing their purpose, slew Dauid Lord Flemming for discouering their intention to his distressed guests, (as by the lawes of honour and hospitality he was obliged) which filled Scotland with ciuill discords. To auoide the dangers whereof, and to better his education, the King of Scots sent his sonne and heire by sea into France, whom, together with the Bishoppe of Orkney certaine Mariners of Cley in Norfolke surprized at sea, and presented to the King, who committed him prisoner to the Tower of London. Meanewhile the French prosecuting their affaires in Wales, sent thither eight and thirty shippes full of souldiers, of which number the English tooke eight (the rest escaping in great feare to Wales,) and not long after other fifteene saile laden with waxe and wine. This fortune though good, was nothing in regard of the seruice which Henry Pay, with certaine shippes of the Cinque Ports, and about fifteene other, exployted vpon a great Fleet, containing sixscore saile, whose ladings were yron, salt, oyle, and Rochel wine. The same times was a felon put to death for hauing in many places of London, dared secretly to set vp bils, containing newes that King Richard was aliue. The fearefull plague of pestilence slew multitudes of people through the Realm, chiefly in London, where, within a short space it destroyed thirty thousand. That most renowned Captaine Sir Robert Knolles, who had led so many liuing men to their honourable deaths in battel, was now captiued himselfe by death vpon the fifteenth day of August. His fame grew principally by martiall deedes in the great warres of France, vnder Edward the third, but spred and setled it selfe by good workes, among which the goodly stone-bridge at Rochester in Kent was one.

(46) In the meane space, the wars of Wales were managed by Prince Henry, who tooke the Castle of Aberistwith; but Owen Glendowr soone after got it againe by faire fraud, and thrust into it a Garrison of his owne. Thus Owen prospered for a time; but the Earle of Northumberland and Lord Bardolf forsaking wales, and seeking to raise a force in the North, were encountred by the Sherife of Yorkeshire, who after a sharpe conflict slew the Earle in the field, and so wounded the Lord Bardolf, that hee died thereof. The Earles head was cut off, which being first ignominiously carryed through London, was fixed vpon the Bridge. The King hauing thus vanquished his chiefe enemies, went to Yorke, where inquiries were made for the Earles adherents, of which he condemned, ransomed, and emprisoned many. The Abbot of Hales, because hee was taken fighting on the Earles behalfe, had sentence to die, which was executed vpon him by hanging. In forraine and transmarine parts, the Kings affaires had mixt successe; for Edmund Earle of Kent, at the siege of Briant in Britaine, was strucken with a quarrell into the head, whereof hee died; but yet after he had first taken the said Castell, and leueld it with the earth.

(47) The peace of Christendome hauing beene long tempestuously troubled by a Schisme, raised by ambition of opposite Popes, wherof the one was chosen at Rome, the other at Auinion, by contrarie factions of the Cardinals; A generall Councel was summoned to bee held at Pisa in Italie, whither the King of England sent his Ambassadors, and the Clergy elected Robert Alum * Chancellour of Oxford, & Bishoppe of Sarum, to signifie, * that vnlesse both the Popes would giue ouer their Papacie, neither of them should thenceforward be acknowledged for Pope. The King in his letter then sent to Pope Gregory, chargeth him (as Platina likewise doth) with Periury, and that this Papall emulation had beene the cause of the murther of * more then two hundreth and thirty thousand Christians slaine in warres. There assembled a great number of Cardinals, Archbishops, Bishops, and mitred Prelates, who elected a new Pope, Alexander 5. tooke degree in Theologie) reiecting the two others, who long and bitterly had contended for the place. The King also cals his Parliament to find out meanes for more money, to the custody and charge whereof hee ordained Sir Henry Scrope, creating him Treasurer, as Thomas Beaufourt the Kings halfe brother, Lord Chancellour. In which Parliament was reuiued the sacrilegious Petition of spoiling the Church of England of her goodly patrimonies, which the pietie and wisdome of so many former ages had congested. But the King (who was bound by oath and reason to preserue the flourishing estate of the Church) detested their wicked proposition, and for that cause denied all other their requests. The Duke of Burgundies prouisions which he had made to reduce Caleys to the French dominions, & stored at Saint Omars, were consumed with casuall fire to ashes.

(48) About these times the great and bloudy factions betweene the Dukes of Burgundy and Orleance brake forth. The cause was for a murther committed vpon Lewis (brother to the French king, and father of the said Duke of Orleance) as he came late one night from the Queenes lodging, who at that time lay in of a child. The murtherers* to preuent pursuit, strewed galthrops behind them. The Duke of Burgundie iustified the fact, for that Lewis had (as hee said) laboured with the Pope to put the King from his seat, vpon pretence that hee was as vnfit to gouerne as euer Childericke was, whom Pope Zacharie pronounced against. This prepared the way for that scourge wherwith God meant to chastice the pride and sinnes of France. Each partie sought to fortifie it selfe with friends, aswel at home as abroad. The Duke of Burgundie had the King and the Dolphin on his side; the other had the Kings of Nauar and Arragon, the Dukes of Berrie and Britaine with many of the mightiest Earles and Lords. The Duke of Burgundie, (who together with the King and the face of gouernment, kept in Paris) perceiuing his aduersaries strengthes to bee more then his owne, offers to the King of England, a daughter of France in marriage with the Prince, and many great promises, so as hee would ioyne in defence of the King, & send ouer competent forces; whereunto hee is said to haue answered: Our aduise is, that you should not in this case aduenture battell with your enemie, who seems to prosecute a iust reuenge for the death of his Father; but labour to asswage the displeasure and anger of the exasperated yong man, by all the good meanes which are possible. If that cannot bee, then stand vpon your guard, and draw into place of most safety, with such force of men as may best serue for your defence. After all this, if hee will not bee appeased, you may with the better conscience encounter him, and in such case wee will not faile (more fully) to assist, acccording as you request. For the present he sent ouer the Earls of Arundel and Kyme, and many men of Armes, with plenty of English Bow-men, who came safe to Paris, where they in nothing diminished the ancient glory of their nation, but behaued themselues valiantly.

(49) The Duke of Orleance, and the Peeres of his faction, seeing their successe, consult how to draw the King of England from their enemie, and thereupon send ouer one Falconet and others, with solemne letters of credence, whom they made their irreuocable "Procurators, to entreat, agree, and conclude, (on "their behalfes) with the most excellent Prince, Henry "by the grace of God King of England, and his most no- "ble sonnes, &c. for the restitution and reall redeliuerie "of the Dutchie of Aquitain, with all the rights and "appurtenances, which (as it affirmed) are the inheri- "tance of the said most excellent Lord the King of Eng- "land, by them to bee made and done, &c. The Ambassadors hauing shewed forth this Proxie, exhibited the points of their negotiation in these Articles, by which wee may see how farre the desire of reuenge will transport great minds. 1 They offer their bodies to be imployed against all men for the seruice of the King

King of England, sauing their faith to their owne Soueraigne, as knowing the King of England would not otherwise desire them. 2. Their Sonnes, daughters, nephewes, Neeces, and all their Cosens to bestow in marriage at the King of Englands pleasure. 3. Their Castles, Townes, treasure, and all their goods to be at the seruice of the sayd King. 4. Their friends, the Gentlemen of France, the Clergy and wealthy Burgers; who are all of their side; as by proofe (they said) shall well appeare. 5. They finally offer to him the Dutchy of Aquitaine entire, and in as full a manner as euer his Predecessors enioyned the same, without excepting any thing; so as they themselues will hold, and acknowledge to hold their lands in those parts, directly of the said King, and deliuer as much of them as they can into his possession, and will doe their vtmost to conquer the rest for him. Vpon condition on the other side. 1. That the King of England and his Successors should assist the said Lords, against the Duke of Burgundy for the murther committed vpon the person of the late Duke of Orleance. 2. That he should assist against the said Duke of Burgundy and his fauourers, till they had repaired all the losses which they, their friends and tenants had sustained through that occasion. 3. That he should help to settle the quiet of the realme, &c.

(50) These Offers being put into the balance with the Articles, vpon which the Duke of Burgundy had obteined succours, ouerweighed them so farre, that about the midst of August, before all those which had beene sent with the Earle of Arundel to the contrarie part, were returned into England, aydes were decreed to the Duke of Orleance, to the wonder of all men, who vnderstood not the secret, so that Thomas Duke of Clarence, Edward Duke of Yorke, the Earle of Dorset, and very many other principall men with a competent puissance were sent ouer to ayde the Duke of Orleance, the Earle of Angolesme remaining hostage in England, for the sure payment of one hundred and nine thousand Crownes for performance of the other Articles: They came on shore in Normandy; but, whither the confederates moued with the perill into which their Country & Nation should by these meanes be precipitated, or for some other causes, (though none indeed so iust, as the sorrow and shame for their so disloyall a combination with the Capitall enemies of France,) the Duke of Orleance (contrary to agreement) came not at the appointed time and place, whereupon the English burnt, spoiled and tooke much riches in the Castles, Countrey and good Townes, therewith to satisfie themselues, till the Duke of Orleance should see them payd. At last yet the Dukes of Clarence and Orleance came to a treaty, after which the English campe rose peaceably and marcht into Aquitaine there to winter it selfe, the Duke of Orleance returning to his owne. While these matters were in hand, the Lord of Heyle Marshall of France with many other Lords, and about foure thousand * men of armes layd siege to a certaine strong place in Gascoigne; which Sir Iohn Blunt Knight, with three hundred souldiers not onely defended, but draue them also from the siege, taking prisoners twelue of the principall and about sixe score other Gentlemen. * The King liued not to see the carriage, and fortune of these warres, for falling sicke at Eltham in the Christmas time (at which our ancient authors begin to draw the circles of their yeeres) but recouering himselfe a little, he repaired to London about Candlemas, there to hold a Parliament; the end whereof he liued not to see, but vpon the twentieth day of March finished his short, but politicke and victorious reigne, in peace and honour, had not the iniustice of his first entrance left a dishonorable staine vpon his worthiest actions.

(51) The vulgar Chronicles tell vs a strange Story, the truth whereof must rest vpon the reporters. The King, say they, lying dangerously sicke, caused his Crowne to bee set on a Pillow at his beds head, when suddainely the pangs of his Apoplexie seizing on him so vehemently that all supposed him dead, the Prince comming in, took away the Crown; which, his father reuiuing, soone missed; and calling for his sonne, demanded, what he meant; to bereaue him of that, whereto hee had yet no right? The Prince boldlie replied; Long may you liue Soueraigne Father to weare it your selfe; but all men deeming you were departed to inherite another Crowne, this being my right, I tooke as mine owne, but now doe acknowledge for none of mine; and thereupon he set the Crowne againe where he found it. Oh sonne, (quoth hee) with what right I got it, God onely knoweth, who forgiue me the sinne; howsoeuer it was got, sayd the Prince, I meane to keepe and defend it, (when it shall bee myne) with my sword, as you by sword haue obtained it. Which the King hearing, hee entered discourse of aduise, shewing him that hee feared some discord would arise betwixt him and his brother Thomas Duke of Clarence, who with better respect had borne forth his youth then Prince Henry had done, and whose distemper was like to breed great troubles, if it were not in time stayed. If my brethren (quoth Henry) will be true subiects, I will honour them as my brethren, but if otherwise, I shall assoone execute iustice vpon them, as on the meanest of birth in my Kingdome. The King reioycing at this vnexpected answere; both prudently and Christianly charged him "before God, to minister the law indifferently, to "ease the oppressed, to beware of flatterers, not to "deferre iustice, nor yet to be sparing of mercy. Pu-"nish (quoth hee) the oppressors of thy people, "so shalt thou obtaine fauour of God, and loue "and feare of thy Subiects, who whiles they haue "wealth, so long shalt thou haue their obedience, "but made poore by oppressions, will be ready to "make insurrections. Reioyce not so much in the "glory of thy Crowne, as meditate on the burthe-"nous care which accompanieth it; mingle loue "with feare, so thou as the heart shalt be defended "in the midst of the body: but know, that neither "the heart without the members, nor a King with-"out his Subiects helpe is of any force. Lastly "my sonne loue and feare God, ascribe all thy victo-"ries, strength, friends, obedience, riches, honour "and all, vnto him: and with the Psalmist say with all "thankes, Not vnto vs Lord, not vnto vs but to thy holy "name be giuen the laud and praise.

*(52) Vpon what soile these most Christian, true and excellent Councels fell, the following life will shew, being nothing else, but a full representation in act, of such things, as are here in precept only, shewing to the world how diuine a beautie Christian goodnes hath.

(53) The first wife of King Henry the fourth, was Mary one of the daughters and heires of Humfrey de Bohun, Earle of Hereford, Essex and Northampton, Constable of England, &c. Shee dyed An. D. 1394. before he came to the Crowne.

(54) His second wife was Ioane, Queene, daughter to Charles the first, King of Nauarre, shee being the widow of Iohn de Montford, Sirnamed Stremi, Duke of Britaine; and died without any Children by King Henry, at Hauering in the Bower in the County of Essex 1437. the tenth day of Iulie in the fifteenth yeere of Henry the sixt, and was buried by her husband at Canterbury.

His Children.

(55) Henry, the Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornewall, Earle of Chester, and afterward King of England, whose glorious life and acts next insue.

(56) Thomas, Duke of Clarence, President of the Councell to King Henry the first (his brother,) and Steward of England. He was slaine at Beaufort in Anion without any issue. He married Margaret daughter daughter to Thomas Holland, Earle of Kent, the widow of Iohn Beauford, Earle of Somerset.

(57) Iohn Duke of Bedford, Regent of France in the time of King Henry the sixt, Duke also of Anion and Alanson; Earle of Cenomannia, Harecourt, of Kendall and Dreux, Viscount Beaumont. He married first with Anne, daughter to Iohn Duke of Burgundy. Secondly with Iacoba, daughter to Peter de Luxemburgh Earle of Saint Paul. And died without any issue.

(58) Humfrey, was by his brother King Henry the fifth created Duke of Gloucester, was Protectour of the Kingdome of England for 25. yeeres, in the time of King Henry the sixt, in whose first yeere hee styled himselfe in his Charters thus: Humfrey by the grace of God, sonne, brother, and vncle to Kings, Duke of Gloucester, Earle of Henault, Holland, Zeland, and Pembroke; Lord of Friesland, Great Chamberlaine of the Kingdome of England, Protector and Defendor of the same Kingdome, and Church of England. Hee was a man, who nobly deserued of the common wealth and of learning, as being himselfe very learned, and a magnificent Patron and benefactor of the Vniuersity of Oxford, where hee had beene educated; and was generally called, the Good Duke. Hee married first Iacoba, heire to William Duke of Bauaria Earle of Holland, who (as after was knowne) had first beene lawfully troth-plighted to Iohn Duke of Brabant, and therefore was afterward diuorced from the said Humfrey. His second wife was Elianor daughter to Reginald, Baron Cobham de Scarborough. Queene Margaret, wife to King Henry the sixt, repining at his great power in swaying the King & state, secretly wrought his ruine, hee being murthered in his bed at Bury, dying without any issue, 1446. His body was buried at Saint Albans, yet the vulgar error is that he lyes buried in Saint Pauls.

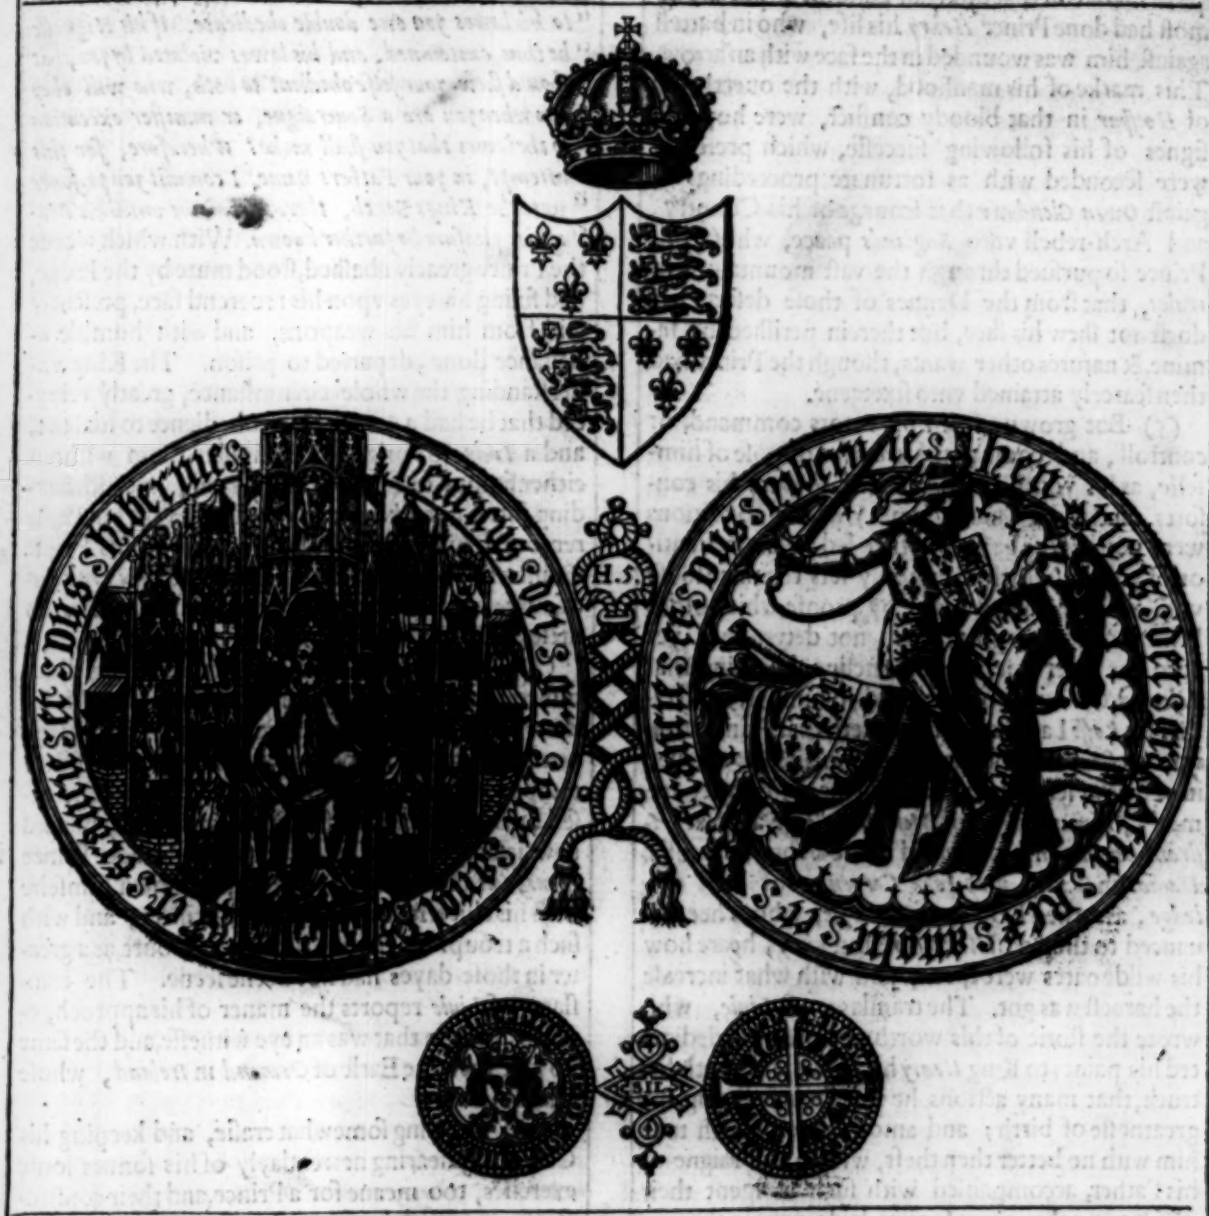
HENRIE

HENRIE THE FIFTH, KING OF ENGLAND, AND FRANCE, LORD OF IRELAND, THE TWO AND FIFTIETH MONARCH OF ENGLAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSVE.

Monarch 52



CHAPTER XV.

AMongst the many Monarchs of this most famous Empire, none is found more complete with all heroicall vertues then is this King, of whose life by order and succesſe of ſtory wee are now to write; which is Henry of that name the fifth, the renowne of England, and glory of Wales. Of whom, what was ſpoken of Titus in the flouriſhing times of the Romans, may for the time of his raigne be truly verified in him: both of them being the louely darlings, and delightfull ioy of Mankind. But as Titus is taxed by his ſtory-Writers, in youth to haue been riotous, profuſe, waſtfull and wanton, for which (as he ſaith) with the diſlikes of men he ſlept into the throne; ſo if wee will beleeue what others haue writ, Henry * was wilde whiles hee was a Prince, whoſe youthfull prankes as they paſſed with his yeers, let vs haue leaue here to rehearſe, and leaue them motiues to our owne vſe, as hee made them for his.

(2) His birth was at Mowmouth in the Marches of Wales, the yeer of Chriſts aſſuming our fleſh, 1388 and the eleuenth of King Richards raigne, his father then a Subiect, and Earle of Derbie, Leiceſter, & Lincolne, afterwards created Duke of Hereford, in right of his wife, then of Lancaſter, by the death of his father; and laſtly by election made the Soueraigne of England, (that vnfortunate Richard) being depoſed the Crowne. His mother was Mary, ſecond daughter and coheire of Humfrey Bohun Earle of Hereford, and Northampton, high Conſtable of England, * as we haue ſaid.

(3) His young yeeres were ſpent in literature in the Academie of Oxford, where in Queenes Colledge he was a Student vnder the tuition of his vncle Henry Beauford, Chancellour of that Vniuerſity, afterwards Biſhoppe of Lincolne and Wincheſter, and laſtly made Cardinall by the title of Euſebius. But his Father obtayning the Crowne, and himſelfe come come to the age of twelue yeeres, had the ſucceſsion thereof entailed on him by Parliament, and accordingly was created Prince of wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Cheſter, and preſently had the Title of the Dukedome of Aquitaine conferred vpon him, the better to effect the thing then intended, which was to haue obtained in marriage young Queene Iſabel, late wife to the murthered King Richard, daughter of Charles the ſixt, King of France.

(4) From Oxford, Prince Henry was called to Court, and the Lord Thomas Percy then Earle of Worceſter made his Gouernour; but being himſelfe falſe to the Father, could giue no good example vnto the ſonne, whoſe hoſtile attempts in the field of Shrewsburie coſt that diſloyall Earle his head, and almoſt had done Prince Henry his life, who in battell againſt him was wounded in the face with an arrow. This marke of his manhood, with the ouerthrow of Hotſpur in that bloody conflict, were hopefull ſignes of his following ſucceſſe, which preſently were ſeconded with as fortunate proceedings againſt Owen Glendowr that ſcourge of his Country, and Arch-rebell vnto Englands peace, whom this Prince ſo purſued through the vaſt mountaines of wales, that from the Dennes of thoſe deſerts hee durſt not ſhew his face, but therein periſhed by famine, & natures other wants, though the Prince had then ſcarcely attained vnto ſixeteene.

(5) But growne from his tutors command, or controll, and come to the yeers for diſpoſe of himſelfe, as his youth ſtood affected, ſo were his conſorts, and thoſe (many times) whoſe conditions were none of the beſt; whether led by an inclination of youth (which commonly lets the raine looſe vnto Will) or, to know that by proofe, which other Princes doe by report, I will not determine: yet vnto the latter doe I rather incline, knowing that Salomon the wiſeſt of Kings did ſo himſelfe; and rather by Roſſe I am lead, who writeth that Prince Henry in Oxford had in great veneration, ſuch as excelled in vertue or learning, and among many, two hee nameth, Thomas Rodban of Merton Colledge a great Aſtronomer, by him preferred to the Biſhopricke of S. Dauids in Wales, and Iohn Carpenter of Oriel Colledge, a learned Doctor of Theologie, whom hee aduanced to the See of Worceſter. But let vs heare how his wilde oates were ſpent, and with what increaſe the harueſt was got. The tranſlater of Liuie, who wrote the ſtorie of this worthy Prince, and dedicated his paines to King Henry his ſonne, affirmeth for truth, that many actions he did, farre vnfitting his greatneſſe of birth; and among other, doth taxe him with no better then theft, who in the raigne of his Father, accompanied with ſuch as ſpent their wits vpon other mens ſpoiles, laide waite in the way for his Rents receiuers, and robd them of that which indeed was his owne, when ſometimes in ſhufling he nothing was ſpared, but bare away many knocks. the lenders whereof hee would frankly reward, when they complained vnto him of their loſſes receiued, which euer were abated in the foot of their accounts.

(6) Our learned Knight Eliot ſetting his pen to portrait a perfect Gouernour, recordeth a ſtory, retaining this Princes great fame, the credit whereof let it lie vpon himſelfe. It chanced (ſaith he) a ſeruant of his to bee arraigned for felony at the Kings Bench-Barre, where ſtanding ready to receiue ſentence of death, the Prince had intelligence, and poſted thither, where finding his ſeruant made ſure for ſtarting, commanded his fetters to be ſtrucke off, & the fellow arraigned to be freed the Court. All men amaſed at this his approach and ſpeech: the Chiefe Iuſtice ſtood vp, and ſhewed the Prince that his ſeate was the Kings, that lawes were the ſinewes of the Common-wealth, that himſelfe was ſworn to doe Iuſtice, and muſt yeeld an account for all that he did, that he honored him as the eldeſt ſonne of his Soueraigne, and Prince, but to ſet free the priſoner, hee could not, hauing ſo apparantly endangered his life to the law; and therefore deſired the Prince, if hee held him in ſuch eſteeme, to ſaue him by pardon from the King, and not to infringe the law, which he told him plainely he ſhould not doe.

Sir Tho. Eliot Gouernour.

(7) The Prince enraged to haue the deniall, aſſaied himſelfe to ſet free the Priſoner, which the Chiefe Iuſtice forbadde, commanding him vpon his allegiance to ceaſe from ſuch riot, and to keepe the Kings peace: whereat Prince Henry in a furie ſtept vp to the Bench, and gaue the Iudge a blow on the face, who nothing daunted, ſate ſtill, and with a bold "countenance, ſpake thus to the Prince, Sir I pray you "remember your ſelfe, this ſeat of iudgement which here "I poſſeſſe, is not mine, but your Fathers, to whom and "to his lawes you owe double obedience. If his Higneſſe "be thus contemned, and his lawes violated by you, that "ſhould ſhew your ſelfe obedient to both, who will obey "you when you are a Soueraigne, or miniſter execution "to the lawes that you ſhall make? Wherefore, for this "attempt, in your Fathers name, I commit you priſoner "vnto the Kings Bench, there to remaine vntill his Ma- "ieſties pleaſure be further known. With which words the Prince greatly abaſhed, ſtood mute by the Iudge, and fixing his eyes vpon his reuerend face, preſently laid from him his weapons, and with humble obeiſance done, departed to priſon. The King vnderſtanding the whole circumſtance, greatly reioyced that he had a Sonne of ſuch obedience to his laws, and a Iudge ſo vpright to adminiſter them without either fauour or feare of the perſon; notwithſtanding for this, and other like actions of his youth, he remoued him from being Preſident of his Priuie Councell, and placed in his ſtead Thomas Duke of Clarence his ſecond brother; to Prince Henries no little griefe and diſcontent.

(8) Howbeit his followers were nothing diminiſhed, but his Court frequented more then his fathers, which bred ſome ſuſpition in the crazie kings head, leſt among his other wild parts, hee would attempt to play with his Crowne; which was encreaſed by his domeſticall flatterers, who dayly buzzed new iealouſies into his eares. This made Prince Henry (as Otterborne noteth) to ſtrengthen himſelfe with his chiefeſt friends, and well-willers, and with ſuch a troupe repaired to his fathers Court, as a greater in thoſe dayes had not beene ſeene. The tranſlator of Liuie reports the maner of his approch, euen from him that was an eye witneſſe, and the ſame no leſſe then the Earle of Ormond in Ireland, whoſe relation is this.

(9) The King ſomewhat craſie, and keeping his Chamber, hearing newes dayly of his ſonnes looſe exerciſes, too meane for a Prince, and their conſtructions euer made to aime at his Crowne, he both beganne to withdraw his fatherly affection, and to feare ſome violence againſt his owne perſon: which when Prince Henry heard of, by ſome that fauoured him of the Kings Councell, in a ſtrange diſguiſe hee repaired to his Court, accompanied with many Lords and noble mens ſonnes. His garment was a gowne of blew Satten, wrought full of Eylet-holes, and at euery Eylet the Needle left hanging by the ſilke it was wrought with: about his arme he ware a dogs-collar ſet full of S.S. of gold, the Tirets thereof being moſt fine gold. Thus comming to Weſtminſter, and the Court of his Father, hauing commanded his followers to aduance no further then the fire in the hall, himſelfe accompanied with ſome of the Kings houſhold, paſſed on to his preſence, and after his duty and obeyſance done, offered to make knowne the cauſe of his comming. The king weake then with ſickeneſſe, and ſuppoſing the worſt, commanded himſelfe to bee borne into a withdrawing Chamber, ſome of his Lords attending vpon him, before whoſe feet Prince Henry fell, and with all reuerent obſeruances, ſpake to him as followeth.

(10) "Moſt gracious Soueraigne and renowned father,

"father, the ſuſpition of diſloyalty, and diuulged "reports of my dangerous intendmentes towardes "your royall Perſon and Crowne, hath enforced at "this time, and in this manner, to preſent my ſelfe "and life at your Maieſties diſpoſe. Some faults and "miſpent time (with bluſhes I may ſpeake it) my "youth hath committed, yet thoſe made much more "by ſuch fleering pickthanks, that blow them ſtron-"ger into your vnwilling and diſtaſtiue eare. The "name of Soueraigne ties alleagiance to all, but of a "Father, to a further feeling of natures obedience; "ſo that my ſinnes were double, if ſuch ſuggeſtions "poſſeſſed my heart: for the Law of God orday-"neth, that he which doth preſumptuouſly againſt "the Ruler of his people ſhall not liue, and the child "that ſmiteth his father ſhall die the death: ſo farre "therefore am I from any diſloyall attempt, againſt "the perſon of you my Father, and the Lords an-"nointed; that if I knew any of whom you ſtoode "in the leaſt danger or feare, my hand according to "duety ſhall be the firſt to free your ſuſpition; yea "I wil moſt gladly ſuffer death to eaſe your perplex-"ed heart; and to that end I haue this day prepa-"red my ſelf both by confeſſion of my offences paſt, "and receiuing the bleſſed Sacrament. Wherefore I "humbly beſeech your Grace to free your ſuſpition "from all feares conceiued againſt mee, with this "dagger, the ſtabbe whereof I will willingly receiue "here at your Maieſties hand, and ſo doing, in the "preſence of theſe Lords, and before God at the day "of iudgement, I clearely forgiue my death. But the King melting into teares, caſt downe the naked dagger (which the Prince deliuered him) and raiſing his proſtrate ſonne, embraced and kiſſed him, confeſsing his eares to haue beene ouer-credulous that way, and promiſing neuer to open them againe againſt him. But the Prince vnſatisfied, inſtantly deſired, that at leaſt his accuſers might be produced, and if conuicted, to receiue puniſhment, though not to the full of their demerites; to which requeſt the King replied, that as the offence was capitall, ſo ſhould it bee examined by the Peeres, and therefore willed him to reſt contented vntill the next Parliament. Thus by his great wiſdome he ſatisfied his father from further ſuſpition, and recouered his loue that neerely was loſt. Hetherto of Henry as he was Prince (ſome other of whoſe youthly actions we alſo touched in his fathers raigne) and now to his Acts after he was King.

(11) Henry ordained ſucceſſor, and ouerſeer of his dying Fathers Teſtament, had in his entrance ſo fortunate proceedings, as hee ſeemeth to exceed all his Predeceſſors; his Nobles proffering the oath of their Alleagiance, before himſelfe had made his, for the iuſt gouernment of the Common-weale, which ſo farre was from acceptation, that hee deſired God neuer to admit him to the Crowne, vnleſſe he ſhould to his glory raigne, and rule the Scepter to the good of the Subiect. The day of his entrance and of his Fathers death, being the twentieth of March, and yeere of Chriſts Incarnation, according to our account, 1412. on the ninth of Aprill following hee was ſolemnly crowned at Weſtminſter, Thomas Arundel Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury performing the roiall Ceremonies: which no ooner was ended, but to beginne a good gouernment, hee beganne with himſelfe, baniſhing from his preſence and Court the vnbridleled youthes which had beene his conſorts, commanding them either to change their manners, or neuer to approch within ten miles where hee lay. Then choſe hee worthy and prudent men for his Councell of Eſtate, and aduanced his Clergie with dignity and power: being himſelfe as zealous in deuotion, as liberall in building, and indowing of places for deuotion of others. His Iuſtice was found of all that ſought it; for euery day after dinner for the ſpace of an houre, his cuſtome was to leane on a cuſhion ſet by his cupbord, and there himſelfe receiued petitions of the oppreſſed, which with great equity he did redreſſe.

And for a further teſtimony of his tender and compaſſionate heart, the ſlaughtered body of K. Richard ouer-meanely enterred at Langley, in great eſtate he remoued into Saint Peters Church at Weſtminſter, and there laid him enſhrined by Queene Anne his firſt wife (as himſelfe had deſired and prepared) founding a weekely memoriall to bee celebrated, and ſix ſhillings eight pence thereon diſtributed vnto the poore, and yeerelie twentie pounds giuen vpon his anniuerſarie day, beſides foure tapers to burne before his monument day and night for euer. And ſo neerely did his death touch this innocent King, that hee ſent to Rome to bee aſſoyled from that guilt of his fathers Act, by the Popes holineſſe, then accounted another God; whoſe penance enioined, he willinglie performed, and afterwards purpoſed to haue made warre in Paleſtina againſt the enemies of Chriſt; for which end, hee ſent Sir Hugh de Launy of Henault to Ieruſalem, to diſcouer the ſtate of things there; but before his returne he was departed to the heauenly Ieruſalem himſelfe. Rob. Fabian.

(12) The obſequies of his Father being ſolemnized at Canterbury, and the King in perſon attending the Corps, fitte occaſion was giuen vnto Archbiſhoppe Arundell to complain of the Wickliffians, (then termed Lollards) great rubs in the wayes of the Clergies pride and proceedings; whereof Sir Iohn Oldcaſtle was thought a chiefe, who by his marriage contracted with a kinſwoman of the Lord Cobhams of Cooling in Kent, obtained the title thereof, a man ſtrong and valourous, and in eſpeciall fauour with his Prince. This Knight in their Synode aſſembled at London, immediately after the Kings Coronation, was accuſed by them to haue rent Chriſts ſeameleſſe coat, in maintaining VVickliffes doctrine to bee taught, eſpecially in the Dioceſſe of London, Rocheſter, and Hereford: againſt whom alſo ſome choiſe Inquiſitors at Oxford, appointed for Hereſies (though *that whole Vniuerſity had formerly vpheld both Wickliffe and his doctrine,) informed and preſented his name with two hundred forty ſixe concluſions, which they had collected to be hereticall. Polychron. Vpon Trinity Sunday. Nich Vigenar. in hiſt. de l' Egliſe. *Fox in Acts and Monuments. Oper a Iob. Huſſ. To. 2.

(13) The King incenſed (by the Archbiſhoppes ſuggeſtions) againſt theſe diſcontented diſcipliners, was further made beleeue that they themſelues had ſet vp billes in diuers places, threatning that an hundred thouſand perſons were ready for armes, againſt all that withſtood their reformation, and among theſe that Oldcaſtle his Knight was reputed the chiefe. The King graciouſly inclined, heard the Archbiſhops complaint, and being at Kennington promiſed to conferre with the Lord Cobham himſelf, which accordingly hee did, inſtantly willing him to ſubmit himſelfe to the cenſure of the Church and obedience of the Archbiſhoppe: but Cobham, no turne-coate from his profeſsion, humbly told the King he owed his ſubiection only vnto his Maieſty whom God had placed in theſe his Dominions, as his onely vice-gerent to gouerne his people and Subiects, and that himſelfe forced nothing Romes leaden ſword, vnſheached by the Pope (that Antichriſt) againſt the Lords ſeruants, nor would ſuffer the key of Canterbury to open the cloſet of his conſcience, where the ſpirite of God was reſiding, bearing witneſſe with his, that hee ſtood in the truth, for whoſe defence as his Champion, he was ready to liue or die. Thom. Walſing.

(14) This anſwere receiued, was ſo deliuered vnto the Archbiſhoppe, with power to cite, examine and puniſh, as their owne Canons in ſuch caſes had decreed. The Lyon thus laid for, whoſe paw they ſtill feared, was ſerued by proceſſe to appeare in the Archbiſhops Court, and the ſame deliuered by one Butler a ſeruant of the Kings Priuy Chamber, for that the bold Sumner durſt not doe it himſelfe, and the Archbiſhoppe (diligent leſt he ſhould forget the day) cauſed his letters cicatorie to be ſet vpon the gates of the Cathedrall Church of Rocheſter, which were preſently torne downe, and others againe ſet vp, were againe pulled off, to the Acts and Monuments.

great great offence of the Clergies eye, and the rather, for that the Actor could not be knowne. The Knight not appearing (as knowing their malice and his own danger) was condemned of contumacie, and afterwards in a Synode at Rochester, was by the Archbishop pronounced an Heretike, where himselfe then enacted that hereticall decree, that the holy Scriptures should not bee translated into the English tongue. But marke the iudgement that fell vpon his own tongue, whose rootes and blade shortly after (as is recorded) grew so big in his mouth and throate, that he could neither speake nor swallow downe meat, but in horror lay languishing, till lastly he so dyed starued by famine.

Archbishop Arundels death.

(15) In the meane time the Lord Cobham wrote his * Beliefe, which was very Christianlike, and presented it himselfe to the King, who (being much prepossessed) in no wise would receiue it, but suffered him to bee summoned in his presence, and priuie Chamber, when the Knight for his purgation offered an hundred knights and Esquires, which would not be accepted; then, according to his degree of Order, and law of Armes, he required the single Combat to fight for life or death, with either Christian or Heathen in the quarrell of his faith, the King and Councell onely excepted. This notwithstanding could not be suffered, but needes must he appeare before the Archbishop his Iudge: where, after diuers examinations (in all which hee most religiously iustified himself & his profession) he was condemned of Heresie, and committed Prisoner vnto the Tower of London, whence shortly he escaped, and got into Wales. Vpon which escape great feares were conceiued, especially of the Clergy, the causers of his troubles, and mortall Enemies to him & his welwillers, for the king was confidently (but as it seemeth malitiously) informed; that Oldcastle with his adherents laid for his life, & that in S. Giles Fields neere vnto Holborne twenty thousand were to assemble in hostile manner, with an intent to destroy the Monasteries of Westminster, Saint Albans, all the religious houses in London, and the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paules. The King therefore in person himselfe after midnight with a great Army came into these fields, where (if wee will beleeue their professed enemies) fourescore of that faction were apprehended, who sayd they came to seeke the Lord Cobham. But as the answerer of Copus from more ancient times hath obserued, that in daies of persecution, such assemblies often had beene made to heare the Gospell preached, which otherwise they could not enioy: so in this place * then ouergrowne with bushes and vnfit for battell, those few were in likelyhood assembled vnto Iohn Beuerly a godly man their Preacher, without any intent of treason, hauing for their Chieftaines no greater persons then Sir Roger Acton a Knight of no great account, a Minister, and a malt man. But their Apologies we leaue to*others; onely the Lord Cobham could not be found, though the King by Proclamation had promised a thousand markes to his taker, besides many liberties to the City or Towne, that would disclose him; whereby (saith Walsing:) it may be ghessed, that the whole Kingdome, well neere, embraced his opinions which that Fryar cals his madnesse: Thirty seauen of that assembly were condemned, whereof seauen were consumed with fire and strangled, Acton, Beuerley and Murly were likewise executed.

(16) As the zeale of this King is much commended for his fauours towards his Clergy, so is his Princely pittie in the commiseration of young Percies distresse, whose father Hotspur slaine at Shrewsbury (as we haue said) and hee by his Grandfather sent into Scotland for security, was there notwithstanding deteined a Prisoner, for that Iames their King was forcibly kept in England by Henrie, and as they tooke it against all Iustice. But fit occasion being offered for young Percies release, and exchange made betweene him and Alrede sonne of Robert Duke of Albany (who had beene taken prisoner at the Battell of Halidon) the king restored him not only in blood, and to grace in his Court, but also inuested his person with the Title and State of his Grandfather, to his owne no little honour, and faithfull seruice attained of that honourable family.

The man though not so rich by birth as Arundle was, yet as strong for the Clergy, and more gratious with his Prince as the sequele proued.

(18) The first assaies of both was made knowne in a Parliament holden at Leicester, where in a Bill exhibited, complaint was made, that the temporall Lands giuen to religious houses and spirituall persons for deuotion were either superfluous, or disorderly spent; whose reuenues (if better imploied) would suffice for the defence of the Land, and honor of the king; fifteene Earles, fifteene hundred knights sixe thousand two hundred Esquires, and one hundred Almes-houses, for the reliefe of impotent and diseased persons, and vnto the kings Coffers twentie thousand pound by yeere. Which Bill (saith Hall) made the fat Abbots to sweat, the proud Priors to frowne, the poore Friers to curse, the silly Nunnes to weepe, and indeed all her Merchants to feare, that Babell would downe.

(19) To stop the breach of which searching spring, no better meanes could be found, then to diuert the Parliament with other businesses, and to driue other proiects into the kings minde; whose "head (as this new Archbishoppe there tolde him) "had the best right to the Crowne of France: for "not onlie the Dutchies of Normandy, Aquitaine, "and Anion, the Counties of Gascoigne, Maine, "and the rest, were his lawfull) though vnlawfullie "detained) inheritance; but therewithall the whole "Realme of France, as true heire vnto his great "Grandfather king Edward the third, and vnto "Philip the faire, in right of his mother Queene Isabell, the only daughter and Child liuing of the "said French king. As for the law Salique alleaged "against the Englisli claime, he affirmed, that Text "touched only those parts in Germany, which lay "betwixt the riuers Elbe, and Sala conquered by "king Charles the great, who placing his French "there to inhabite, for the dishoneste liues of those "Germaine women made this law. In terram Salicam Mulieres ne succedant, which the Glosse did "falsly expound for the whole kingdome of France. (20) The Archbiſhops vnexpected but not vnpremeditated Oration thus ended, ſo ſtirred the blood of the young Couragious King, that his heart was all on a flame; and ſo tickled the eares of his Auditory, as they preſently conceiued that France was their owne; the Title whereof deſcending from Iſabell, the mother of the famous third Edward, and ſhee the daughter and ſuruiuing heire vnto Philip the faire; his right was, lineally deriued thence as followeth, firſt Philip by Ioane his firſt wife intituled Queene of Nauarre, had three ſonnes and one daughter, namely Lewis, Philip and Charles, all three ſucceſsiuely Kings, and this Lady Iſabell, by whom the Engliſh claime: his ſecond wife was Conſtance the daughter of the King of Sicil, who bare him a ſonne after his owne deceaſe which liued not many daies after his father. Lewis his eldeſt ſonne and tenth of that name ſucceeded Philip in the Kingdome of France, and by Margaret his wife the daughter of Burgundy had his daughter Iane intituled Queene of Nauarre, who made claime alſo vnto the French Crowne, but neuer attained it; ſo that her Title fell with her death. Lewis by his ſecond wife Clemence of Sicil, had a ſonne named Iohn borne vnto him, but preſently both father and ſonne departing this life, left the Scepter to his ſecond brother; who by the name of Philip the fift, a while wore the Emperiall Crowne, of France: his wife was Iane the daughter of Burgoine, who bare vnto him only foure daughters.

(21) Vnto King Philip ſucceeded his brother Charles the faire, the fourth of that name, whoſe firſt wife was Blanch, detected of incontinency and brought him no fruite, his ſecond wife was Marie daughter to Henry Luxenbourg the Emperour, who bare him a ſonne that dyed ſoone after birth, and the mother likewiſe ſhortly came to her graue. Margaret the daughter to the Earle of Eureux, was his third and laſt wife, who at his death hee left with Child, and thus the three ſonnes of Philip were branched, raigned, and died, whom Queene Iſabell their ſiſter ſuruiued, and in that right her ſonne King Edward the third, by his royall conſanguinity whilſt the Crowne ſtood thus at ſuſpence, till a Prince ſhould be borne, claimed to be Regent in the Interregnum, and in the nonage of the looked for iſſue, againſt which, Philip de Valois ſonne of Charles the hardy, who was brother to Philip the faire, being a ſecond branch from Hugh Capet, and firſt Prince of the blood of France, maintained that the Regency of the male (if ſo he were borne) as alſo of the Realme (if a daughter or the ſonne dyed) belonged onely vnto him as the next in blood. The ſtate thus ſtanding, and a daughter borne, Philip was ſaluted and proclaimed King, no other right alleaged then this foiſted and falſely termed fundamentall law Salique, for no otherwiſe doth Ottoman the French famous Lawyer eſteeme of that vngodly and vniuſt Ordinance, if any ſuch had beene ordained.

(22) The Kings right thus apparant, and ſufficient poſſeſsions to be had in France: the Bill of complaint againſt the Clergies exceſſe was quite daſht, and all mindes addicted for the affaires that way; thinking it vnreaſonable to pull the Prouiſions from their natiues and brethren, when as the Circuit of their inheritanee extended more large in compaſſe: and therefore with the Danites they determined no longer to ſit ſo pent with increaſe, ſeeing God had giuen them another Kingdome, but would free their own ſtraitneſſe by dint of ſword, and ſpread their Tents wider in the Continent of France: Neither was there any motiue more forceable in conference, then was the ſucceſſe of thoſe intruding Princes, who aſſaied the Crowne by that vniuſt claime of law Salique. Iudg. 18.

(23) For did not the ſword of God (rather then man) in the hand of King Edward, the claimer cut downe the flower of France in the Battell of Crecie, with the ſlaughter of Lewis King of Bohemia, of Charles the French Kings brother, of Iames Dolphin of Viennois, the Dukes of Lorrayne, and Burbon, the Earles of Aumarle, Sauoy, Montbilliard, Flanders, Niuers and Harecourt, the Grand Priour of France, the Archbiſhop, and Zanxinus and Noyone, of Lords, Barons, and Gentlemen to the number of 1500 with 30. thouſand of the French Souldiers, and Philip not able of himſelfe to defend himſelfe, inciting Dauid of Scotland to inuade and weaken England, therein did but only vexe his owne ſpirit, for in that attempt the Scottiſh King was taken priſoner and brought ſo to London, leauing Philip to ſtruggle with his hard fortunes in France, which with bad ſucceſſe hee did to the day of his death. Io. Serres.

(24) Iohn his ſonne by the ſame title and claime felt the ſame ſtroake of iuſtice from the hand of that thunderbolt in warre Edward ſurnamed the blacke Prince, the ſonne of Englands Mars, who farre inferiour to the French in number, farre exceeded them in marſhall power, when at the battell of Poitiers the French royall Standard was ſtroke downe, an hundred Enſignes wonne by the Engliſh, the Conſtable, Marſhall and great Chamberlaine of France with fifty two Lords and ſeuenteen hundred Gentlemen ſlaine in the field. King Iohn himſelfe, his ſonne Philip, two Biſhops, thirteene Earles, and one and thirty Lords taken priſoners by the Prince, to his great praiſe and confirmation of his iuſt cauſe. Io. Serres

(25) Nor was the puniſhment of the father any whit leſſened in King Charles the ſonne then raigning, who beſides the inteſtine warres in his own dominions was by Gods iuſt iudgement ſtrucke into a Lunacy, being vnable to gouerne himſelfe much leſſe his Kingdome, vpon which aduantage (as the French would haue it) King Henry now plaied; though it be moſt certaine he ſought his right farre otherwiſe, for ſo it ſtandeth vpon record dated the ninth of February and firſt of Henry the fift his raigne, that he ſent his Ambaſſadors vnto the French King, who could not bee admitted to his preſence, and him whom they imployed to procure acceſſe was by the French committed to Priſon: whereat King Henry moſt iuſtly conceiued a grudge. Paulus Æmilius their owne Story-writer ſaith, that Henry King of England, ſent honorable Ambaſſadors to demand in marriage the Lady Katherine daughter vnto the French King: which (as he ſaith) was neglected with this anſwere, that the King had no leaſure to thinke on that buſineſſe: whom Franciſcus Roſenius doth further inlarge, ſaying, the King ſcornefully ſmiling anſwered that France was neither deſtitute of Dukes, nor hee at Ex Record. apud Weſtm. *P. leasure to thinke of the Propoſition; and being iealous leſt Burgoigne would match his daughter with Henry, ſent him a command to the contrary, and again at their Concluſion of peace, expreſly enioyned the ſaid Duke, and all other Princes of the bloud, not to make any alliance of mariage with England, whereby K. Henry was further exaſperated againſt France. And laſtly, by his counſell and conference vpon the Archbiſhops Oration ſent a Summons and demand of the Dutchies of Normandy, Aquitaine, Guyen, & Anion; in deriſion whereof, as Caxton recordeth, the Dolphin of France, ſent him a Tunne of Tennis Balls, as Bullets moſt fit for his tender hands, who had ſpent his youth (as he thought) more among Rackets, then regard of his perſon or matters of State: ſo forward is man to be an Actor in common miſeries, when the Fates haue made the Subiect of the Scene Tragicall, that hee drawes the hand of Deſtinie, ſooner to ſtrike, and heauier to fal vpon that proiect decreed to bee caſt downe: for by theſe diſdains and vnprincely dealings the Crowne of France was graſpt by the Engliſh hard hand, and that faire ſoile ſtained with her Natiues owne bloud: for the Preſent receiued as it was ſent, had promiſe to bee repayed with balles of more force, whoſe ſtroke ſhould bee ſuch as the ſtrongeſt gates of Paris ſhould not be rackets ſufficient to bandy the rebound.

(26) Grudges thus growne, and warres in preparing, the French thought it fitteſt to make Scotland their friend, whom they incited to moleſt the Engliſh Marches, which accordingly was done, and that with ſuch violence, as it was a queſtion decideable, whether of the Kingdoms was firſt to be dealt with Weſtmerland thought it ſafeſt to checke the Scots as the neerer and continuall backe-friends. To put back the Scots, Sir Robert Vmfreuile was ſent who in a skirmiſh vpon Mary Magdalens day tooke 360 of them priſoners, and with great ſpoile returned to Rocksburough Caſtell whereof hee had charge; the newes whereof K. Charles vnderſtanding, and the great preparation made againſt France, being better aduiſed vpon the dangerous euent, ſent his Ambaſſadors into England, whereof the Archbiſhoppe of Bourges was principall, who at Wincheſter made offer of money, and ſome other Territories (but none of the beſt) with the Princeſſe Lady Katherine to be giuen in marriage vnto King Henry, ſo that he would diſſolue his Armie and conclude a peace. hold his dealings honourable, and open, hee sent Antilop his pursevant at Armes, vnto King Charles with letters of defiances: next making Queene Ioan his mother in Law the Regent of the land, he drew his forces vnto Southampton, commaunding his followers there to attend him in readinesse by the feast of Saint Iohn Baptist ensuing.

(30) Charles the French King expecting present invasion, sent his Ambassadors vnto Iohn the sixt Duke of Britain, who had married his daughter with an hundred thousand Crowns, to leuie forces for his aide, and a Iewell worth fiue thousand Crownes more to himselfe, which the Duke promised to come in person to performe. And as it is reported, King Charles sent to Scrope, Grey and Cambridge (all three in especiall fauour with the King) a million of gold to betray Henry into his hands, or to murther him before hee should arriue in Normandy. These to make their faction stronger, though Scroope was Lord Treasurer, Grey a Priuie Councellour, & Cambridge the sonne of Edmund Duke of Yorke, meant to draw in, Edmund Earle of March the sonne of Roger Mortimer, and lineally the heire vnto Lionell Duke of Clarence, the next in succession for the house of Yorke, and reuealing their intended purpose, forced him to sweare to their secresie, which if hee refused, they threatned his death; whereupon he required but an howres respite, which hardly granted, he went to the King and reuealed the conspiracie, euen the night before the day that hee meant to put to sea.

(31) The parties apprehended and brought before him in presence of many nobles, King Henry "thus spake; With what horrour O Lord may anie "true Englishman consider that you for pleasing of "a forreine enemy, should imbrue your hands in "our blood, as also in the blood of our brethren, "to the ruine of your owne natiue soile! reuenge "herein touching my person though I seeke not; "yet for the safegard of you my deare friends, and "for due preseruation of the Realme, I am by place "and office to minister remedy against these Offen-"ders; Get you hence therefore you miserable "wretches, to receiue the iust reward of your de-"serts, wherein God giue you repentance for your so "foule sinnes.

(32) Notwithstanding this their offence, their inditement as it standeth in the Record, includes matter of other quality: that, Richard Earle of Cambridge of Conesburgh in the County of Yorke, and Thomas Grey of Heton in the Countie of Northumberland Knight, for that they in the twentieth of July and third of King Henry the fifts raigne, at Southampton had conspired together with a power of men, to haue lead away the Lord Edmund Earle of March into Wales, and to haue procured him to take the Gouernment of the Realme, in case that King Richard the second were dead; with a purpose to haue put forth a Proclamation in the name of the said Earle as heire to the Crowne, against King Henry by the name of Lancaster vsurper, and further to haue conuayed a Banner of the Armes of England, and a certaine Crowne of Spaine set vpon a Pallet (layd in gage to the sayd Earle of Cambridge) into Wales; As also that the said conspirators had appointed certaine into Scotland, to bring thence one Trumpington, and another resembling in shape, fauour, and countenance, King Richard. And Henrie Scroope of Masham in the Countie of Yorke was likewise indited as consenting to the Premisses. Thus well appeared their purpose, though Richard Earle of Cambridge, considering the possibility of his owne issue had secretly carried that businesse: whose sorrowfull letter of his owne hand writing, as it came to ours, we thinke not amisse here to insert.

Most dreadfull and Soueraigne Liege Lord, I Richard Yorke your humble subiect, and very Leigeman, beseech you of grace, of all manner of offences which I haue done or assented vnto, in any kind by stirring of other folke, egging me vnto, wherein I wot well I haue highly offended to your Highnesse, beseeching you at the reuerence of God, that you like to take mee into the hands of your mercifull and pitteous grace, thinking yet will of your great goodnes my Leige Lord: my full trust is, that you will haue consideration (though that my person be of none valew,) your high goodnesse (where God hath set you in so high estate) to euery Leigeman, that you longeth, plentiously to giue; that you like to accept this my simple request for the loue of our Lady, and the blessed holy Ghost, to whom I pray that they moue your heart euer to all pittie and grace for their high goodnes. Notwithstanding this his humble petition vpon the sixt of August following, hee, with Scroope, and Grey, were beheaded, and his body with head enterred in the Chappell of Gods-house in Southampton; whose apprehensions, arraignements, and deaths, were so followed each after others, as the French knew not, but that the treason had successe, and their returned Ambassadours told it for certaine, that King Henry had either dismissed his Army, or (which was thought more true) himselfe was slaine by the Conspirators; so easie an entrance hath babling report into the wide eares of credulous desire.

(33) But King Henrie now ready to embarke his men, vpon Wednesday the seauenth of August with fifteene hundred Saile tooke to Seas, attended with sixe thousand speares, and twenty foure thousand footmen besides Gunners, Enginers, Artificers and Labourers a great number, and the fifteenth of the same month cast Anchor in the mouth of Seyne, at a place called Kideaux, about three miles from Harflew, where he landed his men; and falling deuoutly vpon his knees, desired Gods assistance to recouer his right, making Proclamation vpon paine of death, that Churches should be spared from all violence of spoile, that Churchmen, women and Children, should not be hurt, abused or wronged: then giuing the order of Knighthood to many of his followers hee assigned his Standards to men of most strength and courage, which done he tooke the hill neere adioyning, and thence sent his spiall to the Towne of Harflew, making that the first assay of his fortunes in France. But before we enter any further discourse in the affaires of that Kingdome, it shall not be amisse to speake of things commenced in England before that King Henry tooke to the Seas.

(34) The Churches throughout Christendome, hauing beene disquieted the space of twentie nine yeers, and now growne intollerable, through the schismaticall ambitions, maintained by three Papall Monarchs, mounted into Saint Peters seate, each of them grasping the Chaire with so fast a fist, that the ioints thereof were forced asunder; and the triple Crowne so battered with their thunderbolts of their curses that it was flatted and made vnfit for any of their heads. The persons arreared were Iohn 23. by the Italians elected; the second was Gregory 12. whom the French had set vp; and the 3. was Benedict 13. preferred to the place by the Spaniard. These striuing for the helme, the ship was so steered, that her wracke was apparant vpon these raging and vnquiet Seas. To preuent which the Christian Princes put their helping hands, and by a generall consent, ordained a generall Councell to bee held at Constance in Germany, which began in February 1414 and continued aboue the space of three yeeres; whereunto were assembled besides the Emperour, the Pope and the Palsgraue of Rheine, foure Patriarks, twentie seauen Cardinals, forty seauen Archbishops, one hundred and sixty Bishops, Princes, Barons and Gentlemen with their attendants aboue thirtie thousand.

(35) Vnto this Councell King Henry sent Richard Clifford Bishop of London, Robert Halam Bishoppe of Salisbury, made Cardinall, and died at the same Councell. Iohn Keterich, Bishop of Couentree and Lichfield, Nicholas Bubwith Bishop of Bath and Wels. Iohn Wakering, Bishop of Norwich, Robert Maskall, Bishop of Hereford, Stephen Patrington, Bishop of S. Davids; the Abbot of Westminster, and Prior of Worcester, in company of whome, and for whose greater honour honour, Richard Earle of Warwicke was ſent, themſelues and attendants amounting to eight hundred horſe: ſo as it ſtood in ſuſpence whether their honorable preſence more graced the aſſembly, or their learning or Iudgement bettered the whole body of the Councell: inſomuch that two of theſe Biſhops were there made Cardinals, and of the thirty in beſt eſteeme appointed to aſsiſt the Cardinals in their Election of a new Pope, London, Couentree, Bath, and Wels were choſen, wherein Robert, Biſhop of London was firſt nominated for Pope, and he firſt nominated him that ſucceeded, which was Otho Collonna by the name of Martin the fift. Whoſe Coronation with great magnificence was celebrated of the fiue nations aſſembled, and this honour giuen to the Engliſh, that the Prior of Saint Iohns was a ſupporter of the triple Crowne. Touching the decrees that this Councell enacted, let it ſuffice vs to know that Wicliffes bookes were condemned for hereticall, that Iohn Hus (notwithſtanding the Emperours ſafeconduct) and Ierome of Prage, were both of them burned. The holy maide Bridget canonized a Saint, and that England was made a nation in rancke before Spaine.

(36) The deaths of theſe two diuines manie lamented, eſpecially the Bohemians, who had reaped much fruite from the ſeed they had ſowen, for whoſe doctrine they ſent a defence vnto the ſame Councel, and often became humble Petitioners for their liues, as largely appeareth in their letters written on their behalfe; in whom may truly bee verified that the blood of the Martyrs is the ſeed of the Church, which ſo increaſed in the parts of Bohemia that Pope Martin fearing all would be mard (Ziſca the ſcourge of the Papacy then in Arms to defend them) ſent for aid out of England, to repreſſe the Lollards (as hee termed them) and publiſhed his Buls againſt thoſe Huſſites, with as terrible roarings as vſually were his Croyſadoes againſt the Turkes.

(37) His Legate for theſe holy warres, he made Henrie Beaufort, the rich Cardinal of wincheſter, who with foure thouſand Engliſh aſsiſted with a ſubſidie of the Clergies Grant, did there verie valiantly for certaine months together, vntill hee was recalled by the Pope: wherein Countie Ziſca (though euer a victor) loſt both his eyes, and being blind led forth his army with ſuch terror to his foes, as his name became fearefull, and oft-times was ſufficient to attaine victory without any ſtroake, inſomuch as hee commanded his owne skinne to bee flead off after his death, and to bee made the head of their drum, affirming that the very ſound thereof, would driue the enemy out of the field. But from theſe Church matters and Prelates proceedings, let vs returne from whence we haue ſtept, and continue the affairs of our famous K. Henry hauing now ſet footing in France.

(38) His followers and fellowes in theſe new begunne warres were his two brethren the Dukes of Clarence, and Gloceſter, as alſo his vncles the Duke of Yorke, and Earle of Dorſet, accompanied with the Earles of Kent, Cornewall, and Huntington, beſides a moſt noble fellowſhip of the other Lords, Barons and men at armes: with theſe from Kideaux hee marched towards Harflew, affecting that Towne the firſt, being a port commodiouſly ſeated vpon the mouth of the Riuer Seyne, and a ſafe entrance vnto his intended Conqueſt, aſwell for the landing of his men, as to hinder the paſſage vnto Roane and Paris, both which receiued traffique by the ſame Riuer.

(39) The Towne being ſeated betwixt two hils, that next the Sea the King tooke, at the foote whereof, he cauſed a deepe trench to be caſt, bringing in water to impeach the bottome, and raiſing the rampier to a great thicknes, whereon he erected many ſconces of earth like vnto Caſtles, ſet thicke together: for betwixt them, there was not aboue a cubite wide, for the Souldiers to ſally as occaſion ſerued: the trench thus finiſhed, from the rocke to the Sea, his horſes, munition, and victuals all brought a ſhore, with his whole armie, the King marched vp the hil, and from the height preſented himſelf before Harflew. His brother Clarence hee ſent with certaine Regiments of horſe and foote, to lodge vpon the other hill, which before he could approach, (by reaſon of the nature of the ground and way) hee was forced to march fullie nine miles: which hill attained, he commanded his ſhips to caſt anchor as neere the Towne as with ſafety they might, whereby the place became beſieged both by land and Sea, then mounted he his Artillery, began his mines, brought his workes cloſe to the Counter-ſcarfe of the ditch, prepared faggots to fill it, and preſently wanne the baſe Towne.

(40) Within the Towne it ſelfe Mounſieur Gracourt was Generall accompanyde with Gwylwy de Stonteuile Chaſtellaine de Beauuais Lionet de Bruequemount and others to the number of an hundred Knights and Squires, who with the Townes-men iſſued out of the Baſtile, vpon that quarter where Huntington, and Cornwall lay, by whom with loſſe on either ſide, they were beaten backe, the gates fired, ſome breaches made, and fireworkes ſhot into the ſtreetes, to no little annoyance of the beſieged; but nothing diſmaied them more, then did the Mines made vnder the wals: againſt which though they within countermined, and came to fight hand to hand with the beſiegers, yet they ſaw it little preuailed, the wals being ready to fall, and ſuch batteries therein already made, as they well perceiued K. Henry was reſolued to carry the towne by aſſault: wherupon Monſieur de Gracourt foreſeeing the eminent danger, demanded a Parley, promiſing to render the towne if it were not relieued by a certain day aſſigned.

(41) And albeit that Iehan de Boneigunlt, and Charles de Albuet Marſhall, and Conſtable of France, the one at Caudebue Caſtell, the other in Harflew, either of them hauing in their companies one thouſand and fiue hundred men at Armes, were yet ſo curbd by the Engliſh, that no great ſeruice they did, and leſſe hope was looked for from the French king, whoſe ſtrengthes were not ready as the Dolphin returned anſwere, either to remoue or relieue the ſiege at Harflew; whereupon the twenty two of September, Gracourt the Gouernour with twenty foure ſelected Captaines and Burgeſſes came to King Henry, who ſate in his Pauilion vnder a cloth of eſtate, his Noblemen about him, and the Earle of Kyme vpon his right hand, bearing his casket, whereon was an imperiall Crowne ſet with ſtones of great price: The Gouernour and the reſt proſtrating themſelues at the Kings feet, deliuered vnto him the Keyes of the town, acording to the couenants betwixt them compriſed, which was a reſpite for fiue dayes, and then if no ſuccour came to ſurrender the towne vnto the king, & to deliuer into his hand thirty of their chiefeſt perſonages to ſtand for life or death at his own pleaſure, the reſt to depart without armor, weapons, or any of their goods.

(42) Harflew thus ſurrendred in ſo ſhort a ſiege continuance, the King ſent Thomas Earle of Dorſet with ſufficient troupes to poſſeſſe the Gates, who then erected the Kings Standard, and Saint Georges banner vpon the principall Ports, and aſſured the Towne with guards competent. Moreouer, he ſent the ſaid Monſieur de Gracourt, and with him Gwyen King at Armes vnto the Dolphin to let him know, that hee would ſtay eight dayes in Harflew, to expect his comming, where they might treat of an accord, whereunto himſelfe was well inclined, if hee were not obſtinate, for his purpoſe was not to demand more then his right, and if they could not accord, for the ſparing of Chriſtian blood, he was pleaſed to decide the quarrell by ſingle combat betweene them two.

(43) His entrance into Harflew was not as Caeſars into Rome with Coronets, Enſignes, and Triumphes, attending his Chariot, but in a more humble humble manner hee paſſed along the ſtreetes barefooted, vntill hee came to the Church of Saint Martine, where with great deuotion hee gaue moſt humble thanks vnto God for this his firſt atchieued enterpriſe. Then that the Towne might be Engliſh, and free from French dangers, hee made proclamation, that whoſoeuer of his Engliſh Artificers would tranſport themſelues vnto Harflew, houſes ſhould there bee giuen to them and their heires; whereby in ſhort time the towne was repeopled with Engliſh Artiſans. Here King Henry abode the ſpace of twelue or fiftteene dayes, expecting an anſwere of his meſſage ſent to the Dolphin; but the time prefixed (and more dayes exſpired) hee commanded his ſouldiers to furniſh themſelues with victuals for eight dayes, leauing his vncle Thomas Beauford Earle of Dorſet Gouernor of Harflew, himſelfe with two thouſand horſe, and thirteen thouſand foot, marched towards Callis through the Counties of Caux and Eu.

(44) The French Court notwithſtanding it ſwarmed with factions (whileſt vnder a weake and braine-ſicke King) the great ones ſought to make themſelues greater, and the common enemy endangering all, King Charles, the Dolphin, his brother of Ponthieu, the King of Sicil, the Dukes of Berry and of Britaine, with the whole force of France aſſembled at Roan, and in Councell concluded, that the Engliſh ſhould bee fought with, before they got Callis, and forthwith decreed to endammage King Henry on his way, which preſently was attempted. For beſides their continuall skirmiſhes vpon his marching Army, they brake down the Bridges, plained the woods, intrenched the wayes, ſtrucke ſtakes in the Foords, and in places of aduantage, laid ſtore of ſouldiers to empeach his paſſage, and conuayed all victuals out of the Countries, through which hee ſhould goe; whereby they well hoped, as a Deere taken in the toile, ſo both hee and his hoaſt ſhould haue beene inſnared, who now was approached to Virron, with purpoſe to haue paſſed the riuer Soame at Blanchetague: but there the French had fortified againſt him, ſo as hee well ſaw that was not the way; and thereupon changing his Counſell, hee marched by Wormes, and lodged at Baillew, with an intent to haue paſſed the riuer at Port le Remy, but that alſo guarded, he kept along the Riuer to Hargeſt, the French Army marching vpon the other banke, vnder the leading of Charles de Albret Conſtable of France.

(45) Henry ſtill ſeeking to get ouer Soame, meant to aſſay it, euen to the head, and paſſing by Amiens, Bowes, and Corbie, in a valley adioyning, there lodged his hoaſt, where hee commanded his Archers to prouide ſtakes ſharpened at both ends, which afterwards ſtood them in ſingular good ſtead: Then hearing by his ſpials that the water was paſſable at Bethencourt, by the negligent guard of them of Saint Quintins, hee got ouer the riuer. His ſouldiers both weary and faint, many of them ſicke, and their prouiſions ſpent ſome twelue dayes before, were forced to feed vpon nuts, roots, and Berryes, ſuch as they could get, and their drinke was the water that ranne in their way.

(46) The day they ſpent with great toile and long march, the nights were cold and wet, and no where good lodging, alwayes ſtanding vpon their owne guard, and the French alwayes ſwarming about them without intermiſsion. Theſe things moued Henry as the French Writers report, to proffer the reſtitution of Harflew, with other holds in Normandie, and to make ſatisfaction for the harms done in France, to ſuffer him free paſſage vnto his Towne of Callis. But certaine it is, that great reliefe hee got by the iuſtice and piety that hee vſed in thoſe parts: for albeit hee was in the middeſt of his enemies, and his Souldiers pinched with penury and want, yet made hee Proclamation vpon paine of death, that none of his Army ſhould rob any Church: wherein a ſouldier offending, hee cauſed reſtitution to be made, and commanded the ſtealer to be put to death: the fame of which piety moued the people (albeit they were forbid by the French King) plentifully to ſupply the fainting Engliſh with their owne prouiſions.

(47) But the Nobility vnderſtanding that the Engliſh had got ouer Soame, the Conſtable, the Dukes of Orleance and Bourbon, ſent vnto Henry an Herald with defiance, demanding battell vpon Thurſday following; which the Engliſh King granted, but therein failed, ſaith the French Secretarie, and tooke his march towards Callis without any ſtay. True it is, that Henry was not deſirous of fight, his impediments being ſuch as wee haue ſaid, and therefore returned anſwere, that he meant to keepe on his march vnto Callis, and would not ſeeke them: but if they would diſturbe him, he committed the iſſue thereof to God, aſſuring himſelfe that it would bee to their owne great danger and perill, and ſo paſsing forward to Forceuil, to Bonyers-Leſtaillon, to Baugy, vpon thurſday the 24. of October, hee came to Azincourt, where the French in a field of aduantage (purpoſely choſen) in the County of Saint Paul, and neere vnto Azincourt) had pitched their Banner royall, with an infinite hoaſt, whereof the Conſtable of France had the conduct.

(48) His power (ſaith Parradin) conſiſted of an hundred and fifty thouſand horſe (beſides them for carriages which were innumerable) wherein were ten thouſand men at Armes, all of them (a very few excepted) Princes, Noblemen, Knights, and Eſquiers. The Vantgard was led by the Conſtable, the Dukes of Orleance, and Bourbon, the Earles of Eu and Bouciquals the Marſhall, Dampier the Admirall, Guychard Dolphin de Auuergne, and Cluuet of Brabant. The maine battell, by the Duke of Barre, the Earles of Alenzon, Neuers, Blaumont, Salines, Grandpre, and Rouſſe. And the reregard by the Duke of Brabant Earles of Marle, Furquenberge, and Mounſieur de Lornay; the right wing was commanded by Arthur Earle of Richmond, and the left by Lewis de Bourbon, Count de Vendoſme great Maſter of France, whoſe particular retinues Franciſcus Roſienius doth largely *declare: all ranged together in their array appeared to the eye (ſaith Parradin) ſixe times to exceed the Engliſh, but Peter Diuers eſteemed them to bee ten times more.

(49) King Henry ſeeing himſelfe ſo farre ingaged, and many of his men ſicke of the fluxe, ſent the ſecond time vnto theſe aſſembled Princes his proffers, to ſurrender Harflew, and what elſe he had won, ſo as without diſturbance he might depart for Callis. Whereunto the Conſtable and Marſhall were willing, but the other young Princes deſpiſing the ſmall number of their aduerſaries, refuſed all conditions of peace, and were not onely negligent in the duties of Commanders, but with an aſſurance of victory diuided the pray, diſpoſed of priſoners, and prepared a Chariot to carry the captiue King in triumph; commanding the Cities and Townes adioyning to ring their bels, and to render thankes vnto God, who had deliuered their enemies into ſuch place of aduantage as an aſſured victory muſt preſently follow: and ſo confident were they thereof, that they ſent to King Henry to know what ranſome he would giue. But ſaith Chartier, what anſwere the King made, is vncertaine: for that all who were priuie thereunto, were ſlaine, the Duke of Orleance only excepted, and he a priſoner retained in England. They alſo ſent for King Charles, and the Dolphin his ſonne (then reſiding in Roane) to come in their perſons vnto the battell, that ſo they might haue the honour of the field. Whereat the Duke of Bery was highly offended, and aduiſed the contrarie, laying before the King the hazard of warre, out of his owne experience, being himſelfe at the battell of Poytiers, where King Iohn vnfortunately was taken by the Engliſh, which proued (as he alleged) a great breake-necke vnto France.

indifferent, the French gallant, fresh, and through vaine hope of honour, already mounted aboue men of meane rancke, the English weake, weary and sore starued, made no such shew, and yet their courage no lesse then the other. The one spending the night before Battell, in Feasts, Triumphes, and other like sports, distributing their Captiues, diuiding their spoiles, and decreeing none to bee saued but the King, and his nobles; all others must die or be incurably maimed: the other trimming their arrowes, sharpening their speares, buckling their armours, and refreshing their bodies for the next day; and besides other obseruances, by the light of the great fiers made in the French Campe, the English decerned what was therein done, and tooke the aduantage of their order and ground.

(51) The morning approached, the French tooke the field, thronging forward, who should be first to this most easie and certaine victory (as they tooke it) their greatest strength consisting in horse. Against whose violence King Henry commanded two hundred strong bow-men to lodge in a low meadow, where a deepe ditch full of water might secure them from the horse, and the bushes couer them from sight. These hauing stakes prepared and shod with Iron at both ends, were appointed to sticke them slope-wise in the ground, yet so that they might bee remoued as occasion was ministred, to guarde them from the danger of the horse: which policy accomplished, King Henry (whose hope was in God, and the goodnesse of his cause) about ten of the clocke raunged his English, against the French then in field: he disposed his host into three battels, placing his bow-men on both sides of the maine.

(52) The vantgard, consisting of Archers, was led by Lord Edward, (his cosen) the Duke of Yorke, & with him the Lords Beaumont, Willoughby, and Fanhope. In the maine Battell all in compleate and bright shining armour, the King rode himselfe, his shield quartered with the royall atcheiuements of England and France, vpon his helmet he ware a Coronet, the circle whereof glittered with pearle and stones of an vnestimable price: his horse of a fierce courage carreird as he went, the bridle and furniture of Gold-smithes worke, and the Caparisons most richly embroidered with the victorious Ensignes of the English Monarchy: Before him in gold and glorious colours the Royall Standard was borne, and many other banners in warlike order waued with the winde.

Tho. Walsing. The chiefe Leaders of each part of the English army.

The noble abilliments of King Henry in the maine Battell.

(53) The French had framed their Battels into two sharpe fronts, as intending with their points to haue runne through the English squadrons; altogether relying vpon their horsemen, and shining in bravery with an incredible excesse. And surelie the beauty and honourable horror of both the Armies, no heart can iudge of, vnlesse the eye had seene it, the Banners, Ensignes and Penons streaming in the ayre, the glistering of armours, the varietie of colours, the motion of Plumes, the Forrests of Lances, and the thickets of shorter weapons, made so great and goodlie a shew; but the silent expectation of the bloody blast was as the bullet ramd into the Canon, whose roaring voice is not so soone heard, as the stroake of death felt by the aimed-at marke.

Titus Livius.

The admirable and glorious fight that both armies made.

(54) The Battels thus raunged a while stood still, and faced each other euen in the face: The French (whether vpon errour like to that of Pompeis at the Battel of Pharsalia, where Caesar was victorious, or to draw the English farther from their aduantage of ground, is altogether vnknowne) but certaine it is, that King Henry was resolued to open his way for Callis ouer the Enemies bosome, or else to die: and thereupon with a cheerefull countenance and words full of courage, he comforted his followers and said. "My most faithfull Companions and worthy soul-"diers, we now goe into the field of honour, and to "the worke of manhood, which your great valours "so long haue expected and praied for; loe the day "is now come, and your worke the noblest in the "world; poure forth therefore your vtmost forces, "that ages may know what the lance, the Axe, the "sword and the bow can doe in the hand of the va-"liant: Whosoeuer therefore desires riches, ho-"nour, and rewards here he shall find them. Nimi-"rum hac medio posuit Deus omnia Campo. When hee had thus said, his army fell prostrate on the ground, and committed themselues vnto God euery man taking into his mouth a peece of earth, in remembrance of his owne mortality, (being thereof made) or of the holy Communion whereof hee was incorporated to be a partaker; and so resolued, arising, the King with cheerefull countenance commanded his Standard to aduance forward, saying, because our iniurious enemies doe attempt to shut vp our way, let vs vpon them in the name of the most glorious Trinity, and in the best houre of the wholeyeere.

Io. Serres

(55) The ranging of the Battell King Henry committed to an old experienced Knight called Sir Thomas Erpingham: who with a warder in his hand lead the way, which when he saw time hee threw vp into the aire, whereat the whole army gaue a great shout; which done, he alighted frō his horse, & came to the King, who was in his place on foor. The French beholding this Offer, kept still their owne standing, which the English perceiuing, made forward and came on, giuing another shoute, when immediately the Archers, layd in the meadow, darkened the aire with a shower of sharpe arrowes, most fearefull to the sight, but more deadly to be felt, and withall, the English charged their Battell with an admirable Courage; the most of them for nimblenes being but halfe clothed, without hat, and bare-legged. And such was their courage notwithstanding their wants, as he that ere while could scarcely bend his Bow, is able now to draw his yard-long arrow to the verie head, whose roauing marke was the flancke of the French, so rightly aimed at, and so strongely stucke on, that their sides were altogether larded with arrowes, whereby the vantgard was instantly distrest, and disordered into such a confused presse, as they were not able to vse their weapons at any aduantage. Their wings likewise assayd to charge the English, but Mounsieur de Lignie in the one not well seconded by his troopes was forced back: and Guilliaum de Surreres charging home, in the other, was slaine. The Battalions now brokē, for safety fled to the Main, where they breed both feare and confusion by the vnruline-sse of their wounded horses, so galled with arrowes as they could not be gouerned.

King Henry seeketh to passe Calis.

(56) The first troope of the French horse, were exquisitely appointed, whereon their riders much presumed, and meant to haue burst through the Archers with a violent course, but they giuing backe left their sharpe pointed stakes sticking, which till then were vnseene; the French supposing the Archers had fled, came on with their horse vpon the spur, and that in such heat, as the earth seemed to tremble vnder their thundering feet, and being forced forward, without foresight of danger carried their proud Riders into the iawes of destruction: for falling by troopes vpon those goaring stakes, they were miserably ouerthrowne, and paunched to death. The tempests of arrowes still whisling in the aire sparkled fire in their fals from the helmets of the French, and with their steeled heads, rang manie thousands their knels that dolefull day, who like to corne cut downe with the sith, fell by whole plumps in that fatall field; the English still following the aduantage: against whome Anthoine Duke of Brabant, hoping by his example to encourage others (followed with a few) turned head, and brake into the English Battell, wherein manfully fighting hee was slaine.

Tho. Walsing.

(57) With the like manhood Duke Alenzon a lusty French Lord, pressed into the Battalion where King Henry fought, and incountering Humfrey Duke of Glocester the Kings brother, both wounded

ded and ouerthrew him, to whose rescue if Henry had not come, he had died more honourablie then afterward hee did, for King Henry bestriding him, deliuered his said brother from danger, and wanne himselfe much honour by the deed. Alenzon then coped with King Henry in fight, and with his Axe cut a part of his Crowne, which blow was so surelie laid on, that therewith his helmet was battered vnto his brow, but the Lyon enraged, with redoubled strength, stroke the French Gallant vnto the ground, and slew two of his men that seconded their Master. The Duke thus down, cried to the King, I am Alenzon, whom Henry sought to haue saued, and so had done, had not the deafe eares of reuenge stopt all sound of life, against him, that so had endangered their Souereigne Lord.

(58) The French Reregard surprised with feare, at the disaster of the vantgard, and the maine battell fled, not striking one stroake (except some principall leaders and they not many) the English horsemen fetched a compasse and wheeled about vpon their backes, which no sooner was perceiued, but that the taxe of fighting was ended, and the worke of killing began; as by the words of Walsingham doth manifestly appeare: The way (saith he) is at length made by fine force; the French did not so much giue place, as fall dead to the earth: for when they saw those beaten indeed vnder foote, whom they reputed inuincible, their minds forthwith grew amazed, and such an icie feare slyd through their marrow, that they stood still like senselesse Images, while our men wrested weapons out of their hands, and slew them therewith as beasts. Slaughter then had lost the stay of it selfe, and fight did follow no longer, but all the warre was made at throates, which (as it were) offered themselues to be cut, neither can the English kill so manie of the enemies, as may bee killed. Thus therefore the whole glory of the French name is almost perished, by the hands of those few, whom immediately before they held in most extreme contempt. But the sword now made weary and drunke with blood, all danger past, and humanity retired, prisoners were taken, and liues spared, which hitherto was neglected, least mercy might haue proued the destruction of themselues.

(59) Whilst the King was thus busied, & the successe of the battell in dispute, his carriages (but slenderly garded) by the French were assailed, & all made spoile of, that was to be had. The Captaines of this cowardly enterprize, were Robinet de Bourneuille, Rifflant de Clumasse, and Isambert de Agincourt, with sixe hundred Peasants, who had turned their faces at the first brunt of Battell, as men of better practise to pilfer, then to purchase by manhood the spoiles of the field. Where among other things they found a rich Crowne and sword, which they bare away in triumph-wise, fayning that King Henry was taken, and as a prisoner followed their troopes, the sight of certaine English prisoners by them taken and led away cõfirming the report more strongly in the beholders conceit. But King Henry breathlesse, and in heat of blood, seeing certaine new troopes of the King of Sicils appeare in the field, and the same strong inough to encounter with his weary men, fearing (as hee had cause) that the Bourbon Battalion vpon sight of fresh succours would gather into a body, and againe make head, considering withall how his men were ouer-charged with multitudes of Prisoners, who in number surmounted their Conquerours: that the charge would be double at once, to guard and to fight, and that the prisoners would be ready vpon euery aduantage to take armes and free themselues from their takers: these and other necessities constrayning, King Henry contrary to his wonted generous nature, gaue present commandement that euery man should kil his Prisoner, which was immediately perfourmed, certaine principall men excepted. Which done, and falling againe in Order, hee sent his Heraulds vnto these troopes assembled, commanding them forthwith to come vnto Battell, or else to depart the field, either of which if they delaied, he threatned to reuenge with their deathes, without any redemption or mercy; at which seuere sentence their hearts were so daunted, that with shame and dishonour they departed the field. The base surprisall of the Kings carriages, (the only cause as some alleage of the French prisoners death) was so ill disgested by the French themselues, that the Duke of Burgundie imprisoned the Actors thereof, and was minded to haue put them to death, had not his sonne the Count of Charolois mediated for them, vnto whom they presented King Henries rich sword, the guards whereof was gold set with stones of great price.

(60) The day almost spent in spending French blood, and euening approaching neere the set of the Sunne, the field cleared, and no enemy seene, the retreate was sounded, and all were assembled to giue thankes vnto God; which done, while his souldiers pillaged the dead, King Henry sent for Montioy herault at armes in France, and for other heraulds both English and French: vnto whom he said, we haue not of our selues made this great slaughter, which the sword in our weake hands hath laid at our feete, but the Arme of God for the offences (no doubt) of the French hath doneit, whose blood let now rest vpon their owne heads, and wee guiltlesse in following our right: and then demanding the name of the place, was answered, it was Azincourt, then said he, to all posterities following, this Battell shall be called the Battell of Azincourt. Thus dismissing the heraulds, he returned to Maisoncelles, where he lodged the night before. The spoile was great, and the pray rich in armours, iewels, and apparell, for which by the Countrey Peasants many (left as dead) were stripped starke naked, who afterward crept from the place, but most of them mortallie wounded without reliefe, lay in great dolor and died in the ditches: so certaine is the calamity of warre, and vncertaine the sword till it bee quietlie sheathed.

To bee ſhort, Iehan Tillet ſaith, that there were ten thouſand ſlaine, and almoſt as many more taken: and moſt of their owne writers account the ſucceſſe of this Battell to be with the ſlaughter of foure thouſand Princes, Nobles, Knights, and Eſquires: but the hiſtory of Normandy accounted eight thouſand to be ſlaine of that ranke, whereof an hundred and twenty bare Banners: among whom died foure Dukes, nine Earles, one * Archbiſhop, and ten thouſand common ſouldiers, as the Heraulds relation in that behalfe hath reported.

Of Sens. The number of Dukes, Earles, &c. ſlaine.*

(27) Priſoners of account taken in this field, were Charles the Duke of Orleance, and Iohn Duke of Bourbon, Arthur Earle of Richmond, extremely wounded and left for dead, as he lay gaſping among the ſlaine, was by the Engliſh recouered and reteined their Priſoner. Louis de Bourbon Cont de Vendoſme was there taken Captiue, was Charles Earle of Eu, being carried into England, where hee remained priſoner twenty three yeres. Others of great account were likewiſe taken and put to ranſome, as Edward de Rouen, Oliuer de la Feild, and Iehan Giffart, with theſe and many more the next day King Henry marched to Callais, leauing the French to ſearch for their wounded, that in ditches and buſhes had made their heauy beds: In commiſeration whereof, the Counte Charrolois extreme penſiue for the loſſe of his vncles, and other his friends, in charity came to the field, and cauſed the dead to be buried, the charge whereof he committed to the Abbot of Rouſſiauille and the Bailiffe of Ayre, who incloſed a peece of ground with a deep ditch of two hundred and fifty yards ſquare, fenſing it with an hedge of thornes againſt the rauenings of dogs and wolues. Wherein were interred fiue hundred and eight thouſand Chriſtian carcaſes, in regard whereof it was ſanctified by the Biſhop of Eſguines, and made a Churchyard.

(28) The Duke of Britaine with his forces was come to Amiens within two daies march of Azincourt to ayde King Charles, but the French vpon a conceiued aſſurance of victory, would not ſtay his comming: who now hearing of the glorious day obtained by the Engliſh, diſmiſſed his troupes, and retired to his owne Countrey, not meaning any more to intermeddle in the warre betweene England and France. Now King Henry vpon Saturday the 26. of October, being the next day after Battell, tooke his march towards Callis, but in paſſing the field wherein they had fought, he cauſed ſearch for all the Engliſh, which he cauſed to be enterred according to their eſtates. But the Bodies of his ſlaine coſen the Duke of Yorke, and of Michael de la Poole Earle of Suffolke, hee tooke away thence, carrying them both into England, and ſo paſſing to Guiſnes with his Priſoners hee entred Callis, whither, thoſe left at Harflew reſorted, to pay their ranſomes to them aſsigned.

(29) His hoſt now refreſhed and courage augmented, it was diſputable in Counſell, whether the King ſhould returne againe into France, to purſue his enterprize already begun, or elſe to imbark for England. But the time of yeere ſpent, the winter wet, and the field Camps very much ſubiect to fluxes, wherewith many of his ſouldiers were as yet infected, and more vnhealed of their wounds; it was thought fitteſt to make for England, and the ſooner, for that victuals became ſomewhat ſcarce in Callis. Theſe things premiſed, King Henry vpon the ſixteenth day of Nouember ſpread ſayles for England, and in the paſſage was met with ſuch ſtormes, that his French Priſoners were in as great feare, as they had beene in danger at the Battell of Azincourt: but arriued at Douer and all dangers paſt, vpon the three and twenty of Nouember in triumph wiſe hee made his entrance into London, foure hundred Citizens riding before him in red and white hoodes, the gates and ſtreetes weere garniſhed with Pageants, and the Conduits plenteouſly powring forth ſweet wines. The religious men met him with proceſsion, and foureteene mitred Biſhops attended his approach vnto Saint Paules, where, out of the Cenſers the ſweet Odours filled the Church, and the Quier chanted Anthems cunninglie ſet by note: in all which the honour was aſcribed only vnto God, the King ſo commanding it. And ſo farre was he from the vaine oſtentation of men, that he would not admit his broken Crowne, nor bruiſed armour to be borne before him in ſhew, which are the vſuall Enſignes of warlike triumphes. The Citie preſented him a thouſand pound in gold, two golden baſons worth fiue hundred pound more, which were receiued with all Princely thankes.

The King is receiued of London with great ſtate.

(30) And now to doe the laſt office of a ſouldier for thoſe two noblemen ſlaine at Azincourt, hee willed the body of the Duke of Yorke to be interred in his Colledge at Fotheringhay in Northamptonſhire, and the Earle of Suffolke at Ewhelme in Oxfordſhire, commanding moſt of his Biſhops and Abbots to celebrate the Exequies in London, whereunto likewiſe reſorted his vncle Dorſet the Gouernor of Harflew, whom for his good ſeruice done, he created Duke of Exceter, and gaue him a thouſand pound by yeere out of his owne Exchecquer: but in his abſence ſome attempts were made by the French againſt the ſaid Towne, whereby he was enforced the ſooner to returne.

(31) The calamities of theſe times by the ſtirred ſchiſmes of the Church, and theſe bloody warres among Chriſtian Princes, Sigiſmund the Emperour a man of great wiſdome and integrity, much lamented at the Councell of Conſtance, & as another Conſtantine ſollicited the three ſtiffe ſtirring Popes vnto vnity, but failing of that purpoſe, from thoſe farre parts he trauelled into France, and thence into England: ſeeking to make peace betwixt theſe two Weſterne Monarchs, the better to withſtand the common knowne enemie of Chriſtendome the Turke. King Charles he ſollicited firſt, finding him in words very forward, with many faire ſhewes to imbrace the motion, whereupon taking with him the Archbiſhop of Rheims as Ambaſſadour from the French King, came vnto Callis, where he was moſt honourably entertained by the Earle of Warwicke, Deputy of the Towne, and diuers other Lords ſent thither by King Henry to attend him, as alſo thirtie of his talleſt ſhippes to waft him to Douer gallantlie rigged and manned with a noble traine. The Duke of Glocester accompanied with many of the nobility, was appointed to receiue him at Douer, where they attended his comming.

(32) The Emperour arriued, and ready to take land, Glocester and the other Lords with their drawne ſwords entred the water, and thus ſpake to the Emperour, that if his Imperiall Maieſty intended to enter as their Kings friend and a mediator for peace, they would receiue him with all willingnes accordinglie, but if as an Emperour to claime any authority in England, which was a free Kingdome, they were there ready to reſiſt and impeach his entrance. Which rough demand being moſt mildely anſwered by Sigiſmund, he had preſent acceſſe, and by them was attended towards London.

(33) This worthy Emperour, King Henry greatly reſpected, as well for his owne worths, and the amity held euer with the houſe of Beame; as alſo for that he had married * Barbara the daughter of the Earle of Zilie the Kings Coſen Germane remoued. His entertainement was Princely, and * charges altogether borne by King Henrie, who the more to honor him at Windſore, ſolemnly enſtalled him Knight of the Order of Saint George or Gartar, with a moſt ſumptuous feſt purpoſely prepared, at which the Emperour ſate in his Collar and Robes; but not foreſlowing the cauſe for which he came, hee inſtantlie vrged the peace for France, wherein he was gentlie heard heard by the English King, but vpon new displeasures for some losse of men in the Territories of Roane, the motion at that time was dasht, and would not proceed, least (as King Henrie alleaged) the French should suppose that a small losse had weakened his spirits: yet the Emperour continuing his intercession for peace, had brought it to that passe by his pithy perswasions, as had not the French at that verie instant besieged Harflew both by Sea and land, it had beene effected.

(34) For not long before Thomas Earle of Dorset, hauing made a roade into the County of Caux, was set vpon by the Earle of Armigrace Constable of France with other strong men at Armes neere vnto Vademont, who so distressed the English, that Dorset tooke into a Garden for defence, and hauing had priuate conference there with the Constable, early before day, departed with the losse of * foure hundred men. Armigrace puffed vp by his got victory, with his French powers followed the English in a hasty march toward Harflew, and vpon the lands intercepted their passage, where betwixt them a cruell conflict was performed, with the ouerthrow of the French, and flight of the Constable, who retired to Monstreuillier for safety.

(35) This his vnlucky attempt he tooke greatly to heart, and therefore purposing to repurchase again his honor, he determined for Harflew, where hee set downe his land siege, before the English Garrison within, were well aware, when also the Vicount Narbon Vice-Admiral of France, with a Fleete of tall ships entred the hauen, so that the Towne was begirt on euery side as we haue said. King Henry hearing of these newes, called home his Ambassadours, which were the Bishop of Norwich and Sir Thomas Erpingham in commission then at Beauuois, and in conference for a Peace; and the Emperour well perceiuing that the French plaid vpon aduantage, and that King Henry was not of temper to turne edge at their strokes, saw it vaine to prosecute the peace for France further, and therefore sought to enter league with the English himselfe, vnto the which King Henry was so willing as he confirmed the same vpon these Articles following.

(36) That the said Emperour & King, their heires & successours * shou'd be friends each to other as Allies and Confederates against all manner of persons of what estate or degree soeuer, the Church of Rome, and the Pope for the time being only excepted (for he was the Master Bee that then lead the swarme.)

(37) That neither themselues, their heires nor successours should be present in Counsell or other place, where either of them, their heires or successours might sustaine dammage in lands, goods, honours, states or persons: and that if any of them should vnderstand of losse or hinderance to be like to fall or happen to the others, they should impeach the same, or if that lay not in their powers, they should aduertise the others thereof with all conuenient speed. That either of them, their heires and successours should aduance the others honour and commodity without any fraud or deceit. That neither of them, nor their heires or successours should permit their subiects to leauy warres against the others. That it should be lawfull and free for each of their subiects to passe into the others Countrey, and there to remaine and make merchandize either by Sea or land, paying the Customes, gables, and duties due and accustomed according to the Laws, and Ordinances of the places, and Countreys where they should traffique. That neither of the saide Princes, nor their heires, nor successors should receiue any rebell, banished man, or traitour of the others willingly, but should cause euerie such person to auoid out of their Countreys, Realmes, dominions, and Iurisdictions. That neither of the said Princes, their heires nor Successors shou'd begin any other warres against any other person, other then such as they had warres with at that present without the consent of the other his Confederate, except in defence of themselues, their Countreys and subiects in case of inuasion made vpon them. That it should be lawfull for the King of England to prosecute his warres against France for the recouery of his right, as should seeme to him expedient, and for the Emperour, for the recouery of any part of his right reteined by the French. Lastly, that either of them should assist other in recouery and Conquest of their rights, lands and dominions, withheld and kept from them, by him that calleth himselfe King of France, and others, the Princes and Barons of France. These conclusions and agreements bare date the 19. of October, in Anno 1416. In the meane while the French that had felt the hard hand of the English, and seeing that Henry had with-drawne his commissioners for peace, King Charles made a league with the states of Genoua, requiring their aide against this dangerous enemie, who supplyde him with sixe hundred Crosse-bowes, and eight tall ships of warre, and as many gallies with munition and victuals. These wafting the Seas with many brauadoes, King Henrie in person meant to haue mette with himselfe, but the Emperour disswading his purpose, the charge of that Enterprize was committed to Iohn Duke of Bedford, accompanyde with the Earles of March, Marshall, Oxford, Warwicke, Huntington, Arundell, Deuonshire, and Salisbury; these falling vpon the County of Narbon, a fierce encounter was begun, and long fought, till at length the victory fell to the English, so that the French Nauy was most of them battered, suncke and taken; amongst others three great Carricks of the Genoaes were sent to England, with whom the bastard of Burbon was brought away Prisoner; & the Viscount de Narbon, Le Sire de Montaine, and Le Sire de Berrar chased into Britaine. This victorie obtained, the Duke past forward to the Towne of Harflew, and refreshed it with victuals without anie impeachment; for Armagnac the Constable hearing how his Consorts had kept tune on the Seas, thought it not best to set to their note, least his meane would not be heard, the base of this musicke sounding too deepe, and therefore he put vp his pipes, and got him to Paris. This seruice performed was so commended by the Emperour, as he openly said, that Realme was happy that had such a King, but the King more happie that had such Subiects, and euer after held Bedford in a most speciall account.

(38) His affaires now finished, and Princely entertainements thankefully receiued, he prepares for his returne toward Germany, and King Henry to doe him the more honour would needs accompany him to his Towne of Callis, whither after their arriuals the Duke of Burgogne repayred to doe his homage vnto the Emperour, which Burgogne some moneths before, had concluded a peace with the Earle of Warwick in the behalfe of King Henry, for the Counties of Flaunders and Arthois. Henry therefore in hope of a further friendship with him, sent his brother the Duke of Glocester, and the Earle of March vnto Saint Omers to lye hostages with the County Charrolois, for Burgognes passage and safe returne, with whom hee sent Warwicke to conduct him to Callis.

But this busines ended, Burgundy returned to Graueling, Henry into England, and the Emperour toward Germany, being wafted into the low Countreys with the Kings Fleete

(39) At Calis King Henry had made great proffers vnto Burgundy to enter with him into the warres againſt France, promiſing him part of his Conqueſts, and to ſpare and fauour all his yaſſals, allyes, and friends, but Burgundy refuſing the offers, remained his enemy for France, howbeit he ſent Embaſſadors into England to treat a continuance of the truce, which was granted to his Commiſſioners to indure from the next Michaels-tide vnto Eaſter enſuing, which was confirmed at Portcheſter the 23. of Iulie and yeere of Chriſt 1417. For the ſigning whereof King Henry ſent the keeper of his priuy Seale to Amiens where the Duke of Burgundy deliuered the ſame ſigned, which beganne in this ſort. *Iohannes Dux Burg. This notwithſtanding the ſaid Duke reuerted, and in Nouember following made a league (whereunto he was ſworne) with the King and Daulphin of France againſt England, which his doings King Henry tooke nothing well. But his proceedings proſpering in France hee called a Parliament at London, where the Lord Chancellor, Henry Beaufort, Biſhop of Wincheſter and Cardinall, in the Kings behalfe made an eloquent Oration, declaring the great deſire his Maſter had to make Peace with the French, which their King notwithſtanding reſiſted, and againſt the law of Armes denied vpon ranſome to render his priſoners taken at Agincourt, ſo that the peace which was to be expected muſt be with the ſword, concluding with this ſaying. Let vs make warre that wee may haue peace, becauſe the end of warre is peace. Whereunto the whole body conſented, and granted to the King a Subſidie and a Tenth which was graciouſly accepted, but was farre too ſhort to defray the great Charge, ſo that he was forced to paune his Crowne vnto the ſaid Biſhoppe Beaufort his vncle, for a great ſum of money, as he did certaine Iewels to the Lord Maior of London for ten thouſand Marks.

A ſubſidy granted the King for his warres in France.

(40) Money thus got and the Seas made ſafe, King Henry purpoſed further to follow his fortunes in France, his aduantages many (as the French would enforce) through the weake-braind King, not able to correct the Factions of the Burgundion and Orleance, which troubled all France; and the death of Lewis the Daulphin whoſe funerall might haue beene ſolemnized by the mourners from Agincourt, his death (as was thought) happening immediately vpon that diſtaſture; and to heape more diſtractions vpon the miſerable French, Iohn the Kings ſecond ſonne and new made Daulphin ſhortly left both his title and life, who together were entombed at Compeigne. Theſe, ſay the French, were the bane of the State, and the baits that made King Henry to bite; Notwithſtanding wee ſhall finde them but curtaines to ſhadow the light if we looke into the proiect with an indifferent eye, for the Kings weakenes was ſupported by Burgogne Armagnac and other potent eſtates; Burgundy by Oath, made a mortall enemy againſt King Henry. Orleance in England a priſoner and without racket in hand could not bandy the Ball to marre the French plea: and as touching the deathes of the two Daulphins their raked vp aſhes kept in the ſparke that afterward was the only light of France, for theſe, (though Crowned) were not the pillars of ſtrength able to ſuſtaine the great weight of that Empire: The firſt a Prince of little valour, and great toyle, preſuming to know much, and vnwilling to learne, buſying himſelfe with his ſelfe, and by his inſufficiency rather troubled then managed the eſtate. The other, none of the wiſeſt and of nature ſo remiſſe, that he was euer ready (as waxe) to take the ſtamp of anie impreſſe, but as the prouerbe is, let the looſers haue leaue to ſpeake, and vs to relate our Engliſh French buſineſſes.

King Henry had three great aduantages for the better conquering of France.

Denis Sauage Chron. de Flan.

Iob. Serres hiſt. Franc.

(41) All now in a readineſſe, King Henry with a puiſſant armie prepared his ſecond expedition into France, his Fleete conſiſting of fifteene hundred ſaile, many Lords and men at Armes, the muſter role ingroſſed with twenty fiue thouſand fiue hundred twenty ſeauen ſouldiers, euery fourth being a horſeman, beſides a thouſand Carpenters, Artificers and Labourers: But before his departure he ordained his brother Iohn Duke of Bedford to be the Protector of England in his abſence, which done vpon the 28. of Iulie he tooke to Seas, the ſailes of his owne ſhip, being of purple ſilke moſt richly embroydered with gold: and the firſt of Auguſt arriued in Normandy to ſuch terrour of the inhabitants that they fled further into the maine, leauing the Countrey bare of men and beſtiall: Inſomuch that twentie fiue thouſand families of them repayred into Britain, ſo dreadfull was the approach of the Engliſh.

(42) No ſooner King Henries foote had touched the ſhoare, but to the incouragements of his Marſhal followers, he dubbed forty eight knights, and then ſending to view Harflew laid his ſiege againſt Conqueſt, the ſtrongeſt Caſtle in Normandy, which hee tooke the 16. of Auguſt, and gaue both it and the whole demaines belonging, vnto his brother Thomas Duke of Clarence: And vnto Salisbury the leader of his ſecond battell, he gaue the Caſtle Aumbellers, which at the ſame time he had wonne, as alſo that of Louers vnto the Earle Marſhall, and theſe were the firſt that were inueſted with any reuenew in France.

(43) Caen to withſtand the enemie was ſtrongly fortified, well mand, and victualled, ſo that nothing was wanting needfull for defenſe: yet the King ſate downe before it, and his battery not working the expected effect, he attempted it by mine, and ruinated ſome parts of the Wall: Notwithſtanding the defendants made ſtiffe defence, and manfully put backe the entrance or ſcale. Neuertheleſſe Henry ſeeing that they could not long ſubſiſt, vnwilling to carrie it in fury, which muſt bee the deſtruction of the Inhabitants, whom he ſought to ſaue, and to make his true ſubiects, ſummoned them by an Herault, and promiſed them mercy: which they in hope of reliefe vtterly deſpiſed: hereupon his entry was forced, and great ſlaughter made, till the King ſtaied his ſouldiers furies, and cauſed the Citizens to diſarme themſelues, ſetting a ſtrong guard aſwell to keepe the ſpoilers from pillaging, as the Townesmen from all hoſtile attempt: and they that did, were either put to death or ranſome, which was freelie diſtributed among his Captaines and ſouldiers, by which regular action King Henrie got him the eſtimation of a great Captaine, and an vpright Prince.

(44) But whether by the working of the French, or by inſtigation of the diſcontented reformaliſts (as Walſingham hath it) The Scots would worke wonders in reuiuing a dead King Richard, that ſhould indammage the Lancaſtrians cauſe, and diſpoſſeſſe King Henry of his Crowne: who now abſent and forward of Conqueſt in France, at home was endangered by theſe his emulating neighbours, and his confines in hoſtile manner entered vpon, by the Duke of Albany, together with the Earle Dowglas the Scottiſh Leaders: Theſe bringing with them their ſtage-like K. Richard, laid ſtraite ſiege againſt Roxborough, and Barwicke, where all aſſaies were attempted, by vndermining the wals, and turrets, all extremities vſed and nothing left vnattempted, that might annoy either by Sea or by Land.

(45) But Beauford Duke of Exceſter being at Bridlington in doing his deuotions, had preſent newes of this preſent neceſſity, and therefore ſcarce come to the end of his Orizons, he layd by his Beads and tooke to his armour, which was not ruſty with lying, ſo lately put off, neither did Iohn Duke of Bedford the Protector, foreſlow any time, but with fiue thouſand ſtrong, repaired into the North, where, with the Earles of Weſtmerland and Northumberland, his his power was increaſed, vnto whom alſo the Archbiſhop of Yorke Henry Bewet ſided, with age ſo decrepit, that he was borne into the field in his Chaire, the fame of whoſe comming, and the feare of their worthy Generals ſo daunted the Scots, that leauing their ladders and other engins of warre, in the night they broke vp their ſiege, and well was he that could firſt attaine Scotland.

(46) The Kings affaires thus effected in the North, the Clergies eye-ſore was alſo ſomewhat eaſed by the apprehenſion of Sir Iohn Ouldcaſtle their diſturber in the South, who not contented to ſet the God of Rome at nought, but likewiſe defaced the faces of his Saints, trimly limmed in their Letanyes and other like maſſe bookes; a matter indeed of ſuch moment, that the Abbot of Saint Albans (in whoſe precinct they were taken) ſent theſe poore miſuſed and ſcratched faced pictures, to complaine of their iniuries vnto the King, but his peace not broken, for no blood was drawne, he remitted the offence and puniſhment thereof vnto Chichley Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who ſent them to Paules Croſſe to ſhew their Countenances vnto the people, the Preacher that day being their mouth, inſinuating the offence to be done vnto the triumphant Saints in heauen.

(47) A Parliament aſſembled by the Regents authority for the ſupply of mony to maintaine the warres in France, a matter of as great importance was therein to be paid, and that was the apprehenſion and iudgement of the Lord Cobham, with a conſideration of reward for his taker the Lord Poweſſe in wales, from whence ſore wounded he was brought to Weſtminſter before the Lords, and hauing heard his conuictions would not thereunto anſwere in his excuſe, vpon which record and proceſſe, it was adiudged that he ſhould be taken as a traitour to the King and the Realme, that hee ſhould bee carried to the Tower of London, & from thence drawn through the ſtreetes vnto Saint Giles fields, and there to bee hanged, and burned hanging, which accordingly was done. That N. D. author of the three conuerſions hath made Ouldcaſtle a Ruffian, a Robber, and a Rebell, and his authority taken from the Stage-plaiers, is more befitting the pen of his ſlanderous report, then the Credit of the iudicious, being only grounded from this Papiſt and his Poet, of like conſcience for lies, the one euer faining, and the other euer falſifying the truth: that Copus hath made the Lord Cobham a Traitour: and Stow from Otterborn alleageth Indentures drawne betwixt him and the Scots, to bring in a Counterfeit Richard, and to inuade the land with forraine power, that he acknowledged no King but the ſame Counterfeit in Scotland, and made himſelfe a falſe Chriſt in riſing againe the third day (as Walſingham will haue it) I am not ignorant: but his attainture of Treaſons, I leaue it to the anſwere of Maſter Fox, who largely handled it: and for his combination with the Scots, vnto the letter of King Henries owne hand, who hauing intelligence of the Scots intent, and the meanes by which they meant to worke, ſignifieth vnto his brother and vncle in theſe wordes, as from the Originall is taken.

Part of a letter written with King Henrie 5. his owne hand to the Duke of Exceſter.

*Furthermore I will that ye commune with my * brother, with the * Chancellour, with my Coſen of Northumberland, and my Coſen of Weſtmorland, and that yee ſet a good order and ordinance for my North-Marches, and eſpecially for the Duke of Orleance, and for all the Remnant of my Priſoners of France. And alſo for the King of Scotland, for as I am ſecretlie informed by a man of right notable eſtate in this land, that there hath beene a man of the Duke of Orleance in Scotland, and accorded with the Duke of Albany that this next ſummer hee ſhall bring in the manuell of Scotland to ſturre what he may. Alſo that there ſhould bee founden waies to the hauing away ſpecially of the Duke of Orleance: and alſo of the Knights, as well as of the remnant of my foreſaid Priſoners, that God defend. Wherefore I will that the Duke of Orleance be kept ſtill within the Caſtle of Pomefret without going to Roberts place, or to any other diſport, for it is better he lacke his diſport, then wee were deceiued; of all the Remnant doth as ye thinketh.*

(48) Wherein we ſee the Complot, but heare not a word that it ſhould be of Cobhams compoſing. But as I affect not to iuſtifie the wicked, nor to make crooked things ſtraite, ſo am I farre from diſcrediting authorities; only the eye of thoſe times looking through the thicke foggy Cloudes, made the Sunne (which is bright in it ſelfe) to ſeeme in their ſights all bloody and darke.

The ignorance of thoſe times being ſo generall in all places, the truth was but dimly diſcerned.

(49) The like troubles (though not for the like cauſe) happened vnto Queene Ioane in the Kings abſence, and time of Bedfords regency, whoſe offence was Capitall, if the accuſation were true; that ſhee ſhould by ſorcery ſeeke the death of the King, ſhee therefore was committed to ſafe keeping in the Caſtle of Leedes in Kent, and from thence to Pemſey attended only with nine of her ſeruants: her Confeſſor Frier Randolph a Doctor of diuinity was likewiſe apprehended as her Counſellor and worker in this diueliſh art, for which he was committed to the Tower, where falling at words with the Parſon of Saint Peters (the Church of that place) he was wounded to death; and Queene Ioane thereupon preſentlie deliuerd.

(50) King Henry proceeding in his Conqueſt of Normandy, about Hollantide laid ſiege to the ſtrong Towne and Caſtell of Fallais, continuing the ſame vnto the 20. of December, when the defendants not able longer to reſiſt, demanded and had Parley, with whome Thomas Earle of Salisbury, Henry Lord Fitz-hugh, Sir Iohn Cornwall, and Sir William Harrington Knights were by the King appointed Commiſſioners, who after ſome conference, laſtly accorded vpon theſe conditions. 1. That if the King of France, the Dolphin, or Conſtable, did not by force raiſe the ſiege before the ſecond of Ianuary enſuing, that the Towne ſhould bee rendred to Henry. 2. That all the ſtrangers that were not properly Inhabitants of Fallais, and had formerly fought againſt King Henrie in any place, beſieged and taken within Normandy, ſhould be left to his mercie. 3. That all Engliſh Priſoners which were in the Towne ſhould bee ſet at liberty, ranſome free and acquitted of their Oathes made vnto them whoſe Priſoners they were. 4. That all natiues of England, Wales or Ireland, that had ſerued againſt the King, ſhould be left to his Iuſtice. 5. That neither Captaine, Burgeſſe nor Townſman of Fallays ſhould giue any reliefe to the Caſtell, or victuall or munition, during the truce accorded. 6. That no perſon within Fallays ſhould receiue the Perſons or Goods of any within the Caſtell, whereby they or their goods might be protected. 7. That the Captaines and Souldiers ſhould receiue no preiudice in their Horſes, Armes, or Goods; great Artillery, Shotte, powder and Croſſe-bowes excepted: but the ſtrangers formerly ſpoken of in the ſecond Article were exempted from that fauour. 8. That the Artillery, Powder, Shot, and Croſſe-bowes afore mentioned, ſhould not, during the truce, bee embezelled, wilfully broken, or made away. 9. That during the truce, the ruines made ſhould not bee repaired, and no new workes of defence erected. 10. That no oppreſſion be vſed by the ſayd Souldier vpon the Burgeſſe, and if any were found faulty and not preſently baniſhed for the ſame, they ſhould looſe the benefit which otherwiſe they ſhould haue by the accord. 11. That no Captaine, ſouldier, or Townſman ſhould vnderhand conuay away any Priſoner, ornaments, Iewels, or Church Reliques, either belonging to Fallais, or to any other Church or religious Houſe, that were brought thither for ſafety. 12. That no goods ſhould be purloined or carried out of the Town during the treaty. 13. That

13. That none of the Captaines nor Souldiers, nor any Burgesse should forsake the Towne, vntill the second of Ianuary next: and his maiesty of his grace and mercy, was pleased that all such as would remain in Fallais, should remain there in safety both in body and goods, so as they would bee true subiects vnto him. 14. That none of the defendants of the Castell should be receiued into the Towne, nor their goods secretly kept by the Inhabitants vnder any pretence or Colour whatsoeuer. 15. That during the treaty no assault or offence should be offered by the kings army, to the Towne or to the Inhabitants, so as they do not ayde, assist or relieue the defendants in the Castells. 1. That for the true performance of the Articles twelue knights & Squires should be deliuered hostage to the Kinge, and to be set at liberty when the Couenants aboue mentioned were fulfilled These things concluded and subscribed with their names and seales, the 20. of December; vpon the second of Ianuary no succours appearing, the towne of Fallais was acordingly deliuered, but the Castle standing obstinate, the king was as diligent, till the defendants failing in their spirits, the first day of February demanded a Parley. Wherunto Henry consented making Clarence his brother his sole Commissioner. The Articles acorded for the most part were as the former, whereto were added these which ensue.

(51) That vpon the 16. of the said moneth of February, if the King in person, the Dolphin his sonne, or the Earle of Armagnac Constable of France, did not with force raise the siege, then Sir Oliuer de Mauny Knight, gouernour of the said Castell, should render the same vnto King Henry. 2 That the said Gouernour and all other within the Castell should at the day assigned submit themselues to the King, and remaine his prisoners, trusting to his Maiesties royall promise not to receiue offence either in life or goods: (Geoffrey Chasteaux only excepted) who was left simply to the Kings mercy. 3. That after the rendering of the said Castell Sir Oliuer de Mauny the Gouernour, should at his owne charges repaire all the breaches and ruines made in the wals during the siege, and leaue it in the same sort as it was before the same was besieged. 4. That for the performance of these Articles, eight Gentlemen should remaine Hostages with the King. 5. That when the Castell was prepared, Sir Oliuer Mauny, and al his Company should be set at liberty, and vntill then to remaine the Kings Prisoners, Geoffrey de Chasteaux aboue mentioned only excepted. These agreements concluded, the Indenture subscribed, and king Henries seale of Armes thereunto fixed, at the * prefixed day according to these Articles the Castell of Fallais was rendered vnto him: which done, he diuided his Army into manie parts, vnder the seuerall conducts of the Dukes of Clarence, and Glouceſter, and the Earle of Warwicke: who wan diuers Castels, himselfe the while marching to besiege Rouen, where he set downe his siege, and began the assault in a furious manner: the defendants as obstinately bent to hold him out: so that to winne the Towne by force, Henry found it very difficult, aswell for the strength of Bulwarkes and Ramparts as for the number of hands within it, to make resistance, and therefore to reduce them by famine was his only desigme.

(52) For Burgogne from King Charles had sent many worthy Captaines with a thousand selected Souldiers to defend the City, and within it besides were fifteene thousand Citizens well trained and furnished: and the Towne stored with victuals for ten months continuance; notwithstanding K. Henry quartered about the Towne, and for his safety cast vp a Trench betwixt the wals and his men: the Riuer Seine hee blockt vp with three Iron-Chaines, one of them layd two foote aboue water, another with the leuell, and the third two foote vnder the water, to forbidde all relicfe vnto the Citty by Boats.

(53) With the English, sixteene hundred Irish Kernes were enrolled, from the Prior of Kilmainham, able men, but almost naked, their armes, were targers, darts, and swordes, their horses little, and bare no saddle, yet very nimble, on which vpon euery aduantage they plaied with the French, in spoiling the Country, rifeling the houses, and carrying away children, with their baggage, vpon their Cowes backes. Thus from Iune vnto December the siege had continued, and now victuals failing, and the Towne in distresse, the Rouennois sent foure gentlemen, and as manie Burgesses, vnto King Charles, and the Burgogne (then at Beauuois) to signifie their miseries; fifty thousand already famished with hunger, and twelue thousand staruelings put out of the Towne, but not suffered to passe by the English, died by multitudes in the ditches, whose vnburied Carcases did infect the Towne with contagious diseases, so that without present relieſe they must be inforced to render.

(54) Ayde was promised, and earnestly expected, but in steed of supplies, the Bishop of Beauuois accompanied with others, and the Cardinall of Vrsins sent from Pope Martin, were dispatched to King Henry, to entreat a peace; for the better accomplishing thereof, they brought with them the picture of the Lady Catherine, according to life, which King Henry well liked, yea and (as Serres saith) fell in loue with: but demanding a hundred thousand Crownes with the Dutchies of Normandy, Aquitain, Anion, and other Seignories for her dowry, nothing was concluded or done.

(55) And now the Rouennois helpeles of succour, and despairing of peace, resolued to make a braue sally vpon the kings quarter: to performe which resolution, 10000. chosen mē with their leaders issued out of the Towne, the vantgard (which was 2000.) being past and in fight, by misfortune the draw-bridge with ouer-weight of men brake, manie were drowned, slaine and hurt: neither was there any more passage that way, to releeue their followers engaged in fight with the English; whereupon they made hast to the other Gates: but before they could come to giue ayde, the vantgard was broken, and most of them slaine, and taken Prisoners. Vpon this disastre the souldiers within mutined against Guy de Boutellier their General, murmuring that he had contriued the breaking of the bridge.

(56) In these distastures King Charles returning towards Paris, sent the besieged word to make what shift they could, which vnexpected message stroake a sad feare into the miserable defendants hearts, who weake in men and victuals, knew no way to subsist, and thereupon in Counsell concluded to send vnto Henry, which presently they did. For whose entertainement, he caused two tents to be set vp at Port S. Hillarie. Their Commissioners were two gentlemen, two Clergie-men, and two Burgesses of the Towne. Commissioners for the King were the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Earle of Warwick: the demands of the Rouennois were many, but their answers were short; that no conditions would be accepted, but simply yeelding to the kings mercy; whereupon the conference brake vp, and these returned into the Towne, bred sundry distractions, some crying to yeeld, and other some crying to die like men, but Henrie desirous to be Master of the Towne, and fearing it would be fired by themselues, if he wan it by force, made the Archbishop of Canterbury his Instrument, whose vocation was fit for it, to call again the Commissioners, and againe fell into treaty of Composition, which lastly was agreed, vpon these Articles as follow. 1. That the Burgesses should giue vnto Henry towards his expense in the siege, three hundred fifty sixe thousand Crownes of gold. 2. That Robert Linet vicar generall to the Archbishop of Rouen, Iehan Iourdan who commanded the Canoniers, and Alen Blanchart Captaine of the Common people, should be left to his mercy without condition. 3. That all the people should sweare faith and loyalty to Henry and his Successors. 4 That

Henry

Henrie should protect and defend them against all men, and confirme vnto them their priuiledges, franchises, and liberties, which they had enioyed euer since the time of Saint Lewis king of France. 5. That all such as had desire to leaue the Towne, might freely depart, with his garments vpon his backe only, and his goods to be confiscated vnto King Henry. 6. That the souldiers should bring all their Armes to a place assigned, and should depart out of the Towne vnarmed with a Cudgell in their hands, first taking their Oath not to beare Armes against Henry, for a twelue month next ensuing.

(57) This agreement was concluded the 16 of Iune Anno 1418. when as the hungry Citizens in multitudes came to the English Campe to buy victuals, which so abounded with Prouisions, as a fat mutton was sould for sixe sousses of Paris money. Vpon the next day following, Henrie triumphantlie made his entry into Rouen; the Ecclesiasticks of the Towne, in their mitres and vestures, with their reliques, singing of Hymnes, conducted him to the Cathedrall Church, where before the high Altar, vpon his knees, he gaue thankes to God for the Conquest of this Towne, which had remained two hundred and fifteene yeeres in the possession of the French, euen from the time when Philip King of France wan it from king Iohn of England. The day following, Alain Blanchart the Captaine of the common people was beheaded, Robert Linet, and Iehan Iourdan, put to their high ransomes, the French Garrisons pillaged, vnarmed, and put out of the Towne, but safely were conducted ouer Saint Georges-bridge to goe whither they would. Guy de Boutellier, who was Captaine generall of Rouen, became King Henries leigeman, vnto whom he gaue all his lands, and a charge vnder the Duke of Glouceſter. Immediately after the rendering of Rouen, sundry other places of note yeelded themselues, as Caudebec, Monstreuillier, Diepe, Fescamp, Arques, Neufchastell, Deincourt, Eu, Moncheaux, Vernon, Mante, Gorney, Harflewr, Ponteur-de-Mer, Mollineaux, le Treict, Tancarville, Abrechier, Mauleurier, Valemont, Neufuille, Bellaucombre, Fontaines, Le Boure, Preaux, Nougonder-ville, Logempree, Saint Germain, Sur Cuylly, Baudemont, Bray, Villeterre, Charles-Maisnell, Les Boules Guillen-court, Fauilfontaines, Le Becq, Crepin, Backeuille, and diuers other places wherein Henry placed his Garrisons. France generally troubled, and trembling at the losse especially of Rouen, Henrie ready to pierce forward, and Charles declining through his infirmities encreasing; the Duke of Burgogne (who bare all the sway vnder that infirme King, and therefore much hated by the Daulphin, whose reuenge he feared,) much doubting Henries rising fortunes, held it best to vphold his own greatnes, by mediating a peace betwixt the two Kings. For which end he sent his Ambassadours to Henry, praying personall Conference; to which he assented and assigned the place, which was at Melun, where in a field well trenched, and ramparted with strong Gates, two pauillions were arreard, the one for the Kings to repose themselues in, and the other for their counsell to consult in.

(58) Charles, Isabell, Burgogne, and Catherine, the Count Saint Paul, with a thousand horse garding them thether, came first. King Henry with his brothers of Clarence and Glouceſter, attended vpon with a thousand horse, held the appointment; and now met, the two Kings embraced each others; Henry kissed Isabell and Katherine, who indeed became a precious pearle in his eye: Burgogne a little bending his knee, did his reuerence to Henry, who tooke him in his Armes: and the two nations though mortall enemies, demeaned themselues so ciuilly, as no cause of quarrell was offered on either side, much conference passed, but nothing concluded; Henries demands seeming to the French to bee so vnreasonable. The treaty thus dissolued, and all ready to depart, King Henry not well pleased, spake thus vnto Burgogne: "Cosen, I may not well digest this refusall, but be you assured, that either I will haue your Kings daughter, and all "my demands, or else I will banish both you, and them, out "of France. You speake your pleasure said the Duke, but "before you shall thrust the King, them, and me, out of the "Realme, you will be weary of the enterprize.

(59) The treaty thus broke, and danger nothing lesse, the Burgundian altogether French, and in heart no friend to the English, reconciled himselfe vnto the Daulphin; which deed was soone after the cause of his owne death; and Henry displeased with this combination, quickened his thoughts (full of reuenge) to prosecute the warre more sharpely then heretofore: the first enterprize he made, was vpon Ponthois, vnto which Towne the last day of Iulie hee sent three thousand foote, which before the breake of day, and not discouered by the Centinels, set their Ladders to the Wals, mounted vp, crying Saint George, and so opening a Port let in their Companions. The Signeur de L' Isle-Adam Marshall of France and Gouernour of the Towne, affrighted at the surprize, fled out at another Port towards Paris, after whose example aboue ten thousand Inhabitants did the like, so as the English without resistance were Masters of the Towne, wherein great riches fell to the souldiers shares. When King Charles at Paris heard of the losse of Ponthois, in great feare with his wife, daughter, Burgundy, and many noblemen, to be further from the fire so neere at hand, went vnto Troyes en-Champagne, leauing Paris vnder the Gouernment of the Count Saint Paul, and Eustath de Lactre Chancellor of France, whilst Henry went forward with his intended enterprizes.

(60) For his brother of Clarence by three weekes siedge wan the Castell Gizors by composition, the Earle of Huntington sacked Preaux, burnt Bretuiell, Clermont, and the Castell of Vendueil, and Henry himselfe besieged the Castell of Guillart, and Rochguien, two of the strongest holds in Normandy; which vpon compositions were surrendred, and further preuailed more then the French wished. For the Daulphin, the only man that stood for the publike defence of France, was miserably poore, and for want of pay could make no great shew of follo wers in the field, whose chiefe Counsellor was the Constable Armagnac an old craftie foxe, that had euer sided with Orleance against the Burgundian. And now fearing least his owne esteeme should be lessened, or that Burgundy should be the Architte to crosse him the wise Achitophell, or rather indeed thrust forward by destinie to be the scourge and fall of France, he counselled the young Daulphin to seize vpon his mothers money, iewels and plate, for his further supply to the publike vse, (which immediately he did) to aduance the estate: but Queen Isabell impatient of these wrongs receiued, in a womanish splene studies the reuenge, wholy neglecting the common cause, which gaue the English surer footing in France, but the Daulphin to make good what he had done, leades the King in iealousy that the Queenes designes were dangerous, and altogther set for the alienation of the Crowne, which he weake man, no sooner heard then beleeued, being euer ready to take her at the worst and neuer ouergone in her loue at the best.

(61) These sparkes of sedition thus blowne in the Court, suspitions increasing, and maligners still working, Queene Isabell with her sister in law, the Dutchesse of Bauier were sent prisoners to Blois, and from thence to Eours where they were kept with strait guard, three Gentlemen in Commission to take care of their safeties: till then her fauours had gone with Orleance, and with him had contested euer against Burgogne, but now to quit her imprisonment, shee reconciled her selfe vnto him, and sollicited his assistance for her deliuerance; Burgogne well perceiuing how much it would aduance his part, to draw the Queene to be of his faction, brake vp his siege then laid before Corbeill, and with certaine choise troopes repaired toward Troyes, from whence immediately he sent the Queene word of his comming.

(43) This Charles the ſixt, and ſicke-braind King of France was the ſonne of King Charles ſurnamed the wiſe, who with Salomon his wiſer might haue demanded this queſtion; who can tell whether his ſonne ſhalbe a wiſeman or a foole? for the flower of his youth and commendable diſpoſitions of his middle age promiſed great hopes of a valiant, moderate and moſt happie Prince, only inclined to choller and reuenge, as by the occaſion of his lunacy is eaſilie ſeene, which chanced on this manner.

The occaſion of King Charles diſtemper.

(44) Peter Craon a Courtier, his minion, and an inward fauorite of the Duke of Orleance the Kings brother, blabbed out ſome ſecrecy of the ſaid Dukes amorous paſſions vpon a wanton Lady, vnto his Dutcheſſe Valentine; who but lately married, and ſo ſoon deceiued of bed, took the wrong no leſſe then it was, nor letted ſhee (as who can let a woman to ſpeake) to tell him his faults on both ſides of his head, the Duke could not hide what ſhee too well knew, and therefore ſought to ſatiſfie her with complements of kind words, but the Curtaine-ſermons nightly enlarged vpon the ſame text, made him many times to lie awake with little deuotion (God wot) to heare, and often to riſe when hee would faine haue ſlept, which cauſed him laſtly to complaine to the King that Craon had, and would betray their ouermuch truſt. The cauſe no more, but yet too much againſt a Prince, Craon with all diſgrace was diſcharged the Court, who not able to brooke ſuch an open indignity, aſſaulted Cliſton the Conſtable in a murthering manner, as the only man (as he thought) that wrought his diſgrace, and eſcaping Paris, fled into Britaigne whoſe Duke was his kinſeman, and an enemy to the Conſtable.

Orleance newly married is in loue with another.

Craon diſmiſt the Court for telling the Dutcheſſe of the incontinency of her huſband.

(45) King Charles tranſported with choller of this double offence, mindes to draw Craon by force out of Britaine to iuſtifie himſelfe, whom the Councell had declared guilty of high Treaſon, and enemie to the Crowne of France, and reſolues in perſon to enter into Britaine: forthwith the expedition for men and manner of proceeding made Charles to looſe both meate and ſleepe, ſo as the vexation of minde and diſtemperature of body, carried apparant ſhewes in his face: in ſo much that the Dukes of Berry and Burgogne miſtruſting the worſt, counſelled that his iourney might be ſtaid; his Phyſitians diſſwade him in regard of his health, the ſummer extreme hot, and his blood as then ouer ſubiect to dangerous feuers. New deuiſes were wrought to ſtay him at home, giuing it forth that Craon was fled Britaigne, and in Arragon was impriſoned by the Queene. All this notwithſtanding, needes would he forward, ſo forward is man when his fate will ſo haue it.

King Charles purſueth Craon into Britaine.

(46) He departed Meaux in Iulie: the yere very hot, his head couered with a great Cap of ſcarlet, his body wrapped in a thicke veluet Ierkin warme enough for winter, his mind diſtempered with choller, griefe, and deſpite, and his body wearied with watching, diſtaſture, and want of reſt. Thus entring the forreſt of Meaux about noone-tide, a man bare-headed, and bare legged attired in a Coat of white rugge, ſtepped ſodainely forth from betwixt two trees, and caught hold of his bridle, ſtaid his horſe, ſaying; King ride no further but returne backe, for thou art betraied. Charles whoſe ſpirits were otherwiſe dulled, and his blood greatly diſtempered, was amazed at the voice: which ſeene, his ſeruants ranne to this man, and with blowes forced him to leaue the reines of the horſe: and ſo without any further ſearch the man vaniſhed away.

(47) The troopes of his nobles diuided becauſe of the duſt, King Charles was followed by the Pages of his Chamber, who ouercharged with heat and diſtemperature, tooke no great paines to guide their horſe, ſo that thronging together, he which bore the Kings Lance, let it fal vpon him, who had on his head the Kings helmet, and in the falling made a clattering noiſe. The King much muſing vpon the words ſpoken, and now withall hearing this vnexpected noiſe, was from a penſiue melancholy ſuddainely ſtrucke into a raging Lunacy, ſuppoſing himſelfe to be betraied indeed: and tranſported with this frenſie he drawes his ſword, and made towards his Pages with a maine cric: his brother Orleance not knowing the cauſe, haſted among them, whom Charles likewiſe purſued, and with the like rage ranne at his vncle of Burgogne, thus ſpending himſelfe and his horſe out of breath, all incompaſſed the ſtill raging man, tooke from him his ſword, diſrobed him for heate, and cheered him with flatterings and faire ſpoken words, his brother and vncles ſaluted him, but hee knowes them not, ſits mute, ſighing and panting, and with troubled amazement moues both body and head, ſo that all ſignes of Phrenſie appeared in this poore Prince, and the eminent miſery that was to fall vpon France, very apparant to the inſeeing Statiſts: but now to proceed.

(48) Iohn Duke of Burgogne ill diſgeſting the threats that King Henry had giuen, and ioined in league with the Daulphin, as we haue ſaid: was notwithſtanding ſuſpected to be a great enemy to the State, and as the Giants are faine to heape mountaine vpon mountaine, for ſteps of aſſent to pull Iupiter out of his throne, ſo by ſiniſter Counſellors Burgogne was accuſed of ſome intended ſtratageme, as meaning to mount the Chaire where the Daulphin ſhould ſit: Charles therefore from Monſtreau-Surfault yonne a Towne in Brie, ſent for the Duke vnto Troyes in Champagne to conferre further vpon the effecting of their affected accord, as alſo to imploy their vnited forces vpon the common enemie the Engliſh, a third cauſe likewiſe was alleaged, and that was to haue him his meanes for a reconciliation to his mother the Regent, whoſe wrath, beſides him, no man could pacifie.

(49) The Duke miſtruſting no ſnake in the graſſe, thought all things as ſure as they were faire in ſhew: and accompanied with many noble-men, fiue hundred horſe, and two hundred Archers, he repaired to Monſtreau, at whoſe Gate the Daulphin had built 2. Barricadoes, & himſelfe in armes ſtood there to receiue the Duke, Burgogne approached, kneeled downe vpon one knee, and with an honourable reuerence ſaluted him moſt humbly, the Daulphin neglecting all courteſies to him-ward, charged him with breach breach of promiſe, for that the ciuill warres and his garriſons were not ſurceaſt and withdrawne; the Dukes ſword hanging too farre backe, and ſomewhat troubling his kneeling, he put his hand vpon the hilt, to put it more forward, whereat Robert de Loire ſtanding by, ſayd, doe you draw your ſword againſt the Lord Daulphin? at which words Tanneguy de Chaſtell with a battle-axe ſtroke him on the face and cut off his Chin, and others with other wounds made an end of his life, before he could ariſe from his knee or get out his ſword.

(50) Queene Iſabell another cruell Medea and vnnaturall mother, hauing a double offence done her, redoubled her wrath and continued her tragick paſſions againſt her ſonne the young Daulphin, who not only incites Philip now the new Duke of Burgogne to reuenge his murdered fathers death, but torments her poore husbands ſpirits, in perſwading him to diſherite Charles their ſonne, and to giue in marriage Lady Katherine vnto King Henry, who now had ſet his foote farre into France. Duke Philip for his part ready for reuenge, ſent the Biſhop of Arras with other his Ambaſſadors vnto Rouen to King Henry to entreat a peace, and againe not many daies after their returne ſent backe the ſaid Biſhop, whoſe meſſage was ſo pleaſing, that Henry ſent the Biſhop of Rocheſter, the Earle of Warwicke and Guien vnto Arras, who were as welcome vnto Duke Philip; ſo that betwixt Rouen and Arras meſſengers continually paſſed till a peace was concluded; which was proclaimed to continue from that day (then about the feaſt of the Epiphany) vnto mid-March enſuing, betwixt King Henrie, King Charles, and Philip Duke of Burgogne.

(51) King Henry thus farre gone in his affaires for that Crowne, ſent his Ambaſſadors vnto the new made Pope Martin the firſt, ſuch was the fate of Romes Apoſtolicall fathers in thoſe faire Sun-ſhine and Golden daies, that the greateſt Monarch was but a vaſſal to attend vpon their ſtirrop & their Crownes ſubiect to be ſpurned off, with their feete. Henrie therefore minding to ſtop the violence of theſe narrow Seas, and to make the ſtreame milde betwixt his two Realmes, had now none to let, but only him that was all in all, and bare an Oare in euery mans boat: and therefore from King Charles, Burgogne, and himſelfe, his Ambaſſadors ſollicited his fatherlie conſent, to admit him his moſt Chriſtian ſonne of France, and to giue his holy bleſsing for the confirmation of the marriage, and peace concluded betwixt thoſe two famous Princes. King Henries right to the French Crowne they plainely laid forth, what calamities France had felt in their reſiſtance, Agincourt, Normandy and Aquitaine (as they ſhewed him) were moſt lamentable witneſſes, and the holde that the Lyon had got (at that day) of the Flower de Luce, was not to be wreſted out of his faſt graſped pawes. But his dull eare was deafe herevnto, anſwering that this peace was preiudiciall to the right of Charles the Daulphin, and therefore hee denied to confirme it.

(52) But with what quill theſe wines were vented from the ſetled Lees for the Daulphin, vnleſſe it was the golden vice, (a powerfull key indeed to vnlocke the Popes ſilent lips,) I know not; moſt true it is, the conditions went forward, and the place for the confirmation of couenants was Troyes in Champagne, where King Charles, and his Queene then lay, and whither Burgogne, Guien, the Lord Roſſe, and others attended with fiue hundred horſe, were ſent Ambaſſadors from Henry. In their way they beſieged (and after fifteene daies wan) the Towne of Creſpie that held for the Daulphin, demoliſhed the Caſtell, razed the wals, and departed vpon compoſition.

Theſe comming to Troyes were honorably receiued, and louingly concluded on a finall peace, where Lady Katherine was attended as the Engliſh Queene, and ſome left to guard her by King Henries command. His Ambaſſadors returned, and affection enflamed, himſelfe attended with the Dukes of Clarence, and Gloweſter his brethren, the Duke of Exceſter, the Earles of Warwicke, Huntingdon, Salisbury, Guienne and many other nobles, (his guard conſiſting of ſixteene hundred Launces and Archers) departed from Rouen to Pontheis, to S. Denis, and from thence into Pronins, where he was met neere vnto Troyes by the Duke of Burgundy and many other French Lords, and with all Princelie attendance was conducted into the Towne. The ioy was great with which he was receiued, eſpecially of the King, the Queene and Lady Katherine, whom he found in S. Peters Church expecting his comming, where forthwith he and the Lady was affianced; and falling eftſoones into conference of the conditions of amity, theſe were conſented vnto by the French and King Henry.

History of Normandy.

1. That K. Henry ſhould take Lady Katherine to wife.

2. That Charles & Iſabel ſhould retaine the name of King and Queene, and ſhould hold all their dignities, rents, and poſſeſſions belonging to the Crowne of France, during their naturall liues.

The Articles agreed vpon betwixt the two Kings.

3. That the Lady Katherine ſhould haue her Dowry in England as Queens heretofore were wont to haue, that is to ſay, the ſumme of forty thouſand ſceutes, that is, two to a noble.

Queene Katherines Dowry.

4. That the ſame ſumme of forty thouſand ſceutes yeerely, ſhall bee confirmed vnto Queene Katherine by our lawes, according to our vſuall rights, at the time of our death.

5. That the ſaid Lady Katherine ſo ouerliuing vs, from the time of our death, ſhall haue for her Dowry in the Kingdome of France, the ſumme of twenty thouſand francks yeerly, out of the lands, places, and Lordſhips that Blanch ſometime wife to Philip Beauiſall held and enioied.

The Crowne of France intailed to England.

6. That after the death of Charles our ſaid father, the Crown and Realme of France ſhall with all rights and appurtenances remaine vnto vs, & to our heires for euermore.

7. And for as much as our ſaid father is infirme by reaſon of ſickneſſe, and may not entend in his owne perſon to diſpoſe of the affaires of the Realme, therefore during the life of our ſaid father the faculties and exerciſe of the gouernment, and diſpoſition of the publike vtilitie of the Realme of France ſhall be, and abide to vs, ſo that thence forth wee may gouerne the Realme, and admit to our Councell and aſsiſtance to the Councell of France ſuch of the Engliſh Nobility as we ſhal thinke meete.

The gouernment of France aſſigned to King Henrie.

8. That alſo we of our owne power ſhall cauſe the Court of France to be kept and obſerued in as full authority, and in all manner of places, that now or in time comming, is, or ſhall be ſubiect to our ſaid father.

9. Alſo that we to our powers ſhall defend and helpe all, and euery of the Peeres, Nobles, Cities, Townes, Cominalties and ſingular perſons, now or in time to come, ſubiects to our father, in their rights, Cuſtomes, priuiledges, freedomes, franchiſes, belonging, or due vnto them in all manner of places, now or in time comming ſubiect to our father.

10. Alſo that we ſhall to our power trauell truly, & diligently, to ſee that Iuſtice be adminiſtred in the ſame Realme of France according to their lawes, Cuſtomes, and rights of the ſame Realme without perſonall acception; and that we ſhal keepe and hold the Subiects of the ſaid Realme in tranquility and peace to our power, and ſhall defend them againſt all manner of violence and oppreſsion.

11. Alſo that we to our power ſhall prouide that able and profitable perſons ſhall execute the offices aſwell of Iuſtices and other offices belonging to the gouernance of the demaines of the Realme of France for the good and peaceable Iuſtice of the ſame, and for the adminiſtration that ſhall be committed vnto them.

12. Alſo that we of our power, ſo ſoone as it may commodiouſly be done, ſhall trauaile to put into obedience of our ſaid father, all manner of Cities, Townes, Caſtels, places, Countreys and perſons within within the Realme of France, disobedient and rebels to our sayd father, lyding with them that bee called the Dauphin or Armagnac.

The subiects of France sworne to King Henry.

13. And that we may the more commodiously and freely exercise and fulfill these things aforesaid, it is accorded, that all worthy Nobles and estates of the same Realme of France aswell spirituals as tempor als and also the Nobles, Citizens, Burgesses and Cominalties of France in obedience at this day to our said father shall make these Oathes vnto vs.

14. First to vs hauing the faculty, exercise, disposition, and gouernance of the foresaid common profit at our hests and commandements, these shall meekly and obediently obey in all manner of things concerning the exercise of Gouernment in the same Realme.

15. Also that the worthy great and noble estates of the said Realme aswell spirituals as temporals, Citizens, Burgesses, and Comminalties of the same Realme in all manner of things well and truly shall keepe and to their power shall doe to be kept in asmuch as to them, belongeth or to any of them, all those things that be appointed and accorded betweene our foresaid father, our mother, and vs.

The tenor of the oath.

16. And that continually from the death, and after the death of our said father Charles, they shal be our true liegemen, and our heires, and they shall receiue and admit vs for their liege, and Soueraigne, and very King of France, and for such to obey vs without opposition, Contradiction or difficulty, as they be to our father during his life. And neuer after, this Realme of France shall obey to man as King and Regent of France, but to vs, and to our heires, also they shall not be in Counsell, helpe, or assent, that we loose life or limme, or be taken with euill taking, or that we suffer harme or diminution in person, estate, worship, or goods, but if they know any such thing to be contriued or imagined against vs, they shall let it to their powers, and shall doe vs to witten thereof, as hastily as they may by themselues, by message, or by letters.

17. That all manner of Conquests that shall be made by vs in France vpon the disobedient in the Dutchies of Normandy, shall be done to the profit of our said father, and that to our power, all manner of Lands and Lordships, that be in places to be conquered, belonging to persons, obeying to our forefather, which shall sweare to this present accord, shall be restored to the same persons, to whom they belonged.

18. That all manner of persons of the holy Church beneficed in the Dutchie of Normandy, or any other places in the Realme of France, subiect to our father, and fauouring of the parts of the Dukes of Burgundy, which shall sweare to keepe this present accord, shall peaceably inioy their benefices of holy Church in the Dutchie of Normandy, or in other places next aforesaid.

19. Likewise that all manner of persons of holie Church obedient to vs, and beneficed in the Realme of France, and places subiect to our father, that shall sweare to keepe this present accord, shal enioy peaceably their benefices of holy Church, as is aforesaide.

Churches, Vniuersities and Colledges to enioy their liberties.

20. Also that all manner of Churches, Vniuersities and studies generall, all Colledges of Students, and other Colledges of holy Church, being in places now, or in time comming, subiect to our father, or in the dutchy of Normandy, or other places in the realme of France subiect to vs, shall enioy their rights, possessions, rents, prerogatiues, liberties and franchises, belonging, or due to them in any manner of wise, in the said Realme of France, sauing the right of the Crowne of France, and of euery other person.

21. Also by Gods helpe, when it happeneth vs to come to the Crowne of France, the Dutchy of Normandie, and all other places conquered by vs in the said Realme, shall bow vnder the Commandement, obeisance, and Monarchy of the Crowne of France.

Normandy to be vnder the Crown of France.

22. Also that we to our power shall see recompence to be made by our said father, without diminution of the Crowne of France to persons obeying him and fauouring the party of Burgundy, to whom Lands, Lordships, Rents and possessions belongeth in the said Dutchie of Normandy, or other places in the Realme of France conquered by vs hitherto, giuen by vs in places, Lands, gotten, or to be gotten in the name of our said father vpon rebels and inobedients to him, and if so be that such manner of recompence be not made to the said persons in the life time of our said father, we shall make that recompence in such manner and places of goods, when it happeneth by Gods grace to the Crowne of France, and if so be that the Lands, Lordships, Rents or possessions belonging to such manner of persons in the said Dutchie and other places, bee not giuen by vs, the same persons shall be referred to them without any delay.

23. And during the life of our father in all places, now, and in time to come, subiect to him, letters of common iustice, grants of offices, giftes, pardons, remissions and priuiledges shall be written, and proceed vnder the name and seale of our said father. And forasmuch as some singular case may fall that may not be foreseene by mans wit, in the which it may be necessary and behouefull, that we write our letters; in such case if any hap for the good and surety of our father, and for the gouernment that belongeth to vs, as is aforesaid, and to auoid perils which otherwise might fall to the preiudice of our said father, to write our letters, by the which we shall command, charge and defend after the nature and quality of the need in our fathers behalfe, and ours, as Regent of France.

24. Also that during our fathers life, we shall not call, nor write vs King of France, but shall verily absteine from that name, so long as our said father liueth.

25. Also that our said father during his life, shall name, call, and write vs in French in this manner. Nostre treschier filz Henry Roy d' Engleterre heretere de France: and in Latine in this manner; Praclarissimus filius noster, Henricus Rex Anglia, & Hares Francia.

26. That we shall put no impositions or exactions to charge the Subiects of our said father, without cause reasonable and necessary. No otherwise then for common good of the Realme of France, and according to the Lawes and Customes prouided for the same Realme.

27. Also that we shall trauell to our power, to effect that by the assent of the three states of the Realmes of England and France, that all manner of obstacles may be done away, and this chiefly, that it be ordeined, and prouided, that from the time, that we, or any of our heires come to the Crowne of France, both the Crownes, that is to say, of France and England, perpetually be together in one, and in the same person, that is to say, from our fathers life to vs, and from the terme of our life thence forward, in the persons of our heires, that shall be one after another, and that both Realmes shall be gouerned from the time, that we, or our heires come to the same, not seuerally vnder diuers Kings in one time, but vnder the same person, which for the time shall be King of both Realmes, and our Soueraigne Lord, as is aforesaid, keeping neuertheless in all manner of things, to either of the said Realmes, their rights, liberties, customes, vsages and lawes, not making subiect in any manner of wise, one of the same Realmes to the rights, lawes or vsages of that other.

28. That thenceforth perpetually shall be still rest, and that in all manner of wise, dissentions, hates, rancours, ennies, and warres, betweene the same Realmes of France and England, and the people of the same Realmes drawing to accord of the same peace may cease and be broken.

29. That from henceforth for euermore, peace and tranquilty, good accord and affection, and stable friendship friendship shall be betwixt the said Realmes and the Subiects of the same, and shall keepe themselues with their Counsels, helpes, and common assistance against all men that enforce them to doe, or to imagine wrongs, harmes, displeasures, or greeuances to them or either of them, and that they shall be conuersant in merchandizing freely and surely together, paying the Customes due and accustomed, and that all the confederates and allyes of our said father and the Realme of France, as also our confederates of the Realme of England shall in eight months space from the time of this accord of peace, as it is notified to them, declare by their letters, that they will draw to this accord, and will be comprehended vnder the treaties and accord of this peace, sauing neuertheless their obedience to either of the same Crownes, and to all manner of actions, rights, and reuenues, that belong to our said father and his Subiects, and to vs, and our Subiects against all manner of such Allies and Confederates.

30. That our father, neither our brother the Duke of Burgundy, shall begin nor make with Charles calling himselfe the Daulphin of Viennes, any treatie, peace, or accord but by Counsell and assent of each of vs three, or of other the three estates of either the said Realmes aboue-named.

31. Also that we with the assent of our brother of Burgundy, and other of the Nobles of the Realme of France, which ought thereunto to be called, shall ordeine for the Gouernance of our said father, surely, louingly and honestly, after the degree of his royall estate and dignity in such wise, as shall be to the worship of God, of our said father, and of the Realm of France.

32. Also that all manner of persons, that shall be, our father, to doe him personall seruice, not onlie in office, but in all other attendances, aswell the Nobles and Gentlemen, as others, shall be such as haue beene borne in the Realme of France, or in places belonging to France, good, wise, true, and able to doe him seruice, and our said father shall dwell in places vnder his obedience, and no where else, wherefore we charge and command our said liege subiects, and other being vnder our obedience, that they keepe, and doe to be kept, in all that belongeth to them, this accord and peace, after the forme and manner as it is accorded, and that they attempt in no manner wise, any thing that may be preiudiciall, or contrary to the same accord, and peace, vpon paine of life and limme, and all that they may forfeit vnto vs.

33. Also that we for the things aforesaid, and euery one of them shall giue our assent by our letters Patents, sealed with our seale vnto our said father, without all approbation, and confirmation of vs, and all other of our blood roiall, and of the Cities and Townes to vs obedient, sealed with our great seale, shall make or cause to be made letters approbatory, and confirmed of the Peeres of his Realme, and of the Lords, Citizens, Burgesses of the same vnder his obedience, all which Articles we haue sworne to keepe, vpon the holie Euangelists. Yeuen at Troies the 30. of May, Anno 1420. And the same were proclaimed in London the 20. of Iune following; for the Copies of this treaty, the French King sent to euery Town in France, as King Henry did likewise into England, there to be published by Proclamation. These Articles were concluded betwixt the two Kings, in the presence of Queene Isabell, the Duke of Burgundy, and the Kings Councell, the Prince of Orange, Seigneur Chastelleux, Marshall of France, with many others the prime Nobility, both of England and France, both the Kings with the Queene, taking their solemne oath there, vpon the holy Euangelists, as did likewise the Duke of Burgundy, and the rest, Burgundy * being the first man that laid his hand on the booke, and * sware homage to King Henry; who thereupon was stiled and proclaimed Regent of France.

(53) In whose presence also vpon the third of Iune, (being the morrow after Trinity Sunday) the marriage of King Henry and Lady Katherine, with all pompous solemnity was celebrated, in Saint Peters Church at Troyes, the Bishop of that See, doing the Ceremonies. And after royall feasts and Princely entertainements, before the dissolution of that roiall assembly, King Henry, inuiting the French King and others his great Peeres to a sumptuous banquet, made a pithy and pleasing Oration vnto them, thus testifying his Princely desire to aduance their weale, and demerit their loue.

King Henries Oration vnto the States of France.

(54) "As the chiefe marke whereunto my "cares and endeuors haue hitherto leuelled, hath "beene, to vnite and concorporate these two Kingdomes of France and England into one, which now "by Gods goodnes is most happily effected; so is it "still, and euer shall be, both my desire and care, that "vnto posterity we may leaue it setled in the same "sort, and free from all empeachments, of factious, "discords: that beings as (it is) the greatest, it may "be also the happiest Monarchie of Europe. For the "cleere accomplishment of which worke, there rests "now nothing, but the depressing of the Daulphin, "who is by your doome already, not only depriued "of that dignity, but of succession to the Crowne, "and prosecuted as a Traitor to the State; and of "whom this we must be assured, that while he liues, "France cannot but be in a perpetuall combustion. "For preuenting whereof, I both need and intreate, "both your Counsels and aide, nothing doubting "of your readines in either; for how can we expect "any safety, or you any goodnes at his hand, who, "in his young yeeres, did so perfidiously murder the "Duke of Burgundy his vncle? I am now, you see, "your Regent in present, and Successour to the "Crowne in hope; Let it not therefore sticke in "your hearts, that I am an Englishman borne, for "you know I haue much French blood in my veines, "which warmes my affections as well to French as "English, but looke on me as the lawfull heire to the "Diademe, both by iust Title, and your owne consents, who therefore am, and ought to be, wholly "yours; and your kindnes and iust dealing bind me "so to be. Yours also am I now by fresh alliance, "as sonne in Law to your King, vnto whom I will "performe all offices of loue and honor, as to mine "owne father; and you his subiects shall I loue and "cherish, as mine owne children, and will defend "France and the French, so long, as you defend my "right with your louing aide, and will deserue my "loue with your loiall affection.

Polyd. Verg.

(55) These affaires thus accomplished at Troyes, the Kings, the Queenes, and the rest of the Peeres in great estate rode vnto Paris, where all faire countenances were shewed, and great entertainement giuen to the English. But the Daulphin and his followers neither feared nor fainted, though the present courses pleased not their palat. Their first Counsell therefore was how to preserue themselues in so eminent danger; to sit still and doe nothing, they knew it was but to increase and aduance the successes of the English; and to rise without strength, was to fall into further misfortunes, hauing no meanes to hold warre with so potent an Enemy. In this distraction their voice was best heard, that spake most for the safety of the Daulphin (whose only life gaue breath vnto the after-hopes of France) and for the strengthening of those places which might be of most aduantage to themselues, and offence to the Enemie. This then past by decree in that Counsell of warre, that the Daulphin should at no time hazard his person in field, and that a leuy of Souldiers should be had, to lie in Garrison in places conuenient; for Time, which neuer stands still, they well hoped might yet turne the tice for them, fortune being (said they) as subiect to fawne, as to frowne; in which resolution each man tooke to his charge, and all to withstand the doings of Henry.

Denis Sauage in Chron. de Flandr.

French so in Paris a Parliament of the three estates was assembled, wherein such as were guilty of the death of Burgundy, were iusticed, the disherizing of the Daulphin confirmed, and warres prepared against these Townes which held for him. Against Sens the two Kings with their Queens, Clarence, and Burgundy, marched; which after 12 daies was rendered vpon composition of life, those excepted as were guilty of the Duke of Burgundies death. Monstreau was the next, which by force was entred, where the body of the Duke of Burgundy, vndecently buried by the Daulphinois, was taken vp, and by his sonne Philip sent in great pompe to Dijon in his Dutchy, and there honorably interred. The Towne being taken, the Castle held out: vnto whose Captaine twenty Captiue Gentlemen were sent, whose liues from King Henries mouth (say the French) were sentenced to death, vnlesse they could perswade the Castellan to surrender; but those men (say our English, to mollifie that seuere doome) were all especiall friends of that Captaine and such, as had giuen opprobrious words to the Kings Herauld, being sent vnto them in the siege of Monstreau. Howsoeuer, in this extremity they sollicited Guitay vpon their knees, vrging their owne deaths, and his great danger if he held out; but Guitay, a true Frenchman, and friend to the Daulphin, withstood the assault, and thereupon these Gentlemen Petitioners were presently hanged in the sight of the defendants: so bloody is Mars to maintaine his owne Lawes, and so eager was Henry of his full Conquest of France, whose thirsting sword had heretofore beene somewhat ouerlauish in blood, but neuer more (perhaps) then in this bloody act; which I wish might be obliterated from the number of his other glorious actions. Yet at length was that Castle enforced to surrender vpon composition of life, excepting the guilties of Burgundies death.

(57) Then was the siege remoued to Melun, a Towne of great strength, and made more strong by the valours of her commanders, who were Seigneur Barbason an absolute souldier, Pierre de Bourbon a Prince of the blood, Preaux, and Bourgeois, whose Garrison was seuen hundred Daulphinois: and indeed no default in defence, could anie wise be imputed, but the Canon opening a breach, the English and Burgundians made an entry into the Bulwarke, and ouer the Riuer Seine built a bridge with Boates; so that from either quarter they had passage one to the other without impediments, and encamped themselues for their best aduantage; vpon whom the enemie neuertheless made diuers sallies, with the losse of either parties. King Henry inforced his siege to the vtmost, and made a myne vnderneath the wals, which being perceiued, the defendants countermined against him; where the King (too forward) as the very first man entring his myne, and Barbason likewise his within the Towne, met each other at point of sword, where they performed nobly the parts of priuate souldiers, (nobly indeed, if priuate souldiers they had been, but Princes should remember they are not such) till lastly they agreed to discouer themselues, and first Barbason made known his name, then King Henry did his, whereupon the French Lord suddainely getting backe, caused the Barriers to be closed, and Henry returned to his Campe.

(58) This enterprize failing, King Charles himselfe came into the Campe, to induce the defendants to render, at the presence of their naturall Lord; which neuertheless was little respected; for answere was made, that if their King were at liberty, and free from King Henries power, they would doe him the duty of naturall subiects, and yeeld him their charge as their Liege Lord: but being as he was, they desired to be excused, for to the mortall enemy of France they would not yeeld.

(59) Whileft King Henry lay at the siege of Melun, the Duke of Bauier (who was Palsegraue of Rhyne Elector) came to King Henry hauing married his sister, and thence sent a defiance vnto the Daulphin his kinseman by Queene Isabell his mother; the Prince of Orange likewise came thither vnto Henry, but because he required an Oath of him, as a subiect of France, he went away displeased, saying, he was a free Prince, and ought neither obedience to England nor France. At which time the Parisians with more respect of their owne safety committed their City vnto K. Henries deuotion who deputed his brother Clarence (though Count Saint Paul with his French displeased) Gouernour thereof, and put Garrisons into the Bastile of S. Anthonie, the Louure, and the Hostill de Nesle. During this siege, mandatory letters were sent by King Charles into Picardy, to put all places that held for him in those quarters into Henries possession, and to take the Oath of their obedience vnto him as to the only heire, Successor, Regent, and Gouernour of France; the execution whereof was committed to the Count of Saint Paul, the Bishops of Therouenne and Arras, the Vidame of Amiens, the Lord of Vendueill, the Gouernour of Lisle, Pierre Marigny Aduocate of the Parliament, and George Ostend the Kings Secretary, beginning thus; Charles par le Grace de Dieu, &c.

(60) The distresse of Melun, was wonderfull great aswell vpon the seegers, as defendants; the one afflicted, and their troupes sore weakened with mortality, the other oppressed with famine, and other defects incident to a long indured siege. In this State eighteene weekes were spent, and more had beene, but that the English were supplied with souldiers out of Picardie, whose colours displaied a farre off, put the Towne in hope of reliefe, as sent from the Daulphin, but vpon their neerer approach, Melun was rendred by these capitulations. 1. That the Towne and Castle should be deliuered to the King. 2. That aswell the men of warre, as the Burgesses, should submit themselues to King Henry, to be dealt with as pleased the King. 3. That all such as should be found guilty of the Duke of Burgundies murder should suffer death. 4. That all the rest of the souldiers should be receiued to mercy, but to be prisoners vntill they put in good caution for their true obedience in after times. 5. That the Natiues of France should be sent home to their owne Countreys. 6. That all the moueables and Armes in the Towne should bee carried into the Castle. 7. That all the Prisoners they had taken either before or during the siege, should be enlarged ransome-free, and acquitted of their promises. 8. That for the performance of these Articles, 12. of the principall Captaines, and 6. of the wealthiest Burgesses should deliuer themselues in hostage. 9. That all the English, and Scots, should be deliuered to Henry and left at his disposition.

These things accorded, an English Garrison was put into Melun, commanded by Pierre Varrolt. Pierre de Burbon, Seigneur de Preaux, and valiant Barbason, with sixe hundred Prisoners of quality, were sent with a strong guard vnto Paris. The guilties of Burgundies murder were all of them put to death, amongst whom were two Monkes, and Bertrand de Chartmont a Gascoigne, (a man in great fauour with King Henry) for that he at King Henries entry into Melun, had conuaied thence one Amenion de Lau, who was proued guilty of Burgundies death. The Duke of Burgundy himselfe, as also Clarence earnestly labored with King Henry for Bertrands pardon, but the King, though much grieued, and protesting that he had rather haue lost 50000. Nobles, yet was resolued he should die for example to all such, as should dare to offend, vpon presumption of their nearenes and grace with their Princes.

(61) Melun being rendred, and these things thus disposed, the two Kings with their Queenes most honorablie attended, returned to Paris, before whose entrance the Citizens and Students met them in most solemne manner, hauing beautified the City with flagges, streamers and rich hangings throughout the streetes where they should passe. The two Kings rode rode together vnder a rich Canopie, Henry vpon the left hand, next vnto whom followed the Dukes of Clarence and Bedford, and vpon their left hand the Duke of Burgundy clad all in blacke, the Princes and Nobles of either Nation mingled together in their degrees, the Clergy with proceſſions, and their venerable reliques, going before them to Noſtre dame Church; and the next day the two Queenes entred the City with as great a ſhew. King Henries Pallace was prepared in the Loure, which was moſt rich and magnificent, and Charles his Court in the Hoſtel of Saint Paul, being but homely and meane; for (ſaith Millet) young Henry commanded all, and his brethren exerciſed ſupreme authority, whiles olde Charles ſtood as a Cypher, and the French Nobilitie had nothing to doe.

(62) During the two Kings abode here, a great Aſſembly was called as well of the Spiritualty, as of the ſecular Nobilitie, in whoſe preſence, in the great Hall of the Hoſtell, a State for Iuſtice was prepated, where the two Kings ſitting, as ſupreme Iudges, vnder one Cloath of eſtate, the Court was furniſhed with Princes and Officers in moſt ſolemne wiſe. Before whom, Nicolas Rollin aduocate from the Duke of Burgundy, and the Dutcheſſe his mother, craued audience (and had it granted) vnto an inuectiue and long Oration againſt Charles Viſconte Narbone, Tanneguy, Barbaſon and others, for the cruell murther of Iohn Duke of Burgundy; and not only that the murtherers might be accordingly executed, but withall, that a Church might be founded and furniſhed with ſacred Ornaments for twelue Chanons, ſixe Chaplaines, and ſixe Clerkes to pray for his ſoule for euer, euery Chanon to haue yeerely two hundred pound Paris money, euery Chaplen one hundred, and euery Clerke fifty, to be leuied vpon the Lands of the Daulphin, and his aſſociates in the murder: that the ſame foundation ſhould be engrauen vpon the Porch thereof, and the like inſcription ſet vp publikely in the Cities of Paris, Rouen, Graunt, Dion, Saint Iames of Compoſtella, and Ieruſalem. This motion was ſeconded by a Doctor of Diuinity appointed by the Rector of the Vniuerſity, who concluded with an humble requeſt to the King and thoſe Princes, that iuſtice might be done. Whereunto the Chancellor of France, in the behalfe of King Charles, promiſed that no endeuour on his part ſhould bee lacking; and thereupon cauſed his ſonne to be ſolemnely called to the Marble-Table; to anſwere his accuſation, by the name of Charles Duke of Touraine, and Daulphin de Vienne, which done three ſeuerall times, and he not appearing, by arreſt of the ſame Court of Parliament, he was baniſhed the Realme, and iudged vnworthy to ſucceed in any of the Seignories as well preſent, as to come. But the Daulphin appealed from this ſentence to God and his ſword, and ſtill was the ſame, though his fortunes were changeable. Mounſieur de Barbaſon was vehemently accuſed to haue his hand in the murder, and therefore King Henrie accordingly gaue ſentence on him to ſuffer to death; but he in open Court defended himſelfe, not to bee guilty of the crime, although he confeſſed to be a true ſeruant to the Daulphin. Notwithſtanding, had he not appealed to the Officers of Armes, King Henries iudgement of death had gone againſt him: for the Law Military, as he there alleaged, forbiddeth, that any man, hauing his brother in Armes within his danger, ſhould afterwards put him to death for any cauſe or quarrell, and proued himſelfe to be the Kings brother in Armes, for that he had in the Countermine coaped in combat with the King. Thus by a quirke of Heraldry acquitted from death, he was neuertheleſſe remained in priſon the ſpace of nine yeeres, and laſtly at the winning of Caſtle Galliard from the Engliſh, was deliuered out of moſt ſtrait impriſonment, to the great ioy of the French.

(63) This execution of Iuſtice on thoſe Murtherers, was a great, but not the only act of K. Henry at this great Parliament of three Eſtates of France in Paris. For therein alſo was the finall accord betwixt the two Kings, openly acknowledged by the French King, as made by his free aſſent, and with aduiſe of all the Councell of France; whereupon it was there alſo ratified by the generall ſtates of France, and ſworne vnto particularly vpon the holy Euangeliſts, by all their Nobles and Magiſtrates, ſpirituall and ſecular, who alſo ſet their ſeales to the Inſtruments thereof, which were ſent into England to be kept in the Kings *Exchecquer at weſtminſter. King Henries glory thus aſcended to the higheſt verticall in France, his Court was not only honoured daily both with Courtly and military ſhewes and paſtimes, but alſo was ſtill frequented both with forraine Ambaſſadors, and domeſticke Commiſsioners, whoſe directions depended only vpon his voluntary aſſigne, himſelfe redreſſing all things at his pleaſure, placing and diſplacing Officers and Gouernors, cauſing alſo a new Coyne to be made, called a Salute, wherein were the Armes of France, and the Armes of England and France, quarterly ſtamped. King Charles the while in his Palace, was but for faſhions ſake viſited, and but by ſome of his olde ſeruants, his Sunne was drawne ſo neere vnto the ſetting. The great affaires of France thus ſetled, (as well as that vnſetled time would permit,) King Henry minding to Crowne his Queene in England, ordained his brother of Clarence, (a wiſe, valiant, and a great Captaine) his Lieutenant generall of France, leauing alſo the Duke of Exeter with 500. men of warres to keep Paris, and ſo attended with great ſtate, he came to Amiens and Callais, where taking to Sea, he arriued at Douer vpon the third of February, and was receiued of his Subiects as an Angell from heauen, or another victorious Caſar on Earth.

(64) All things in a readines for his faire Queens Coronation, vpon the foure and twentith of the ſame month, with all roialty the ſame was ſolemnized at Weſtminſter, and the Engliſh rich diademe ſet on her head. The feaſt was great, with all Princely ſeruices, and the ſtate ſuch as deſerueth the report; for the Queene ſitting at Table, at the right ſide of her Chaire, kneeled the Earle of March holding a Scepter in his hand; the Earle Marſhall kneeling on the left ſide, held another; and the Counteſſe of Kent ſate vnder the Table at her right foote; vpon her right hand at Table ſate the Biſhops of Canterbury and Winchester, and vpon the left the King of Scots, the Dutcheſſe of Yorke, and the Counteſſe of Huntington; the Nobles giuing their attendance, each man according to his office and place.

(65) Preſently, after Eaſter, in the month of May, a Parliament was held at Weſtminſter, whoſe chiefeſt intent was to haue meanes to continue the Kings Conqueſt in France; but ſuch was the ſtate of thoſe lauiſh times, that, to ſtop the current of this melting mint, ſome, minding more the heapes of their money, then the ſpreading abroad of Englands faire Monarchy, exhibited their Bils vnto the three eſtates in Parliament, and petitioned vnto the King, to commiſerate the pouerty of the commons, which (as they ſaid) were beggered by theſe warres. For which cauſe, as it ſeemeth, no ſubſidy or ayde was demanded, but the King againe pawning his Crowne to his vncle Beaufort, the rich Cardinall, for twenty thouſand pound, before the ſaid month was expired, with foure thouſand horſe and foure and twenty thouſand foote returned into France to follow thoſe warres,

(66) Neither was his haſt more then needed: for Iohn Earle of Buequhanan, and Archbald Dowglas, two valiant leaders of ſeuen hundred reſolute Scots, repaired into France to ayde the Daulphin, and ioining with the French in Anion, meant to haue ſurprized the Duke of Clarence before he had beene aware: in which enterprize, foure ſtraggling Scots, taken and brought to his preſence, *as he ſate at dinner, reuealed the intent and ſtrength of the Enemy, whoſe approach was verie neere at hand. ner came, but the Duke ouerhastily got to horse (saying, they are allours) leauing his troupes to follow him with asmuch celerity as they might. His suddaine and vnlooked-for approch, caused the Scots to take into the Church of Bargie for their safety, where whilst they were making defence, the rest tooke the Alarme, and the Earle of Bucquhanan manned the Bridge, to whose ayde, Hugh Kennedie with an hundred horse presented himselfe.

(67) The Duke of Clarence seeing no possibilitie to free the passage with his slender troope of horse, alighted on foot, & gaue forthwith a furious charge, where the Earle of Bucquhanan came to blowes, being followed by two hundred horse; and either side fighting with equall courage and rancor. Clarence gaue singular demonstration of his great valour, vntill, as he was remounting, one Iohn Swinton a Scot, wounded him in the face with his Launce, and threw him to the ground, being the first man of the English that there was slaine, where likewise died the Earle of Kyme, the Lords Gray, and Rosse, besides other men of marke, and fifteene hundred common souldiers, the Earles of Huntington, and Sommerset, with Thomas Beausort his brother, were taken prisoners. The * cause of this ouerthrow, is imputed to the Dukes hast in not staying for his Horsemen. Clarence that day vpon his Crest ware a Circlet set with precious stones, which being taken off his Helmet by a Scot, was solde to Iohn Steward of Derby, for a thousand Angels. For this fortunate dayes successe, (wherein yet the Enemy also lost eleuen hundred, and sundry of them men of principall note,) the Daulphin made the Earle of Bucquhanan Constable of France. This losse receiued the Earle of Salisbury, (who followed with the other forces, but came too late to the encounter,) thought to requite, and bringing forward his troupes, the enemy gaue ground, whereby yet he recouered the dead bodie of Clarence, and sent it to Rouen, from whence it was conueyed into England.

(68) After this victory the Dolphinois besieged Alenzon, which the Earle of Salisbury with his best forces sought to releeue; but finding the enemie too strong, retired to the Abbey of Becq, in whole retreat the French charged vpon him, and slew three hundred of his troopes, but finding no meanes to possesse Alenzon, raised their siege & returned to Anion.

(69) King Henry therefore vpon notice of his brothers death, was much perplexed, for besides the naturall affection of a brother, his wisdome, valour, and counsell in the warres was highly esteemed by him, and to speake truth, there were very few Princes of that age to be equalled vnto him. Wherefore ordaining his other brother, Iohn Duke of Bedford his Lieutenant, and leauing his faire Queene most honorably attended, vpon the tenth of Iune he landed at Callis, hauing in his companie Iames King of Scotland, in hope either to draw the Scots vnto his seruice, or else to withdraw their aides from the Daulphin, by the sight of their owne King vnder his roiall standard. But the Scots, constantly French, being demanded why they would fight against their Soueraigne, answered directly that they might not acknowledge any duty vnto Iames, who as yet liued vnder the obedience of another. His designe thus fayling, his confidence was in his right and his sword.

(70) The morrow after his arriuall he dispatched the Earle of Dorset, and the Lord Clifford with twelue hundred horse and foot vnto Paris, to releeue the Duke of Excester, who was straitned of victuals by the Dolphinois, that harrased the Countrey adioining, taking Bonneual, Galandon, and some other forts, and in his fortunate successes, and new conceiued hope then marched to Chartiers with seuen thousand men at Armes, foure thousand Crosse-bowes, and sixe thousand Archers strong, where he began the siege, whom the Bastard of Thian brauely resisted, and sent to King Henry for aide.

(71) Henry, after a few daies stay in Callais, marched to Monstrelet, and there lodged, quartering his Army in the villages about, where he found the Duke of Burgogne somewhat impaired of health: three daies spent in conference, King Henry marched into Ponthieu, and the Duke to Abbeuill vpon Some, to facilitate his passage there to be made, whereof some doubt was held by reason of the Inhabitants disposition, altogether vnsetled, and as ready to offend, as affect. Henry in his way tooke the Fort called La Ferte, commanded by the Bastard of Bellay, which vpon summons rendered, and being committed to the Custody of Barssiers a Picard, was betraied againe by him vnto the Daulphin: from hence departing, he passed the riuer at Abbeuile, where he was roiallie receiued, and richly presented, whence he marched to Beauuois, Giſors, and so to Bois-de Vincennes, where Charles and his Queene resided, and receiued him with great honour, and lastly to Paris where he was receiued in triumph.

(72) But more minding a Conquest then the delicate pleasures of Court, after he had consulted vpon his affaires, and leuied French forces to adde to the English, he marched toward Meaux, intending (in reuenge of his brothers death) to fight with the Daulphin, who had now laine before Chartres the space of three weekes, and giuen it forth he would come into the field. But hearing of King Henries comming, and that his Armie by the accesse of supplies, from Paris and Normandy was much increased, he brake vp his siege and departed: which newes related, Henry marched to Dreaux and sate downe before it. The inhabitants and Garrison sensible of the danger, praied parley, and accorded to render the Towne, if the Daulphin did not relieue them by a certaine day, which expired, the Towne was deliuered, and eight hundred of the Daulphins souldiers permitted to depart vpon their Oathes, not to beare Armes against King Henry, nor his allies for the space of one yeere: then following the Daulphin (who fled still before him) in his march he tooke Bangency, Rougmont, and other places of defence.

(73) Seeing his pursuit of the flying Daulphin to be fruitlesse, he diuerted his Army vnto Luigny vpon the riuer of Marne, where * he caused many engines and habiliaments for the warre to be made; hauing a designe to beliege Meaux in Brie, and infest the Faulxbourg, sending before him the Duke of Exeter with foure thousand strong, to preuent the burning of Meaux, by the Inhabitants, and a * few daies after followed himselfe. His first worke was to secure his Armie, by entrenching his Quarters, which done, and the Artillery mounted, he beganne to batter the wals, and to make his Mines, wherein neither his industry nor personall labour was spared; and within, the Bastard of Vaurus with many men of Marke, besides the inhabitants, and a thousand trained souldiers, were as busie and resolute for the defence. Meane while Iaques de Harecourt, in seruice of the Daulphin, with seuen hundred souldiers harrased the parts about Vimeu, against whom, some English Garrisons thereabout, assembling, slew three hundred of his retinue, himselfe hardly escaping by the swiftnes of his horse.

(74) Whilst King Henry lay in his siege before Meaux, newes was brought him that his Queene at the Castle of Windsore was deliuered of a sonne, named also Henry, whereat he exceedingly reioiced, though, as some will haue it, he liked not well the place of her deliuery, hauing before commanded the contrary, and prophecying, that what Henry of Monmouth should get, Henry of Windsore would loose. At the same time likewise he heard that Auranches in Normandy, was surprized by the Daulphinois; and aboue three hundred English there in Garrison put to the sword, or taken Prisoners; to remedy which, King Henry sent part of his owne Armie vnto the Earle of Salisbury his Lieutenant of Normandie, who within few daies recouered Auranches and reuenged the death of the surprized.

(75) But

(75) But Henries siege lessened through these stirs in Normandy, and his mind busied vpon his affaires that way, fitted opportunity to Seigneur de Offemont, vnto whome the besieged had many times made knowne their desires to haue him their Gouernour; on a night therefore (ladders made readie to put ouer the wals to receiue him) he secretly approached the place, but being discouered by the Centinels; and the alarum taken, he not able to recouer the ladders, fell into the ditch, whence by reason of his heauy armour hee could not free himselfe, and in taking was wounded in the face: the King esteeming the taking of so braue and valiant a Captaine, as a prize of much importance. The Defendants now hopelesse of succour, and finding themselues not able to hold out, carried all their goods from the towne into the * Castel; but the assailants discouering their actions, and perceiuing their feare, gaue a fierce assault, and by force made way into the Towne with their swords: then Henry planting his Canons, began to batter the Castell, and shortly brought it to that extremity, that besides want of bread, most of their hand weapons were broken, and all of them in a maner dangerously wounded; yet desisted they not to prouoke the English with opprobrious words, which caused such heauy conditions to bee laid on them, as the like had not beene of any surrender before.

1 That the March of Meaux should bee rendred vpon the eleuenth of May next ensuing. 2. That Messier Louis de Gast, the Bastard of Vaurus, Iehan de Romieres, Tromagon, and Barnard de Meureuille should be left to K. Henry to execute. 3. That Guicchard de Sissayi, Pierron de Luppe, Robert de Geraines, Philip de Gamaches, and Iohn de Ouraye should be at the kings will vntill they had rendred or caused to be rendred all the Townes, Castels and Fortresses which they or any of them held in France, and then to be secured of life. 4. That all the English, Welsh, Irish & Scots that heretofore had beene in the Kings obedience should be left to the Kings discretion. 5. That all the rest, aswell Souldiers as Burgesses should bee left to the Kings pleasure, their liues onely excepted. 6. That the Earle of Connerson, who had beene prisoner to Pierron de Luppe, and at the beginning of the siege of Meaux, was deliuered at the instance of Henry for a ransome, should now bee freede without ransome. 7. That al the Armes and goods in the March should bee brought to one place there safely guarded, and an Inuentory of the same deliuered vnto King Henry. 8. That all the Reliques and Church ornaments should likewise be put in safety. 9. That all the Prisoners aswell in the March, as in any other place vnder any of their commandements should be set at liberty, ransome free, and acquitted of their promises. 10. That no man vntill the assigned day of rendring should goe out of the March, and that none should bee admitted to enter into it, but such as King Henry assigned. 11. That these Articles should be subscribed and sealed by an hundred of the best men amongst them. 12. That for the true performance of the concord, foure and twenty persons elected by King Henry should remaine in hostage.

(76) The place thus rendred vnto the King, hee presently sent eight hundred selected persons prisoners to Paris, Rouen, and England. The Bastard of Vaurus, and the Gouernour of Meaux, the King caused to be hanged before the Towne on a Tree, named (by the Bastard himselfe) Vaurus, whereon hee had formerly hanged many English and Burgundions, and his head was fixed vpon a pole on the toppe of the same tree. Messier Louis de Gast, Denis de Vaurus, brother to the Bastard, Iehan de Romieres, and Barnard de Meureuille were sent to Paris, & there executed; the goods of the March were distributed by Henry amongst his Captains, and deseruing men. Then order was taken for repairing of breaches, and a strong Garrison left in Meaux and the March. After whose surrender, Crespi, the Castell of Pierrepont, Merlau, Offemont, and sundry others submitted themselues to Henry, whilest the true Dolphinois set fire on theirs, before hee could attaine to their siege.

(77) Queene Katherine in England daily hearing of the Kings successe, desired greatly the sight of his person, and to that end prepared her voyage for France, vnder the conduct of Duke Iohn the Kings brother, then Regent of England, who deputed for the time of his absence, his brother Humfrey Duke of Gloecster, and tooke shippe at Southampton. The winds prosperous, the 21. of May she landed at Harfleur, and with stil-encreasing troupes of Noblemen, by easie iourneyes came to Rouen, and thence to Bois de Vincennois, whither her husband, her father and mother with great state came to meete her, of all whom shee was receiued as some Angelicall person, who together remoued to Paris, where King Henry and Queene Katherine in the Lowre, vpon the festiuall of Pentecost, sate in their royall roabes, with their imperiall Crownes on their heades, and kept their Court with great confluence of people, K. Henry assigning the affaires of the Prouinces. Enguerrant de Monstrelet. A.D. 1422.

(78) But though Champaigne, Picardie, Brie, and Normandy with the Isle of France were in Henries possession, yet was not all reduced to his quiet obeysance, a great and strong part holding out still for the Daulphin; who with twenty thousand strong besieged La Charity vpon Loire, and tooke it, from whence hee marched to Cone vpon the same riuer, whose Defendants agreede, that if Burgundy did not raise the siege by the sixteenth of August, they would surrender; which the said Duke accepted, and thereupon sent profer of battell to the Daulphin; who was likewise as readie (and by his Herauld gaue his faith) to trie his fortune in the field: The day assigned, and preparation made, the Duke of Burgundy sent to King Henry for his assistance; whose answere was, that himselfe and his forces would not faile to bee with him that day, and run the same fortunes with him in the field. Enguerrant de Monstrel.

(79) But great Henries stout mind was crossed with his new crazy body, his health being so empaired with a burning feauer and fluxe, that he was disswaded from the March; so the command of the Army was committed to his brother Iohn Duke of Bedford, and the Earle of Warwick, who ioyning their forces for auoiding of contentions, through all their rankes intermingled the English, Burgundians, and Picardes together, and so the night before the designed day of battell, came to Cone and encamped neere to the Towne; yet vndaunted Henry, who neuer miscarried in any of his personall enterprises, taking his leaue at Senlis of K. Charles, and the two Queens, in his horse-litter (with a guard for his person) marched (though weake) after them; but at Melun finding his sickenesse to encrease, and himselfe (who erst could endure all things) now vnable to endure trauell, he returned to Bois de Vincennois. K. Henries sickenesse.

(80) The English colours displayed in the Daulphins eye, and his power inferior in shew vnto them, howsoeuer hee had vaunted, he thought it not best to aduenture the field, and therefore dislodging from Cone, he marched to Barry, both to protract time, and to weary the enemy. Cone thus relieued, the Dukes marched to Troyes in Champaigne, and set down their Army for the siege; but before the cords of their tents could bee sufficiently made fast, the Duke of Bedford had heauy newes of Great Henries encreased sickenesse, and danger of death: wherefore leauing the Duke of Burgundy with the Armie, hee posted to Bois de Vincennois, where finding the relation too true, hee greatly lamented his dying brothers estate: but the King much reioycing of his brothers comming, cheerefully comforted his mourning friends and Nobles, and made vnto them this graue and his last dying speech. His cheerfulnes in his sickness.

Enguerrant de monstr. (82) Thus said, and drawing neere to the period of his short but glorious life; he demanded of his Physitians how long (in their iudgement) he might liue?
wherunto when one of thē answered, Sir, thinke on your soule, for your time is not aboue 2. houres: he made his cōfession, & his Chaplains afterward kneeling in prayer, when one of them out of the Psalms made mention of Ierusalem, the king no sooner heard ter hee had raigned nine yeeres, fiue monethes, and * four- teene dayes, leauing none like vnto him amongst all the Kings and Princes of Christendome, for which cause his death was not onely bewailed of the English, whom hee gloriously had ruled, but also of the French, whom hee had victoriously conquered. This was the manner of this triumphant Monarchs end, which moues men iustly to wonder at Hector Boetius, who saith, he was Boet. l. 16. c. 19. stricken by God for sacriledge, and died miserablie:

Hectors friends haue occasion to wish, that his Readers should not make that miserable iudgement, the rule and measure of crediting or discrediting his other writings, yet lamentable his end was indeed, if he perished by poison, wherof there was a vehement Polydor. suspition, as Polydor Vergill hath auerred, and the carriage of the French affaires afterward makes it more then probable.

Ioh. Stow Annals. (83) His workes of pious affection were shewed
His works of deuotion. in erecting the Monasteries of Bethlem & Briget, neere vnto his Manour of Richmond, as also his princely gifts vnto the workes and furniture of Westminster Church, besides the brotherhood of S. Giles without Creple gate London. And (which had surpassed all the rest) hee intended (such was his loue to learning, and to the place where himselfe was a learner) to haue founded in the great Castell at Oxford, a magnificent Colledge for Diuines, and Students of the seuen liberall Sciences, * the plot and ordinations of which foundation he had already drawne, and * re-solued to endow it with all the lands in England, belonging to Priors Aliens; but his vntimely death
preuented both that, and many other noble workes.
To leaue a domesticke testimony of his affection to Armes, hee first instituted Gartar principall King at Armes: besides other augmentations to the Order of Saint George. In a word, neuer liued English King with more true glory, nor euer died any in a more vnseasonable time, nor more lamented: for he was godly in heart, sober in speech, sparing of words, resolute in deedes, prouident in Counsell, prudent in iudgement, modest in countenance, magnanimous in action, constant in vndertaking, a great Almesgiuer, deuout to Godward, a renowmed Souldier, fortunate in field, from whence hee neuer returned without victo-rie. These, with many other (I might almost say, all other) vertues are attributed to this most renowned amongst English Kings; the more to be admired in him in so short a raigne, and in those yeeres, hee being but of 36. yeers, when he breathed forth his glorious soule.

(84) His bowels were interred in the Church of Saint Mauro de Fosses, and his embalmed Corps was closed in Lead, and attended vpon by the Lords of England, France, Normandy, and Picardy, was brought vnto Paris (where in the Church of our Lady solemne exequies were performed) and thence to Ro- uen, where it rested till all things were ready to set forward for England; though the Cities of Paris and Rouen strooue, and offered great summes of gold to haue Henries royall remains enterred amongst them.
His picture artificially was moulded of boiled hides, and countenance painted according to life, vpon whose head an imperiall Diademe of gold and pretious stones was set, the body clothed with a purple robe, furred with Ermine, in his right hand it held a scepter royall, and in the left a ball of gold; in which manner it was carried in a Chariot of State, couered with red veluet, embroidered with gold, and ouer it a rich Canopie, born by men of great place.
Thus accompanied by Iames King of Scotland, many Princes, Lords and Knights of England and France, he was conuaied from Rouen to Abbeuile, to Hesdin, to Menstruill, Bologn, & Calais, the Chariot al the way compassed about with men all in white garments, bearing burning Torches in their hands; next vnto whom followed his houshold seruants, all in blacke, and after them the Princes, Lords, and Estates in vestures of mourning adorned; then two miles distant from the corps followed the stil lamenting Queene, attended with princely mourners, her tender and pierced heart more inly mourning, then her outward sadde weedes should in any sort expresse.

(85) And thus by Sea and Land the dead King was brought vnto London, where through the streets the Chariot was drawne with foure horses, whose Caparisons were richly embroidered, and embossed with the royall Armes; the first with Englands Armes alone, the second with the Armes of France and England in a field quartered, the third bare the Armes of France alone, and the fourth three crowns
Or in a field Azure, the ancient Armes of King Ar- thur, now well beseeming him who had victoriously

all pompous celebrity was enterred in the Church at Westminster (for so Henrie had by his last will commanded) next beneath King Edward the Confessor, plate guilt, but the head thereof altogether of massie siluer. All which at that Abbeys suppression, (when the battering hammers of destruction did sound almost in euery Church) were sacrilegiously broken off, and by purloining transferred to farre prophane vses, where, as this day, the headlesse monument, (worthy to be restored by some more Princely and sacred hand) is to be seene, and with these verses written vpon his Tombe.

(86) Katherine, daughter to King Charles the sixt of France, vpon an agreement of peace forementioned, was married vnto King Henrie at Troyes in Champaine, Iunij 3. A. D. 1420. and after Febr. 14. was Crowned at Westminster with all solemnities. Shee was his Queene two yeeres, and about three months, and suruiuing him, was remarried vnto Owen Theodore of Wales, vnto whom shee bare three sonnes, Edmund, Iasper, and Owen, and a daughter who liued not long. Owen tooke the habite of religion at Westminster, the other two by King Henry the sixt (their halfe brother,) were honorably preferred; Edmund was created Earle of Richmond, and marrying Margaret, the sole heire of Iohn Beaufort Duke of Somerset, was father by her vnto Henry (the only heire of Lancaster,) afterwards King of England. Iasper, the second brother, was created the same yeere, Earle of Pembroke, who requited his brothers kindnes with continuall assistance against the house of Yorke; and when that faction preuailed, he was forced to flie into Flanders, but it againe waning, he was both restored, and to his greater honour created Duke of Bedford, dying without any issue legitimate. This Queene, either for deuotion, or her owne safety, tooke into the Monastery of Bermondsey in Southwarke, where dying Ian. 2. A. D. 1436. shee was buried in our Ladies Chappell within S. Peters Church at Westminster; whose Corps taken vp in the raigne of King Henry the seuenth her Grand-child, (when he laid the foundation of that admirable structure,) and her Coffin placed by King Henry her husbands Tombe, hath euer since so remained, and neuer reburied: where it standeth (the Couer being loose) to be seene and handled of any that will; and that by her owne appointment, saith Report, (which doth in this, as in most things, speake vntruth) in regard of her disobedience to King Henry, for being deliuered of her sonne at the place hee forbad.

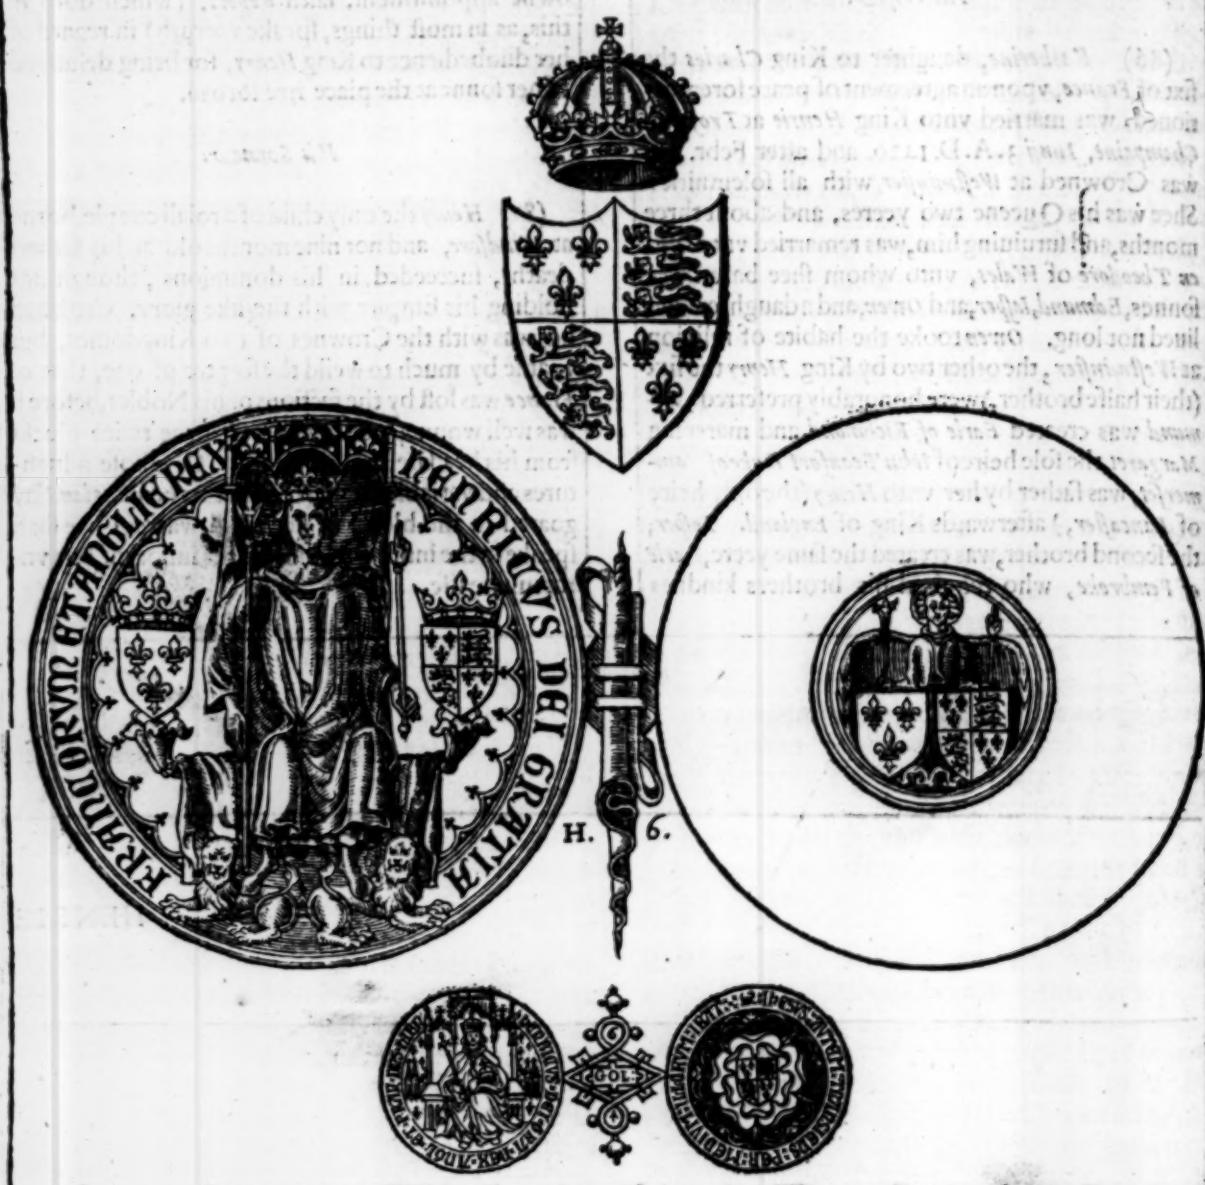
His Sonne.

(87) Henry the only child of a roiall couple, borne at Windsore, and not nine months old at his fathers death, succeeded in his dominions, though not holding his Empire with the like glory. Crowned he was with the Crownes of two Kingdomes, but vnable by much to weild the scepter of one, that of France was lost by the factions of his Nobles, before it was well wonne; and Englands Crowne twice pluckt from his head before his death. Of whose aduentures and variable raigne (the times when England lay goared in the blood of her ciuill warres) we shall speake in the insuing relation of his innocent, but vntortunate life.

HENRIE

Henry VI.

HENRIE THE SIXTH, KING OF ENGLAND, AND FRANCE, LORD OF IRELAND, THE THREE AND FIFTIETH MONARCH OF ENGLAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSVE.



CHAPTER XVI.

HAd God almighty (the *giuer and transferrer of Kingdomes) thought good that the Englisb should haue setled in the Continent of Europe, and not haue beene shutte vp within their Ilands, hee would not so soone haue depriued them of their late incomparable Captaine and Soueraigne Henry the fifth. But it seemes that God hauing humbled the French Nation vnder Henries victorious hand, ment now again to restore them to his wonted fauor by taking away their terrour & triumpher, substituting his son (an Infant) in his place, Henrie of that name the 6. born at Windsor, who was crowned about the eight month of his age. The prety hands which could not feed himselfe, were yet made capable to weeld a scepter, and hee that was beholding to nurses for milke, did nevertheless distribute the sustenance of law and iustice to so great and warlike Nations. Counsell supplies the defect of age. At his fathers death hee had vncles, men of approued valour and discretion, to whom the principall care of all publike affaires by the fathers last prouisions was committed. Humfrey Duke of Gloucester (the yonger brother of two) had the * gouernement of England entrusted to his fidelity: the regency of France was assigned for Prouince to Iohn Duke of Bedford, the eldest liuing vncle of the King, as to a Prince of much magnanimity, prowesse and felicitie in conduct, with whom was *ioyned Philip Duke of Burgundie. The guard and custody of the royall Infant was assigned to *Thomas Duke of Exceter: the nurture and education to his * mother, the Queene Dowager: vpon the two vncles (as betweene the two Poles of the English Empire) the whole globe of gouernment moued: whatsoeuer is done by the kingly power is said to be done by the King. We shall behold notwithstanding in the tragicall glasse of this Henries raigne, how farre the imbecillity of the kingly person ſon may affect the body politicke with good or euill. If hiſtories were ordayned to ſtirre affections, not to teach and inſtruct, neuer any Princes raigne ſince the Conqueſt did better deſerue to bee deſcribed with a tragical ſtyle and words of horror & ſorrow, although the beginning (like the faire morning of a moſt tempeſtuous day) promiſed nothing morethen a continuance of paſſed felicities.

(2) For the State of the Engliſh affaires was great and flouriſhing, England without tumult, the naturall fierce humors of her people conſuming or exerciſing themſelues in France, and France her ſelfe (for the nobler parts together with the grand City of Paris head of that Monarchie) was at their deuotion. There wanted nothing which might aduance the worke begunne. Moſt noble and expert Leaders as thoſe which had bin faſhioned in the ſchoole of warre, vnder the beſt martiall maſter of that age, the late Henry, arms full of veterant ſouldiers, moſt of which were of skill ſufficient to be commanders themſelues: their friends firme, no defect nor breach (by which diſsipation might enter to the ouerthrow of the Engliſh greatneſſe) as yet diſcloſing themſelues. Wiſdome, pietie, riches, forwardneſſe at home, courage and like forwardneſſe abroad. It is a fruitfull ſpeculation to conſider how God carrieth his part in the workes of men, alwaies iuſtly, ſometimes terribly, but neuer otherwiſe, then to bring all worldly greatneſſe and glory into due contempt, and loathing, that the ſoule may bee erected to her Creator, and aſpire to a Crown celeſtiall. The firſt diſaduantage which hapned to the Engliſh cauſe (after the late Kings deceaſe) was the death of Charles the French King, who ſuruiued the other but *fiftie and three dayes. This wee may worthily call the firſt (as it was a great, aſwell as the firſt) diſaduantage, for the imbecilities of that Prince were a ſtrēgth to the Engliſh; On the other ſide (God obſeruing a talio and parilitie) the infancy of young Henry was an aduantage to Charles the Daulphin of France, now by them of his faction called King of France, as the Engliſh vſed in deriſion to enſtyle him King of Berrie, becauſe little elſe was left vnto him.

(3) In England (whoſe condition the order of nature wils vs firſt to deſcribe, becauſe there was the ſeat of counſell, by which all the actions of the generall ſtate were directed) a Parliament was aſſembled to eſtabliſh the Crowne vpon the Infant, and to prouide for the publike vſes and neceſſities of State. Money* (alwayes one of them) was liberally granted. It was a ſtrange ſight (and the firſt time that euer it was ſeene in England) which in the next yeere hapned, an infant ſitting in the mothers lap, before it could tell what Engliſh meant, to exerciſe the place of Soueraigne direction in open Parliament. Yet ſo it was, for the Queene to illumine that publike conuention of States with her Infants preſence, remoued from Windſor to London; through which Citie (her ſelfe roially ſeated with her young ſonne vpon her lappe) paſſed in maieſticke manner to Weſtminſter, and there tooke ſeate among all his Lords, whom (by the ordinary mouth of that high Court) hee ſaluted and ſpake to them at large concerning the premiſes; where, as hee vttered the mind of his place by anothers tongue, ſo hee elſewhere proſecuted all affaires by other mens hands and Organs.

(4) The Duke of Bedford (as the nature of his place exacted) to ſettle and preſerue the State of France for his young Nephew the King, together with Philip Duke of Burgoigne, who as yet continued a ſtedfaſt friend to the Engliſh Soueraignety (knowing the Daulphin buſie to recouer France) ſtrengthned the confines of their gouernment with Garriſons, aſſembled their powers, and laboured to retaine the hearts of their owne party. The Duke of Bedford Regent of France, had* words to them to this effect in open aſſemble. That they ſhould not violate their plighted and ſworne alleagiance, neither by themſelues endeauour nor endure, that by others their Soueraigne Lord young Henry ſhould be defrauded of his inheritance, or that the hatreds and enmities which now beganne to die betweene the French and Engliſh names, ſhould through the practiſes of moſt faithleſſe men be renued, and reinflamed: That they would remember how (by Gods ſpeciall fauour and goodneſſe) the two Kingdoms of France and England were vnited vnder one moſt faire and goodly Monarchie in an eternall league, and lately ſo eſtabliſhed that no humane force could reſiſt. That albeit they had ſuſtained dammage by the warre, yet the ſame would bee recouered with aduantage, if they honored loued and obeyed their lawfull Soueraigne Lord King Henry, and proſecuted his enemies with extremity, according to bounden duty. This Oration found plauſible admiſſion in ſhew: Henry is proclaimed King of England and of France, and ſuch chiefes as were preſent did their homages, taking oath to be true: The like Obligation and Sacrament of alleagiance was put vpon all the French through the Engliſh Dominions in France.

(5) Charles (who as ſonne and heire to the late King entitled himſelfe King of France, by the name of Charles the ſeuenth) being then about the ſeauen and twentieth yeere of his age, full of courage and new hopes, gathered what force he could: his chiefe Leuies were made in Daulphynois and Italy, from whence (for money) he drew ſundry troupes. But the beſt ſinews of his Army moued in certain thouſands of the Scotiſh Nation, which ſerued vnder him. The firſt ſteppe which the Charolines, or forces of Charles made into hoſtile action was vnfortunate, for comming to raiſe the ſiege which the Engliſh held about * Crepan they were put to flight, with the loſſe of about two thouſand of their numbers. This was noble in Charles, and his Charolines, that their minds ſunke not at the horrour of ſuch an euill Omen. It was ſaith Æmylius of them, reſolued to encounter aduerſe fortune with encreaſe of courage. The Regent on the other ſide was vigilant vpon all occaſions: the power of his Regency extended it ſelfe without contradiction * through Vimew, Pontieu and Picardie, from Paris to Reines, Chalons and Troyes, vp to the water of Loyr and the Sea: A goodly ſcope of territory, and abſolutely the beſt of France. That late loſſe & foile of the Charolines was repaired ſhortly after by an ouerthrow in skirmiſh which they gaue to the Engliſh party, from whom (with the ſlaughter of about fifteene hundreth) they recouered a great booty, ſpecially of Cattel which the Engliſh had gotten in the Countries of Nugion and Main, but thus intercepted vpon their return into Normandy. Charles (which Paul. Æmylius omitteth) doubteth that ſucceſſe: for * Meulan vpon Sein is by him taken where all the Engliſh are put to the ſword: but the poſſeſſion was ſhort, and the reuenge ſpeedy: Thomas Montacute Earle of Salisbury (a man (ſaith Polydor) more like the old Romans then people of that age, ſo great was his vertue and cheualrie) hauing with him Iohn of Luxemburg, Generall of the Burgundian horſemen, recouers the place, killing all the French which were found therein.

(6) At the Citie of * Amiens in Picardie the three great Dukes of Bedford (Regent of France) Burgoign and Britaine meet to conſult of the whole courſe & ſumme of affaires. There they renued the League, adding, that each ſhould be others friend, and that all of them ſhould defend King Henries right with their beſt forces. For the better aſſurance of this profitable amity, the Regent (then a Bachelour) tooke to wife the Lady Anne, ſiſter to Philip Duke of Burgundie: while the Regent was abſent from Paris vpon theſe iuſt occaſions, the Pariſians (who not long before had * ſent Ambaſſadors into England, to acknowledge their obedience to King Henry) practiſed with Charles to deliuer their City. The Regent had notice of this dangerous treaſon, and with his preſence retained them in duety. The chiefe Actors paied their liues for ſatisfaction of the treſpaſſe. In good Himselfe lead about with him for the generall seruice, eighteene hundred horsemen, and eight thousand foote. With these field-forces the maime of the English estate in France was held together, though not without difficulty, and diuers aduentures. In them he tooke from Charles sundry strong Townes, and Fortresses as * Crotoy, Baside, Riol, Rula, Gyrond, Basile, Mermound, Milham, Femel, Seintace, and many other.

(7) The Regents chiefe designe was to draw Charles to fight, hoping by his ouerthrow to conclude many daies workes in one. For this cause he drew into Normandy. Charles was then in Tourain, where he mustereth his people. The Regent prospers in the meane time, and takes by siege a place of good importance, presuming so to dare the French out to a Battell. Iohn Duke of Alanson is sent with an Army and instructions to fight, if occasion serued, but Charles himselfe was not suffered to hazard his person. Not farre from the Towne * of Verneil, which the * English had taken before the * Duke of Alanson, and his Charolines could succour it, the two Armies embattelled themselues. The fight began with shot, which seeming not quicke enough to dispatch the work, the battels came to hand-stroaks, where for some houres, there was maintained a constant and doubtfull battell with great furie on both sides. The English enured to the French warres, hauing borne the first heats of their enemies, (which are in that Nation most ragefull:) by perseuerance vtterly brake and put them to flight. The Regent * himselfe with a battle-axe fought most fiercely, winning immortall honor in that bloody iourney. There were slaine of the enemies side: Iohn * Earle of Boughwhan Constable of France: Archenbald Douglas Duke of Tourain and Lieutenant of France; Archembald his sonne Earle of Wigton, with many other of the Scots. Of the French there were slaine the Earle of Vantadowr, and sundry others. In all there died vpon that side certaine thousands. None writes of fewer then foure or fiue thousand, nor any of aboue fifteene. The great number of the slaine, is not the measure of a victory, but the vse and effects which it drawes. The Duke of Alanson himselfe was taken prisoner, with about two * hundred others of speciall worth. The English paid for this noble victory, the bodies of about two thousand of their souldiers which lost life there, for it was fought vpon faire termes in the open fields, and carried by meere manhood. That which followeth till the siege of Orleance, Paul * Æmylius comprehendeth in some few lines. The fierce Conquerour besiegeth Mants in Main, and with Ordinance beates downe part of the wals. It yeelds heereupon. The English Garrison left therein, after the taking not being sufficient to containe the Towne in due subiection, is compelled to flie to a Tower for their safetie, the enemies which were admitted into it by the Burgers enioying the rest. The Lord Talbot (the most noble Captaine of the English) presently arriues to the rescue, and puts the malefactors to death. The English Empire extends it selfe to the Riuer of Loyr. Charles they call in scorne the King of Berry. Thus roundly he.

(8) The chiefe things which passed in England, during these happy proceedings in France, were briefly these.

Iames the first King of Scots set at liberty out of England.

Iames Steward the young King of Scots, hauing beene casually taken vpon the Sea, in the reigne of King Henry the fourth, and after his fathers death not sufficiently tendered nor respected by the Scots, remained still a Prisoner. The rather therefore to hinder the Scots, (that was the hope) from aiding the French, it was now thought fit by the Councell of England to enlarge him. Which was accordingly done vpon pledges. Not long after the which, he married the Ladie Ione, daughter to Iohn Earle of Sommerset, neere cosen to King Henry. Principall setters forward of this marriage (as by likelihood of his liberty also) to honour their family with a Kingly alliance, were the Earle of Sommerset and the Bishop of Winchester, both of them Beauforts, who together with sundry other of the English Nobility, conducted the new married Couple to the Scottish Borders. Much of his ransome was abated, and his new kinsemen bestowed vpon him * store of plate, gold, and siluer, & among other gorgeous Ornaments suit of hangings, in which the labors of Hercules were most curiously wrought. But this wise King (hauing had the benefit of excellent and Princely education in England) did not suffer any obligations contracted in the time of his durance, to preponderate with him the Generall state of Scotland, whose freedome did much depend vpon the fortune of France, whereby the maine drift of his enlargers was not much aduanced. The reason notwithstanding which lead this action was probable, and so much the more commendable, for that it was tempered with humanity. The forreine mischiefe thus howsoeuer intended, hereby to be auoided or qualified, Sir Iohn Mortimer (a dangerous firebrand at home) being Prisoner in the Tower was arraigned for many treasonable speeches vsed to a yeoman, (seruant to Sir Robert Scot *, keeper of the Tower of London) to draw the said yeoman to let him escape: promising him great matters. The points of his speeches were as that fellow charged vpon him in open Parliament,

For these ouertures of escape, and conspiracie the Knight was drawne hanged and headed: Of whose death no small * slander arose. Perhaps he that writes so doth meane that the whole was but a stratageme to rid him out of the way. Edmund Lord Mortimer Earle of March, the party whom the said knight mentioned, was sent not long after with many other Lords, and competent numbers of men, into Ireland, where he deceased without issue, whose great patrimony descended to Richard Plantagenet Earle of Cambridge, the fatall disturber of the Realme of England, vpon the pretence of Mortimers title to the Crowne.

(9) The amity with the Duke of Burgoin, which the English had hitherto found so auailable toward their Conquests, hauing otherwise receiued some few slight flawes was now in danger of vtter breaking vpon this occasion. Humfrey Duke of Gloucester Protector of the Realme, following councell vnworthy of his person and place, contracted himselfe with the Lady Iaqueline of Bauaria, Inheretrix of Holland, Zeland, Henault, and many other faire dominions in the Netherlands, notwithstanding that Iohn Duke of Brabant, her former husband was then liuing, and that the suit of diuorce commenced by Iaqueline * depended still betweene them. The Duke of Burgoin held with Brabant. This bred bitter humor in the Duke of Gloucester, who being not vsed to meet with any rubs or confrontments, and now when in person he came with an armie to take seison of Henault in right of his supposed wife, finding himselfe hard set vnto, by the aids which Burgois ministred to the Duke of Brabant, he challengeth Combat of the Duke of Burgundy, calling him traitour. It was accepted and the *lie strongly thrust vpon Glocester, who (leauing the light Lady at her Towne of Mons in Henault) returned into England, doing nothing of that for which at that time he came. Mediation tooke vp the quarrell afterward betweene the Duke of Burgundy and him. Not long after the returne of the Duke of Glocester into England, the first marriage which had beene made and consummated betweene the Duke of Brabant, and the said Lady Iaqueline, was pronounced lawfull by Pope Martin the fifth. Hereupon the Duke of Glocester (hauing susteined many losses aswell of friends as treasure in punishment of that great sinne, in taking anothers wife) forthwith marries Eleanour, daughter to Reignald Lord Cobham of Sterborough, whereby he made her amends for that * vnlawfull familiarity which had formerly passed betweene them.

Meanewhile the Court of England doth well shew that the King was an infant, for it was full of dangerous emulations and sidings, the Duke of Glocester (whose high office it was to tender the welfare of the King and State) laying sundry grieuous accusations against the Cardinall Beaufort (sonne of Iohn Duke of Lancaster) Bishop of Winchester and Lord Chancellor as being a person very dangerous vnto both.

(10) The news of these home-contentions comming to the Duke of Bedford into France, easily drew him home, though the state of that Realme could not well want his presence. For Iohn Duke of Britaine, (notwithstanding his late renouation of league with the Regent at Amiens) iealous of the * English greatnes turned sodeinely to Charles, and with him, Arthur, Earle of Richmond his brother. This puts fresh spirit into the drooping Prince. Arthur is by Charles made Constable of his France, in place of the Scottish Earle, who was slaine at the bloody Battell of Vernoil. The Duke of Britaine ouerliues this reuolt but a small time. Arthur to declare his forwardnes on the behalfe of Charles, assembleth about twenty thousand men, and with them sodeinely besiegeth S. Ieans a Towne of Normandy, vpon the frontier of Britaine; which Edmund Duke of Sommerset, Gouernour of Normandy, had lately fortified and stuft with souldiers. The vnexpected arriuall of the French, did greatly at the first perplex the English, but vpon better aduise, they valiantly sallied out vpon them, both before and behind, which stroke so great terrour into the enemy, that with losse of their Artillery, and many of their people they forsooke the siege. To redeeme this dishonour, he turnes his fury vpon the Countrey of Angiau, which in many parts he depopulates and spoiles. The Regent being resolued to returne into England, leaues behind him Beauchamp Earle of Warwicke; as lieutenant, who was lately arriued in France, hauing six thousand fresh Souldiers in his company.

(11) The presence of the Duke of Bedford Regent of France, was to the State of England very necessary. For the wisdome and authority of so great a Prince, being eldest vncle to the King, and one whom many great deedes made famous, allaied the distemper which he found at his arriual. It was a worke worthy of his labour, and he also found it to be a worke indeed, and not easily effectuable. The differences were debated first at Saint Albans, then at Northampton, lastly in a Parliament at Leicester, which continued there till toward the end of Iune. The Duke of Bedford himselfe, to auoid the note of partiality, for that his brother of Glocester was a party did not intermeddle otherwise then as in Generall words to perswade amity, but the whole cause was referred to arbitrators of greatest Nobility and prudence: by whose endeuours all those differences and greeuances were equally thrust into one sacke, to be sealed vp for euer by oblivion, and without mention of amends on either side, the Duke and Bishop (the one hauing sworne by his Princehood, the other by his Priesthood, truly to obserue the award,) shooke hands, and were fully for that time reconciled. After which holy and necessary worke of priuate attonements, ensued acts of festiuitie and honor. For in the same Towne of Leicester the young King, not then fiue yeeres of age, was at the high feast of Pentecost dubbed Knight by the Regent of France. Immediately whereupon the King honored Richard Earle of Cambridge, (who by the fatall errour of the Counsell was at this Parliament created Duke of Yorke, the same who was father to Edward the fourth) with the order of knighthood, and about forty more with him. This Richard Duke of Yorke was hee, who brought vpon this Kingdome and nation most dolefull diuisions to the vtter extirpation of all the male lines of either house, that is to say, his owne, and that of Lancaster, whereof the young King was head. From Leicester the King was conueighed to Killingworth, and Thomas Duke of Exceter dying, Beauchamp Earle of Warwicke, was constituted Guardian and Tutor to the King.

(12) The Regent hauing thus worthily prouided for the quiet estate of the King and Country, returns to his charge in France. There went ouer at the same time a choise and great number of fresh men, vnder the conduct of that immortally renowmed, the L. Talbot, whose victories (saith Polydor) were so many, that his name was not onely most dreadfull to the French, but most famous through the world, euen at this present. That yee may know the man not to haue beene studious of fine Phrases; vpon the one side of his sword-blade was engrauen, Sum Talboti, and vpon the other this boisterous blunt sentence;

Prouincere inimicos meos.

The Duke of Alanzon (taken at the Castell of Vernoil) was set at liberty vpon payment of two *hundreth thousand Scutes of gold. At Montarges about Orleance the English receiued an ouerthrow with the losse of about fifteene hundreth of their numbers, and in Britaine the French sustained great dammages by a Captaine of the Duke of Sommersets. These were petty matters: They of Mantz in Maine had drawne in the French by night, who massacred the English. William Earle of Suffolke Captain of the place sends to Iohn Lord Talbot for succour. It came, and that so vnexpectedly, that the French were alike distrest. All but souldiers were spared, and many also of them, though thrust into prisons. The Traitours which had caused so much mischiefe, had their deserts by death. From hence the Lord Talbot marched to other enterprises. The quality of our taske cals vs to the maine.

(13) Thomas Lord Montacute Earle of Salisbury, being with the Regent at Paris, and considering what forces of men, and all prouisions the English then enioied, bethought himselfe of some action, which might answere the greatnesse of his owne name, and of the publike meanes. The siege of Orleance is by him propounded to the Councell. The credite of the Motioner was alone an argument of power to conuince the possibility. His desires were therefore furnished with all competent prouisions. They of Orleance hearing what a storme was comming (for the name of this Earle was worthily terrible) with great diligence ordaine for their defence. The *Suburbes (answerable in bignesse to a good City) they leuell with the earth, that the enemie might not from thence annoy them. Men, victuals, munition, and constant intentions to fight for their liberty, and safegard abounded. The Earle of Sarisburie, the Lord Talbot, and a dreadfull puissance vnder most expert commanders present themselues before it. Orleance was and is an Episcopall See, a Parliament

The siege of Orleance.

Parliament Towne, and Vniuersity, richly scituate vpon the riuer of Loir, whose best glory it is, being the chiefe City which that renowned streame watereth. No enemies appearing abroad, he *approacheth close to the walles. Assaults * prouing vain, he entrencheth about it, and to secure his Campe, casts vp ramparts and other works, one of which (by reason of the hugenesse thereof) was called London, by the name of the chiefe City of England. The Fort which stood at the Bridge foot beyond the Loyr, hee seiseth vpon and closeth them vp on euery side. Charles of France could minister no sufficient succor. God, when mans helpe failes interposeth his hand, which as all of vs daily feele, so is it most conspicuous in the deliuerance of Nations. The City is driuen to some miserie through the beginning want of all things; for the siege had now endured about 60. daies * not without much bloudshed on both sides. The Earle of Salisburie impatient of such delay, purposeth to giue a generall assault. The better to consider vpon the course, hee stands to take view at a window barred with Iron which ouerlookt the City toward the East. Behold how God began to vncutte the knot of those bands with which the English held France bound, a bullet of a great piece (which lay ready leueld at that window) discharged by the Gunners *sonne, a lad, stroke the grates, whose splinters so wounded the Earle, and one Sir Thomas Gargraue, that they both dyed of the incurable hurts within few dayes. Heare now the common iudgement of Writers concerning this Earles losse: * Presently after the death of this man the fortune of the warr changed. Now both mortall and immortall powers beganne to looke fauourably vpon the State of France. This to the * English was Initium malorum: for after this mishappe they rather lost then wanne, so that by little and little they lost all their possession in France: and albeit that somwhat they got after, yet for one that they wan, they lost three. So that Polydor not without cause (after many other great praises) doth elsewhere call him the man in whom the safety of the English state consisted. The vertue therefore of a fortunate Generall is inestimable.

(14) Howbeit the siege did not determine with his life, William Earle of Suffolke, the Lord Talbot & the rest maintained the same all the winter. The wants of the Campe were relieued from Paris by a conuoy, vnder the guard of Sir Iohn Fastolfe and fifteene hundred souldiers who arriued safe in despite of all the attempts to distresse thē, which the French made. The City would yeeld it selfe, but not to the English. The Duke of Burgundie they were content should haue the honour. A subtle stratagem, rather then an offer of yeelding, for there was likelihoode in it to breake thereby the amity betweene the English and him. The Regent and his Counsell being sent vnto, thought it not reasonable (Æmylius erroniously makes the late Earle of Salisbury the Author of that refusall) neither indeed was it, theirs hauing beene the cost and labour. The Duke of Burgundy construed this repulse sowerly, which marred his taste of the English friendshippe euer after: yet the Regents answere was iust and honest. That the warre was made in King Henries name, and therefore Orleance ought to be King Henries. Among these difficulties stood the French affaires. Charles of France vnderstanding the miserable straites of his deare City, & ignorant how to remedy so neere a mischiefe; there presented herselfe vnto him at Chinon a yong maid about eighteene yeeres old, called Ioan of Loraine, *daughter to Iames of Arck dwelling in Domremy neere Vaucaleurs, a * Shepheardesse vnder her father, whose flockes shee tended, bids him not faint, and constantly affirmes, that God had sent her to deliuer the Realme of France from the English yoake, and restore him to the fulnesse of his fortunes. Shee was not forthwith credited; but when the wise of both sorts, aswell Clerkes as Souldiers had sifted her with manifold questions, she continued in her first speech so stedfastly, vttering nothing but that which was *modest, chast and holy, that honour and faith was giuen vnto her sayings. An *old woman directed her. Ioan armes her selfe like a man, and requires to haue that sword which hung in * S. Katherines church of Fierebois in Touraine. This demaund encreased their admiration of her; for such a *sword was found among the old Donaries or Votiue tokens of that Church. Thus warlikely arrayed she rides to Blois, where forces and fresh victuals lay for the reliefe of Orleance. Shee with the Admirall and Marshall of France enters safe. This did greatly encourage the fainting French. Ioan the maide of God, so they called her, (though * some haue written that it was a practise or imposture) writes thus to de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, who succeeded Salisbury in the maine charge of that siege.

" (15) King of England do reason to the King of heauen, for his blond royall; yeeld vp to the Virgine the " keyes of all the good Cities which you haue forced. If you doe not reason to them whom " you haue wronged, the French will doe the goodliest " exploit that euer was done in Christendome. Vnder- " stand these newes of God, and of the Virgine. Yet Charles had at this time no whole Countries vnder his obedience, * but Languedoc and Daulphin against which both the Sauoyard and Burgundian prepared, but miscarried, the Prince of Orenge the third confederate being discomfited.

(16) This letter was entertained by the English with laughter. Ioan reputed no better then a Bedlam or Enchantresse. Though to some it may seem more honourable to our Nation, that they were not to bee expelled by a humane power, but by a diuine, extraordinarily reuealing it selfe. Du Serres describes this Paragon in these words. Shee had a modest countenance, sweete, ciuill, and resolute, her discourse was temperate, reasonable and retired, her actions cold, shewing great chastity without vanity, affectation, babling, or courtly lightnesse. Let vs not dissemble what wee finde written. By her encouragements and conduct the English had Orleance pluckt out of their hopes, after they had suffered the Duke of Alanson to enter with new force, and with much losse were driuen to raise the siege. Ioan herselfe was wounded at one sallie in which shee led, being shot through the arme with an arrow. Iudge what she esteemed of that hurt, when shee vsed these admirable and terrible words. This is a fauour, let vs goe on; they cannot escape the hand of God. In all aduentures she was one and formost. The English lost at this siege, the Earle of Salisbury, the Lord Molins, the Lord Poynings, and many other. But doe not rashly beleeue Serres in saying, that of all sorts were slaine in such Sallies, as the martiall Virgine made eight thousand. Our Writers say but * sixe hundreth. The Lord Talbot marched away with aboue nine thousand, whom Ioan would not suffer the French to pursue. In memory of this admirable deliuerance, they of that City erected a monu-

(17) There was an interchangeable taking and recouering of Townes and places of importance vpon both sides. The Lord Talbot tooke Lauall, and the Earle of Suffolke puts himself into Iergeaux. Thither the Duke of Alanson with Ioan and other great Captaines come, which they force by assault. Sir Alexander Poole the Earles brother was slaine, with many others in the fight, the Earle himselfe remained prisoner. The Duke added some other places to this Conquest: soone after his numbers are augmented by the repaire to him of Arthur Constable of France, the Earle of Vandome, the Lord Dalbret and others, so that now their whole Army contayned about twenty and three thousand men. With these they encounter the Lord Talbot (who had scarce the fifth part of their numbers) at a village called Patay, whom they charged so sodainely, that his Archers had no time to fortifie their battels (after their manner) with a Palizado, or empalement of stakes, so that the chiefe fight must bee made vpon horsebacke. After three houres bloudy resistance, the English were put to the worst. * The Lord Scales, the Lord Hungerford, Sir Thomas Rampstone, and euen the Lord Talbot himselfe (being first wounded in the backe) were taken. The footmen enforced to trust to their * swords vnder the shelter of such horsemen as remained, retreated in order, and came to a place of safety. The English lost aboue a thousand, the French aboue 600. This blow shooke the whole fabricke of the English greatnesse in France, at the very foundations, awaking multitudes (euen of those who before had vowed fealty to the English, and now had colour of diuine warrant for violating that vow) to ioyne with the victors for the recouery of common liberty. There followed the present reuolt of sundry townes; neither was it long before Charles himselfe issues out in Armes, recouers the City of Auuerre and Reims; where according to the Maides direction, hee was solemnly crowned King. Hitherto shee might bee thought prophetical and fortunate. It should seeme now that the chiefe part of her imployment was accomplished, yet she flourished a while longer. The Duke of Bedford to buttresse the shrinking state of English affaires in France, and to encounter euill fortune in the face, vpon the vnpleasant newes of Orleance rescued, and Talbots taking, musters his whole present forces which made aboue ten thousand English, besides certaine wings of Normans: with these he marcheth out of Paris, and opposeth himselfe to the Current of Charles his new hopes who meant to attempt that City, some of whose Citizens held strict and secret correspondence with him. But vpon this affrontment he suspended the execution of that design, hauing as then no hope to atchieue it. The Regent returnes to Paris, Ioane the Pucell disswaded Charles from fight.

(18) Places of speciall note as Campeigne and Beauuois yeelded themselues voluntarily to Charles. The Regent hauing setled the Estate, and Garrisons of the Chiefe City, passeth into Normandy, to prouide for a safe retreat there, if perhaps the English (by the ineuitable will of God) should bee enforced to quit their other holdes and dominions: which hee began to suspect, for that he had intelligence of a secret purpose, which the French pursued to winne the Burgundians from King Henries side. While the Regent was absent vpon this occasion, Charles got the Towne of Saint Denis, (a neighbour to Paris) though hee held it not long by practise. From thence he sends the Duke of Alanson and Ioane to trie their friends and fortunes at Paris. They found not hoped successe, for the English gaue them so rough an encounter, that Ioan her selfe was * wounded; and the rest with much slaughter driuen to fall off. The Regent hearing of these attempts, entru-steth the Coast-Townes of Normandy, to the care of Richard Duke of Yorke, and Roan (the Capitall City of that Dutchy) to Edmund Duke of Somerset, himselfe speedes to Paris; where he commends the souldiers and Citizens for that they had not imitated the disloyaltie of their Neighbours. New supplies came out of England. The next enterprize was to reduce Campeigne to obedience. Iohn of Luxemburg with Burgundians and some English besiegeth it. Here the glory of Ioan vnfortunately ended; for comming to the rescue shee entred indeed, but afterward sallying forth, her troupes were beaten, and her selfe (being betrayed, say her fauourers) taken prisoner by the said Burgundian * Knight, who for the value of her ransome (ten thousand pounds Turneys, and three hundreth Crownes yeerely rent) deliuered her vnto the English. The siege was notwithstanding raysed; they sent her to Roan, where she (about nine or ten moneths after) was burnt to death. Clelia was saued by * Porsenna; and it is not to be doubted, but that the magnanimity of the English would haue spared her, had they not found it necessary to deface the opinion which the French euen with superstition had conceiued of her. Our * Writers shew how the course of her life being legally examined by the Bishoppe of Beauois (in whose Diocesse shee was taken) and shee thereupon for sorcerie, bloudshed, and vnnaturall vse of manlike apparrell, and habiliments contrary to her sex, condemned to die, was notwithstanding vpon her solemne abiuring of such her lewd practises, pardoned her life, till againe conuicted of periurious relapsing, though acknowledging her selfe a * strumpet, and fayning to be with child, she deseruedly vnderwent that punishment which she sought to delay. The rumor of her end, and the ignominious cause thereof was somewhat incommodious to the affaires of Charles. It was thought that the comming of King Henry to Paris would be much more.

(19) Hee had already with great solemnity receiued the Crowne of England at Westminster, being about nine yeeres olde, a most fashionable and waxen age for all impression either of good or bad. The next yeere after his Coronation in England, he passeth ouer into France there also to receiue the diademe thereof. The Constableship of England, was before his departure, assigned by Patent for terme of life to Richard Duke of Yorke (which gaue him a more feeling of greatnes and secretly whetted his ambitious appetite,) vpon this occasion. One Iohn Vpton, of Feuersham in Kent Notarie, accused Iohn Down of the same place Gentleman, That hee and his complices did imagine the Kings death at his Coronation. The combat was granted, and in Smithfield (the Duke of Yorke exercising the office of high Constable) they fought in lists. In the end the Kings name was vsed to part and forgiue them. It is a vice to suspect too farre. The Duke of Yorke (a most subtle man) seemes neuer in heart to haue beene a true subiect to King Henry: yet no man saith, hee was any author in this. Henrie (the common wealth hauing yeelded to liberall grants of money) is now ready to enter Paris. England remained vnder the gouernment of the Duke of Gloucester.

(20) There is no doubt that the English there at their Kings presence, set forth their greatnes to the full shew. The yong King attended vpon with two English Cardinals, Yorke, and Winchester, and great Princes of his blood, Dukes, Earles, Barons, Prelates, and the flower of our nation, with many aswel French and Burgonians, as Normans and others, excellently well appointed, makes a triumphant entry into the head City of that most noble Monarchy. There was no signe in the People but of ioy and welcome; the showes were many and magnificent. minds of the Assembly with a set speech, wherein he declared, King Henrie his Nephewes vndoubted title to that Crowne, and commended the same to their fidelities, adding ample promises of honour and emolument. Such of the French Nobilitie as were present, did their homage. The people had good and gratious words giuen vnto them, and certaine *quantities of money, Corne, and wine, in the nature of a donatiue, liberally distributed among them. Proclamations were made, that all Frenchmen who came in by a day there named, should be protected. The Kings Patents and grants touching French matters, passed vnder the seale and stile of Henry King of the Frenchmen and of England, which Seale (for variety) we haue prefixed, as we found it annexed, * to a writing directed by the King to his Court of Requests in his Pallace at Paris; but for English affaires he vsed another Seale, being in euery point like vnto that * of King Henry the fourth, and (as some thinke) the very same stamp, (which therefore we haue here omitted,) as likewise some * Charters of his there are, whereunto he affixed the seale of his father. Charles of France esteemed not himselfe the lesse a King for all this, but pursues his affaire. His people tooke the City of Chartres by a stratagem, the Bishop whereof (because a Burgundian) they also put to the sword with others. Neither were the English idle. Iohn Duke of Norfolke, Thomas Earle of Arundel, Richard Beauchamp Earle of Warwicke, the Earle of Suffolke, and others, made vp this losse with aduantage. Their actions are placed by some as done before the Coronation which is likely.

The King hauing thus taken possession of France, not long after tooke his farewell thereof. His re turne was by Roan, and so ouer land to Callais, from whence vpon the eleuenth day of February, hee arriued safe at Douer. His vncle the Duke of Gloucester was able to giue an honest, and good account of the Gouernment during the kings absence. The suppressiō of an insurrection, beginning at Abingdon in Oxfordshire was not the least seruice. A weauer (the Baliffe of the Towne) was the vlcerous head, to which that corruption gathered; who had changed his own name, and called himselfe; Iacke Sharpe of Wigmores land in Wales. The speciall colour of his attempt was to haue massacred Priests; whose heads (he said) hee would make as cheape as Sheepes-heads; that is, two or three, or ten for a penny. But the mention of Wigmores lands, the ancient inheritance of Mortimer, (then the possession of the fatall Duke of Yorke, who afterward in the right of that name, challenged the Crowne of England from King Henry) insinuates somewhat further. The varlet forfeited his head and foure quarters for his attempt. It is to be wondred that the Councell of Estate vnder King Henry, hearing that title so often glanced at, prouided not better against the mischiefe. But the eies and hearts of the wise are blinded, when God hath a purpose to reserue a scourge, or to hide the fire which shall afterward be vsed to consume a nation. Vnquiet humors were aswell abroad as at home. The souldiers of Callais discontented with their wages as to little began to be mutinously troublesome. The Regent comes thither in person in Easter weeke, where he exerciseth necessary discipline seuerely. Foure, the most faulty lost their heads, one hundred and ten are cashered, and banisht from the Towne, as sixe score others had formerly beene. Why dwell we vpon so petty accidents? The losse of the Kingdome of France is imminent. Let vs diligently note the degrees which God found out to depriue our Nation of that honor. In this iourney of the Regent, King Henries interest was not aduanced. The Regent (a widdower) roade from thence to Turwin, where (without the Burgundians priuity) he married the Lady Iaquet, aged about *seuenteene yeeres * daughter to Peter of Lutzembourg Earle of S. Paul no friend to the Burgundian. This was nothing prosperous to the English affaires. For Anne, the Regents former wife, sister to the Duke of Burgundy, being, while shee liued, a strong reason and assurance of amitie, weakened the same by her death; and this second marriage, not pleasing the Burgundian, did yet more diminish it. These were but degrees.

In the meane space, the accidents of warre between the English and French, were manifold and perplext, now wee, now they leesing, or gaining, as opportunity serued: which vncertainties brought forth their ordinary progenies, fearefull outrages, and * scarcitie of all things needfull for the vse of man. It would be wearisome, and not much necessary, to recount the particular lesser actions, neither indeed is it easie; for who can readily tell the sieges, surprises, skirmishes and the like, being so confusedly set down by Authors, wherein diuers of both Nations wanne to themselues much honour, and serued the vses of those times, and their owne. The vttermost effect of those great labours, was, that the English Regency fell not forthwith into nothing. Permanent leaders in those publike seruices were the Regent himselfe; their maine Pillar and Chiefe life, Thomas Earle of Arundel, Richard Earle of Warwicke, Henry his Sonne, the Lord Willoughby, the thrice noble Iohn Lord Talbot, (who was now at liberty,) the Lord Scales, besides Knights, Esquires, and other valiant Captaines a multitude.

*Iob 11.

(21) The fortune of Renate Duke of Barre, is not to be omitted, for that afterward, our King vnluckely married into his house. He had to * wife Isabell the daughter, and heire of Charles Duke of Lorraine, by whom he had issue two sonnes, and two daughters, the youngest of which was Lady Margaret, whom King Henry afterward tooke to wife. Charles Duke of Lorraine dying, Renate thinkes to succeed in that estate. Antony Earle of Vallement, brother to Charles presumes he hath a neerer right. The matter comes to be determined by blowes. Charles King of France was a stedfast supporter of Renates claime, in lieu of like offices performed by Renate to him in the times of most difficulty. The Regent and Philip Duke of Burgundy, stood for the Earle. Their aides preuailed so much, that Renates forces were beaten with losse of about * three thousand, from the siege of Vallemont, and himselfe with not fewer then two hundred others remained prisoner to the Duke of Burgundy, one of whose subiects commanded in chiefe at that enterprize. This * Renate was afterward entituled to the Crowne of Naples and Sicilia, by the testament of Ioane Queene of them. The King of France might seeme to haue susteined a grieuous losse by the enthralment of this Duke: but the English gained nothing thereby: for his perswasions, and priuate offices on the behalfe of King Charles, did not a little prepare the Burgundians heart (which now was knit to the English but with feeble Arteries) to accept in time the holy impression of reconcilement. The French who liued vnder the Regency, or in danger of the English, made choise of the Burgundian to protect them, which could not be embarred to them, for that he was as yet King Henries pretended friend. Indeed this Scene and vnstable state of affaires was full of horrour, which Polydore Vergill describeth well enough. While the English and French (quoth he) contend for Dominion, Soueraignty and life it selfe, mens goods in France were violently taken by the licence of warre, Churches spoiled, men euery where murthered, or wounded, others put to death, or tortured; Matrons rauished, Maids forcibly drawne from out their parents armes to be deflowred, Townes daily taken, daily spoiled, daily defaced, the riches of the Inhabitants carried whither the Conquerors thinke good; houses and villages round about set on fire: no kind of cruelty is left vnpractised vpon the miserable French; omitting many hundreth kinds of other calamities, which all at once oppressed them. Adde hereunto that the Commonwealth being destitute of the helpe of lawes, (which for the most part are mute in times of warre and mutinie) floateth vp and downe without any anchorage auntrage at right or iustice. Neither was England herselfe voide of these mischiefes, who euery day heard the newes of her valiant childrens funerals, slaine in perpetuall skirmishes and bickerings, her generall wealth continually ebd, and wained, so that the euils seemed almost equall, and the whole Westerne world ecchoed the groanes and sighes of either Nations quarrels, being the common argument of speech and compassion throughout Christendome.

(22) The course certainly which the English held, did only faintly keepe aliue the Generall State of the Regency, without giuing period to the warre, either by finishing the Conquest, or setling that which was conquered. Some would haue had large supplies of men, and treasure leuied, that King Charles might no where haue any rest: Of this opinion were *Bedford himselfe, the Dukes of Yorke and Sommerset. This Counsell was not followed, but another, in shew more frugall, which fed the euils, but redressed none. Present sparings doe oftentimes draw after them infinite wasts, and no husbandrie proues so ill, as vnseasonable Parsimony. In the mean time, the Earle of Arundel and the Lord Talbot, carry about victorious Armes, and terrifie Angiou, Main, and other places with their successes. In Normandie, neuertheless the common people drew together in huge multitudes. There were threescore* thousand of them rebelliously knotted together in Vexin, Norman, and twenty thousand in Caux. Their purpose was (through dislike of the English Gouernment, or practise of the French) to haue reacht one hand to King Charles, and to haue thrust King Henries officers out. What is a multitude without aduise? To stoppe their insolency and course which * they held toward Caen, the Earle of * Arundel, and Robert Lord Willoughby, with about thirteen hundred light horse, and sixe thousand Archers, march against them, by direction of the Dukes of Yorke and Sommerset, who had the chiefe Leiutenancies in Normandy. They diuide their forces to vse them with the more aduantage. The Earle stayes in Ambush with two parts, the Lord Willoughby drawes them into it with the third. A thousand of the Rebels were cut down before the souldiers hands could be stayed to spare the rest, who basely (as it became them) threw away their weapons, and fell to the earth, crying mercy. The multitudes were suffered to returne, their ringleaders lost their liues. All that the world could collect by this popular insurrection was, that the Normans would be gladly rid of the English. Nothing else was done. This Earle of Arundell hauing done sundry noble deeds during the wars in France, receiued his deathes wound shortly after in a skirmish at Gerberoy in Beauuoisine, where La Hire (a famous Captaine among the enemies) had the day.

(23) The Regency yet held, and the miseries of France (being burnt vp by the fiery reflections of two Counter-Sunnes) were nothing diminished: Who should giue to them a Period? while the Duke of Burgundy continued English, it could not be. To prepare therefore a separation betweene them, such of the Nobility as went ouer to the Burgundian Duke told him, * That King Charles vpon all occasions (when speech was ministred) spake of him honourably, and inwardly wished him well, and that he neuer heard any mention of the murther committed vpon the Duke his father, (cause of the sonnes hatred to France) but he heartily sighed, protesting hee was neither party nor priuy thereunto. These and the like mollifying salues applyed to the tumors of his reuengefull affections, did worke strongly, the rather for that his minde heretofore possessed with the English amity, was now vacant in that part, the same (by the means of sundry iealousies and auersions) lying open to contrary impressions. There wanted but an outward honourable meanes to fashion him entirely to the French partie. Let vs heare * Serres in this point: The Deputies of the Generall Councell presse both French, English and Burgundians to end all quarrels by some good composition. The City of Arras is allowed of them all to treat in. From the * Pope and Councell of Pisa, there came the Cardinals of S. Crosse and Cyprus, with twelue Bishoppes. For the King of France, there was the Duke of Bourbon, the Earle of Richmond Constable of France, the Archbishoppe of Reims, Chancellour of France, and many others, great, noble, wise and learned men. For the King of England, the two Cardinals of Yorke and Winchester, the Earles of Suffolke (* Iohn Holland Earle of Huntington) the Bishoppe of Saint Dauids, Iohn Ratcliffe Keeper of the great Seale, the Lord Hungerford, Ralfe the wise Officiall of Canterbury, and some Doctors of Diuinity. For Philip Duke of Burgundy, the Duke of Guelders, the Earle of Nassau, the Bishoppe of Cambray, Count Vernambourg, the Bishoppe of Leige; fiue other great Earles, besides the Deputies of many his best Townes, sufficient to shew, that though hee was in title but a Duke, yet that his greatnesse was equall to a King. When it came to communication, the English being also in possession, *vrged farther for themselues the right of descent, and the act of Charles the sixth, father to this Charles, by which act the Crowne of France was setled vpon Henry the fifth, and the issue of the Lady Katherine his wife, and therefore they propounded no other condition of peace, but that Henry their King might haue all, and * Charles to hold of him. The French offered Normandie and Guien.* There ended the hope of agreement betweene them, for neither party would accept. King Charles therefore resoluing to maime the English faction vpon any termes (how base soeuer) sends Duke Philip a blanke, bids him therin to prescribe his owne conditions and demands: he did so: and his Conditions were so vnreasonable, and so many, euen a great volume full, (saith a French man) as it is strange, so great a Monarch should stoope so much to his subiect and vassall, but that necessity hath no law. They * ioine hereupon most firmely, and the Duke (a man wholy transported by profite) declares himselfe a publike enemie to all the enemies of King Charles, and friend to all his friends. This was the first parting stroke which seuered the French Dominions from the English Soueraignty: the euent declared, that the English had done more wisely, if they had accepted Normandy and Guyen; but as the case stood, then they could not in honour doe it; and Councels are not to bee measured by euents; for so the most foolish may sometimes passe for prudent. King Henry not onely lost now hereby a most needfull friend, but was compelled to relie vpon his single strengthes, aswell against King Charles his naturall enemie, as against the Duke of Burgundie, who plainely seemed to haue betrayed the cause. To set a glosse vpon this fact, the Duke * dispatcheth Ambassadors into England to King Henry (who as * Aemylius erroneously saith was present at this treaty of Arras) to make known the reasons of his peace with King Charles, and to perswade the King to entertaine the same. This Ambassage was so odious to the English, that they forbare not to call the Duke a deceitfull man, a turn-seruer, a periured person, and a Traitor.

(24) The popular hatred also was such against the Dukes Subiects, resiant in London, that they were beaten and slaine many of them, before the furie thereof could be stayed by Proclamation. The Ambassadors returne with honest admonitions to their Master, against which, his eares and senses were strongly mured; for King Charles had set about them as it were a Barricado of royalties, priuiledges, honours, money, Cities, Townes and whole Prouinces, which he confirmed to the Duke, onely to withdraw him from vs. The whole Counties of * Aust, Erre, Ponthieu, Bolein, Artois, the towne of Abbeville, and other lands, the Cities and Townes in Picardy, vpon the water of *Some, Amiens, Corbie, Peron, S. King Lewis his Princely testimony of the late Regents vertues.

* foure hundreth thousand Crownes were satisfied: Briefly, what not? the Charity of King Charles was so feruent to make the Duke of Burgundy a true Frenchman once againe; hee paide so deare for it, that wee may thinke him worthy to obtaine his desire; yet was it worth his cost; for Æmylius saith most truly, that the ceasing of that indignation did releeme the French from a forraine gouernment, as the first assuming thereof had made the English, Lords ouer France. But, howsoeuer the high and iust displeasure, which this Prince tooke for the wicked murther of his father, (aboundantly satisfied for by this treatie) moued him first to embrace the English amity, hee afterward most subtilely conuerted the reuenge (by way of taking amends) to the enlargement of his proper riches, power and amplitude. After his Ambassadors returned, hee sends backe all contracts to the Duke of Bedford at Paris, and renounceth the alliance of England with a watchword, that euery one should looke to himselfe.

(25) Each man hereupon (saith * Serres) sharpens his sword and scoures his Armes, to recouer that by force which they could not obtaine by reason; Serres might better haue said, reasoning. All things certainly fauoured the French designes; for this was the generall estate of the English affaires. King Henry scarce out of his Child-hood; and when he came to mans age, not Man enough to manage so turbulent occurrents; the Princes of the blood weakely vnited in loue, for the common good; the Protector vigilant ouer England, the Regent carefull for France, but both priuately enuied; Richard Duke of Yorke (whose strenghts daily increased, which in time he meant nothing lesse then to vse for the benefit of King Henry,) ambitiously reseruing himselfe for a deare day; most of the great warriours slaine; and in briefe a great inability (for want of a Soule, willing and fit to looke so sterne and dismall aduentures in the face) through the whole body of the English forces; which though otherwise they might haue lingred out the warre, and kept their footing, yet the death of the great Duke of Bedford Regent of France doubled the difficulty, or rather the impossibility. In taking this triumphant Peere away, God made it manifest, that he held the English vnworthy and vnfit to continue their Empire among the French any longer. This Prince not long after this reuolt of Duke Philip, died at * Paris, vncertaine to some, whether through griefe of the euils he foresaw, or other malady. But the Analogy and colour of his whole former life, doth contradict their conceit, who think that such a grief should determine his daies, because it could not but proceed from a kind of feare and despaire, an humor absolutely opposite to Magnanimitie, wherein hee abounded. How mighty a Prince he was this his * style sheweth: Regent of France; Duke of Bedford, Alanson, and Anion, Earle of Maine, Richmond, and Kendale; and Constable of England. But (which excelleth his greatnes) he was one of the best Patriots and Generals, that euer blossomed out of the roiall Rosiar of England. His valour was not more terrible to the enemy, then his memory honorable. For (doubtfull whether with more glorie to him, then to the speaker) * Lewis the eleuenth being afterwards counselled by certaine enuious persons to demolish and deface his stately Tombe, (wherein, with him, * saith one, was buried all the Englishmen; good fortune in France) which was erected ouer his body in the North side of the high Altar, in our Ladies Church at Roan, vsed these indeed most Princely words.

(26) What honor shall it be to vs, or you, to breake this Monument, and to pull out of the ground the bones of him dead, whom in his life-time, neither my father, nor your Progenitors with all their puissance, were once able to make flie one foot backward? who by his strength, pollicie, and wit kept them all out of the principall dominions of the Realme of France, and out of this noble Dutchy of Normandy? wherefore I say first, God saue his soule; and let his body now lie in rest: which when he was aliue, would haue disquieted the proudest of vs all: And as for the toombe, I assure you, it is not so worthy, or conuenient as his honor and acts deserued.

(27) The Regent being now dead, the late peace made at Arras betweene King Charles and Philip Duke of Burgundie, presently disclosed, and put forth effects most dangerous to the English; for many Townes voluntarily yeeld, and multitudes of the French (who hitherto through feare contained themselues) starting away, all the English dominions were full of priuate conuenticles, practises, and correspondences with the Enemy. Such English as then were in France, are not altogether sloathfull, but yet, through a fatall either security or negligence at home, there was not speedy sufficiencies of resistance ministred.

(28) Richard Duke of Yorke, (whose seruices neuer did good to the English common-wealth) is created Regent of France, and Edmund Duke of Sommerset (his perpetuall riual, or perhaps an intelligent censor of his manners) continues his commands in Normandie. The Duke of *Sommerset opposed the aduancement of Yorke to that slipperie dignity. He was no babe in so doing, but more fore-seeing then the Protector, and all the Councell of England. Yet his opposition was vnseasonable, and fruitlesse, for the others carriage had woonne such a party about the King, (whom he meant by embracing to pull down) that notwithstanding the disaduantage of his silenced title, which was alone a great cause to haue made him euerlastingly incapable of so great trust and meanes, he preuailed. But before he could arriue, Paris was lost. Robert Lord Willoughby was Gouernour there for the English, who had with him but about two thousand, the faith of the Citizens was presumed vpon to make vp the rest at a pinch, for a common resistance. On the contrary, they perceiuing vpon what termes the English affaires stood in France, chiefly after the late Regents death, conspire against them. The treason was carried so cunninglie by some of the principall Magistrates of the Towne, who capitulated for a generall pardon from King Charles (which was gladly yeelded vnto,) that the mischiefe sooner tooke effect, then it could be discouered. Thomas Lord Beaumont began the losse with his misfortune; for Arthur Earle of Richmond, Constable of France, houering about Paris, in hope to recouer the same, the Lord Beaumont with certaine hundreth of English, fell into his danger about Saint Denis, and were distressed. While as yet the terror of this discomfiture (not great in regard of the numbers slaine, but in regard of the Circumstances) was freshest, the French aduance their Banners vp to the City, where a gate was opened vnto them by their partisans. What should the English doe in this generall mischiefe? The townesmen, lately vassals, turne enemies on a sodaine: women and children assaile the English from their windowes with all sorts of misfitt things. Many are beaten downe and massacred in the streetes. The Lord Willoughby Gouernour of Paris, Lewis of Luxemburg Bishop of Therouan, Chancellour of France for the English, the Bishops of Lisieux and Meaux, with other, flie to* S. Anthonies gate and the Bastile, places which they had reserued for defence till extreme necessity. Many more had been saued in those places, but that the perfidious Citizens drew chaines thwart the streetes, and empeached their retreat. Heare the rest in a * Frenchmans words, to the walles, and cry out with great shoutes, * baiting the Englishe like Dogs, whom a little before they had feared, and honoured as their masters. Who of the Englishe reades these things without indignation? but they are the perpetuall manners of the base multitude, & the fortune therin of the Englishe, the same which followeth all like accidents. Some will thinke that the Lord willoughby, and his people might haue done more nobly, to haue taken vp their graues in the place which they pretẽded to make good against the French. Fortitude is neuer separated from Prudence. Succour was despaired. The Duke of Yorke was not as yet arriued, and in maintaining their strengthes against the whole City of Paris, and all the present French forces for the space of about ten dayes, they sufficiently cleared themselues both in point of honour and loyalty. Paris * is thus lost in the worst time for an Army to march in. They did wisely to choose so vnseasonable a season, their market might haue else beene marred; for the new Regent (not so much hindred from sooner comming by the Duke of Somersets emulations, which some affirme, as by the very quality of the winter weather) arriued afterward, accompanied with the Earles of Salisbury and Suffolke, the Lord Falcombridge, and other worthy persons, with an Army of eight thousand men. But this Regent did neuer good in France: Hee who so writes, might haue also safely added, nor elsewhere. The Englishe affaires were not as yet come to the very breake-necke point. They held (in the late conquered parts of France) Normandy entire, though not without much trouble; for the people againe rebell in Caux: but that mischiefe was destroied with the greater and more mercilesse confusion of the Authors and Actors, then the former. About fiue thousand of them were trampled to death by the iust fury of the Englishe, vnder the leading of the Lord Scales, the Lord Hoo and others. They burnt all their dwellings, made booty of their goods, draue their whole numbers out of the Country. The Lord Scales not long after discomfited La Hire, and his Companie not farre from Roan. The war was handled on all sides without full or complete armies. Skirmishes were the ordinarie formes of fighting. The French were schooled from setling their rest vpon a pitcht field. Thus houered the affaires.

(30) Philip Duke of Burgoigne had as yet in person giuen no proof against the Englishe of his affection to King Charles. Now hee addresseth himselfe to an enterprise worthy of that expectation, the recouery of Calais. You would suspect that hee continued still a friend to the Englishe, in making choice of a seruice, wherein hee was most likely to waste his time in vaine, and yet make shew of much forwardnesse; but hee was reall, though the rather stirred therunto by the desire of priuate reuenge. The Englishe, vpon his forsaking their alliance, had attempted to kindle the Gauntois, and other of the Flemish townes (Subiects to the Duke) to rise in rebellion: but the opinion that K. Henries fortunes in France were desperately stooping, made their wils too dank to take fire. The notice notwithstanding of this attempt came to the Duke, which sharpened him to reuenge, whereof (as the former passages abundantly declare) hee was not ordinarily thirsty. He brings his Armie before Calais. Chiefe commanders there for King Henry were the L. Dudley who had charge of the Castell, and Sir Iohn Ratcliffe of the Towne. The Dukes purpose was to haue cloyed the harbour by sinking shippes laden with stones, and such like choaking materials; but vpon the ebbe-water the Calisians deliuered the hauen from that perill. The King of England aduertised that his precious Fort and Towne of Calais were thus emperilled, Humfrey Duke of Gloucester the Protector comes in person with a very great Fleete (some write fiue hundreth saile) to the rescue, and in it a great puissance, with full purpose to giue battell, glad perhaps that hee might now reuenge old grudges. It is able to moue choler, to consider how Writers torture vs with the diuersities of reports; but the generall agreement is, that the Duke of Burgundy did raise his siege before he was fought with. Some* say the very rumor of the Protectors approch draue him away, and that the Protector came the next day after the Burgundians flight. Others excuse him (probably enough) in saying that the Flemings grew vnweildie to his commandements, and would needes home.

*Polyd. Verg. l. 23

(31) The Protector was master of the Dukes Camp, and spent eleuen dayes in his Dominions, burning Poppering and Bell, and greatly damnified him about * Granelin and Bolognois, then setleth hee the state of Calis, and * returnes with great honour to his charge into England. But the English were thought to haue created store of worke for this busie Duke at home; where many great tumults rose, in * one of which, his owne person was endangered at Bruges, Lisle-Adam the Captaine of his guard being there presently slaine. Hence it came perhaps that a meane * was found by contracts made with Isabel the Dutchesse his third wife (a most witty woman a Portugesse) to hold a league with England, and yet no breach with France.

He returns with honour into England.

(32) These haue hitherto beene the actions of Men, let vs not neglect two great Ladies, because much concerning our historie depend on their courses. Queene Katherine, the widdow of King Henrie the fifth, and mother by him of this sixth Henrie, about this time departed out of the world. This most noble Lady, when her husband the King was dead, being not of iudgement (by reason of her tender yeeres to vnderstand what became her greatnes, or hauing found perhaps that greatnes was no part of happinesse,) secretly marrieth one Owen ap Theodore or *Teder the most noble and most goodlie gentleman of all the Welsh nation, and endued with* admirable vertues, who drew his descent from holie Cadwallader, last King of the Britaines. This husband had by her sundry children, two of which, Edmund and Gasper doe beare a part in the royall history, and King Henry the sixth (their halfe brother) created the first of them Earle of Richmond, the other of Pembroke. This Edmund is he, who by Margaret the daughter of Iohn Duke of Somerset, (grandechilde to Iohn of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster) had Henry the 7. the most famous and prudent King of England.

(33) In that yeare in which this excellent Queen died, the young Dutchesse Dowager of Bedford (widdow to the late Regent of France) married also (below her degree) a vigorous Englishe Knight, one * Sir Richard Wooduile, of which match yet Serres needed not to haue spoken so contemptibly, calling him an Englishe aduenturer, of small account; shee thereby (saith he) giuing cause to laugh at her: which censure tasteth perhaps of the French leuen and preiudice, because the Lady was sister to the Earle of S. Paul, who would not make one in the peace of Arras, but held with the Englishe.

* Stowes Annals. The Dutchesse Dowager marrieth Woodvile.

(34) But let vs see the sequell. Out of this Matrimony also sprung Queenes; for her husband (afterward made Earle of Riuers) had sundry children by her, whereof Elizabeth being one, had the honour to marry Edward the fourth King of England, and hereby was both herselfe a Queene and a Progenitresse of those glorious Kinges and Queenes which followed: for from her and this match sprang another Elizabeth, the renowned wife of King Henry the seauenth, as King Henry himselfe did of the former: both those marriages proued most fortunate to England: but another marriage which then threatned present danger to King Henry, was that which Iames the first King of Scots made with France, who gaue his daughter the Lady Margaret, to Lewis the Dauphin for wife, and sent new supplies of men against the English: hee meant also to haue attempted some personall hostility, but that hee was most wickedly murthered by certaine bloudy Traitors in Perth,

The new Regent doth nothing.

(35) Let vs now caſt our eye to the doings of our new Regent the Duke of Yorke, that we may be witneſſe s, how farre by his endeauors, the affaires of King Henry were aduanced in France. The ſilence at this time is euery where very great, yet had he opportunitie to haue atchieued ſomwhat. Two* thouſand French horſemen were mutined, and roued vp and downe in great diſorder. Paris was fearefully puniſhed with famine, and the attendants of famine, peſtilentiall maladies. The Countries about lay open: the Courtiers were diſcontented and diuided: Nothing is yet done by our Regent, which * ſome impute to Edmund Duke of Somerſets oppoſition, who out of enuy and diſdaine hindred his diſpatch. Wee muſt in the meane time find out them that did ſomewhat. The Duke of Sommerſet himſelfe accompanied with the Lords Talbot and Fauconbridge, with other Gallants, and a competent force of the Engliſh, beſiege Harflew, which the Normans in the late rebellion tooke from them, and ſtill maintained againſt them vnder French Captaines: King Charles ſends ſome of his principall Commanders with foure thouſand men to reſcue the Towne; who did their beſt, but not able to effect any thing, Harflew was rendred to the Duke.

The Earle of Warwicke comes Regent into France, and Yorke returnes.

(36) In Nouember Richard Earle of Warwicke came as Regent into France, being ſurrogated in that office to the Duke of Yorke, who returned into England. Hee carried with him a thouſand freſh Souldiers, and arriued at Harflew, from whence he repaired to Roan, the chiefe ſeat (Paris being now loſt) of the Engliſh Dominions in North France, as Burdeaux was in the South; whether now the Earle of Huntingdon, with certaine troupes and companies of Souldiers, was ſent as Seneſchall. This new Regent buſied himſelfe in the generall affaires of his place. Vnder him the Duke of Burgoins forces were driuen from Crotoy. Abbeuile freed from the danger of a Baſtile, with which the Duke had pent that Towne in; and the Engliſh for twentie dayes ſpace together tooke their pleaſure in ſpoiling the Country of Picardy about Amiens and Artois. Theſe and ſome other actions hauing beene worthily carried during this Regents gouernment, himſelf dyeth. The Duke of Yorke againe ſucceedes him. Our intereſt in France was retained, not ſo much by King Henries miniſters and Armies, as by remiſſeneſſe of King Charles, whom alſo Lewis the Daulphin (afterward King) did greatly trouble by rebellious deceſſions, and abſentments of himſelfe. The feare of the Engliſh reconciled the ſonne to the father the ſooner. K. Charles was now fallen into diſlike with his people, but to redeeme his credite, hee attempts the recouery of Pontoyſe (a towne neere to Paris) which the Lord Clifford had not long before ſurpriſed by ſtratageme and money (an ordinary meanes as then for the expugnation of places) and comes in perſon to the enterprize. There attended vpon him for that ſeruice about ten or twelue thouſand men. The L. Clifford is within, and makes a braue defence.

A. D. 1438.

The Duke of Yorke Regent againe.

King Charles and his ſonne reconciled againſt the Engliſh.

The ſiege of Pontoyſe.

(37) The Duke of Yorke lately landed in Normandie, as Regent, aſſembleth his maine ſtrengthes, being about ſeuen or eight thouſand; offers the French King battell. Hee keepes himſelfe within his trenches. The Duke (according to the ancient humor, and diſcipline of the Engliſh, who loue to ſet all vpon a puſh) deſirous to fight, vnexpectedly paſſeth the riuer of Oyſe, which ranne betweene the two Campes. King Charles diſlodgeth ſo fearefully, that the French doe not ouer boldly excuſe him of *flying. The Duke hauing had the ſpoile of the French Kings Campe, refortifies Pontoyſe, and aſſaults a Baſtile, where Charles had left three thouſand Souldiers to maintaine the face of a ſiege. It was held better to purſue the King, who was gotten to Poiſie. There the Duke of Yorke againe very nobly prouokes him to a field. It would not be; King Charles ſaw the hazards were not equall, and therefore endures his brauado. What could the Duke doe more? hee is of neceſſity to returne to the maine of his charge in Normandy, and doth ſo. King Charles ran into ſuch obloquie and contempt with his people by this diſhonourable retreat, but chiefly with the Pariſians; that if hee had not attempted again and preuailed againſt Pontoiſe, it might haue ieoparded his whole eſtate; for there was a faction which would haue made vſe of his diſgrace. He returnes in great fury to the ſiege, and finally enters the town, not without much bloudſhed. Serres ſaith, that fiue hundred Engliſh left their dead bodies at the breach. The King was one of the firſt that entred, chooſing rather to be thought temerarious then timerous. This exploit eſtabliſhed his opinion among the people. A ſatietie of warre filled both ſides, and the eſtate of England vnder King Henry, whoſe ſoftneſſe and lenitie gaue way to ſundry dangerous Court-factions, needed quiet Commiſſioners meet at Callis: nothing is concluded but the enlargement of Charles Duke of Orleans for the ſumme of three hundred thouſand Crownes. Hee had beene Priſoner in England about twentie and ſixe yeeres, euer ſince the Battell of Agincourt, where hee was taken. The Duke of Burgundie was a ſpeciall Actor in his enlargement, with a purpoſe to ſecure his owne greatneſſe by benefites: this high borne Prince for the murther of his father, being naturally the head and chiefe of that deadly fewde, which had moſt mortally raged between the houſes of Burgundie and Orleance. Humfrey Duke of Gloceſter prudently foreſeeing the dangers like to enſue on Orleance his enlargement, ſtoutly oppoſed himſelfe thereunto, and that vpon important reaſons which * hee required to haue regiſtred, that they might remaine on Record for a teſtimony and diſcharge of his duty in that behalfe.

*Serres.

1 Firſt, for that the French King wanted diſcretion and iudgement to order his affaires, which defects might bee ſupplied by the Duke, (being a man of experience and very ſubtle) if hee ſhould bee ſet at liberty.

2 That the ſaid Duke might procure an vnion of the factions (now hotely maintained in France among the Nobility) to the preiudice of the Crowne of England, and hazard of the loſſe of the Kings territories in France.

3 That the Dutchie of Normandy (hauing ſuſtained a great charge in maintaining the warre) ſeeing the Duke of Orleance deliuered, and no royall Army on the Engliſh part to withſtand the common enemy, was likely inough to reuolt.

4 That if the Duke ſhould be deliuered, it might be probably coniectured, that he would ſooner break his oath, which he ſhould (being priſoner) make to the King of England, then the oath of his alleageance to the French King his Soueraigne Lord, of whom he holdeth his lands and dignity.

5 If the Articles concluded between his Maieſty and the French on the Dukes behalfe, ſhould not be performed, what remedy might his Maieſty haue or expect?

6 That conſidering his coſen of Huntingdon was to leaue the Dutchy of Guyenne, and for that the alliance betwixt the ſaid Duke, and the Earles of Armiack and Foix, and the Lord de la Bret, was to bee ſuſpected as dangerous, it was very neceſſary that good prouiſion ſhould be made for defence of that Country, being his Maieſties ancient inheritance.

7 That his Maieſty hath no allyance with any Chriſtian Prince, but onely the King of Portugall (being but of tender yeeres and farre off:) And therfore it was not ſafe for his Maieſtie to deliuer him, that was

was likely to proue his Capitall enemie, and to seeke meanes to depriue him of those lands which his noble father had left him.

8. That if any of his Maiesties kinred, or other Lords on that side the Sea, should happen to be taken prisoners, the said Duke of Orleance might ransom 4 or 5 of them.

9. That it were fit to take aduise of the Lords, and other his Maiesties subiects in the Realme of France, and dutchy of Normandy, whether they thought it expedient that the said Duke should be deliuered or not. Otherwise the world might crie shame thereon, when men should call to minde the losse of his brethren of Clarence, and Bedford, and other noble Personages, in defending and keeping those Lands.

10. If he (the said Duke of Gloucester) should consent to the said Dukes deliuerance (the same being also quite-contrary to the last will of his Maiesties Father) such inconueniences, as would ensue thereupon, should be imputed to him.

(38) Notwithstanding the weight of so many thousand Crownes ouer-peysed all these important and ponderous reasons; and the warre eates on still in the body of France, but not with so sharpe teeth, nor so full engorgement as before. Townes and people are taken on both sides. The Countie of Amiens was spoiled by the English Lords, Willoughby and Talbot; The Regent and the Duke of Sommerset, march into Angiou, where they charged their carriages with much spoile and returned. Then the Duke of Sommerset seuers himselfe, and doth sundry exploits in and about Britaine. Diep in Normandy being besieged, was rescued by the Dolphin of France to our losse. The contemplation of these mutuall violences touched all Christendome: for the Turke, common enemie thereof, encreased. Ambassadors are sent from all parts, to determine these bloody differences. William de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, was chiefe for the English. A truce was hereupon taken for eighteene months, between King Henry and King Charles, and an hope of perpetuall amity, weakely grounded vpon a match, which the Earle of Suffolke contracted for King Henry, with Margaret the daughter of Renate, titulary King of Sicile, Naples, and Ierusalem, Duke of Angiou and Lorrain, Prince of the blood. To effect this, the Earle couenanted that the English should abandon the possession of Angiou, and Main to her father. A strange purchase of a wife, who though shee brought youth, beauty and hope of a perpetuall peace with France, (the more profitable opportunity whereof, the English had more brauely then happily neglected) yet was shee otherwise without portion. The Earle notwithstanding (whose drift herein could not be without manifest ambition, to make himselfe one of the greatest of England, by this gratification of the French, with his Masters charge and dishonour) is not abashed to expect publike thanks for this high seruice, and an whole fifteene for the charge of her transportation. Sundry Lords of Councell and the King himselfe thought him worthy, and according to his deuise and ouerture, the whole affaire was carried. Suffolke made Marquesse is sent ouer with many honorable persons, both men and women, to conduct the faire and goodly (but most vnfortunate and fatall) Bride into England. * Polydore giues vs no vnfitting Character of this Lady. Shee was prouident enough, very desirous of glory, abounding in discourse, counsell, gracious behauiour, and manly courage; but not free from womens humour, which (saith he) is vsually vehement and apt to change. In England ye may easily suppose, that shee was most roially entertained; Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, among others, meeting her with a traine of * fiue hundred horsemen in a liuery, that worthy Poet Iohn Lydgate Monke of Burie, deuising the speeches for such gratulatory triumphs as were made at her entrance into London. The King being married lawfully enioyes her embracements, from which he was often afterward violently separated by the miseries of a most cruell warre, wherein shee had her piteous portion. Suffolke in the meane time hauing the most assured fauour of the Queen pursues his ambitious purposes. Shee in the meane time was solemnly Crowned Queene of England at Westminster vpon the * thirtieth of May.

Shee is married to King Henry and Crowned.

*A.D. 1445 A.reg. 23.

(39) Would to God it stood now with the quality of this argument, to turne our eies from the view of those actions which ensued; for here the mournefull tragedies of our poore Countrey began. But we cannot but open those olde and most execrable sores, that, in their example, all true English blood may the rather be tender ouer their bowels, beholding such effects as the diuell and all the furies of hell were (by Gods seuere permission) Actors in. Fabian giues vs the causes and contents of those effects, in these graue and few words.

(40) "It appeareth that God was not pleased with "that marriage: For after this day, the fortune of the "world began to fall from the King, so that he lost his "friends in England, and his reuennes in France: For "shortly after, all was ruled by the Queene and her Coun- "sell, to the great disprofit of the King and his Realme, "and to the great manger (it is Fabians word) and ob- "loquie of the Queene, who (as since hath beene well "proued) had many a wrong, and false report made of "her. All which miserie fell for BREAKING OF "THE PROMISE, made by the King vnto the "Earle of Armenacks' daughter, as most writers agree: "Which misery in this Story shall some-deale appear by the "loosing of Normandy, (as all things else, except Callais, "which the English held in France) the diuision of the "Lords within this Realme, the rebellion of the commi- "nalty against their Prince and Soueraigne, and finally "the King deposed, and the Queene with the Prince faine "to flee the land, and lost the rule thereof for euer. Thus he: but all this farre short of the euils that were the brood and offspring of the following times. The Parliament in the meane time grants aides of money, that vpon expiration of the truce there might bee present abilities to maintaine warre. The Duke of Yorke is reuoked, and the Duke of Sommerset (in an euill houre) is sent in his place, with such prouisions as were reputed competent.

Fabian.

This contract by proxie is said to haue beene made in the twentieth yeere of King Henry 3 and that the Earle of Suffolke was chiefe, if not sole actor in breaking it.

The Duke of Sommerset Regent of English France.

(41) Humfrey the renowned Duke of Gloucester, Lord Protector, felt the first stroke of the euill Angell, which was sent to punish England, and to roote out her Nobles. This Duke was much hated of the Queene, and her faction, as the onely man who by his prudence, as also by the honor and authoritie of his birth and place, seemed to empeach that soueraigne command, which they pretended to settle in the Kings owne person, but meant indeed (as the manner is vnder soft Princes) to reigne themselues in anothers name. Many great Lords were drawne on (at the time of a Parliament then * holden at Saint Edmunds Bury,) to concurre for his ruine, not perceiuing, that thereby they pluckt vp the floodgate, at which the Duke of Yorke entered, ouerwhelming all of them in a deluge of blood. Whether they had any true or iust feare of Gloucester himselfe, least perhaps he should take reuenge vpon some particular persons among them, is doubtfull, though it be probable enough, that they had. Heare some things that forewent this Parliament. About fiue or sixe yeers before, *the Dutchesse of Gloucester Eleanor*, was conuented for witchcraft and sorcerie, and afterward endited of treason in the Guild-Hall in London, before the Earles of Huntington, Stafford, Suffolke, and Northumberland, and certaine Lords, as Fanhope, and Hungerford, with others, and Iudges of both benches; of which crimes shee was appealed by one Bolingbrook an Astronomer, and Thomas Southwell a Chanon, which Southwell was charged to haue said Masses ouer certaine instruments, by which the Astronomer should practise Necromancy against the life of the King. These being taken, accused her as necessarie

Some part hereof ſhee confeſſed, for which ſhee was put to publike and ſolemne penance in London vpon three ſeueral daies, with wonderfull ſhame to her perſon, and after ſhee was committed to perpetuall priſon vnder the ward of Sir Thomas Stanley in the Caſtle of Cheſter, but from thence remoued to Kenelworth. Her pride, falſhood, auarice, and lechery were cauſes of her confuſion, ſaith Stow; who hath ſet forth that buſineſſe very diligently, though not ſeeming to attribute much credit to that accuſation of treaſon. The Duke of Gloceſter her vnhappy Lord and husband (whom ſhee by loue-cups and enchantments was ſaid to haue enueigled, vſing therein one Margerie Gurdmain a witch of Ey in Suffolke, who was burnt in Smithfield) ſtung with this reproach, might reaſonably be thought not vnwilling to doe ſomewhat. Howſoeuer that was, his deſtruction borrowed countenance from that opinion. The Duke therefore being come to attend in this Parliament at Burie, was arreſted of high treaſon by Iohn Lord Beaumont high Conſtable of England, the Dukes of Buckingham and Sommerſet with others. Certaine of the Kings houſhold were appointed to guard him. Not long after he was found dead. His body was ſhewed to the Lords and Commons, as if he had died of a palſey or an apoſteme. Of thirty and two of his ſeruants which were attached, Sir Roger Chamberlaine Knight, Richard Middleton, Thomas Herbert, Arthur Turſey, Eſquires, and Richard Nedham Gentleman, were condemned of high treaſon, and had this vnexampled puniſhment. They were drawne from the Tower to Tiburn, hanged, let down quick, ſtript naked, marked with a knife to be quartered, and then a Charter of pardon ſhewed for their liues by the Marqueſſe of Suffolke. But the yeoman *of the Crowne had their liuelihood, the executioner their cloathes. Their pardons were thus obtained by the earneſt diligence of Doctor Gilbert Worthington, a famous preacher, parſon of *S. (42) Such was the end of this great Prince, who, notwithſtanding this open ſhewing of his body, and theſe pretended crimes, was by the people of England thought to be doublie murthered, by detraction, and deadly practiſe. He was not only a true louer of learned men, but himſelfe alſo learned*, and (ſaith our Author) a father of his Countrey. His maine opinion concerning the gouernment of King Henries French dominions, was as mainely oppoſed by the Cardinall of Wincheſter and others, who altogether perſwaded Peace, to which the noble Duke (ſtanding preciſely vpon the honor and Maieſty of the Engliſh name,) was * an abſolute enemie. From this troubled fountaine of diuided Councell many following blacke aduentures did flow. The Duke thus brought to his end, goodmen (ſaith Polydore) fearfull of their owne ſafeties, did of their owne accord forſake the Court, into whoſe roomes many ſucceeded, who for the more part looking how to riſe in dignity made open an eaſie way for new factions. The Cardinall of Wincheſter (the other halfe-arch of the Kingdome) ouerliued not the Duke aboue fifteene or ſixteene daies. The whole frame of gouernment was thus drawne to repoſe it ſelfe vpon the Queene, and ſuch fauourites, as the King by her commendation the rather liked.

*A.D.1448. A.reg.26.

(43) The Marqueſſe * of Suffolke, prime man in grace, was created Duke, which made him a more conſpicuous marke of enuie, then that any ſhadow of the King or Queene could ſhelter or protect. After the Cardinals * death, the affaires in France (where Sommerſet was now Regent) were neither duelie looked vnto, nor the gouernours of the Countrey well aduiſed. But the King and Realme of England lay, much more then France, open to the ineuitable, deepe, and pernicious conſpiracies of Richard Duke of Yorke. Her (by the error of King Henry, and the euill ſtarres of our Countrey) being of himſelfe a great Prince, and growne ſtronger by affected popularitie, perceiuing the King to be a Ruler, and not to Rule, began ſecretlie to allure his friends of the Nobilitie, and priuily declared to them his title to the Crowne, as likewiſe he did to certaine Gouernors of Cities and townes, which attempt was ſo politickly and cloſely carried, that his prouiſion was readie, before his purpoſe was opened. The very ſtate of things inuited this fatall conſpiracie: a milder King then England was worthy of; a Councell out of fauour with the people; manifold loſſes and diſhonours abroad; a turbulent and iealous condition of things at home. Of all which and much more, the Duke of Yorke, hauing King Henrie the fourth (the enemie of his houſe) for a perillous example, made his pretious vſe, cheriſhing the popular auerſions, without ſeeking to redreſſe any euils, but repreſenting them worſe then they were, thereby to ripen that breach of loialty in the hearts of men, which his ambition wrought vpon. His diſplacement from the Regency of France, did not a little (perhaps) offend him at firſt, becauſe the Duke of Sommerſet got it ouer his head; but it will not be long, before Sommerſets euill carriage of that truſt, and the declining fortune of England, will giue him occaſion to reioice at the foile of his dreaded enemy. Let vs not be long in the rehearſall of the publike ſhame and dammage of our nation.

(44) During the truce betweene England and France, one Sir Francis Surien an Arragonois (Knight of the Garter) ſeruing vnder the Regent, vnlawfullie ſurprized Fougers, a towne of Britaine vpon the confines of Normandy. Reſtitution is demanded. The Duke of Sommerſet (a proud man (ſaith Serres) who thinking to doe better then the reſt, did abſolutely ruine the Engliſh affaires) contrary to good diſcipline, cheriſhing his ſouldiers in their riots and diſorders, neglected the iuſtice of nations in that point. The French make this their example, and ſurprize Port de l'Arch, and towne after towne, ſo many and ſo faſt, that King Charles (who, that he might haue God on his ſide, and wrong on his enemies, conteined himſelfe with great modeſty, till * he ſaw all quiet reſtitution deſperate,) recouered Roan, Caen and all Normandie within a ſhort ſpace after.

(45) Thus Sommerſet, and the Engliſh, are compelled to quit Normandy, not only inglorious, but alſo in England it ſelfe vncommiſerated. The next maine parcell of the Engliſh inheritance, beyond our Ocean, was Gaſcoigne. King Charles and his people deſirous (againſt plaine right) to make all that theirs, whatſoeuer was comprehended within the French language, inuaded that Dutchie alſo, and within verie *few yeeres after (the fortune of warre, and diſloialty of the people euery where fauouring them) extorted the ſame out of the Engliſh-mens poſſeſſion, after it had continued theirs about two hundreth foure-ſcore and nine yeeres, to the immortall diſhonour and dammage of our nation. The Duke of Yorke in the meane time, who thirſted for the Crowne of England, hath occaſion miniſtred to impe more feathers into his aſpiring wings. Ireland is in tumult. Thither the Duke paſſeth, and not only appeaſeth the diſorder of that Nation, *but * wan ſuch fauour among them, as could neuer be ſeparated from him, and his linage*. Thus diligently the Pioner makes his mines into the quiet and felicity of his Countrey, calling his cauſe the quarrell of right and iuſtice, as pretending that the Crowne of England appertained to his name and familie.

(46) But

(46) But the odor of this vile ſucceſſe in France, comming into England, filled mens hearts and ſenſes with great perturbation. The Queene and Suffolke ſuffer obloquie for theſe effects in the generall iudgement. The common wealth is not ſilent. A Parliament is called to be holdē at Weſtminſter, which from thence was aſſigned to be kept at Leiceſter. The place likes not; few appeare. It is brought backe to Weſtminſter. There the whole body of publike counſell meetes. Many * Articles are exhibited by the lower houſe againſt the Duke of Suffolke, wherein hee is charged with euill demeanor, miſpriſion and treaſon: who thereupon is committed priſoner to the Tower: from thence, within fowre or fiue weeks hee is diſcharged, which more augmented the generall indignation then his commitment had miniſtred ſatiſfaction. The perilous Duke of Yorke warms himſelfe at theſe blazes, and vnderhand cheriſheth them as opportunity wil permit, hauing his cunning factors and inſtruments fitte for ſuch occaſions ſecretly ſpread ouer the Realme, to inſtill the poyſons of diſcontentment, and deſire of change into the giddie multitude. When wee reade in our vulgar Chronicles, that about this time Adam Molins Biſhoppe of Chicheſter, Keeper of the Kings Priuy Seale (through the procurement of Richard Duke of Yorke) was by ſhipmen ſlaine at Portſmouth, and yet no cauſe of ſo foule and wicked a murther expreſſed, it cannot but offend any curious Reader, who would receiue ſatiſfaction rather by the reaſō of actions then by the euents. His guiltineſſe in the fact was ſo apparant, that K. Henry in his anſwere made a yeere or two after to the Dukes diſſembling, and deceitfull letter, confidently mentioneth the ſame, where thus hee ſpeaketh. Sooth it is that long time among the people hath beene vpon you many ſtrange language, and in ſpeciall anone after your diſordinate and vnlawfull ſlaying of the Biſhoppe of Chicheſter, diuers, and many of the vntrue ſhipmen and other, ſaid (in their manner) words againſt our ſtate, making menace to our owne perſon by your ſayings, that yee ſhould bee fetched with many thouſands, and you ſhould take vpon you * that which you neither ought, nor as wee doubt not will attempt, &c. What cauſe led the Duke to commit this ſo impious a deed, may eaſily now be coniectured, being none other but the common hatred hee bare to all ſuch wiſe or valiant perſons, as might in any ſort vphold the moſt iuſt and gracious Henry, and this ſincerity in the Biſhoppe could not be but a grieuous crime in the Dukes ambitious eyes, whoſe greatneſſe was euen then too intollerable; for where was the Kings iuſtice when ſuch a fact might hope of impunity? The Duke did effect it by his bloudy complices as hee did many other moſt ſeditious and perfidious things, while hee was abſent in Ireland. Thomas Thanie notwithſtanding calling himſelfe Blew-beard being a Fuller of Canterburie, and attempting to gather the people, miſcarrieth in his treaſon, and for that was hanged and quartered: this was a preamble to the following tumults. The Duke of Yorkes whole and onely hopes were repoſed in the generall perturbations of his Country.

(47) The Duke of Suffolke (a principal pillar of K. Henries ſafety) being ſet at liberty, attends the King and Queene in their Parliament at Leiceſter. Behold the humour of the Commons which were ſowred with the peſtilent leauen of Yorkes conſpiracy. They cannot endure the ſight of this Prince, becauſe his readuancement ſeems done in deſpight of them. Calumniations & odious ſurmiſes are exhibited againſt him: hee muſt downe to make way for K. Henries moſt vnworthy ruine. The moſt vile part of this Parliamental accuſation was, that they ſhould charge that for a crime vpon Suffolke which themſelues had vniuerſally in another former Parliament aſſented vnto and ratified. Which was the deliuery of Anion and Main vpon the marriage, concluded (for the good of England, if others had not inuerted or interrupted the ſucceſſe by their temerity) with Renate, father of Queene Margaret. Neither did the enuy onely of the ſecret Turkiſh ouerlade this noble Gentleman, but the impotency of the Duke of Somerſets faction, whoſe raſhneſſe and vanity hauing loſt all Normandy, would gladly find any others ſhoulder, vpon which to caſt the imputation, either in part or whole. In that former Parliament aſſembled immediately vpon Suffolkes returne from that treaty with Renate out of France, this was the ſumme of the whole proceedings. Suffolke (as hee was very eloquent) made knowne to both houſes, his counſels and ſeruices, and the effect of his Embaſſie, praying they might be approued, and enrolled for his diſcharge. Whereupon * the next morrow, Burley Speaker of the lower houſe, and the body therof repaired to the Kings preſence, then ſitting among the Lords, and there * humbly required, that the requeſt of the Marqueſſe (afterward created Duke of Suffolk) might be granted: and the Lords made the like petition, kneeling on their knees. The King condiſcended to their deſires, and ſo the whole matter was recorded for his acquitall.

(48) What can bee more euident? or who can enough admire the vanity of popular mutabilitie? The Duke the (principall marke, though the Biſhop of Salisbury, the Lord Say, and others were alſo accuſed) vnable to ſtand the puſh of ſo generall an oppoſition, muſt be baniſhed. The King vnwillingly giues this ſentence againſt the Duke, or rather againſt his owne life and ſafety: fiue yeeres are limited to his exile. Being vpon the ſea, hee is taken by his enemies, who at Douer-road ſtroke off his head vpon the ſide of a Cocke-boat. This diueliſh murther (for it was none other, the Kings authority being not vſed therein) committed vpon ſo great a Prince, was the leſſe pitied, for that hee was noiſed among the people to haue beene a priuy actor in the Noble Duke of Gloceſters death, who periſhed (ſaith a * learned Author) by the fraud and practiſe of a woman (belike) Queene Margarite. The Biſhop of Salisburie before ſaid more impiouſly, and irregularly loſt his life in the following tumults, being murthered (after he had finiſhed diuine ſeruice) by his owne Tenants, who dragged him from the Altar to an hill-top, and there (while hee was making his laſt prayers) cleft his ſacred head: The Lord Say Treaſurer of England fell likewiſe into the peoples fury, and had his head cut off by the commandement of that execrable rebell Iacke Cade, at the Standerd in Cheape, as yee ſhall hereafter learne.

(49) This William Duke of Suffolke * was indeed a great and worthy perſon, for when his Father, and three Brothers had valiantly powred forth their lines for their Country in the warre of France, hee ſerued in them foure and thirty yeeres, in ſeuenteene of the which hee neuer returned home, hee was ones taken priſoner, being then but a Knight, and paied for his ranſome twenty thouſand pounds ſterling, hee was fifteene yeeres priuy Counſellour, and thirty yeeres Knight of the Garter. Notwithſtanding all which, the ſame Author truly addeth: That as for theſe cauſes he was in higheſt grace with the King, ſo he was the more diſgratious or hated of the people, and for * certaine very ſleight matters, and thoſe not very apparant, hee was driuen into baniſhment, and (as you haue already heard) was intercepted vpon the ſea in his paſſage to France, and by his aduerſaries killed. What honeſt heart doth not melt at the relation of theſe violent contempts of all religion, honour, reaſon and iuſtice? yet are they but the drops which doe forego thoſe many bloudy ſhowres, which the cloud of Yorkes faction rainde vpon our miſerable Nation. They who murthered this great triumphant Gentleman, were certaine perſons who waſted vpon the Seas in a Barke called the Nicholas of the Tower, which belonged to Iohn * Holland Duke of Exceſter, Conſtable of the Tower of London, whom Gods reuenging hand ſhall not leaue vnpuniſhed.

p ractise. Hereupon the Commons of Kent, (who haue seldome refrained in such turbulent times) while the Duke of Yorke was as yet in Ireland, take Armes. One Iacke Cade is their Captaine: hee had beene the seruant of a Sussex Knight, Sir Thomas Dagre; kils a woman with Child; abiureth the land; turnes French; swearing seruice to them, and now returning, is the instrument to hang out Mortimers name, like a flagge to draw a party, fayning himselfe to bee a Cosen to the Duke of Yorke. A pestilent deuise, to sound the affections of the multitude, and to proclaime the Title to the Crown, which the Duke (as heire of that family) afterward challenged; for who would not aske, what should moue him to vse the name of Mortimer? This Cade whom some (by contraries) call Iohn Amend-all (that is, Iohn Marre-all) hauing drawn great numbers to follow him, encampes at Blacke-Heath by Greenewich, and in his writings cals himselfe the Captaine of Kent. His pretences (as of al like disloial actions) were the common good and such other. The King at the report of these stirres is stirred. The Captaine of Kent demaunds.

1 That Richard Duke of Yorke bee called out of Ireland, and (with certaine others named for staies and colour) be principally vsed in Counsell.

2 That as the Duke of Gloucester was falsly proclaimed a Traitour, so the Authors of his death might bee punished.

4 (For the third Article contained no demand, but onely scandalous matter to aggrauate hatred against the dead Duke of Suffolke, and his liuing adherents:) That all the extortions (so the Rebels phrased them) daily vsed among the common people, might be laid downe: that is to say, the greene waxe, which is falsly vsed to the perpetuall destruction of the Kings true Commons of Kent. Also the Kings Bench, the which is too grieuous to the Shire of Kent, without prouision of our Soueraigne Lord, and his true Councell. And also in taking wheat and other graines, beefe, mutton, and all other victuall, the which is importable to the saide Commons, without the briefe prouision of our said Soueraign Lord, and his true Councell, they may no longer beare it. And also vnto the Statute of Labourers, and the great extortioners, the which is to say, the false Traitors, Sleg, Cromere, Isley, and Robert East.

Stowes Annals.

(51) Thus traiterously to the Kings welfare, and scandalously to his most gentle gouernment, writes this arrogant Captaine of Rebels. The King vpon view of these braues, beginnes to feele the indignity and danger. An Armie is raised, Cade retires to Seuenoke in Kent. The King supposing hee had fled, sends after him * Sir Humfrey Stafford Knight, and other Gentlemen with some forces. Wee reade none of these things without a suspition, that the King was alwayes betrayed by such hypocrites about him, as would not haue him prosper. Marke the euent. At Seuenoke Cade abides, probably not without encouragement from secret Traitours, and after long fight slew Sir Humfrey with many others. Hee armed himselfe in the dead Knights abillements with guilt spurres. The King and Queene hearing of this mishappe, leaue the Tower of London to the custodie of the Lord Scales, and of that renowned Esquire Mathew Gowgh; and London it selfe to the Lord Maiors fidelity, themselues departing to Kenilworth. The headlong crewes of London fauour the Rebell, and giue entrance. Robert Horne Alderman, like an honest wise man, would haue had them resisted. This free necessary speech endangered his life; honourable in his memory for the hazard onely, what should hee haue beene if hee had gloriouslie lost it? but money buyes out his perill with the Tyrant, who fined him at *fiue hundred Markes. The time was very slippery and loose; for the Essex men also were encamped vpon Mile-end by London: All men are afraid of their owne estates; such secret well-wishings attended vpon the Arch-Rebels pretences. The King before hee had left London was enforced (by such hollow friends as were about him) to commit the Lord Say Treasurer of England to the Tower, after that the valiant and loyall Sir Humfrey Stafford was slaine, and the newes of his vnlucky defeate were confirmed.

(52) Cade therefore being admitted into London vpon the second of Iuly with his forces, (where for a short while to delude the people with a shew of conscience, they abstained from robberies) strikes with his sword vpon London-stone, saying; Now is Mortimer Lord of this City. At night hee returnes into Southwarke: One * Robert Poinings of Southwarke Esquire was his Sword-bearer and Caruer. It is needlesse to be particular in this Rebels behauiour: The next day hee returnes, and the Lord Say is beheaded in Cheapside (as is before said) at Cades commandement, and his body cut into quarters. The King being by the losse of so trusty and graue a seruant, not a little weakened.

(53) The next tragedie was Cromeres an Esquire, and high Sheriffe of Kent (the Lord Sayes sonne in law) who is drawn out of the Fleet (and to appease the Essex Rebels) sacrificed by beheading without any triall at Mile-End. The City stirres not for all this. Malpas and Gerstie, two rich Citizens, at whose houses Cade had seuerally dined, being spoiled and robbed by him (lest perhappes it might appeare, that he who durst commit treasons, had not also the heart to commit felonies) teach what others are to expect. The Maior, Thomas Chalton and the wiser wealthy ones, ouerruled by faction till then, see their danger now, and secretly send to the Lord Scales for aide. Mathew Gowgh at night is come among them as sent by him. The Kentishmen, hearing their entrie was barred, runne furiously to armes. Cade endeauors to open his way by force; but in despight of all his power, the Citizens made good & defended London-bridge against him, though with the losse of many valiant and honest men, for the conflict endured all night till nine in the morning. Among such as were slaine on the Kings side, were Iohn Sutton Alderman, Mathew Gowgh himselfe, and Robert Heysand Citizen. This Gowgh (an Esquire of Wales) was a man of excellent vertue, manhood, and zeale to his Country, and of great renown in the warre of France, where he had serued with speciall commendations faithfully, for the space of aboue twenty yeeres. His deserts at this time deserued a Statue in the City, for whose safety hee spent his last bloud. To giue a quicke end to these miseries, impunity is proclaimed for all offenders, and sent to them in the Kings name by the Archbishoppe of Canterbury, Lord Chancellour, vnder the great Seale of England: the rebels are scattred with this assurance of their safeties, and euery man retires in peace from following so pestilent an Impostor. A *thousand Markes (when Cade afterward attempted new troubles) are promised to him, who kils or takes this counterfeit Mortimer. Alexander Eden, a Gentleman of Kent, had the happinesse to discouer and kill him at Hothfield in that County: his wretched carkase was brought to London, where his false head was set sentinell vpon London-bridge, and his quarters were aduanced for terrour in seuerall parts of Kent. There died also by the stroke of iustice twenty and sixe more, whereof eight were executed at Canterbury, and the rest elsewhere in Kent and Sussex. The multitude it selfe * came naked in their shirts to the King on Blacke-heath, humbly praying mercy which they obtained.

(54) The Kentish rebellion thus pacified, farre greater and farre more dangerous troubles ensued, as it * fareth in humane bodies, which relapsing into sicknesses, are shaken so much the more terribly. These troubles had their fountaine and mediate Originall, from Richard Duke of Yorke, no degenerous sonne of that Richard, whom King Henry the fifth had created Earle of Cambridge, and enriched with much wealth, honoring him aboue others in regard of his blood and and parentage: but No bountie, nor benefits could change a treacherous disposition, for (as you haue heard before) he conspired to murther his benefactor King Henry the fifth, as the Duke of Yorke (his true progenie) labored to depose this King Henrie his aduancer. The humors of the popular body, were, in the last commotion, not obscurely discouered. The Common weale had perhaps some few enormities, through the abuse of Magistrates and men in place, but yet such, as the maladie was infinitely lesse pernicious then the remedy. Vpon this intelligence the Duke comes sodeinely out of Ireland, and to begin his vsurped censureship and dictature, apprehends John Sutton Lord Dudley, Reignald Abbot of Saint Peters, at Glastenbury, and another, whom he imprisoneth within his Castle of Ludlow. Intollerable beginnings of more intollerable sequele. Edmund Duke of Somerset was the man, who (after Suffolks death) most supported the Kings side by his vigilancie, cares, dangers, and good Counsels, endeauouring by all meanes to cleare the Realme from factions, and to preserue the King and state in quiet.

(55) Yorke seeing this, doth find that Suffolke perished in vaine, if Sommerset held like grace; against whose person he had a particular pretence of quarrell, for that the City of Caen in Normandy, which was the Duke of Yorkes charge, was rendred vp to the French by him, when the English affaires grew desperate in those parts; Sir Dauid Hall Knight, being at that time Captaine there for his Lord and Master the Duke of Yorke, and not allowing it, although the renowned Talbot himselfe was present at the render, and became an hostage for performance of the Capitulations. Yorke hereupon consults with his speciall friends, Richard Earle of Salisbury, and Richard his son, (who was afterward that most seditious & great fighting Earle of Warwicke,) Thomas Courtney Earle of Deuonshire, Edmund Brooke Lord Cobham, and others, how Yorke might get the Crowne of England, and for that cause how to ruine or fret out the Duke of Sommerset, who standing, they were to looke for strong opposition. In the end, they conclude to take armes, but yet to smother the mention of the Duke of Yorkes title, giuing out to the world for the reason of their doings, that they meant all honour and obedience to King Henry, and only to remoue certaine bad men from about his person, who afflicted the people, and made a pray of the Common-wealth: which, to gaine the more credit, and to blind the good King, the subtile Duke declares by Proclamation; *wherein, thus speaketh that Ambitious Hypocrite. God knoweth from whom no thing is hid, I am, haue beene, and euer will be his true liege man; &c. And to the very proofe it is so, I offer my selfe to sweare that on the blessed Sacrament, and receiue it, the which I hope shall be my saluation, at the day of doome. &c. In that it was the euill hap of the Duke of Somerset, that Normandy was lost during his Regencie, his enemies had the more commoditie to incommodate him with the people, who forbare not at his returne to offer to him sundry dishonours and iniuries, till vpon paine of death they were restrained, for breach of which Proclamation, one had his head cut off in west Cheap London.

(56) The King (notwithstanding all his Cosens arts and dissimulations) seeing the hooke through the baite, and the snake through the grasse, by the aduise of his trusty friends, chiefly of Edmund Duke of Sommerset, thinkes not fit to relie vpon his enemies good nature, but hauing a strong power, and store of honorable men to conduct them, he marcheth toward Wales against the Duke. The King did herein wisely, but not so much as the cause required. Yorke hauing notice of the Kings approach turnes aside, and with all speed marcheth toward London. That City, (the vaine hope of all Rebellions,) would not harken; Thereupon he slides with his people into Kent, the nest of his hopes, and at Brentheath neere Dertford (a towne about twelue miles from London) encampeth, meaning to fight. The King is not slow, but leauing his march toward Wales, pitcheth vp his roiall pauilion vpon Black-Heath, with a purpose to teach his cosen of Yorke more duty. Behold the fortune of England. God puts an excellent opportunity into the Kings hands of tearing vp the danger of his house by the rootes, for the Duke was farre inferiour in numbers, such therefore as secretly fauoured him, fearing his ouerthrow, were willing to aduise a reconcilement. Messengers goe betweene the hosts. The Duke, in his wonted manner, pretends loialtie and particular iniuries, as that the Kings seruants, Sir Iohn Talbot at Holt Castell, Sir Thomas Stanley in Cheshire, and others in other places, were set to harken vpon him. That by two of the Norrices, Bulkeley, Grust, Bould (and other Gentlemen) he was forbidden to land at Bewmaris, or to haue any refreshment, affirming that he (the Duke of Yorke) was against the Kings intent and as a Traitour. The King stoupes so much as to answere the letter, letting him to knowe: That the suspition vniuersally conceiued of his behauiours maued those effects: neuertheless, in regard of the humble obedience which was now protested, he, for the easing of the Dukes heart, doth declare, repute and admit him as a true, and faithfull subiect, and as his welbeloued Cosen. The Duke then aduanceth his practise one step further, and writes to the King, that Iustice might be done vpon all persons of what degree soeuer, which were guilty, or noised to be guiltie of treason: aiming at the Duke of Sommerset, whom he doubted not to ouerwhelme with sleights and calumnies, as hee and his had done the Duke of Suffolke.

(57) The King is contented (such weake or treacherous counsels he relied vpon) that Sommerset (for his satisfaction) should be commanded Prisoner to his owne house, and Yorke (hauing first dissolued his armie) should come in person, and put himselfe into the Kings hand. When he was come, he exhibites a great complaint against the pride and auarice of the Duke of Sommerset, and cunningly accusing none but him, he seekes the good-will of all others. A cunning drift as any, considering that hereby he deriued vpon his enemie all the enuie of the people, and left him single to withstand the effects. Sommerset (a Prince of great spirit and wit) not thinking it reasonable, as well in regard of his owne honour as the Commonwealthes interest, to endure such indignity, presents himselfe to the King against his accuser, and resoluing not to be tender-mouthed in the so apparent perill of the King and Realme, whose quiet was vndermined, answeres Yorke face to face, and, in plaine termes accuseth him of highest treason, as hauing conspired to depose the King, and take vpon himselfe the Soueraignty: vehemently vrging: That *the Duke of Yorke might be committed and arraigned, to the intent that by his deserued death, and the disenablement of his sonnes, Ciuill warre might be extinguished, praying finally that God would not suffer the enemie of the King dome to escape the hand of iustice.

(58) This had in likelihood beene done, but that the publike faith seemed to stand engaged for the Dukes indemnitie, he hauing come in vpon the Kings word, and also for that the hearts of men were not well assured to the King, which by executing Yorke would perhaps haue beene more vnsetled, because (not looking into the depth of the Kings perill) it would haue beene thought that he had beene destroied to gratifie Sommerset, and not to secure the Realme. There was hope likewise to recouer Aquitain, for that Burdeaux had offered to returne: Lastly, the Dukes sonne and heire, Edward Earle of March (afterward King) was reported to be ready with a great force of Welshmen to succour his father. Vpon these and other reasons, the Duke is no longer restrained, as vpon Sommersets most weighty accusations he had beene, and to assure the gentle and indulgent King, of his allegiance, he makes his submission, and solemnely TAKES HIS OATH to bee true, faithfull and obedient subiect. This was done vpon

An Armie is decreed for their reduction. Iohn Lord Talbot the first Earle of Shrewsburie of his name as Generall in that enterprize, lands in Gascoigne, where he doth sundry exploits, and the fame of his former cheualrie flying before with terrour, makes many places the rather to yeeld. Burdeaux her selfe secretly opens a gate vnto him, which the French Garrison perceiuing fled out at a Postern, but many being ouertaken were slaine by the Lord L'Esparre and the English. New supplies and victuals arriue, whereof the Earle of Shrewsburies yonger sonne, (Vicount Lile by his wife,) was a principall conducter. Burdeaux thus throughly mand and fortified, the Earle is aduertised that the French lay at siege before Castillion, a place of importance vpon the riuer of Dardonne. Thither the Earle marcheth, and with too great a confidence charging the enemie vpon vnequall termes, was there slaine, together with his sonne the Vicount Lile and others. Burdeaux receiued such as fled. The English fortunes and hopes which began to quicken, made this vnhappie Catastrophe in * Iulie, to the infinite losse of our nation and griefe of the Gascoigns, who generally misliked the French, and inclined to the English, hauing so honorablie, and for so long a time gouerned those dominions. This was the end of that great Earle, after he had for the space of twentie and foure yeeres serued his Prince and Countrey in the French warres, with higheft commendation; a * "most noble and most valiant man, by whose vertue the English name did chiefly become terrible in France. Burdeaux it selfe, and all other places after this, were by siege brought againe vnder the French King, who prosecuted those affaires in person. From that time forward the English neuer obtained there any hold or further footing, the felicity of this attempt breaking all combinations of the Gascoignes. This Dutchie of Aquitaine * contained foure Archbishopriks, foure and twenty Bishopriks, fifteen Earledomes, two hundred and two Barons, and about a thousand Captainships and Bailywickes. The losse of so goodly an inheritance which had continued English for almost three hundred yeeres, the world may easily coniecture how iustly it was greeued and lamented for. In this false estate of the English, the Queene vpon the thirteenth day of October was deliuered of her first sonne who was named Edward, prouing the child of sorrow and infelicity.

* Sarres.

(61) It were to be wished we might now rather number the following euils of England, then describe them; for what can we learne out of such vnnaturall and sauage destructions, but matter of horrour and detestation? but sith they must be handled, (the law and necessitie of our taske exacting it,) the sooner to be quit of so vnpleasing obiects, it will bee best abruptly to thrust into the narration. The Duke of Yorke (wickedlie careless of an Oath so religiouslie and publikely taken,) to make his way to the Crowne more easie, hath now procured his chiefe and most fearefull enemie the Duke of Sommerset to be sodeinely arrested of high treason, (doubtfull whether by any authority but his owne) in the Queenes great Chamber, and sent to the Tower of London, vpon pretence that he had capitall matter to charge him with. Yorkes principall friends (vpon confidence of whom he dared so high things) were Richard Neuil Earle of Salisburie second sonne of Ralfe Neuil Earle of Westmerland, whose daughter the Duke of Yorke had married. This Richard was Earle of Salisbury in right of Alice his wife, sole heire to Thomas Montacute, the famous Earle, slaine at the siege of Orleance. The Dukes other maine hope was Richard Neuil (sonne of the former Richard Neuill,) who in right of his wife, the Lady Anne (sole sister, and heire of the whole blood to Henry Beauchamp, Duke of Warwick) was by this King Henry the sixth created Earle of Warwick in a most vnhappie houre both for the King & kingdome, being * inuicti animi &c: a man of an vndaunted mind, but flitting faith.

(62) The

(63) The King in the meane ſpace, while the Duke of Sommerſet was thus endangered, lay ſicke; and Yorke (as Regent) ſwayed and ouerſwayed in Court; but when the king (perceiuing malice and practiſe to be the chiefe baſes of Yorkes accuſations) had recouered his health, and reſumed the gouernment, Sommerſet is ſet at liberty and made Captaine of Calleis; Yorke and his adherents repaire to open force: They leuy their armie about the Marches of Wales, with which they repaire toward London, the maine obiect of Pretendents. The King hearing of his enemies approach, is accompanied with Humfrey Duke of Buckingham, Edmund Duke of Sommerſet, Humfrey Earle of Stafford, Henry Percie Earle of Northumberland, Iames Butler Earle of Wiltſhire, and Ormond, Beaufort Earle of Dorcet, Iaſper Theder Earle of Pembroke the Kings halfe-brother, Thomas Courtney Earle of Deuonſhire, the Lords Clifford, Sudley, Berners, Roſſe and others, and with them enters into Saint Albans in warlike manner, hauing certaine thouſands of common ſouldiers. Thither alſo the Duke of Yorke and his adherents came. This was toward the end of May: The Dukes requeſt to the King was, that he would deliuer ſuch perſons to be deſeruedly puniſhed as he would name. The King (to let them know who he was) returnes this confident anſwere. That hee and the reſt were Traitors, and that rather then they ſhould haue any Lord from him who was with him at that time, hee himſelfe would for their ſake in the quarrell vpon that day liue and die.

(64) The Yorkiſts hereupon aſſaile the Kings people within the Towne, and Warwicke breaking in through a Garden, a ſharpe battell is begun. The loſſe fell lamentably vpon King Henries ſide; for beſides the Duke of Sommerſet, there were ſlaine the Earles of Northumberland and Stafford, the L. Clifford, with ſundry worthy Knights and Eſquiers, of which forty and eight were buried in Saint Albans, there being ſlaine aboue fiue thouſand of K. Henries party, and of the Yorkiſts about ſixe hundreth. The King himſelfe was ſhot into the neck with an arrow; & other of his chief friends were likewiſe ſore wounded and taken. The Earle of Wiltſhire, and Thomas Thorpe, Lord chiefe Baron of the Exchequer, with others ſaued themſelues by flight. The Duke of Yorke, the Earles of Salisbury and Warwicke with the King, (whome they in ſhew did vſe moſt reuerently, and as if they had meant nothing vnto him but good faith) vpon the morrow ride to London, where in Iuly immediately following, a Parliament is holden in King Henries name. The fore-runner whereof was a Comet, or blazing ſtarre, which appeared in the moneth of Iune, the beams whereof extended themſelues into the ſouth. The firſt popular act of this aſſembly, was to reſtore the memory of Humfrey Duke of Gloceſter to honour, declaring him to haue beene a true ſubiect to the King and Realme.

(65) The next prouiſions which the Yorkiſts made, were for themſelues, and their owne ſecurity, willing and commanding that the Duke of Yorke & his partakers ſhould incur no blame by reaſon of the iourney at Saint Albans: the whole fault whereof was laid vpon the dead Duke of Sommerſet, the Lord Chiefe Baron, and one William Ioſeph Eſquier, who (ſay they) kept from the King a pacificatory letter which the Duke of Yorke had ſent. It is a wonder and a ſhame to reade how officiouſly theſe violent Lords (meaning nothing leſſe) behaued themſelues to the King, of whoſe maieſty they will needs ſeeme to be the onely Champions and conſeruators. The Duke of Yorke in the ſame Parliament creates himſelfe Protector of England, the Earle of Salisbury is made Lord Chancellour, and the Earle of Warwicke (his ſonne) Captaine of Caleis: they ſpared as yet to touch King Henries life, becauſe the people did wonderfully honour, eſteeme, and reuerence him for his ſingular holineſſe, and for that he had great friends left aliue, and a ſonne. In the meane ſpace, that they might without trouble, and at their pleaſure, vncrowne or kill him, they by little and little diſplaced the ancient Counſellors, and ſubſtituted their aſſured fauourites. Another Act of that abſolute force and fraud, which they exerciſed in this dreadfull perturbation of all things, was the drawing of Iohn Holland Duke of Exceſter out of Sanctuarie at weſtminſter, conuaying him to Pomfret Caſtle in the North.

(66) Henry Beauford Duke of Sommerſet, (ſonne of the former) the Duke of Buckingham, (whoſe ſonne and heire the Earle of Stafford was ſlaine at S. Albans) and other the Kings friends, perceiuing whereunto this faire ſhew tended, conſult with the Queene at Greenewich concerning her husbands danger, and how to preuent it. Hereupon the Duke of Yorke is diſplaced from the Protectorſhip, a ridiculous title to be aſſumed, where the king was aged about fiue and thirtie, and had no other fault or vnfitnes, but that he was too good to liue among them. The Earle of Salisbury was alſo depriued of his Lord Chancellorſhip.

(67) The King hauing thus recouered his dignity and authoritie, but not ſufficient meanes to ſuppreſſe his dangers, the French take courage at our inteſtine diuiſions, and landing at Sandwich with fifteene thouſand men (part of their forces) they kill the Maior, Bailifs, and other Officers of that Towne, with ſundrie Gentlemen of the Countrey, ſpoile all they could lay hand vpon, and among all they rob two great veſſels laden with merchandiſe, which lay there bound for London and departed. Another part of them, burnes Foway and certaine other townes in Deuonſhire. On the other ſide the Scots hoſtillie entred into Northumberland, but vpon notice that the Duke of Yorke approached with a power, they returned, hauing not as yet done any great harme.

(68) Theſe indignities and loſſes might haue vnited the diſioined affections of true Engliſh hearts, which was greatly deſired by ſuch as loued their Countrey: For which purpoſe the King, Queene, and their chiefe friends, being at Couentrie, the Duke of Yorke, the Earles of Salisbury and Warwicke are ſent for by the Kings letters vnder his priuie Seale, to giue their attendance, whither they come, but they (either warned of ſome plot contriued againſt them, or fearing it, or faining to feare) ſodeinely leaue the Court, without leaue, the Duke departing to Wigmore in the Welſh marches, the Earle of Salisburie to his Caſtell of Midleham in the North-Countrey, and the Earle of Warwicke to Calleis, whoſe bodies though thus diuided, their mindes continued moſt firmely factionated. But the King (a patterne of Chriſtian* goodnes) being tender ouer the generall eſtate of his Countrey, and wonderfully deſirous to reconcile differences among his ſubiects, that they might the better withſtand their imminent forrein enemies, returnes to London there to conſult how to effect his holy wiſhes. The great Lords are perſwaded to *meete there; which they did; but yet not without ſtore of followers, for the Duke brought with him fourehundred men, the Earle of Salisburie fiue hundreth, the Earle of Warwicke ſixe hundreth: The Dukes of Exceſter and Sommerſet eight hundreth, the Earle of Northumberland, the Lords Egremond and Clifford fifteene hundreth. This was the faſhion of that ſwording age.

(69) In March the king and Queene with a very roiall company alight at Weſtminſter, to accompliſh, if it were poſſible this charitable and neceſſary worke of attonement and reconciliation. Godfrey Bolein was at that time Lord Maior of London, (being the anceſtor of two renowned and vertuous Queenes of England, Anne ſecond wife to King Henry the eight, and Elizabeth their daughter,) through whoſe great vigilancie and prouidence, the City ſtood ſo well guarded, that the Kings peace was dutifullie kept, notwithſtanding the great Lords of both the factions (Yorkiſts and Lancaſtrians,) were with ſo great troupes of followers lodged within, and about the ſame: for during the whole time of their abode he had *fiue thouſand Citizens in Harneſſe, himſelfe riding daily about the City and ſuburbs, to ſee the publike quiet preſerued: and for the night watch there were aſsigned to three Aldermen two thouſand corſlet-men.

*Rob. Fab. Chro.

(69) During this watch, a great Councell was holden by the King and Lords, where at length by the diligent trauaile, good exhortation, and prudent aduiſe of the Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury, and of other learned and godly Prelates, the parties offended were induced to a communication, and afterward to a finall accord: the points whereof, conſidering they held ſo ſhort a while, (for as *one ſaith truly, the diſsimuled loue day hung but by a ſmall threed) it were friuolous to dwell in their rehearſall. The King himſelfe (a ſingular teſtimonie of the opinion which all parties had of his integritie) was whole arbitrator of their differences. Certaine ſatisfactions were awarded to be made by the Duke of Yorke, with the Earles of Warwicke and Salisbury, for the death of Edmund Duke of Sommerſet, and others ſlaine at S. Albans. And the ſame Duke of Sommerſet, the Earle of Northumberland, and Lord Clifford (ſlaine in that battell by the Yorkiſts) are declared for true liegemen to the King at the day of their deathes, aſwell as the Duke of Yorke, the Earles of Warwicke and Saliſburie. So both parts ſtand iuſti fide and recti in curia. Many other articles and awards were made, to ſolder and glue together their alienated harts and affections. The reioicement cauſed by this ſeeming peace (which on the behalf of the kings perſō was vndoubtedly ſincere and true) was wonderfully great among all good Engliſhmen, who flocked to the publike celebration thereof. For vpon our *Ladies day in Lent, a ſolemne proceſſion was made within the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul in London, where the King (adorned with Crowne and robes of maieſtie) went in perſon, before whom went hand in hand the Duke of Sommerſet, and the Earle of Salisburie, the Duke of Exceſter, and the Earle of Warwicke, and ſo of either faction one and one, and behind the King himſelfe, came the Queene and Duke of Yorke with great familiarity in all mens ſights. O religion, ô honour, ô ſinceritie, that your diuine vertue ſhould not haue contained theſe ſpirits in the harmonie of ſweet obedience; but if you could not, what alas ſhould? England muſt be more ſeuerely ſcourged, then that ſo goodly a bleſsing of publike reconciliation ſhould continue, whereby the proud tops of her nation (offenſiue to God and men) being taken off, the way might be opened to other names or races, which as yet were nothing thought on.

The quarrels ended by the Kings award with ſhew of common liking.

*Martii. 25.

(70) There is no reaſon to doubt, but that the Duke of Yorke (a man of deepe retirement in himſelfe) ſecretly continued his purpoſe for the Crowne, notwithſtanding all theſe his verniſhed pretences, and did only therfore not as then put for it, becauſe he preſumed the time was incommodious. Againe the Queene (true head and life of the contrary part) aſwell in regard of her ſelfe, her husband, and young ſonne, may in likelihood be thought to haue laid downe any thing, rather then the wakefulneſſe and iealouſie, which former perils and the enemies preſent ſtrength might worthily keepe aliue in her. The thinne aſhes therefore, which couered theſe glowing coles, were thus againe firſt vnraked and ſet to blaze.

The probable condition of things after the reconcilement.

(71) The King and manie of the Lords, ſtill being at Weſtminſter, there hapned (or perhaps * was plotted) a fray betweene one of the Kings ſeruants and a follower of the Earle of Warwicke, who hurt the Kings ſeruant. Hereupon his fellowes of all ſorts (as Cookes with their ſpits &c:) in great diſorder aſſaile the Earle himſelfe, as he was comming from the Councell, and had there ſlaine him, but that the euill fate of England and his owne, reſerued him to doe and ſuffer greater miſchiefes. The Earle hardly gets to his Barge, and reputing all things vnſure about the King, gets ouer to his place at Calleis. The Yorkiſts directly charge the Queene with this, as with a plot drawne for the Earles deſtruction. Not long after this, the young Duke of Sommerſet is ſent Captaine to Calleis. Warwicke will reſigne no roome, notwithſtanding the Kings command, alleaging he was made by Parliament: Sommerſet is reiected with danger to his perſon. Warwicke partly maintains himſelfe, and ſuch as ſtucke to him in that charge, with ſpoiles which he got at Sea; How lawfullie it appeares not; though Warwicke is ſaid to haue been Admirall by Patent, though now reuoked. The Ordinarie bookes haue, that he, with foureteene ſaile of men of warre, ſet vpon three Caricks of Gene or Genoa, and two of Spaine, greater then the Caricks: three of which Merchant-fleete (which how they ſhould be lawfull prize, we ſee not) he vanquiſhed after two daies fight, with the loſſe of about an* hundreth men of his owne, and a thouſand of theirs: The bootie was worth, at meane rates ten thouſand pounds; ſuch alſo as followed the Duke of Sommerſet comming into his hands, he beheaded at Calleis. Theſe were ſtrange darings in the Earle of Warwicke; whom yet the vnskilfull, and drunken multitude ſo highly praiſe: but what are theſe in regard of them which will preſentlie follow?

* Rob. Felix who alſo reports a much greater number of Merchants ſhips.

(72) The Duke of Yorke in the meane time, and Warwicke with his father, the Earle of Salisbury (the Triumuirs of England) conſult of their affaires: Saliſburie is reſolued with ſword in hand to expoſtulate the danger and iniury offered to his ſonne at Weſtminſter. The Queene (a Lady of incomparable magnanimity and foreſight) confident in this, that now King Henry, or the Duke of Yorke muſt periſh, and that one Kingdome was not wide enough for both their Families, beſtirres her ſelfe to maintaine the poſſeſſion of a Crowne, and to aduance to the ſame her owne fleſh and bloud Prince Edward, by ruining his houſe, whoſe whole building conſiſted of Lancaſtrian beneficence. She conſults, ſhe ſends, ſhe ſpeakes, ſhe giues, and ſtrengthneth her ſelfe with friends on all ſides, chiefly in Cheſhire, cauſing her ſonne to diſtribute ſiluer ſwannes (his badge or deuiſe) to all the Gentlemen of that County, and to many other through England. Salisbury ſets forward from his Caſtell at Middleham with foure or fiue thouſand men. Iames Touchet, Lord Audeley encounters him vnaduiſedly vpon Blore-heath neere Muckelſtone. The fight was long and bloudy, but in the end K. Henries euill fortune gaue the better of the day to the Earle of Salisbury, where, beſides the valiant Lord Audeley himſelfe, were ſlaine not fewer then two thouſand and foure hundreth, but the chiefe loſſe fel vpon the Cheſhire men, who ware the Princes Liuerie.

(73) The Earle of Salisbury in this ſort opened to himſelfe a way to Ludlow, where the head of their combination, Richard Duke of Yorke, buſied himſelf to gather forces: being met, they conclude, that ſeeing the matter was now become deadly, they would deale in cloudes no longer, but fight it out to the extremity. Men are drawne out of all parts with large hopes & promiſes of ſharing in their fortunes, and the Earle of Warwicke bringing with him from Caleis (which he left with his friends) that valiant Captaine Andrew Trolop, and a band of ſtout and choiſe Souldiers, comes to the generall Rendeuou of the Yorkiſts, the Caſtell of Ludlow. The King in the meane ſpace, (and not before it was need and time) hath aſſembled a great puiſſance of faithfull Subiects, and being * attended with the Dukes of Sommerſet and Exceſter, and other of his chiefe friends marcheth againſt his enemies. His firſt worke was, to offer them generall pardon. It is refuſed, and called by them a ſtaffe of reede, or glaſſe Buckler. The ſword muſt decide the quarrels; whereupon the king commands his Standards to aduance: while he was in his March, *a letter fraught with the wonted wonted hypocrisies) is deliuered to the King. There are in it among many other insinuations these also: Most Christian King, right high and Mighty Prince, and our most dread Soueraigne Lord, &c. Wee sent vnto your good grace by the Prior of the (Cathedral) Church (of Worcester) and diuers other Doctors, and among other by M. William Linwood doctor of Diuinity, which ministred vnto vs seuerally the blessed Sacrament of the body of Iesus, whereupon wee and euery of vs deposed of our said truth and duty.

(74) Thus these prophane and ambitious men play with God, who in the end will seuerely bee auenged on them for their impietie: but the letter made no ouerture of any course, vpon which they would yeeld to lay downe Armes, alleadging, they wold but make their way to the king for redresse of abuses, & that they were enforced to stand together for their own defence, against such great Courtiers and Fauourites, as (say they) intended their destruction; meaning indeed such persons whose vigilancy and manhood might protect and guard him from their practise and violence. The King is now in sight, whom the Triumuirs Yorke, Warwicke and Salisbury being strongly entrenched before Ludlow,* meane to assaile. Andrew Trollop (who had in the Kings pay done great seruice vpon the French) was acquainted with all their counsell, and finding himselfe extreamely deceiued, (for hee thought and so by the Earle of Warwicke was made to believe, that the preseruation of the King was intended, and not destruction) abandons the Yorkists Campe at midnight, & with a choise number of trusty men presents himselfe and seruices to the King, who graciouslie receiued him and his. The truth of the Triumuirates plot, and bottome of their conspiracies was thus made clearely knowne: The Yorkists vpon notice of Trollops act, despairing of successe, at that present flie. The Duke of Yorke with the Earle of Rutland his yonger son into Ireland, the Earle of March his eldest sonne and heire, Warwicke and Salisbury, with much difficultie escape to Caleis, which place (as * one saith probably) if Henry had in time taken from his enemies, they had without question beene forthwith irrecouerably ruined.

(75) The multitude which serued vnder Yorke found mercy, but their Tenants were many of them executed, maimed, or generally ransackt. The town of Ludlow it selfe was spoiled to the bare wals, and Dutchesse of Yorke depriued of all her goods. What lesse could bee the effects against the friends of such aduersaries, vpon so publike an act and aduantage? The point is followed more sharpely vppon the great Offenders in the next Parliament which was holden at Couentree: there Richard Duke of Yorke, Edward Earle of March, Richard Earle of Warwicke, Edmund Earle of Rutland, Richard Earle of Salisbury, Alice Countesse of Salisbury (in whose right her husband was Earle) two or three Lords, 9. Knights, and certaine other, were openlie of high Treason attainted, and their whole estates confiscated.

(76) Caleis, a most important piece, being in the meane space violently possest by Warwicke, the Duke of Sommerset, the Lords Rosse and Audley, are sent with forces to take it; their successe was euill, for the Duke was glad to flie, his Souldiers were robbed by Warwicks men of their harnesse, the Lord Audley is taken into the Towne, and the Lord Roos hardly escaped. Letters are hereupon written into forraine parts, entreating * that no relieue bee ministred to the Traitors who kept Caleis against the King, and all men are at home forbidden to transport any victuall or refreshment thither. Euident it is, that the Councel of England rather wished that the Town and Castel had beene French againe, then as it was; neither therein erred they, for it could not be so mischieuous to the maine of their cause, as now it was. The Duke of Sommerset being in Guines, a neighour Castle, doth daily by his Souldiers skirmish with the Caliseans: Warwicke meditates other things. Hee must speake with the Duke of Yorke, at whose commandement all Ireland (where hee abode) seemed to be readie; but is aduertised that the King had certaine shippes, which lay at Sandwich to transport supplies and succours to the Duke of Sommerset. Hee meanes not to leaue such a perill behind him vnremoued; hauing therefore espied his time, hee wils his people to slippe ouer in the night to Sandwich, which they accordingly did, tooke the Lord Riuers, and his son Anthony Wooduile prisoners, and brought away all the shippes, except one called Grace de Dieu: one Sir Baldwine Fulford Knight, hauing (after this) assumed to doe seruice vpon the Earle of Warwicke, and to take him, returnes empty. Warwicke sailes now to Ireland. The King makes the Duke of Exceter Admirall, and giues him commission to apprehend the Earle of Warwicke. The Duke with a great naue puts forth to Sea from Sandwich. Behold the ill carriage of things. At Dertmouth many of his Souldiers, pretending want of money and victuals, forsake him. Meanewhile the Earle of Warwicke passeth by the Duke, not daring to assaile him, nor he willing to assaile the Duke, for that hee was Admirall and of the Kings bloud. Such was the act and cunning of the Yorkists to pretend reuerence vnto that, which most of all they thirsted to shed: Fiue hundreth fresh souldiers attend at Sandwich to bee shipt ouer to the Duke of Sommerset for safe-conducting him into England. Warwickes men sodainely come vpon them, slew Montfort their Captaine, and many other, and disarmed the rest. Such was the distracted estate of our poore Country at this time, through the pride and restlesse ambition of one or two vnhappy men. But though nothing was more plaine then that the Duke of Yorke sought the crown of England; yet nothing is truer, then that they as yet pretended nothing lesse for the veneration of King Henries purity of life, would haue preuailed with the people greatly to their preiudice.

The Earle of Warwickes men take the Lord Riuers and some of the Kings Nauie at Sandwich.

The King arms to Sea, but cannot take the Earle, who returns from Ireland to Caleis.

(77) The King failing thus to obtaine the person of Warwicke, or his Towne of Caleis, the Yorkists send ouer certaine Articles into Kent, in which (as if they were the onely Patriots and best Subiects of the world) they complaine of certaine generall enormities concerning iniuries done to the Church, and the ill ministration of iustice, abuse of purueyers and takers, the Kings pouerty by the corruption of his officers, and the like plausible stuffe: where they speake of the King, they sequester him from all exception, as being of so noble, so vertuous, so righteous, and so blessed dispositon: (these are their words and the truth) as any Prince earthly. Where they speake of their enemies, (that is, the Kings principall friends and faithfull subiects) they name the Earle of Salisbury, the Earle of Wiltshire, and the Lord Beaumont which must euer bee an honour to their memories, and put the blame (if it were blame-worthy) of such attaindors which were enacted against the Yorkists at Couentree, vpon these three Lords specially. Where they speake of themselus & their intentions, they professe al sincerity and loyaltie to King Henry, and that they onelie meant, to come vpon their guard to speake with him concerning the common-wealth, and their owne safeties, and that now they would attempt the same againe, in the name of the Land, and not to suffer such mischiefes to raigne vpon them. The conclusion of their cunning and painted pretences hath these fained holy words: Requiring you (the people) on Gods behalfe, and praying you in your owne, therein to assist vs, doing alway the duety of Liegemen in our persons to our said Soueraigne Lord, to his estate, prerogatiue and preheminence, and to the surety of his most noble person, whereunto wee haue euer beene, and will bee as true as any of his Subiects aliue: whereof we call God, our Lady Saint Marie, and all the Saints in heauen, to witnesse, and record. But of the thing it selfe (that is to Crowne the Duke of Yorke) they make not the least mention: what wanted in these men to the height and depth of humane malice? They preuaile with the multitudes; a shallow braind, but a great great and many headed beast. The Lord Fawconbridge is sent to sound their affections, and to draw the purulent matter to an head: he finds great forwardnesse. The Earles of March, Warwicke and Salisburie aduertised of all things, land in Kent. But the people onely were not deluded; for Thomas Bourchier Archbishoppe of Canterbury, and other graue men, beleeued they meant sooth; which that they might the rather doe, the Earle of Warwicke made open oath vpon the Crosse of Canterbury, that they had euer borne true faith and alleagiance to King Henry. A strange humor in the English, that could neither brooke bad nor benigne Princes. The King had before their comming quit the City of London, as not greatly trusting the affections which the people thereof bare toward such as the Yorkish faction had made odious about him, and appointed the Rendeuow of his forces at Northampton where he abode. The enemy (shewing friend) aduanceth thither. It is a shame to reade that some of the great Prelates would simply bee drawne to countenance such an enterprise: but their intentions were different; they hoped to reconcile enmities, the Earles, to make Yorke King. Meanewhile their complices labour to take the Tower of London, within which there were for King Henry these loyall Nobles. The Lord Scales, Hungerford, Vescie, Louel, Delaware, and Candal a Gascoigne with sundry others.

The Earle of Warwicke lends his side an Oath.

(78) At Northampton things were carried thus: The King meaning there to abide his aduersaries, when it was not thought meete to admit the Earle of Warwicke to his presence, (which thing was colourably sued for to raise a ground of iustification for battell) they prepare on both parts. The Earles of March and Warwicke (with like or greater cunning, then they had desired admission to the Kings speech) let cry through the field, that no man should lay hand vpon the King, nor common people, but vpon the Lords, Knights and Esquiers.

(79) The hoasts ioyne. No stroke they gaue but seemes to wound vs also. Let vs swiftly turne our eyes from so vnnaturall slaughters. The * L. Grey of Ruthen began the discomfiture of the Kings side, for hee (let the world iudge with what commendation,) hauing the point, did quit his place and fled to the Earles. The kings armie is defeated, and vterlie broken. Many were slaine and drowned. Polydor and Grafton say ten thousand: The chiefe of the Nobles who there lost their liues, were the Duke of Buckingham, Iohn Earle of Shrewsburie (a * most hopefull young Gentleman, and in all points like his heroicke Ancestors) Iohn Vicount Beaumont, Thomas, Lord Egremond, and among sundry other prime men, * Sir William Lucie, who making hast to the fight, was vpon his first approach chopt downe with an axe. The Kings Ordinance could not play, there fell so great a raine.

*Stowes Annals. who varieth in many circumstances of this battell from some other writers

* Polyd. Verg. Graft. Chron.

(80) This wofull battell was fought vpon the * ninth of Iuly. The King (as a man borne to all calamities and miseries, though he not therefore the lesse, but the more happy through that excellent fortitude of mind, with which hee inuincibly sustained them) comes into his enemies hands; but the Queene and the Prince, and the remains of their scattered fortunes flie into the North, there to reenforce their powers, and to * subdue (as shee caused them to be proclamed) the Kings Rebels and enemies. The Tower of London after this misfortune renders it selfe. The Lord Scales is wickedly murthered vpon the Thames by Wherrimen, belonging to the Earle of Warwicke, as hee intended to passe to * Sanctuary at Westminster. The Earles when they were possessed of the King, continued their admirable hypocrisies (which God will terribly plague them for) thereby to leade the people on, and had to him these words.

* Stowes Annal.

(81) Most noble Prince, displease you not, though it hath pleased God of his grace to grant vs the victorie of our mortall enemies, who by their venemous maliee haue vntruly stirred and moued your Highnesse to exile vs out of the land, and would haue put vs to finall shame, and confusion: wee come not to vnquiet or grieue your said Highnesse, but to please your noble person, desiring tenderly the high welfare and prosperity thereof, and of all your Realme, and to be your true Liegemen while our liues shall endure. Our soules are amazed at these arts, and men blush to publish to the world things so vnworthy.

The Earls words to the King.

(82) The * Florentine Secretary was scarse borne at this time, but the Diuell was as great a Master then as afterward. The King and Earles in the meane time goe to London, where a Parliament was summoned in his name to be holden in October following. The Duke of Yorke (aduertised of his victorie) speedes from Dublin, the chiefe City of Ireland, to bee at that Parliament, where wee shall at last see the true face of his purpose, his owne selfe taking away the maske which hitherto concealed it.

* Machiauel.

(83) Scotland, by reason of late affinity with the house of Beaufort, whose chiefe and toppe was the Duke of Sommerset, (descended from Iohn Duke of Lancaster by the Lady Katherine) was a speciall backe, and Second to King Henry in all his tempestuous aduersities; but now that refuge was also hazarded: for King Iames the second, partly in fauour of King Henry, and partly as making vse of the troubles in England, laieth siege to Rocksbrough (Bellenden the Scot calleth the same Castle * Marchmont) being in the custody of King Henries enemies, where while himselfe (whose * skill and delight in shooting of Ordinance was great) comming down the trenches to see the * Lion (a new great piece which had lately beene cast in Flanders) and the other Artillery discharged, one of them brake, and with a shiuer thereof slew the king, and dangerously wounded the Earle of Angus. This vnhappy accident hapned vpon a Sunday, the * third day of August. The Queen of Scotland neuertheless maintaineth the siege, and aswell obtaines that place, as the Castle of Warke, both which shee (in reuenge) threw to the earth. Iames the third, a child of seuen yeers old succeeded to his father, aswell to the cherishment of the distressed English, as to the Crowne.

(84) The Parliament being begunne, about the * eight of October at Westminster in King Henries name, thither comes with flying speed, Rithard Duke of Yorke, who brake open the Kings lodging Chamber, and placed himselfe therein, suffering the King to prouide elsewhere. Then makes hee his claime to the Crown of England, and publisheth it in open Parliament together with his pedigree. The whole house (such among them excepted as were priuie to the Dukes intention) was * greatly dismayed both for that hee did set himselfe in the Kings seate, and for this his vnexpected challenge: But the Duke though at first hee greatly meant to haue deposed King Henry, and with speed to bee crowned himselfe at Alhallontide next, yet finding such amasement and silence, hee sends them his pedigree and his claime in writing, that they might the better consider, yeelding (as it seemes) to be ordered therein, according to their generall agreement during the treaty whereof he would not visite King Henrie, alleadging himselfe was peereless in England. The maine points of his Title were as followeth. King Edward the third had issue, Edward Prince of Wales, William of Hatfield, Lionell Duke of Clarence, Iohn of Gaunt D. of Lancaster, Edmund D. of Yorke, Thomas D. of Gloceſter, and William of Windsor. Edward Prince of Wales dyed, liuing his Father, and left issue Richard the second King of England, who died without Issue: as did also William King Edwards second sonne.

(85) Lionel the third sonne had issue Philip his daughter and heire, married to Edmund Mortimer Earle of March, who had Issue Roger Earle of March, who had Issue Edmund Earle of March, Roger, Anne, and Eleanor, which Edmund, Roger, and Eleanor died without Issue. Anne (the heire of that house) marrieth Richard

Earle

Earle of Cambridge, the ſonne of Edmund Duke of Yorke, fifth ſonne to King Edward the third, which Earle of Cambridge had Richard commonly (ſaith the Booke,) called Duke of Yorke.

(86) Iohn of Gaunt the fourth ſon and younger brother to Lionel, had Iſſue Henry, who immediately after King Richards reſignation, vnrighteouſly (ſaith the Booke) entred vpon the ſame, for that Edmund Earle of March, ſonne of Roger Earle of March, and of Philip daughter and heire of the before ſaid Lionel Duke of Clarence, elder brother to Iohn Duke of Lancaſter was then aliue, and that aſwell the ſaid Henry, eldeſt ſon to Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, as his deſcendents haue hitherto holden the Crowne of England, &c. vniuſtly, for that himſelfe the ſaid Richard Plantagenet Duke of Yorke was the lawfull heire, being the ſonne of Richard Plantagenet Earle of Cambridge, and of Anne before ſaid.

(87) This was the effect of the Duke of Yorks title, which for the points of the Pedegree was very true, though in barre thereof the friends of King Henry (without denying any part of the premiſes, being all of them more euident then that they could be honeſtly denied) had not a little to ſay for him: for they could among other things alleadge, that Richard the ſecond reſigned vp his Crowne and Regality at large; and that none elſe making claime but Henry Duke of Lancaſter, hee was thereunto by the conſent of all the three Eſtates admitted; that Richard Earle of Cambridge was for high Treaſon attainted and executed, and his Iſſue made incapable of any inheritance, that this Richard his ſonne now challenging the Crowne of England, being reſtored by the meere clemency and goodneſſe of this King Henry the ſixt, had voluntarily acknowledged him for his lawfull Soueraigne, and ſworne the ſame, and that the ſaid Richard was finally for treaſon attainted, and adiudged vninheritable: they could hereunto haue added ſundry Acts of Parliament, made to eſtabliſh the right of the Lancaſtrian line, the ſucceſſion of three Kings, all Henries, that is to ſay, the fourth, fifth and ſixth; the politicke addreſſes of the firſt of thoſe Kings, the noble victories of the ſecond, and the holy life of the third; which three Kings liues contained of raigne about threeſcore yeeres, in which number this was the nine and thirtieth of King Henry the ſixth, who was deſcended of the male line, and the Duke of Yorke but of a female: of which female line none had euer been in poſſeſſion of the Crown. Great and weighty points, (if any) and the rather to bee conſidered, for that King Henries perſon beeing (in very truth) Priſoner, no act of his to eſtabliſh Yorkes title could bind in law or conſcience, and the leſſe, for that hee had a wife, and by her a ſonne, who was at liberty, and ready with Armes to free his father, or hazard to deſtroy the whole Engliſh name. But they who on Yorkes behalf) abſtractiuelie diſputed theſe higheſt queſtions, knew a rule of law, which ſaith, Iura ſanguinis nullo iure ciuili dirimi poſſunt; and the Lancaſtrians were not without their ſpeculatiue and remote conſiderations, to countenance the particulars of their cauſe. Thus we ſee that in Monarchies (though the nobleſt forme of Regiment) where lineall ſucceſſion is the rule of inheritance, there ſometimes fall out as great and as indeterminable difficulties, as where Election deſigneth the Succeſſor: whereof the French tragedies which our Nation made among them, and now theſe in England, are without all exception, the moſt fearefull inſtances. For France had heretofore her time of affliction, but now (O deareſt England) it was thine.

(88) While this weighty controuerſie was debated, a Crowne which hung for garniſhment in the middle of the roofe, where the Knights and Burgeſſes of the Parliament met to conſult, and the crown which for like cauſe ſtood vpon the higheſt Tower of Douer Caſtell, * fell ſodainely down, which were vulgarly conſtrued * to portend That the raigne of K. Henry was at an end, and that the Crown ſhould be tranſferred from one royall line to another. But the Queene, her ſonne Prince Edward, and her faſt friends in the North (the ſeate of their hopes) being nothing diſcouraged at their late ill fortunes, prepare all the forces they can to recouer K. Henrie and the Kingdome; which thing whiles they are purſuing; the concluſion of the Parliament concerning the crown, was, That Henry the ſixth ſhould raigne, and bee King during his life, the remainder to reſt in Richard Duke of Yorke, and the lawfull heires of his body in generall tayle, King Henries heires to bee extluded. The Duke in the meane time is proclaimed heire apparant, and called Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, Earle of Cheſter, and Protector of England. The agreement was engroſſed, ſealed and ſworn vnto. The Queene will haue nothing to doe in this bargaine, being ſo dangerous and preiudicious to her ſelfe, her husband, and her ſonne; and therefore when the King (at the Duke of Yorkes inſtigation) ſent for her to repaire vnto him, ſhee relying vpon the Dukes of Sommerſet and Exceſter, and other the Kings friends, vtterly refuſeth: Henry continueth king. The Armes therefore, which ſhe taketh for his deliuerance, haue the more iuſtice. The Duke of Yorke miſſing the prey hee expected, leaues the king with the Duke of Norfolke, and the Earle of Warwicke at London; himſelfe with the Earles of Salisbury and Rutland, and certaine forces, * ſetteth forward to Wakefield to purſue the Queene and her ſonne, ſending direction to the Earle of March that hee ſhould follow with all his power. The Caſtell of Sandall ſtandeth pleaſantly vpon a ſmall hill, in view of the faire town of Wakefield; there the Duke of Yorke (comming thither vpon Chriſtmas Eue) repoſeth himſelfe, and expecteth the encreaſe of his numbers. The Queene aduertiſed, thinkes it wiſdome to fight before the Duke grow too ſtrong; and thereupon marcheth forward, hauing an Army of eighteene thouſand men, led by the Dukes of Sommerſet and Exceſter, the Earles of * Deuonſhire and * Wiltſhire, the Lords Neuill, Clifford, Roſſe, and in effect all the Northerne Nobility. The hoſt (or ſo much thereof as they thought neceſſary to ſhew) preſents it ſelfe before Sandall, to prouoke and dare the Duke to battell. His bloud impatient of theſe braues, & ignorant perhaps that the enemy had ſo great a multitude, will needes fight, though the Earle of Salisbury, and Sir Dauid Hall (an ancient ſeruant of his, and a great Souldier) gaue him aduiſe to ſtay, till his ſonne (the Earle of March) approched with ſuch Welſhmen and Marchers, as hee had in great numbers aſſembled. But God would forbeare him no longer, but like a ſeuere Maſter meanes to take a preſent account: at which he found whether all the kingdomes of the earth are worth the leaſt ſinne, much leſſe a wilfull periurie.

(89) The Queene therefore addeth ſtratageme, and wit to her force, to the entent hee might not eſcape her hands; whereupon the Earle of Wiltſhire vpon one ſide of the hill, and the Lord Clifford vpon the other, lie in ambuſh to thruſt between him and the Caſtell; the Dukes of Sommerſet and Exceter, ſtand embattelled in the open field. Their policy had the wiſhed ſucceſſe; for the Duke being not fully fiue thouſand ſtrong, iſſueth out of the Caſtle downe the hill. The battels which ſtood in front, ioyne furiouſly, when ſodainly the Duke of Yorke ſees himſelfe incloſed, and although hee expreſſed great manhood, yet within one halfe houre, his whole Armie was diſcomfited, himſelfe and diuers his deare friends beaten downe and ſlaine. There lay dead about him the Lord Harington, Sir Thomas Neuill ſonne to the Earle of Salisburie, Sir Dauid Hal, with ſundry Knights and others about two thouſand, & two hundred; among which were the heires of many Southern gentlemen of great account, whoſe * bloud was ſhortly after reuenged. Let vs not linger vpon the particular accidents of this battell, but conſider what it wrought for King Henries aduancement; yet theſe few things are not to bee vnremembred. (90) That mercileſſe propoſition was common (as the euent will ſhew) to either faction. The Duke of Yorkes head, crowned with paper, is preſented to the Queene. Cruell ioy is ſeldome fortunate. Caſar wept ouer Pompeis head, but the Queen (ignorant how manifold cauſes of teares were reſerued for her owne ſhare) makes her ſelfe merrie with that gaſtly and bloody ſpectacle. The Earle of Salisburie, after wounds receiued, being in this battel taken priſoner, is conueighed to Pomfract Caſtle; from whence the common people (who loued him not) *violently haled him, and cut off his head; which perhaps was not done without the good liking of others. A.D. 1461. A.reg.39. The Earle of March purſues his fathers deſignes.

(92) For the Earle of March, ſonne, and heire to this late valiant Duke of Yorke, hearing of this tragicall aduenture, giues not ouer: but, hauing gathered an armie of about twenty thouſand to march againſt the Queene, he findes emploiment neerer hand: being certified, that Iaſper Theder Earle of Pembrooke (halfe-brother to King Henrie) and Iames Butler Earle of Ormond and Wiltſhire, had with them a great force of Welſh and Iriſh to take him. The youthfull and valiant Earle of March, whoſe amiable preſence and carriage made him gratious with the people, (and the rather for that he had the generall good word of *women,) meanes to try his fortune againſt the ſaid Earles. He ſodeinely therefore turnes backe from Shrewsbury, and at a place called Mortimers Croſſe neere Ludlow, where the enemie abode, he ſets vpon them; It was Candlemas day in the morning, at which time there appeared (as ſome write) three Sunnes, which ſodeinely ioined in one. This luckie prognoſticon, and ominous Meteor exceedingly fired the Earle of March, and was (ſome ſay) the reaſon, why he vſed for his Badge, or roiall deuiſe, the Sunne in his full brightneſſe. The Battels maintaine their fight with great furie; but, in the end, the Earle of March obtaines the victorie, killing of his enemies three thouſand, and eight hundreth men; the Earles ſaued themſelues by flight. The ſonne of honour and fortune did thus begin to ſhine through Clouds of blood and miſerie, vpon Edward, whome ſhortly we are to behold King of England. There were taken * Sir Owen Theder (father to Iaſper Earle of Pembrooke,) who was beheaded by Edwards commandement, as alſo Sir Iohn Skudamor knight with his two ſonnes, and other.

(93) The Queene on the other ſide (hauing ordered her affaires in the North, ſetled the eſtate thereof, and refreſhed her people,) within a while after drawes neere with her Northern armie to *S. There came before them an euill fame of their behauiour to London, whoſe wealth lookt pale knowing it ſelfe in danger; for the Northern armie, (in which were Scots, Welſh, and Iriſh aſwell as Engliſh,) made bold by the way with what they liked, making ſmall diſtinction of ſacred or prophane, after they were once paſt the riuer of Trent, Captaine Andrew Trolop being their Coronell. King Henry himſelfe in perſon, with the Dukes of Norfolke and Suffolke, the Earles of Warwicke and Arundel, the Lord Bonuile, & other, with a great puiſſance encampe at S. Albans, to giue the Queene battell, and ſtop her farther paſſage toward London. But the Lords of her faction being ready to attempt on her behalfe, aſſaile the Kings forces within the Town, and after ſome ſharpe affronts, breake through, and driue their aduerſaries out with much bloodſhed, till they fell vpon a ſquadron or battalion of the Kings, wherein there were about foure or fiue thouſand men, which made good their ground for a while with great courage, but in the end the Queenes ſide clearely wanne the day. The common people of London doe notwithſtanding ſtand wholy for the beautifull Earle of March, and ſtand the more confidentlie, becauſe they had ſure intelligence, that he had vanquiſhed the Earle of Pembrooke in the Marches of Wales, and that the Earle of Warwicke, eſcaping from S. Albans, had met with the Earle of March neere Coſtwold, and that both with ioint forces were marching toward London. Theſe newes made the King and Queene retire into the North, and leaue that Citie and the Southern Countreys to their Enemie, till they might recouer a fairer opportunitie or more ſufficiencies. Edward vpon notice of the Kings departure, entreth London, and giues period to Henries reigne, which is accounted to take end after he had ſucceſſiuely ruled this Land the ſpace of thirtie eight yeeres, ſixe moneths, and foure daies.

CHAPTER XVII.

Edward Duke of Yorke and Rich. Earle of Warwick come vnto London.

Dward, borne at Roan in Normandy, and bearing the title of March in England, hauing wunne the battell at Mortimers Croſſe (though the Lords his Confederates had loſt that of Saint Albans) from Ludlow haſted towardes London, & on his way was ſeconded by Richard Neuill, the ſtout Earle of Warwicke, to the great encreaſe of his number and power, which ſo terrified Queene Margaret, now ready to poſſeſſe the South, that with her husband and ſonne, in a perplexed feare, ſhe returned againe into the North; vpon which aduantage Edward now Duke of Yorke, preſently played. For London vnreſolued whether Prince to obey (the one very powerfull, and the other in poſſeſsion) dayly conſulted for their ſafeſt eſtate; when on the ſuddaine Edward with Warwicke entred their gates, whoſe warlike viſages ſo daunted the aduerſe affected, that they beganne with the firſt to make him way to the throne, & the Noblemen likewiſe made him offers of their ſeruice, to eſtabliſh his claime, neither were the Clergy to learne the obſeruance of time, or to ſway with the man vpon whom the world ſmiled. All theſe ſet in Counſell to confer of the ſtate, Duke Edward made knowne his title to the Crowne, and in well ſet termes declared, how the body of the whole Parliament formerly had thereunto conſented, and Henry himſelfe ſubſcribed with his owne hand; whoſe title, though now carried through three deſcents; yet what right Lancaſter had, they all knew, and how inſufficient this laſt man was for rule, France to their diſhonour did witneſſe, where all was loſt through his neglect, whoſe ſimplicity euer minded more his priuate uate deuotions, then the potent managing of a Soueraignes command.

(2) These things vrged (and most of them true) their voices went current, that Edward was the vndoubted King, whereunto the Londoners the sooner yeelded, for that his dreaded Northerne Army was then encamped in Saint Iohns field: neither was any reseruation made (as before) of Henries naturall life, but hee is now absolutely neglected as vnworthy of his Crowne, how acceptable soeuer he had raigned till then, whose following miseries were not so much lamented, as his constant patience was admired in vndergoing the same. Edward thus mounted, before his foot had well touched the first steppe, was vpon Sunday the second of March, among his Northerne Souldiers proclaimed King; William L. Fauconbridge Earle of Kent declaring his claime, and disabling K. Henry of stile or Gouernement, whose weake head (as hee alleadged) had ouer long blemished the English Crowne.

(3) Vpon the next day, with all pompe hee was conueied to Westminster, and set vpon the Kings seat in the Hall, where holding the scepter of Saint Edward in his hand, the voice of the people was againe demanded, and againe granted; such was the hap of vnfortunate Henry, and condition of the multitude euer to dislike the present, and to affect the new: but no interim left to dissuade or attempt, the next day his stile and title was again proclaimed by the name of King Edward the fourth, being the fourth of March and * about the 20. yeere of his age.

(4) These sodain alterations made the richer sort somewhat fearefull, especially, those whose heart stood firm for K. Henry, (who was now in the North new mustering of men) and among those, London afforded many, as King Edwards iealousie suspected, whereof one Walker a substantiall Citizen and Grocer was a sufficient proofe, who for wordes spoken concerning his owne sonne, that hee would make him heyre of the Crowne (meaning his house hauing that Signe) was the eighth day of this Kings raigne apprehended, and beheaded in Smithfield. And albeit his words intended no treason, (the Grocer not once dreaming to touch King Edwards title) yet the time being when the Crowne lay at stake, the tenture of the Law made them his death. This rough beginning moued many to doubt, that they had wronged themselues in wronging King Henry, which opinion was more confirmed in that hee retained * a great summe of money borrowed of the Staplers-Merchants, and disbursed in his affaires, whose restitution he vtterly denyed with an austere commandement to surcease the demand. But hearing how Henry was beloued in the North, & what followers were gathered to recouer him the Crown, vpon the twelfth of March with a complete Armie hee sets forth of London, accompanied with his brethren, and many other Nobles: with whome marching towards Pomfret, he there appoints the Lord Fitzwater to keepe the passage of Ferribrig, omitting no directions of a worthy commander.

(5) King Henry for his part though nothing so warlike, yet thought it best policy to imploy such leaders as desired reuenge against the house of Yorke; such were the Duke of Sommerset, the Earle of Northumberland, and the Lord Clifford, whose fathers had been slaine in the first battell of S. Albans, which last, though in degree the least man, yet sought to raise his fame with the first, and therefore to leaue no attempt vnassayed, hee so sodainely charged vpon the Troupe appointed for Ferribrig, that the L. Fitzwater vnarmed (only with a pollax in his hand) came hastily to the Brigge, thinking a fray had been among his owne Souldiers, where, with the Bastard of Salisbury, hee and many of his men were slaine by the enemie.

(6) The brute of which gust blowne into stout Warwickes eare, hee mounted his Courser, and posting to Edward, puffing, blowing, and almost out of breath, said, Sir I pray God haue mercy on their soules which in the beginning of your enterprize haue lost their liues; I see no succour in the world, but in God, to whom I remit the vengeance. And so alighting, forthwith slew his horse with his sword saying, Let him flie, that flie will, I will tarry with him that will tarrie with me: which hee confirmed by kissing the crosse of his sword, the vsuall complement of couenants made by martiall men. The valiant Lord Fauconbridge fearing lest this beginning would giue an edge to the sequell, got ouer the riuer at Castleford, three miles from the bridge, meaning to inclose the takers vpon their backes, which Clifford perceiuing, sought to auoide, and whether for haste, heate, or paine, put off the gorget he wore, when sodainly an arrow without an head, shot from the Bow of some laide in ambush, pierced through his throat, and stucke in his necke, which set a period vnto his life.

(7) The next day more fatall for Englands bloud, was celebrated with speares in stead of palmes, vsually borne on * that Saboth of Lent, in whose dawning, the Lord Fauconbridge, who commanded the foreward (the Duke of Norfolke being sicke) tooke the field on a plaine, betwixt the townes of Towton and Saxton, where King Edward ioyning his whole forces (being forty eight thousand, and six hundreth sixty persons, as King Henries were also threescore thousand) caused proclamation to bee made, that hee who feared to fight, might forthwith depart, but if any Souldier abiding, should seeke to flie or turn backe, hee should bee slaine by his next fellow, and the slayer to receiue a great reward, besides the stipend of a double pay.

(8) Both Armies ready to ioyne, a small sleet of snow hapned to fall, which with the wind was carried into the face of the Lancastrian host, whereby their sight was much empeached, which aduantage Fauconbridge soone espying, forthwith commanded his Archers to shoot each man a flight, and then to stand without further proffer. The Northern men feeling the arrows, but not seeing the Archers, made haste to acquite them with the like, and shot their whole sheaues of arrowes without intermission, but short of the marke by threescore yeards at the least; which storme being past, and all their store spent, the worthy Fauconbridge aduanced forward, and within reach of his Archers sore galled the enemie, making a double aduantage of what they had done: for their owne quiuers being full, when the others were empty, they gathered vp & shot theirs, against their owne shooters, yet left some of them sticking to gall the legges of their pursuers: by which onely stratagem, as was constantly auerred, the battell and day was lost and wonne.

(9) The fight was bloudy and continued tenne howres, for all being English, acquit themselues English-like, no taking of prisoners, nor looking for ransome, but all to retaine, and to get honour that day; wherein died the Lords Beamont, Neuill, Willoughby, Wells, Scales, Gray, Dacres, Fitzhugh, Beckingham, and Clifford, (who died the day before) the two bastards of Exceter, Knights, Esquiers & Gentlemen a great number, and in all (on both parts) thirty five thousand ninety and one; so that not onely the field lay stained with English blood, but the riuers ran red for a great distance, so markable is this battell of Englands ciuill wars.

(10) Henry, who neuer was victor whersoeuer hee came, hearing this losse which seemed irrecouerable, with his Queene and sonne hasted into Scotland, where, of Iames the young King hee was royally entertained, with comfort of assistance to recouer his estate, in regard whereof he surrendred the strong town Barwicke into the Scots hand, and concluded a marriage betwixt Prince Edward his sonne, and Lady Margaret the sister of the said King. These things thus effected, milde Henry conceiued some new budding hopes, and Queen Margaret his wife, (indeed

A.D. 1461. King Edward crowned.

(11) Victorious Edward, after those his prosperous successes in the North, in triumph returned to London, and the eight & twentith of Iune with great solemnity was Crowned at Westminster, where in S. Peters Church, the next day it was againe most solemnly set on his head, and the third day so Crowned he came to Saint Paules in London, and therein was censed with great applause of the People. In November following a Parliament began, wherein King Henrie, Queene Margaret, and Prince Edward their sonne, were disherited of their right to the Crowne; the Dukes of Exceeter and Sommerset, and the Earle of Deuonshire, with an hundred and forty moe, were attainted also and disherited; so fortune dallieth in setting the dice of her fauours, or frownes.

A.D. 1462. Queene Margaret returned into Scotland.

(12) Queene Margaret stored with men, but in want of money, with her French powers made into Scotland; whose comming was most welcome to the two Kings there, and thence, with great shew of enterprize, hoised her sailes for England, but hauing touched the bay of Tinmouth (whether vpon better aduise, or feared with their owne shadowes,) shee with her French put backe to the Sea, where such a sore tempest tooke them, as had not Queene Margaret in a small Caruell got vnto Barwicke, shee had not liued to vexe the new King, nor seene the vnfortunate losse of her husband, her son, and Realme, nor the miserable calamities of her owne old age; her French by Bastard Ogle were beate into Holy Iland, many slaine, and foure hundred of them put to their ransomes.

(13) This fainting French enterprize, though it dulled the edge of some spirits, yet did it nothing daunt the courage of the Queene, her better hopes being fixed vpon the Scots valour; so, (leauing Prince Edward for safetie in Barwicke,) with her husband and Scots shee entred Northumberland, tooke the Castle of Bamburgh, and so passed forward vnto the Bishopricke, their forces daily increasing through the confluence of such English, as fauoured King Henrie.

King Edward commeth to Yorke.

(14) King Edward hearing these stirres in the North, made his preparation both by Sea and Land, and with his brethren and Nobles came to Yorke, from whence he sent Iohn Neuil Lord Montacute, with a power of men, as somewhat mistrusting the loialties of the Northumbrians, who passing forward, vpon Hegely-Moore was sodeinely encountred by the Lords Hungerford and Roos, with whom was Sir Ralph Percie, a most valiant Knight; but Montacute, accompanied with such as would neither looke backe, nor stand gazing on, abode the encounter, and at the first push put backe the two Lords, and finallie slew the said Percie, who no waies would depart out of the field; but in dying said, I haue saued the birde in my brest, meaning his oath made to King Henrie.

(15) Lord Montacutes Sunne thus mounting in the Horizon, cast forth the rayes of his rising fame, which as he well hoped would higher ascend. And therefore learning by espials, that Henries host lay incamped vpon a plaine called Liuels, neere vnto Hexham by the Water Dowill, he hasted thither, and so valiantly assaulted their Camp, as after great slaughter, in chase were taken Lord Henrie Duke of Sommerset, the Lords, Roos, Mollins, and Hungerford, all which were beheaded, and Sir Ralph Gray, who first solemnly disgraded, his guilt spurres cut from his heeles, by the Master Cooke, his sword broken ouer his head, his Coate armour rent, another reuersed put on by the King at Armes, was so led to his execution. King Henrie himselfe got away (as Stow saith) into Lancashire, where, with some few he liued full hardly in Caues, and vnknowne, more then a yeere, but King Henry put to flight.

(saith Grafton) hee fled into Scotland which is more likelie.

(16) Edward thus cleered of the Cloud threatning storme, thought best ere others did light, to prouide for himselfe, and therefore he raised Bulwarks, built new Fortresses in places of danger, put forth his espials vpon the Marches of Scotland, and commanded that none should keepe Henrie or Margaret in secret, whose sight, he feared, would draw the affections of many, which otherwise stood in case of obedience. But ouer-borne Henrie (whether past al feare, or inforced by destinie) in disguised apparell past into England, where he was soone apprehended by one Cantlow; but Stow saith by Thomas Talbot in Cletherwood besides Bungerley Hippingstones in Lancashire, being betraied in Waddington Hall as he sate at dinner, and thence brought to London with his legs bound to the stirrups, arrested by Warwicke, his guilt spurres taken off, and committed Prisoner to the Tower of London.

(17) The Lyon thus pent, his pawes cut or pared, and Queene Margaret in France with her father Reiner; King Edward now quiet set his minde vpon Gouernment for the good of his Realme. In his Court of Kings Bench he vsed to sit in person certaine daies together, to see how his lawes proceeded with Iustice; ordained penall Statutes against excessiue pride in Apparell, especiallie against long picked shooes then vsually worne, which grew to such an extreme, that the pikes in the Toes were turned vpward, and with siluer chaines, or silke laces tied to the knee. But among many good prouisions, one proued very bad, as the sequell shewes; for concluding a league with King Henrie of Castile, and Iohn King of Arragon, he granted a licence to transport certaine numbers of Cotesweld Sheepe, which are since growne to such an exceeding increase, as the Clothes made of their woolles is a great hindrance to our Marchants, which aduenture in the Leuant Seas.

(18) His next care was to finde a fit Queene, both for the hope of issue to succeed, and for alliance and power to assist (if need were) against Henries claime. Fist therefore minding to send into Scotland, to desire in marriage the Ladie Margaret, (sister to king Iames the third) thereby to frustrate Henries further hope; was made to beleiue that the said Ladie was, by reason of sickenesse, not capable of conception, which altogether declined his affection from that way. Next, as some say, a motion was made for Lady Elizabeth sister and heire apparant vnto Henrie king of Castile, as a match most conuenient, considering king Edward had thereunto a Claime, whose great Grandmother was one of the heires of Castile, being the daughter of Don Peter the king, besides which high match, and combination of Alliances, a hope was conceiued that the Dutchies of Guien and Aquitaine, might be recouered by the assistance of these Castilians, without great charge or trauell to the English. But the tender spring of the one, and the lusty growth of the other, would not be grafted into one stocke to beare fruite, shee little aboue sixe, and he about twenty three, farre vnfit to abstaine till shee could giue him content.

(19) A third Princesse was assaid, against whom could be no exceptions, for birth, beautie, yeeres, or alliance, which was Lady Bona, daughter of Lewis Duke of Sauoy, and sister to Carlot the French Queene, at that time residing in the French Court. This double string was thought most fit for king Edwards bow; for the Duke more remote, might strengthen him abroad, and the French neerer home would be made a good neighbour, hauing the night-bird still singing in his eare: especially to cast a rubbe in king Henries way, whose hopes lay most vpon Lewis, for that Reiner of Anion, stiling himselfe king of Naples, Sicil and Ierusalem, had more honour by that verball stile, then rents or reuenues to maintaine his estate, or any subiection acknowledged by them; so as if king Lewis were Edwards, Anion was not to be feared feared. This match being most approued in counsell, none was held more fit to solicite the businesse then Lord Richard Neuil the great Earle of Warwick, a man esteemed for power a Demy-King, and for magnificence and hospitality matchlesse: in whose house at London (as some haue verified) sixe oxen were spent euery day, and most Tauernes in the City full of his meat.

(20) Warwicke in great state arriued at Tours, & his message knowne, was accordingly entertained in the French Court, where he wrought the Queen her selfe to be the chiefest Agent; who drew on her sister Bona, with recommending the state and stile of a magnificent Queene (a sound very tunable in a Ladies eare,) and her husband Lewis, with assurance of a potent and wise Allie, a pleasing theame to soft natured Princes, as the French King was. And indeed to all shee vndertooke all good contentments; so as on that side all things were cleare, and Warwicke dismissed with Courtly French complements; the Earle Damp-martin was to passe into England for the finall confirmation.

(21) But whilest Warwicke had beene industriously wooing in France, King Edwards affection in England was working another way; for being on hunting in the Forrest of Wychwood beside Stony-Stratford, hee there found other game, that made game in his eye, which was the Lady Elizabeth Gray attending the Dutchesse of Bedford her mother, who then soiorned at his Mannour of Grafton, whither hee repaired for his recreation. She had beene attendant vpon Queene Margaret the wife of King Henry the sixt, and had beene married vnto Iohn Gray Esquier, knighted, and slaine at the battell of S. Albans vpon King Henries part, who now was a suiter vnto the King, for some thing taken away in the extremity of that time, to bee restored towards the maintenance of her estate. But howsoeuer her suit pierced his eare, her sweetly composed feature strangely affected his heart; more formall shee was, and louely in countenance, then either tall or exceedingly faire; yet both sufficient to meete in one person, of an excellent witte, a sober demeanour, a modest looke, a feminine smile, and her speech vttered in such a naturall eloquence as her answeres euer set on edge King Edwards desires, which howsoeuer distastfull to the appetite of his wanton bed, (affirming with blushes, that as shee accounted her selfe most vnworthy of the name of his Queene, so shee held her selfe of more worth, & her chast honour dearer then to bee his Concubine) yet held they him in chase till shee had taken him in the snares of her loue.

(22) Their many meetings and louers complements, made the old Dutchesse of Yorke (the Kings mother) much to suspect it would bee a match; to hinder which, with a parents authority shee entred discourse, alleadging it honourable, safe, and of much profite to linke with some great Princesse in forraine lands, both for the increase of possessions abroad, and (as the case stood) to bee assisted at home: that Warwicke had gone so farre in his suite in France, as if in himselfe now were the stay, she feared their displeasures would not bee staied. To marry his Subiect shee held it vnprincely, especially one without reuenewes, alliance, or riches, no other thing mouing, but a wanton dotage on the person; and although that in Lady Elizabeth nothing was to be misliked, yet was there nothing so excellent, but the same was incorporated in farre greater Ladies, more meet as shee thought of a Queenely estate. A virgine (quoth she) is most fitte for a sacred Prince his side, whose head is annointed with holy Oyle, and whose Maiesty is outwardly more sublime then the Leuiticall Priests: yet were they forbidden to make widdowes their wiues, lest the holy callings should bee defiled with the staine of Bigamie.

(23) When his Mother had said, and expected his answere, the King who had taken counsell of his owne desires, and knew himselfe to bee out of his mothers rule, partly in earnest, and partly in pleasance, made her this reply: That marriage being a spirituall type, ought rather to be conioyned where God had framed the parties to consent (as this of his was) then in regard of any temporall respect whatsoeuer. That his choice was pleasing to himselfe, and would be to his subiects he certainly knew, whose amity before all other Nations hee most preferred and desired; neither could he giue them better occasion of loue then in this, that being their Soueraigne, hee disdained not to marry into their Tribes; and so likewise for his Issue, there could not any Prince be better beloued then he that was their naturall Prince so borne of both parents. That if forraine alliances were so needfull, hee had many of his kin, to contract them, and that with content of all parties: but for himselfe, to marry for possessions, or to please others with displeasing his own affections, hee saw it no wisdome, hauing already sufficient of the one; and the other offended, euen sweet pleasure would seeme sowre pils; especially, the choice that is made by another mans eye. That there are many comparable to her, said hee, I make no question, and am the more glad, let them haue them that like them, I will not repine, neither I hope will any abridge mee of that which I allow vnto others: the Prouerbe is (Mother) that marriage goes by Destiny, but to be wiued against a mans own liking is an earthly Purgatory. And therefore my Cosen Warwicke I am sure, neither loueth me so little, to grudge at that I loue, nor is so vnreasonable to looke that I should in choise of a wife, rather be ruled by his eye, then by mine owne: as though I were a Ward, that were bound to marry by the appointment of a Gardian: I would not bee a King with that condition, to forbeare mine owne libertie, in choise of mine owne marriage. As for possibility of more inheritance by new affinity in forraine land, it proues oftner the occasion of more trouble then profite; and wee haue already title by that meanes, to so much as sufficeth to get, and keep well in one mans dayes. That she is a widdow, and hath already children, by Gods blessed Lady I am a Bachelour, yet haue some too, and so each of vs hath a proofe, that neither of vs is like to bee barren. And therefore (Madam) I pray you bee content, I trust in God, shee shall bring a young Prince that shall play on your lappe to your great pleasure, and your selfe shall blesse the wombe that bare such a babe: and as for your obiection of Bigamie, let the Bishop hardly lay it in my way, when I come to take Orders; for I vnderstand it is forbidden a Priest, but I neuer wist, that it was forbidden a Prince.

(24) The Dutchesse seeing the King so set on his owne choice, that she could not pull him backe, tooke it in such disdaine, that vnder pretext of her duty to Godward, she deuised to frustrate the match, and rather gaue furtherance that Lady Elizabeth Lucy should bee his Queene, whome not long before hee had with wanton dalliances enticed to his bed; for which act, vnder pretence of a contract with her, whose husband hee was before God, (as shee alleadged) his mother openly obiected against this his intended marriage, in the discharge (forsooth) of her owne conscience, which was the cause of such an obstacle, as either the Bishops durst not, or the King, proceed to the solemnization of this wedding, till the same were clearely purged, and the truth openly testified: whereupon Dame Elizabeth Lucy was sent for; which Lady albeit shee was by the Kings mother, and others to auerre the same, yet when shee was solemnely sworne to speake truth, she confessed that they were neuer assured indeede, howbeit shee affirmed his Grace spake so louing words vnto her, as she verily hoped he would haue married her, and that if it had not beene for such kind words, shee would neuer haue shewed such kindnesse vnto him. This point cleared, and no impediment resting, the King

His mothers deuise to crosse his purpose of marriage.

Lady Lucy infligated to claime marriage of King Edward.

K. Edward married Lady Elizabeth Grey.

King tooke to wife this later beloued Lady Elizabeth Grey, who had beene formerly married vnto his enemy, and many times prayed full heartily for his losse, in which God loued her better then to grant her her boone, reseruing greater honour for her selfe and her posterity.

The descent and parentage of the Lady Elizabeth Grey.

(25) She was honourably descended, especially by the surer side, whose mother was Iaquellin daughter to Peter of Lucemburg, Earle of S. Paul, and Dutchesse to Iohn Duke of Bedford Regent of France; after whose death shee married Sir Richard Wooduile knight, and among others bare vnto him this Elizabeth, Englands faire Queene, who being priuately married at the Manour of Grafton, was afterwardes crowned Queen at Westminster with all due celebrations, vpon the sixe and twentieth of May, Anno, 1465. Her father then by this new made sonne in law, and Soueraigne Lord, was created Lord Riuers, and made high Constable of England, her brother Lord Anthony, married to the sole heire of the Lord Scales, and her sonne Thomas Grey borne to her first husband, was created Marquesse Dorset, and married to the heire of the Lord Bonuile.

Queene Elizabeth crowned.

The Queenes kindred highly preferred.

(26) But when Warwicke had knowledge the wanton King had got a new wife, and his courting of Lady Bona, to bee but a ball to make Edwards play; hee stormed not a little, whose credite hee tooke to be crackt in the French Court, and himselfe rather thought to haue dallyed in this motion, then to deale by commission from his King, for which cause hee conceiued so inward an indignation, that his affection was withdrawne from King Edward, and thenceforth ranne vpon Henrie retained in prison, to which end he temporized with the present king, applauded the Queene, and bare countenance in Court with no discontented shew: The King as wary as Warwicke was, cast no eye of dislike, or of any suspition, gaue him countenance in Court, and in familiar conference heard him before others; yet lest the stem of his greatnesse should ouertop his crown and his brethren the spreading branches shadow his designes, hee tooke the Chancellorshippe from George Neuill, the one of them, then Bishoppe of Exceester, afterward Archbishoppe of Yorke, and from the other Iohn Neuill Baron Montacute, the Earledome of Northumberland, bestowing the same (at the suite of the Northumbrians, set on by himselfe) vpon Henry Percy, whose father was slaine at Touton, and himselfe at that present fled into Scotland for safety. Whereupon Montacute was remoued, and to auoid suspition was created Marquesse, a greater name, but farre lesse in power. And to haue a stake in store howsoeuer the dice chanced to turne, hee sought to ioine friendshippe with forraine Princes, hauing offended France for the refusing of his Queenes sister: so as hee sought, and obtained the amity of Henry King of Castell, & of Iohn King of Arragon, and tooke a truce with his neighbour the Scotish King for fifteen yeers following.

(27) But these confederates for the more part too farre to be called for by whistle, fortune beyond expectatiō set him another euen at his elbow, which was Philip Duke of Burgundy, Prince of Flanders, Brabant, and Zealand, whose onely sonne legitimate, (Charles Earle of Charoleys a widdower, and without any sonne) hee sought to conioine to King Edwards faire sister, not so much for any loue hee bare to the house of Yorke, himselfe being a Lancastrian by his mothers side, as to bandy against Lewis King of France, whom he had lately ouercome in a battell at Montleherry, and as then stoode vpon his defence, as hee was sure King Edward did. This motion king Edward and his Councell well liked, only Warwicke withstoode it, in fauour of the French: but the Lady Margaret sent ouer according to her estate, and Warwicke left fuming with a discontented mind, after some complements of mirth with his brethren the Archbishoppe and Montacute at his Towne of Warwicke, braste forth into warlike consultations for the deposing of Edward, and restauration of Henry, whose wrongs (as he alleadged) did crie for righte at their hands. The Bishoppe lightly consented to side for King Henry; but the Marquesse would hardly bee drawne from King Edward, which Warwicke perceiuing, laid his lime twigges yet another way.

Philip. Com. l. 3. cap. 4.

(28) For being a man of a deepe reach and witte, hee well saw that George Duke of Clarence the Kings second brother, bare not the best liking to the sway of the times: him therefore hee sought to allure to his fist, which once mand, Edward should loose the best Faulcon for his game; him therefore by Problemes hee meant first to proue and according to their digest, purposed to proceed. So falling in familiar conference with Clarence, beganne to complaine of some vnkindnes in the King, both in breach of some promises, and staine of his honour in the French Court. The Duke as discontented as Warwicke, interrupted his tale before it was told, why my Lord (quoth Clarence) doe you looke that a Leopard should haue no spots in his skinne, or a Camelion no colours, but one, in faith you are deceiued, and loose but your labour to wash the naturall Blackamore: for will you haue him kind that is by nature vnkind, and to be respected of him, that respects not his owne bloud: or thinke you (a Cosen and Allie) to be raised by him, that seeth (if not seeketh) his owne brethrens fals. For the heire of the Lord Scales (you see) hee hath married to his wiues brother, the heire of the Lord Bonuill and Harington to his wiues sonne, and affianced the heire of the Lord Hungerford to the Lord Hastings, marriages indeede more meete for his two brethren and kinne, then for such new fondlings as hee hath bestowed them vpon. But by my George I sweare, if my brother of Gloecester would ioyne with mee, wee would make him know that wee are all three one mans sons, and of one and the same mother.

The mariage celebrated.

(29) Earle Warwicke hauing that which hee greedily sought after, seconded the resolution with his owne assistance, imparting now boldly what confederates he had made, and to ioine more faithfully in this his designe, hee proffered Clarence his eldest daughter Lady Isabel in marriage, faire and well qualified with the one halfe of his wiues inheritance, she being sole heire vnto Henry Beauchampe Earle of Warwicke her brother, and nothing inferiour to any of those whom Edward had bestowed vpon others, which no sooner was spoken, but was as presently embraced, and the plotte conferred how to proceed, which was concluded; forthwith to saile vnto Calleis (whereof the Earle was Captaine, and where the virgine Lady lay) aswell to confirme the contract betwixt them, as to be absent whē the commotion should beginne, as the safer from suspition and the surer to strike when the Ball came to hand, to stir which, the Archbishoppe and Montacute were appointed for the North.

(30) The occasion pickt to make Malecontents, was the abuse of Charity vnto an hospitall dedicated to Saint Leonard in the City of Yorke, whose reuenew stood most vpon corne yeerly receiued from Farmers in the Country, as an oblation of their first graine. This, the factious made their onely ground vnder a holy pretext (forsooth) that the poore were defrauded, and the Master and Priests onely fed & waxen fat. To redresse which one Robert Hulderne entred in action, and with fifteene thousand strong enterprised for Yorke, in which City the Lord Marquesse Montacute was President for King Edward, who with a small number, but well chosen, issued out against the enemy, put them backe, and stroke off the head of their Captaine before the gates of Yorke: but whether hee did it in policie to grow more in trust with the King, or else of duety of oblige, not moulded throughly to the commotion, is vncertain. But certaine it is, the Rebels were nothing daunted at Huldernes death, but rather made resolute to to continue what they had begunne,

(31) To which end they chooſe them two Chieftaines, of greater account, and eminent calling, which were Henrie ſonne and heire to the Lord Fitz-hugh, and Sir Henrie Nevill, ſonne and heire to the Lord Latimer, the one of them being Nephew, & the other Coſen-germane vnto the Earle of Warwicke; theſe but young, and not altogether experienced in Armes, chooſe for their Tutor Sir Iohn Conyers a Knight of ſuch courage, skill and valiantnes, as in the North-parts few were his like: who meaning to ſtrike at the head, determined to march forthwith to London proclaiming in his way, that Edward was neither a iuſt Prince vnto God, nor a profitable King vnto the Common-weale.

(32) King Edward hearing of theſe Northern proceedings, and that his brother and Warwicke were preparing againſt him, ſent for the Lord Herbert whom he had created Earle of Pembrooke, to be his Generall in the North (who partly to deſerue the Kings liberality in aduancing him to ſuch honour, and partly in emulation he bare toward Warwicke, being the ſole obſtacle (as he tooke it) why he obtained not the wardſhip of the Lord Bonuils daughter and heire for his eldeſt ſonne) did not a little reioice of that his imploiment. And therefore accompanied with Sir Richard Herbert his brother and eighteene thouſand well furniſhed Welſhmen, marched towards the enemie, and after him was ſent Humfrey Lord Stafford with ſixe thouſand Archers to ſecond him in his warres. Theſe Lords meeting together, had notice by eſpials that the Northern made forwards towards Northampton. to intercept whom, the Lord Stafford lately made Earle of Deuonſhire was imploied and Sir Richard Herbert, who with two thouſand horſe laid themſelues couertly by the ſide of a wood, and ſodeinely ſet vpon the rereward, the reſt hauing paſſed: but the Northern verie nimbly turned about, and bad the Welſhmen ſuch welcome as few of them returned to tell of their entertainement.

(33) The King vnderſtanding of this hard beginning, muſtred his ſubiects on euerie ſide, intending to cope with the Northern himſelfe. And Earle Warwicke as forward to forward his fortunes, gathered his friends, with purpoſe to encounter with Pembrooke and his Welſh. But before any ſupplies came to either of both; it chanced the Armies to meete at vnawares, vpon a faire plaine called Danes more neere to the Towne Hedgecot, three miles from Banburie and preſently fell to a bickering, wherein Sir Henrie Nevill Knight, ſonne of the Lord Latimer, vpon a luſty courage, venturing ſomewhat too farre was taken priſoner, and notwithſtanding he yeelded himſelfe to his Takers, was cruelly ſlaine, which vnmartiall act reſted not long vnrepaied with the loſſe of moſt of the Welſh the next day. For the field withdrawne the Lord Stafford repaired to Banberie and there tooke his lodging, where his affections were much enamoured vpon a faire damſell in the Inne. But the Earle of Pembrooke comming to the ſame Towne, tooke into the ſame Inne, and commanded the Lord Stafford to prouide him elſewhere, contrary to their agreements made before, whereat Stafford was diſpleaſed, and departing thence with his whole Band, left the Earle naked of men in the Towne, and diſabled the field of the Archers, whereby the day was loſt vpon the kings part, for which he ſhortly loſt his owne head.

(34) The Northern enflamed for the death of young Nevill, the next morning moſt valiantly ſet vpon the Welſhmen, and by the force of Archers, draue them from their ground of aduantage, which Pembrooke wanting, ſupplied with his owne proweſſe, and Richard his brother with his Pollaxe twice made way through the battell of the Northern, without anie mortall or deadly wound: ſo that by their valours it was verily ſuppoſed the field had beene wonne, had not Iohn Clappam an Eſquire and ſeruant to Warwicke diſplaied his Lords Colours with his white-beare, and from an eminent place cried a Warwicke, a Warwicke, whereat the welſh were ſo terrified, as they turned and fled, leauing their Generall and his brother alone in the field, who valiantly fighting were incompaſſed and taken with the death of fiue thouſand of their men. The Earle with his brother Sir Richard Herbert were brought to Banbery, where with ten other Gentlemen they loſt their heads, Conyers and Clappam being their Iudges.

A.D. 1469.

The Earle of Pembrooke with others beheaded.

(35) This ſecond victory thus got, and the Northern now fleſhed; vnder the leading of Robbin of Riddiſdale; haſted to the Kings mannor of Grafton, where the Earle Riuers father to the Queene then lay, whom with his ſonne Iohn, they ſodeinely ſurpriſed, and in Northampton ſtrucke off their heads without any iudgement. The deathes of theſe Lords the King greatly lamented, and ſought to reuenge: firſt therefore writing his Commiſſions for the apprehenſion of Lord Humfrey Stafford of Southwicke (who by diligent ſearch was found at Brentmarch and beheaded at Bridgewater, as he worthily deſerued) next he prepared a mighty Armie, and with the ſame marched towardes Warwicke, his company increaſing euer as he went.

Robert of Riddiſdale captaine of the Northernes.

The Earle Riuers with his ſonne Iohn ſurpriſed and beheaded.

Lord Stafford beheaded.

(36) King Edward ſet downe his tents at Wolney foure miles from Warwicke, where the Duke and the Earle of Warwickes hoſt lay readie for Battell, but by the mediation of friends a peace was intreated, and letters written from either parties, expreſſing the grieſes and wrongs ſuſtained, with proffers of redreſſe, in amending all, and in ſhew ſo farre it proceeded, as the King conceiuing a certaine hope of peace, reſted ſecure, not fearing any foule-play, which politique Warwicke (by his ſpiall perceiuing) thought it not wiſdome to looſe the aduantage, and thereupon in the dead of the night with a ſelected Company he entred the Kings Camp, killing them that kept the watch, tooke the king in his bed, and brought him his priſoner to his Caſtle of Warwicke, and thence by eaſie iourneys in the night had him conueyed to Middelham Caſtle in Yorkeſhire not farre from Richmond, where vnder the cuſtody of his brother George Nevill Archiſhop of Yorke hee was reteined.

(37) His vſage was Princely, and according to his eſtate, which he often acknowledged to the Archbiſhop with all kind thankes, and complements of wordes, whereby he wrought himſelfe into ſuch truſt and fauour, as he had the Forreſts to hunt in, and the parkes for his pleaſure, whoſe pales are well knowne, vnſufficient wals to pen the lyon in, as appeared by this King, who being abroad and on hunting, Sir William Stanly, with Sir Thomas Burgh brought him freſh horſe, and ſuch a crew of followers that his keepers more feared their owne liues, then were forward to force him backe againe to priſon, and ſo let the game goe without further chaſe. King Edward thus eſcaped, Warwicke like a wild man furiouſly raged, but ſeeing no remedy made vſe of neceſsity, and gaue forth that himſelfe ſo cauſed it, hauing power to make Kings and to vnmake them againe.

Warwicks ſayings to make and vnmake kings.

(38) The King forthwith repaired to Yorke, where with great honour hee was ioifully receiued, and abode certaine daies, which made him well hope of a further ſupply of friends and men, but fayling thereof, and fearing the Archbiſhops purſuite with a ſmall traine he poſted to Lancaſter, where he found the Lord Haſtings his Chamberlaine well accompanied for his Conuey: his ſpirits then reuiued, and traine daily increaſing, with ſpeedie iourneyes hee came vnto London; where all his ſtudies and conſultations were, how to be reuenged vpon theſe diſloiall Lords, his brother, and Earle Warwicke, and they againe fretting at the Archbiſhoppes follie ſought to make ſtronger their factions againſt the King.

diuisions, and no estate sure to enioy what was theirs, the Nobles anew began to sollicite the parties vnto a Peace, hauing first obtained libertie to post to and fro without their impeachments, and so effectually laid downe the state of the Land whose ruines now were so eminent by these intestine warres, that the Natiues lamented, the Forrein reioiced, and God they saw highly displeased, whose sword thus giuen into their hands, was to be feared would be the destruction of the English, as Nabucadnezzars of Babell was of Iudea, and indeed so effectually wrought, that the Duke and Earle vpon perfect confidence came to London, accompanied with a small number in respect of their great danger: where falling into conference with the King, he tasked them with disloialtie, and they him with ingratitude, so that their splenes were nothing appeased, but much more increased, and with high wordes departed, the King vnto Canterbury, and they againe to VVarwicke.

A.D. 1470. A commotion in Lincolnshire.

(39) The stout Earle whose stomacke must haue vent, otherwise the Caske must needs breake, caused new stirres to be raised in Lincolnshire, vnder the leading of Sir Robert VVels, an expert souldier, and sonne of the Lord VVels, who with thirtie thousand Commons, disturbed the Countrey, and in euerie place proclaimed King Henrie; setting downe his battel not farre from Stamford, meaning to abide the encounter of his opposers; which when the King heard of, he sent for the Lord VVels his father, commanding him to write to his sonne to surcease the warres, and so marching toward Stamford tooke VVels in his companie, with a good hope that the sonne would not beare armes against his own father in field; but howsoeuer he had writ, or the King conceiued, Sir Robert went on in his former designes, which so sore moued Edward, that he beheaded Lord VVels with Sir Thomas Dimocke that had married his daughter, although he had giuen them promise of safety and life.

The Lord Wels and Sir Thomas Dimocke beheaded.

(40) Young VVels then hearing of his fathers death, sought the reuenge vpon this vntrusty Prince, and not staying for VVarwicke who was in preparing to come, set manfully vpon the King and his power, where betwixt them was performed a most bloody fight, till at last Sir Robert was taken, with Sir Thomas Deland and others, whereat the Lincolnshire men were so terrified, that casting off their Coates, they all ranne away, in regard whereof this battell to this day is called, the battell of Losecoat field, wherein were slaine ten thousand men at the least: after which victory the King commanded VVels with many other of note to be put to death, as the chiefe causers of these dangerous Commotions.

(41) This vntimely conflict and vnfortunate ouerthrow, made Clarence, and VVarwicke, at their wits end, who vnprouided to field against Edward, gaue way to necessity, and from Dartmouth in Deuonshire embarked themselues and wiues for France, both to instigate king Lewis no friend vnto Edward, and to secure themselues in Callis (whereof VVarwick was captaine) till fortune had changed the hand of her play. These crossing the Seas cast Anchor before the Towne of Callis, and gaue notice they were ready to land, but the Lord Vawclere a Gascoigne, whom VVarwicke had substituted his deputie, discharged diuers peeces of Ordinance against them, and sent word flatlie they should not come there: meane while the Dutches of Clarence fell in trauell, and was there on Shippe-board deliuered of a faire sonne, which Child the Earles deputie would scarcely suffer to be baptized in the Towne, nor without great entreaty permit two flagons of wine to be conueyd aboard to the Ladies lying in the hauen. For which his good seruice King Edward by his letters Patents made Vawclere chiefe Captaine of Callis, and discharged the Earle as a Traitor or Rebell against him.

standing his marriage, thought now a fit time to requite the discourtesie; and therefore sent many thankes vnto Vawclere, with promise of a thousand Crownes pension by yeere, if he stood firme for his wiues brother King Edward, himselfe laying the Coast to impeach his arriuage. But how Monsieur Vawclere stood affected, whatsoeuer shew he made, Comines the French Kings Historian doth tell, who sent Warwicke word the danger he stood in, of the said Duke, and of Duras the Kings Admirall, so as to land, would be his finall confusion: His Counsell therefore was that he should make into France, vnto whose King he should be most welcome; and as for the town of Callis, he willed him to take no thought, but promised to make him a good reckoning thereof, when time should best serue. Whereupon the Earle waied anker for Normandy, and in his way tooke many rich Ships of the Duke of Burgundies subiects, which netled him not a little, but yet found no docke to rub out the smart.

(43) King Lewis hearing of the arriuage of Warwicke, and knowing his troubles to arise for his Ambassage to Bona, and faith vnto France, sent certaine Princes to conduct him to the Castle of Amboys, where a supply was made against all necessities, and himselfe and traine most honorablie intertained, whereat the Duke of Burgundy sore repined, and sent Lewis word that he disliked his doings with threats of reuenge, if he aided him against his wiues brother. This, notwithstanding the French King gaue all comforts to these fugitiues, and prepared his assistance for their restorations, and the raising againe of godly King Henrie.

(44) Queene Margaret hauing fled England and soiourning in France with her Father Reiner (a King in name, but scarcely able to beare the State of an Earle) saw now the Iron hot, and ready to be strucke, therefore with her sonne Prince Edward, Iohn Earle of Oxford, and Iasper Earle of Pembrooke (who latelie had escaped out of prison in England) came vnto Amboyse, where by meanes of the French King a combination of Alliance was confirmed betwixt the Prince of Wales, young Edward, and Anne the second daughter to the Earle of Warwicke, then present with her mother and sister in France. That King Henry should be againe restored, the Duke of Clarence, and the Earle tooke a solemne Oath neuer to desist whiles they had power, and in the nonage of the Prince they iointly were to be deputed his Protectors, and the Lands sole Gouernors.

(45) Edward in England hearing what Queen Margaret, his brother Clarence, & stout Warwicke in the French Court had done, was strucke into a sodaine dumpe, being as doubtfull of friends, as fearefull of foes, and therefore such as were alied to the Lancastrians, or fauourits of the down-cast K. Henrie, he began somewhat roughly to deale with: many therefore that were guilty daily tooke Sanctuarie, or yeelded themselues to his mercie, among whom Iohn Marques Montacute brother to Warwicke was one, who with faireft words of promises, was receiued into fauor, and vpon whose example many others came in, which notwithstanding meant to stand out if occasion should serue. But no busier was Edward to keepe the Crowne on his head, then these Lords in France were resolute to strike it off: in midst of whose consultations behold how it happened.

(46) There came from England to Calleis a damsell belonging (as shee said) to the Dutches of Clarence, who signified vnto Monsieur Vawclere that shee came from King Edward with a declaration of peace, which hee fearing to impart the conditions to other, had made her the instrument, the better to passe without any suspect, and he glad to heare for the Earles sake (whom he entirely affected) gaue her his safe conduct vnto the Duke of Clarence then at Amboys; where hauing priuate accesse vnto him, shee told, that it was neither naturall nor honourable for him to take part against the house of Yorke; that that the house of Lancaster, was not onely by the whole Court of Parliament debarred to bee the indubitate Heire of the Kingdome, but that K. Henrie himselfe had discharged his Issue from claime, as it standeth (said she) vpon Record to be seene, contrary to which, as he might well perceiue this marriage of Prince Edward with the Earles daughter, did onely aime and intend to the vtter extinct of the house of Yorke, whereof himselfe was one, and in neere possibility of the Crowne, Edwards Issue young, and not many, and the King very wanton, a sinne commonly punished with want of posterity, which if it so chanced, then hee, or his were the next. These reasons wayed, so ouer-wayed the Dukes further designes, that hee promised thereafter a more brotherlike affection, as (saide hee) Edward should find; with which good newes shee returned into England, Warwicke vtterly ignorant what was said or done.

(47) All now in a readinesse for the return, ships, money and men supplied by the French King, the Admirall of France was sent to secure them from the Duke of Burgundies Fleet, which with an extraordinary number and power lay in the mouth of Seyne to fight with Warwicke when he should loose out of Harborow: but see how the heauens fauoured, and frowned vpon the parties, for the night before they should hoise saile, such a stormy tempest tooke the Dukes Fleete, lying more remote from the Lee, that they were scattered asunder, some into Scotland, some into Denmarke, and many of them drowned. But the Seas calmed, and the wind seruing faire, the English set saile and landed at Dartmouth, whence they had shipped into France almost six moneths before.

(48) King Edward relying vpon Burgundy abroad, and thinking all friends who fawned at home, gaue himselfe daily to follow the hound and the hawke, and nightly to his court pleasures in dancings and daliances with damsels, little minding their approach that meant to marre his mirth; for Warwicke now landed, proclaimed King Henry, commanding all from sixteene to sixty, vpon a great penalty to take Armes against Edward Duke of Yorke, the most vniust vsurper of Henries rightfull Crowne, and vncredible it was, to see the confluence of them which came armed to him, who ere-while applauded & approued none but King Edward. Thus making towards London, his company daily encreased; which the youthfull King seemed little to regard, but verily supposing hee had now Warwicke in his trappe, wrote to Burgundie to secure the seas, lest he should escape againe into France, and to his Lords of England, to attend him in his wars; but very many neglected his commaund, and few or none made their repaire. Which when Edward perceiued hee was strucke into a great feare, and with his brother of Gloucester, the L. Hastings his Chamberlaine, and the Lord Scales the Queenes brother, hee hasted towards Nottingham there to determine what was to be done.

(49) In the mean while the bastard Faulconbridge in the west, and the Earle of Pembroke in Wales, euery where proclaimed King Henry; and to forward the matter, D. Godard preaching at Pauls Crosse declared by reading of Billes, and diuers other proofes, that King Henry was the vndoubted and true heire vnto the English Crowne. Neither is the L. Montacute now the man that he was, who hauing mustered sixe thousand in the name of King Edward, and brought them forward almost to Nottingham, on the sodaine drew backe his forces, alleadging that Edward was vngratefull, & regardlesse of his friends as himselfe said, himselfe was the example, who hauing serued him in many bloudy battels, was rewarded with a verball word Marquesse, without any maintenance at al, no not so much as Pyes poor nest: & therfore he had iust cause neuer to draw his sword in his quarrell any more, and them that did, hee assured them should receiue the like reward in the end.

(50) These with the like distastures, diuulged among the rude multitude, it was a world to see the face of this new World, for in euery streete Bonfires were made; in euery Church bels rung, Ditties were sung at euery meeting, and euery man cried K. Henry, King Henry, whose Eccho likewise redoubled, a Warwicke, a Warwicke, and indeed all so applauded the passage now on foot, as King Edward hearing the rumor, thought it not safe any longer to stay, & therefore with those trusty Lords and some others, hee fled from his hoast besides Nottingham, passing the Washes towards Lynne with greater difficulties then was befitting a Prince to aduenture; and thus without any order taken for his Realme, in two Hulkes of Holland, and one English shippe destitute of all necessary prouisions, set sayle toward Burgundy and in the way was encountred by the Easterlings, Englands great Enemies, hauing much adoe to cleare himselfe from their surprise.

How vncertaine it is to stay on the multitude.

K Edward is forced to flee England. October 3.

(51) In these times of misery the Queene (whose marriage was the onely cause of all these stirres) vpon the first of October had stolne out of the Tower, and taken Sanctuary at Westminster, where like a woman forsaken shee solitarily remained, and on the fourth of November following was deliuered of a sonne, which without all pompe more like a priuate mans child then a Prince, was there also baptized by the name of Edward, who after his fathers death, a while was King of England, as shall be said; other Sanctuaries were full of King Edwards friends, that praied deuoutly for his prosperous health, and well hoped the world would againe turne, as shortly it did. One King thus fled, and the other in prison, the Kentish, whose conditions are mutable at the change of Princes, came to seeke prey in London, where they knew it was to bee had: Ratcliffe, S. Katherins, and Southwarke they robbed, and within the City did some hurt besides, yea and surely more had done, had not Earle Warwicke in good time come to the rescue which encreased his name, that was great enough before.

(53) Thus farre proceeded, and Henry reestablished, a Parliament was begunne at Westminster the six & twentieth of Nouember following, wherein King Edward was declared a Traitor to his country, an vsurper of the Crowne, and all his goods confiscated; the like iudgement passed against all his partakers; wherein also it was enacted, that all such persons as had taken Armes in his quarrell, should bee seuerely punished; among whom, John Typtoft Earle of Worcester, and King Edwards Lieutenant in Ireland was attainted, who being found hid in the toppe of a tree, in the Forrest of Weybridge, not farre from Huntington was brought to London, and vpon Tower-hill beheaded. Moreouer, all Statutes made by King Edward were clearely reuoked, abrogated, and made frustrate: the Crowns of England and France entayled to King Henry, and the Heyres-male lawfully begot of his body, and for the want

In like perplexity was the Burgundian Duke, who neither durſt giue Edward his outward aſſiſtance (the French and Warwicke being ſo mighty oppoſites) nor leaue him in diſtreſſe, leſt the ſparkes of diſcontent ſhould flie from the eyes of his faire wife, and therefore to know whether Vawclere the Gouernor of Calleis ſtood reſolute for him according to Couenants, he ſecretly ſent Philip Comines the hony-mouth Hiſtorian, to drop ſome of his ſweet eloquence into his gold-thirſting eare.

Earl of Warwicks eſteeme in Calis.

(56) King Edward hearing what his brother of Burgundy had done, and being dayly ſolicited from his friends in England, thought it no policy long to delay, leſt Henry ſhould take growth to a bigger ſteame; and therefore repairing to his brother in the towne of Saint Paul, required his aide, as the onely man on whom hee relied, aſwell for the bond of alliance in the marriage of his ſiſter, as alſo in regard of the orders which they both ware, the King that of his which was the golden Fleece; and the Duke the Gartar and Robe of Saint George. In the Court of Burgundy at that time lay Edmund Duke of Sommerſet, coſen-germane remoued vnto Duke Charles, a great enemy againſt the houſe of Yorke, and now ſet himſelfe to thwart King Edwards ſuite, alleadging, that it was more honourable for the Duke of Burgundy to ſide with the Lancaſtrians, from whom he was deſcended by his Grandmother the daughter of Iohn of Gaunt: as alſo in the vprightnes of King Henries title, held good in her brother, and his Grandfather, and in her Nephew his father without all exceptions.

King Edward coueteth aide of his brother the Duke of Burgundy.

The Duke of Sommerſet diſſwadeth Burgundy to aid K. Edward.

(57) The Duke perplexed betweene theſe great ſupplicants did then, as many doe now, ſpeake much and meane nothing leſſe, or elſe ſay little, & meane to doe much. To Sommerſet for Henry hee outwardly promiſed all helpe and aſſiſtance, but neuer gaue the leaſt, and to Edward no comfortable words of ſupply, and yet vnderhand he hired him ſhippes, furniſhed him with munition, and lent him fifty thouſand Florences in money. And now the ſeaſon ſeruing for warre, K. Edward with two thouſand ſtrong beſides his Mariners made ouer for England, attempting to take land in Norfolke; but thoſe coaſts guarded, hee waffed more Northward, and entring Humber, landed at Rauenſpur in Yorkeſhire, when laying aſide al claim to the Crown, and pretending nothing but his Dutchy of York, he ſhewed the rude multitude the letters, and ſeale of the Earle of Northumberland, which as he affirmed, & made them beleeue was ſent for his ſafe conduct to enioy the ſame, and in euery place where he came proclaimed King Henry himſelfe, wearing an Eſtrich feather, which was Prince Edwards Liuery, and paſſing to Yorke in no other ſhew then a Subiect, his oath firſt taken to be true to King Henry, entred the City, which preſently hee ſurpriſed and aſſumed to himſelfe.

Burgundie temporiſeth with his ſubiects.

(58) Earle Warwicke now hearing that Edward was landed before he had marched very farre in the main, ſent ſtrait charge to his brother the Marqueſſe Montacute then reſiding at Pomfret (with a ſufficient Army to ſecure thoſe parts) that hee ſhould not ſuffer his acceſſe vnto Yorke, leſt he grew more potent, then was to bee wiſhed; himſelfe making ready with all poſſible ſpeed, to repaire into thoſe parts; but whether the Marqueſſe purpoſely winked, or elſe (and that rather) would not ſee at all, hee made no great haſt to forelay his way to Yorke, neither ſought to empeach the paſſage: when Edward from thence marched in a more hoſtile manner towards Nottingham; taking his way not farre from Pomfret, and as it were through the middeſt of his enemies; which encouraged many to fauour his deſignes, holding that Montacute was either a friend, or afraide to deale againſt ſo powerfull an enemy.

(59) The White Roſe thus bloomed, and the red falling his leafe, all tooke the time of this pleaſant ſpring, and flocked to Edward as to their April Sun, who now more able, and therefore more bold made forward towards Leiceſter, where the Earles of Warwicke and Oxford with a great power were, but becauſe Clarence was abſent, they let Edward hold on without any encounter, whoſe traine as hee paſſed was like to a riuer that in the running is euer encreaſed with new ſprings, which Warwicke perceiuing, thought it more then time to giue battell, well knowing that his brothers forbearance had giuen him that head. And to that end ſent vnto Clarence then about London in leuying of men, but hee ſomewhat too backeward, and Warwicke too forward, tooke into the City Couentry, meaning from thence to ſet on the enemy. But Edward whoſe ſtar had now paſt the darke threatning cloud, pitched his tents neere vnto that City in a plaine field, and valiantly bad the Earle come to battell. But he then miſtruſting (as in truth hee had cauſe) that the boldneſſe of Edward was backt by a Clarence, kept cloſe within the wals, with a purpoſe to ſee how the world would goe.

(60) Edward loth to looſe time about one Cities ſiege, raiſed his Campe, and haſted forward toward Warwicke, vnto which Towne likewiſe his brother Clarence, with foure thouſand ſtrong was on march: theſe meeting vpon a plaine, three miles from the Towne, ſet their Battels in Aray, as if they meant to haue fought, but the King, his brother Gloueſter, Lord Riuers, Haſtings, and others, without any gard made towards Clarence, which when he beheld, himſelfe accompanied with ſome of eſtate encountred his brother with a louing countenance and friendly cheare, ſo as no ſparke of hatred was perceiued betwixt them, but with all brotherly affections entred into amitie and peace, which afterwards proued the confuſion of the Duke. Clarence thus got ſought to draw Warwicke into the ſame traine, to which end he ſent certaine meſſengers vnto him; firſt to excuſe his owne fact, as too vnnaturall for him to vnſheath his ſword againſt his owne brother, as alſo he ſought to ſtay the effuſion of Engliſh blood, which in theſe quarrels lay ready to be ſhed: His peace with Edward he promiſed to worke, and that with ſuch honour as Warwicke ſhould know himſelfe not only a father to Clarence, but likewiſe vnto Edward great Englands King. Vnto all which motion Warwicke gaue eare only with this replie, Goe tell your Duke (ſaid he) that I had rather bee an Earle, and alwaies like my ſelfe, then a falſe and periured Duke, and that ere my oath ſhall bee falſified (as his apparantly is) I will lay downe my life at my enemies foote, which I doubt not but ſhall bee bought very deere.

(61) This ſtout reſolution made Edward more warie, and therefore to obtaine London, the only key that opened the dore to the Crowne, he haſted thitherward, whoſe Citizens hearing of the increaſe of his hoſt, and waying that Henrie was but a milkeſop to him, thought it moſt ſafety to ſaile with the faireſt winde, and therefore ſet open their Gates, and with publike applaud cried, King Edward. Which when the Duke of Sommerſet with others left to attend the innocent King Henry, heard, they fled for their liues; and left him in the Biſhops Palace at London, where his Competitor King Edward tooke him, and ſent him againe priſoner to the Tower. With ſo many winds are the ſailes of their ſhips filled, which ſeeke the Port of their ſafety by the affections of the people: for euen the ſame day had Henrie beene carried through the Citie (as it were) in triumph, and had heard the ſhoutes of the Commons in euerie ſtreete crying; God ſaue King Henrie.

(62) But Earle Warwicke hearing how things went in London, and now fully conceiuing that the hazard of Battell muſt determine either with, or againſt him, being come to Saint Albans, fell into a deepe conſideration what was to be done: His aſſiſtants were Iohn Duke of Exceſter, the Earles of Oxford and Sommerſet, and Marqueſſe Montacute his brother, whom notwithſtanding he did not greatlie truſt, being alwaies too fauourable to the contrarie faction. Theſe in Counſell held it beſt pollicie to follow the Enemie, and before the bodie grew too great, to lop off the branches, leaſt they ſhould ſhaddow their Sun-ſhine too farre. In which reſolution, they haſted forward, and came vnto Barnet, with a full purpoſe to recouer London: but Edward well knowing the ſtate of the City vnfurniſhed for ſiege, and readie to take ſtampe of any impreſſe, ment not to be pent within thoſe weake wals; and therefore taking with him vnfortunate Henry, leaſt any confederacy ſhould be made in his abſence, he marched with all poſſible haſt, to encounter his oppoſites, before they came too farre, and vpon Gladmore neere vnto Barnet ſet downe his Tents cloſe to the enemie, the eue of Chriſts reſurrection, ſo careles is Mars of diuine celebrations, that the holieſt feaſt is prophaned, when his ſword is drawne.

(63) The next day being the Paſchall whereon Chriſt roſe from death, which with due reuerence is celebrated in all the Chriſtian world, theſe Engliſh contenders for a terreſtriall Crowne, with Irefull hearts and hands as readie, made ready to digge each others graues: for at breake of day Warwicke began to Marſhall his Army, which he diuided into three battalions: The right wing was led by the Marqueſſe his brother, with the Earle of Oxford, conſiſting chiefly of horſemen, himſelfe with the Duke of Exceſter led the left; and the maine battell was commanded by Edward Earle of Sommerſet, which was ſupplied for the moſt part with Archers. K. Edward likewiſe ordered his men. The foreward was led by Richard Duke of Gloucester his brother, a good ſouldier and ſufficient for aduiſe, the middle by himſelfe, and his brother Clarence, hauing King Henry in their companie; And the rereward was commanded by the Lord Haſtings, euer moſt firme for the houſe of Yorke, reſeruing a freſh ſupplie, when occaſion ſhould ſerue.

(64) The Battels ioined; were manfully maintained by the proweſſe of Oxford, vpon that part of the Kings, againſt which he fought, which with great violence he forced backe, ſo that many of them fled to London, bringing newes that with Warwicke went the day: and ſurely in great forwardnes it was, had not fortune thwarted it by an vnexpected chance: for the day being foggy, and ouercaſt with miſts, hindred their eies of any farre ſight, ſo as the ſtarre embroidered vpon the Earle of Oxfords mens Coates, were miſtaken for the Sunne, which King Edwards men wore, in which errour Warwickes Battell let flie at their owne fellowes, who were in great forwardnes to haue wonne the day, and they not knowing the cauſe of the error cried, treaſon, treaſon, we are all betraid. Whereupon the Earle of Oxford with eight hundred fled the field, leauing the chance to be caſt for the Crowne; which when Warwicke perceiued with words like a ſouldier, he incouraged his men, and ſeeing the freſh ſupply of his enemie draw now vnto fight, he furiouſlie ruſhed into the midſt of their Battell, wherein he aduentured ſo farre as he could not be reſcued, but valiantly fighting was ſtrucke downe, and among them ſlaine, hauing repaid his danger with many a wound. The Marqueſſe Montacute made forward to ſecond his brother, (who till then had beene the Mars and Make-King of England) but was ſo ouerlaid by his Oppoſites, that they ſent his ſoule likewiſe from his bodie whereby was ended that bloody daies taske.

(65) In this Battell vpon King Edwards part, died, the Lord Cromwell, the Lord Bourcher, the Lord Barnes, ſonne and heire to the Lord Say, and Sir Iohn Liſle Knight: In the quarrell of Henrie died Richard Neuill Earle of Warwicke, and Iohn Neuill Marqueſſe Montacute his brother, and vpon both ſides of common ſouldiers ſaith Hall ten thouſand, Stow ſaith foure thouſand, as Fabian farre leſſe: all which were buried vpon the ſame Plaine; where afterwards a Chappell was built: the Duke of Exceſter being left for dead in the field, recouered, and tooke Sanctuarie at Weſtminſter. Edmund Duke of Sommerſet, and Iohn Earle of Oxford eſcaped the field, and fled into Wales, where with Iaſper Earle of Pembrooke they ſtill plotted to ſet vp King Henry, whom God and deſtinie would haue to be caſt downe.

(66) The ſame King Edward vpon the ſame day as an abſolute Conquerour, lead the vnfortunate Henry his Captiue to London, and entring the City in triumph wiſe, offered his roiall Standerd in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul, whither the ſlaine bodies of Warwicke and Montacute in two Coffins were brought, and lay there bare faced, and vnburied the ſpace of three daies, leaſt a falſe Brute ſhould be made that they were not dead. After which they were conueied to Biſſam Abbey, and interred in that Priorie among their Anceſtors.

(67) Edwards affaires thus farre proſpered at London, the windes that had croſſed Queene Margaret before, came fauourably about to fill her Sailes for England, & indeed to accompliſh the decree, which heauen had appointed: ſhee with her ſonne Prince Edward and their French followers, landed vpon Eaſter Eue at Weymouth, and the Counteſſe of Warwicke at Porteſmouth, who hearing the ſorrowfull newes of her husbands death, tooke Sanctuary within the Abbey of Beaulieu. And Queene Margaret vnderſtanding of the loſſe of Barnet-field, withdrew aſide to the Abbey of Ceerne, vnto whom preſently reſorted Edmund Duke of Sommerſet, with Lord Iohn his brother; Iohn Courtney Earle of Deuonſhire, Iaſper Earle of Pembrooke, Iohn Lord Wenlock, and Iohn Longſtrother Prior of Saint Iohns.

(68) Theſe with many words of hope, comforted the ſorrowfull Queene, and proffered her their assistance to erect Prince Edward her sonne, though it were done with the losse of their owne liues, requiring her only to vndertake the authority of the war, and themselues would vndergo the charge and burden thereof, by whose valor and power, they doubted not to daunt the pride of the vsurping Edward; who now held himselfe sure, and beganne to grow careless. To these their resolutions the warlike Queene most gladly consented, and gaue all encouragements vnto them shee could; when falling in counsell how to proceed, her care (according to the naturall affection of a mother) was most vpon the safety and life of her sonne: and therefore aswel for their owne parts (if fortune should faile in this their first attempt) as for the feare which the Yorkist would possesse (who whiles Prince Edward his corriuall liued could not account the Diadem his Bride) shee thought it best to send him backe againe into France, till God had set the Crowne where it should stand: whence hee might supply them with new forces, or at leastwise ouer-awe Edward for tyrannizing too farre. But the Lords contrariwise alleadged, that Prince Edward being the morning Sunne of the Lancastrians hopes, and the rayes very splendent to most English eyes, was to be present in field himselfe, whose sight would both heat the courage of his owne Souldiers, and attract the glance of his aduersaries hearts, either to fight faintly, or else, and that rather, to come to his side. Thus their counsel at that time preuailed; and thus resolued, euery man departed to make ready his power, the Queene with her French repairing to Bath.

The opinions of the Lords.

(69) But Edward in London had not sate two daies in rest, before hee heard of Queene Margarets arriuage, and the confluence of people out of Cornwall, Deuonshire, and of the Westerne parts, which hourely flew to giue her assistance; wherefore committing to the Tower King Henry, and George Archbishoppe of Yorke with a selected company, he marched to meet them, intending to cut off many springs before they should ioyne to the body of a riuer, whose streame without danger could not be passed: therefore from Windsor, Abington, Chichester, and Malmesbury hee proceeded; seeking and vrging his enemies to battell: but the Queene and her forces fearing to abide in Bath, remoued to Bristow, Berkeley, and Gloucester, and lastly at Tewkesbury, Duke Somerset her Generall pitched down his Tents not staying the comming of the Earle of Pembroke: his battell he marshalled into three fights, whereof himselfe and his brother Iohn Lord Somerset lead the foreward; the middle Battalion was commanded by Edward the young Prince, vnder the conduct of the Lords Saint Iohn and Wenlocke, and the Rereward gouerned by Iohn Courtney Earle of Deuonshire, a mortall enemy against the house of Yorke.

(70) King Edward who was come now within sight of his enemies, diuided likewise his Army into 3. Battalions, cõmitting the Foreward vnto the guidance of his brother Richard D. of Gloucester a good Souldier, and of a deepe reach and policy: the Main hee vndertooke to gouerne himselfe, and the Rereward was commanded by the Lord Hastings his Chamberlaine. The field thus marshalled, and the signe of battell being giuen, a most bloudy fight beganne, the King had planted his Ordinance at most aduantage, which Gloucester frankly bestowed among the Dukes men, and they lodged betwixt ditches, bushes and hedges, with their showers of arrowes galled Gloucesters followers, so as by his command his battell gaue backe, as though they would shrinke, which Somerset no sooner perceiued, but that he came on, and ouercome with courage, came out of his strength, when by a certaine passage before hand prouided, he came vnto the place where King Edward was embattelled, thinking verily that Wenlocke had followed at his backe, who as it seemed meant nothing lesse.

The battell at Tewkesbury.

Edw. Hall.

(71) The aduantage espied, Duke Richard made good his retreat, and with fresh supplies of two hundred speares so charged Somerset, as his battell was disordered, and put to fearefull flight, himselfe recouering the Midle-ward, found there the L. Wenlock idle, whilest others were thus working for their liues, whom he most opprobriously reuiled in the termes of a Traitor, & with his Battell-axe stroke his braines out of his head; when presently Gloucester, and after him the King entred the Trench, wherein all of the Queenes part went to wracke; for there were slaine in this battell on her side Iohn L. Somerset, Iohn Courtney Earle of Deuonshire, the Lord Wenlocke in manner as wee haue said, Sir Iohn Delues, Sir Edward Hampden, Sir Robert Whittingham, and Sir Iohn Lewkener, with three thousand others besides.

(72) Among them that fled, Prince Edward was one, whome Sir Richard Crofts apprehended before hee got to Tewkesbury, but Edmund Duke of Somerset, Iohn Longstrother, Prior of Saint Iohns, many Knights and Esquiers tooke Sanctuary in the Abbey, and other places of the Towne, notwithstanding they were taken forth and arraigned before Richard Duke of Gloucester, who that day sate Constable of England, where they were condemned and had iudgement of death, which they immediatelie suffered vpon a Scaffold set vp in the Town. With these two Lords died twelue worthy Knights, besides others of inferior degrees.

(73) Then was Proclamation made for the apprehension of Prince Edward, promising to his taker an annuitie of an hundred pounds during his life, & if the Prince were liuing, his life to be spared, vpon which promises Sir Richard Crofts presented young Edward vnto the King, whom with a sterne countenance hee a while beheld, and as sternely demanded, how he durst so presumptuously with Banner displayed enter into his Realme; wherunto the Prince made this reply; to recouer (said hee) my fathers Kingdomes and his most rightfull inheritance possessed by his Father and Grandfather, and from him immediately belonging vnto me; how darest thou then which art his Subiect display thy colour against him thy Liege-Lord? which answere moued King Edward so much, as with his Gantlet hee dashed the Prince on his mouth, whom Richard Duke of Gloucester with others of the kings seruans most shamefully murthered, euen in his presence, and at his feete: whose body was buried without all solemnity among other poore and meane persons, in the church of the Monastery of the Blacke-Fryers in Tewkesburie.

(74) Queene Margaret in this fatall day of battell fled towards Worcester, and by the way tooke into a poore religious house in that her present distresse: but three dayes after shee was apprehended and brought vnto Worcester to King Edward, who committed her to sure and straite keeping, in which City she a while remained. But sodain news brought him, that the Northern men were in Armes, and meant to aduenture for her liberty, the Conquerour marched to Couentrie, and there made preparation further to proceed: which when these hote spirits pefectly vnderstood, their courages grew colder, & their weapons cast away, they came thronging to Edward to offer him subiection; yet the Lancastrians were not so minded, but rather intended once more to trie whether fortune would afford them her smile.

(75) A fitte instrument they had to forward the enterprise, namely Thomas Neuill bastard Fauconbridge sonne of Lord Fauconbridge Earle of Kent, a great supporter of King Edwards Crowne: howbeit this Bastard being a man of a turbulent spirit, and forward for action, Earle Warwicke had made him his Admirall to keepe the narrow seas, that none should haue way to strengthen King Edward, which his office he executed beyond his Commission, and became a taker of all Merchants goods, being aided with 300. Malecontents from Calleis.

(76) His

(76) His enterprise desperate, and his name growne fearefull at sea, hee meant to make it no lesse on the land; for putting in at Dower, many misgouerned and loose persons dayly drew to him, so as his power grew to bee seuenteene thousand strong: with these through Kent he made his way towards London, meaning to doe much, the land so molested with intestine warres; and lodging his hoast on the Southside of London, commanded the Citizens to giue him accesse, that with King Henry (whom hee meant to release from the Tower) he might passe through their streetes, to meet and encounter the vsurping Edward. But the Londoners knowing the rudenesse of these Rakehels kept their gates shut and garded the same with sufficient strengthes: whence some Lords of the royall bloud therein residing, sent vnto Edward of their present danger, who presently sent them fifteene hundred of his best Souldiers, after whom in person hee warily marched, leading with him his prisoner Queene Margaret, whose bounds hee well knew, gaue him the full scope of liberty.

(77) Fauconbridge in the meane while thirsting after spoile with his shippes secured the Thamesis aboue S. Katherines, purposing with his land Forces to passe the Riuer at Kingston: but hearing that Edward was on his March, and fearing to bee cut off from the benefite of his ships, hee altered his mind; when to open his way into London, hee caused the Bridge to bee fiered, and three thousand of his men being set ouer Thamesis by his ships, diuided themselues into two Companies, the one assaying to enter at Algate, and the other at Bishopsgate, both which they likewise set on fire, so that the Citie was in three places fired and assaulted at once, but with such euill successe to the assailants, that seuen hundred were slaine, and the bold Bastard driuen to his ships.

(78) Vpon the twentieth of May the Conquerour Edward with his Captiue Queen Margaret entred London, and so into the Tower, the one in pomp commanding the place at his pleasure, the other in teares to remaine a most pensiue prisoner, where her husband, the downcast King Henry was kept in hard durance. The place being thus charged with the presence of two Kings and their Queens: the Crokebacke of Gloceſter intended to cleare by taking him away, that stood in his brothers way, whose successor as is thought hee then meant to bee; and making his inward mind more deformed then were his outward lineaments, without regard of bloud-defiled hands, stabbed the most innocent Henry to the heart with his dagger, in which act at once beganne the ones happy rest, and the others foule guilt, which accompanied his conscience to the day of his death.

(79) The body of this murthered King was vpon the Ascention Eue laide in an open Coffin, and from the Tower guarded with many bils and glaues, was so carryed through the streetes vnto the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul, where it rested vncouered one day, and beganne to bleed againe afresh, a sorrowfull spectacle to most of the beholders, and thence was it carried to the Blacke-Fryers Church, where it likewise lay bare faced, and bled as before, all men being amazed at the sorrowfull sight, and lastly, it was put in a boat without Priest, Clerke, Torch or Taper, singing or saying, and was ferried vnto the Abbey of Chertsey in Surrey, & there without pompe enterred. But afterwards King Henry the seuenth translated his body vnto his Castle of Windsor, where in a new Tombe at the entrance into the Chancell of the Chappell, and south dore of the Quier, it was princely bestowed, but since the Tombe is remoued, and where the Corps is now laid is not vulgarly knowne.

(80) Thus liued and thus dyed this innocent and iust King, who had beene proclaimed in his Cradle, crowned in his Infancy, and againe at more age had the Emperiall Diadem of France set on his head, liuing vprightly, louing his Subiects, and raigning thirty eight yeeres, was in that time tossed with variable successe, for twice he was imprisoned, and depriued of his Crowne, betrayed, smitten, and wounded, and in all things became a worthy example of fortunes vnconstancy: hee was of stature very seemly, of body slender, of face beautifull, and by a naturall inclination abhorred all vice, farre from pride, giuen to prayer, well read in the Scriptures, vsing works of Charity, and so chast, as no suspition of incontinency could be conceiued in him: nay, so farre to the contrary, that when certaine Ladies presented themselues before him in a maske, with their haire loose, and their breasts vncouered (hee then a Bachelour, and able of marriage) hee immediately rose vp, and departed the presence, saying, fie, fie, forsooth yee are to blame. Oath he vsed none, but in weighty matters, his affirmation was forsooth, and forsooth, very mercifull to the poore, and so pittifull to Malefactors, as he commanded the quarters of Traitors to be taken downe from the Gates, and buried, and so farre from reuenge, that hee willingly pardoned the greatest offences against him; for a Ruffian intending his death, wounded him in the side with his sword, what time he lay prisoner in the Tower, and being restored to his kingly estate, he freely forgaue the fact; and another like Ruffian striking him on the face, hee punished with this onely reprehension, forsooth you are to blame to strike mee your Annointed King: for these and his other patient vertues, King Henry the 7. assayed to haue him canonized a Saint: but Pope Iulius the 2. demanding too great a summe, the King went no further in the suite: notwithstanding, in the repute of the vulgar hee was taken for no lesse, so as his red hat which hee had worne, healed the head-ach, when it was put on, as the simple beleeued.

(81) The monument of his zeale to true piety, and care for posterities, are his famous Colledges of Eaton and Cambridge, the Chappell of which last, shewes the magnificence that the whole should haue beene of, had their Founder raigned to haue finished them himselfe: for the performance whereof hee enfeoffed certaine Bishops with other noble personages by his letters Patents with lands and possessions, to the yeerely value of thirty foure hundred pounds very neere: but as his life ended, before that nature had thereunto set her owne seale; so these remain vnperfected of the excellent beauties intended, which their zealous Founder meant to haue adorned them withall.

(82) And his sorrowfull Queene Margaret, who twentie sixe yeeres before this his death, with all pompe and royalty had beene crowned Queene of England, and had ruled all in all, now a poore Prisoner in distresse and wants, weates out her time in teares and laments, and wisheth for nothing more then the day of her death; which Duke Reiner her Father well vnderstanding, made suite to King Edward to haue her released by ransome; and lastly, bought her liberty at so deare a rate, as hee first pawned, and afterward solde to Lewis the French King, the Kingdomes of Naples, and of both the Sicils to pay and repay the price of her redemption, vnto which poore father, this sorrowfull daughter returned, and ended her aged dayes, where shee had begun the dayes of her life.

(83) Victorious Edward thus leading Mars chained to his Chariot, and now himselfe led by Fortune to the high chaire of Estate, sits an absolute Monarch sure, and without opposite, vnto whose rayes all eyes tume a submissiue aspect: onely bastard Fauconbridge departed, from London (as we haue said) and withdrew vnto Sandwich with his disquiet crew, made shew to doe much, and did somewhat more then befitting, by rape, and robbing, where those rude Mariners came, which Edward hearing of, hasted to Canterbury in person himselfe, fully resolued to weede vp by the rootes those new sprowted

Baſtard Fauconbridge beheaded.

A.D. 1472.

(84) In which times of feare, Iaſper Earle of Pembrooke, with his Nephew young Henry Earle of Richmond, fled into Britaine, where, of that Duke they were moſt courteouſly entertained, with aſſurance made, that no wrong ſhould be offred them, during their ſtay in his dominions. And ſo theſe two Earles the vncle and nephew, there attended the day of their wiſhed ſucceſſe.

Henry of Richmond fled into Britaine.

(85) But Iohn Earle of Oxford, who had withdrawne himſelfe from Barnet field firſt into Wales, and thence into France, was farre more vnpatient of thoſe rough times, for hauing gotten ſtore of prouiſion by ſtrong hand at Sea, with ſeauentie ſeuen men only ſurprized Saint Michaels Mount in Cornewall, and made that peece good againſt the King, which he kept and reuictualled, but whether by force or fauour King Edward much ſuſpected, and therefore the more willingly came to a compoſition with his Subiect, who vpon the pardon of his life deliuered the Mount to the King: and as ſome ſay the rather, for that his minde was then troubled with many ominous ſignes. For certaine Bournes about this time burſt out of the Earth, as Woe-mere at Market in the County of Bedford, whoſe name carried the quality of his nature. In Kent, at Canterburie, Leuiſham, and Langley Parke, at Croyden in Surrey, and at Hungerwill neere Dudley Caſtle one running verie foule: all of them predictions, as that credulous age beleeued, of great troubles to come: and therefore not truſting a new reconciled enemie, King Henrie ſent the ſaid Earle Priſoner vnto the Caſtle of Hames in Normandy, where he remained the ſpace of twelue yeeres, during the raigne of the King, moſt ſecurelie guarded, and ſo ſtraitly kept, as Lady Margaret his Counteſſe could not be ſuffered to haue acceſſe vnto him, in all that time. Neither was ſhee allowed any thing out of his reuenewes, or from the king, to maintaine her eſtate, but was forced to liue vpon the Charity of others, & by the workes that ſhee made with her Needle; both of them very ſhort to ſupply her great wants. This vnmercifull and almoſt vnhumane vſage, was the more extremely followed, for that Oxford himſelfe, his father and brother, had euer ſided with the Lancaſtrians. And her ſelfe being ſiſter vnto Richard Duke of Warwicke, the Capitall obſtacle againſt king Edwards proceedings, was held either dangerous, if her wealth ballanced her birth and eſtate, or elſe vnworthy of his fauour, whoſe good fortunes as was ſuggeſted, ſhee euer maligned.

(86) But much more miſerable was the eſtate of Lord Henry Holland, Duke of Exceſter, and Earle of Huntington, who flouriſhed ſo long, as king Henries pillar ſtood crowned on his baſe, and the Lancaſtrians (of whoſe houſe himſelfe was) ouerſwaid the times; he being the ſonne of Lady Elizabeth the ſecond daughter of Iohn of Gaunt, and hauing married the ſiſter of Edward the then raigning King, was notwithſtanding driuen to ſuch want, as he may ſerue an example to all, how vncertaine Adams ſons are of any continuing greatnes. For (ſaith Philip Comines) I once ſaw the Duke of Exceſter runne on foote bare legged, after the Duke of Burgundies traine, begging his bread for Gods ſake, but he vttered not his name, he being the neereſt of the houſe of Lancaſter, and brother in law vnto King Edward, and being knowne what he was, Burgundy gaue him a ſmall penſion to maintaine his eſtate.

(87) But when King Henrie was againe reſtored, & the Title of the Crowne laid vpon the ſucceſſe of Barnet-field, this man Lord Henrie bare himſelfe moſt brauely againſt king Edward, and in fight was ſtrucke downe, and left for dead, where, in his bleeding woundes he lay moſt part of the day, but yet recouering, and got to Weſtminſter, he there tooke Sanctuary to ſaue his life, for which, he became Suiter vnto the king, but his wife Lady Anne ſiſter vnto king Edward, ſued as earneſtly for a diuorce, which with great inſtancy ſhee laſtly obtained againſt him. How he releaſed himſelfe from the wrath of the king, is vncertaine, and how he came by his death no man can tell, for his body was found caſt vpon the ſhoare of Kent, as though he had periſhed by ſhipwracke vpon the Sea.

Ed. Hall.

(88) Now Edward to finiſh all factions, thought beſt to lop off both bough and branch, that gaue any ſhadow to the Lancaſtrians deſignes, to which end he rather picked, then found occaſion of treaſon, in George Neuill Archbiſhop of Yorke, whoſe goods, lands, and Lordſhips, he ſeized vpon, got poſſeſſion of his rich plate and Iewels, whereof one in his Miter was of ſuch valew, as the King cauſed it to be ſet in his Imperiall Crowne, and the Archbiſhop to be ſent ouer Sea to the Caſtle of Hames, where he remained a Priſoner a long time after, with no ſuch curteous intertainement, as himſelfe had vſed to Edward when he was Priſoner.

(89) But the eſcape of Pembrooke and Earle Richmond troubled the King not a little, the onely men now left to bandy againſt them, and therefore were moſt followed with a ſuſpicious eye. In ſomuch as Edward wrote vnto the Duke of Britaine their receiuer, with promiſes of heapes of gold to haue them ſent backe and deliuered vnto his hands: but the Duke that had giuen them his ſafetie before, anſwered the Engliſh Ambaſſadors, that it ſtood not with honour, ſo to betray theſe diſtreſſed Princes, fled to him for relief, yet, he faithfully vndertook, that they ſhould be ſo followed, as King Edward ſhould ſleepe quiet from their moleſtations, which being no better, Edward notwithſtanding made the beſt of it.

(90) All now in quiet, and Edward raigning without any Competitor, or malignant diſturber, cauſed a high Court of Parliament to be aſſembled at Weſtminſter, wherein he reeſtabliſhed thoſe Acts, which Henrie had abrogated, and abrogated thoſe that were made againſt his fauourites; at which ſeaſon the Duke of Burgundie ſent his Ambaſſadors vnto Edward, crauing his aide againſt the French King, which was the more willingly heard and granted, as well for his fauors receiued of the Duke, in time of his neceſſitie, as for ſpleene againſt Lewis, who had aided Warwicke to diſpoſſeſſe him of his Crowne. And indeed this was a ſparke, that was likely to ſet the hearts of the Engliſh on fire, to recouer France loſt by Henrie the laſt King.

(91) All things in a readineſſe King Edward repaired to Douer, and there embarked himſelfe for Callis, with the greateſt Army that euer from England ſet ſailes into France: for he had in his Companie fifteen hundred Noble-men, and men at Armes, all of them mounted, and moſt of them barbed, who with the Archers on horſebacke alſo made vp the number of fifteene thouſand, beſides a great number of footemen and others to pitch Tents, to attend the Artillerie, and incloſe their Campes. Before the Kings departure from England, he had ſent Garter King at Armes vnto King Lewis with a letter of defiance: whoſe contents demanded no leſſe, then the whole Realme of France, which if he refuſed, hee threatned to inuade his dominions with fire and ſword.

(92) The letter receiued, and read in ſecret by Lewis himſelfe, he priuately ſent for, and conferred with with the Herald, telling him that it was not Edward, but Burgundy that raked abroad these dying sinders, who as a man discomfited & vnfurnished for warre, would draw in the English, by his slie dealings, to their inestimable Charges, to supply his defects; that Burgundy being of the house of Lancaster hated most deadly the family of Yorke; and more for feare then loue married Edwards sister. As touching the Constable he told him, though Edward had married his Neece, yet hee would deceiue him, as he had done his owne Master of France, who had heaped manie and extraordinary benefits vpon him. And lastly with the gift of three hundred Crownes, and the promise of a thousand more, he instigated the Herald to worke a peace. Gartar very thankefullie tooke the French gold, and counselled Lewis to send a Herault vnto his Master King Edward to demand a safe-conduct for conference: and so openly rewarded with thirtie Elles of Crimson-veluet he departed.

(93) King Lewis nothing so pompous as other Princes are, nor attended with Heraulds continually in his Court, was therefore inforced vnto this present shift: he caused a seruant of the Lord Hales to be arraied like an herauld in a trumpets banner, and sent him in hast into King Edwards Camp; where hauing audience, he shewed the great desire the King his Master had of peace, whose amity with England he had euer held, excusing his receit of Warwicke with the necessity of time, whom he aided not against Edward, but against Burgundy, who as he instantly alleaged, had now drawne the English to this excessiue charges, that he might thereby conclude a better composition for himselfe, and to amend the broken state of his owne affaires; lastly he desired that the King of England would grant a safe-conduct vnto the Ambassadors of the French King his Master, who should more fully informe his Maiestie, and giue his safe-conduct for a further conference in these affaires: and so wisely this counterfeit worded his message, that the King and Nobles liked well the ouerture, and thereupon granting a safe-conduct sent with him an English Herauld, to receiue the like and other assignements from the French King.

(94) But when the Duke of Burgundy vnderstood that a peace was trauersed betwixt Edward & Lewis, he stormed not a little, and with no small hast from Lutzenburgh accompanied with sixteene horse only, came to his brother King Edward, and in a great rage reproued him of breach of promise, and vncourteous requitall of his former kindnes, that thus would enter amity with his great foe, and in outward semblance more ready to bite then to barke, burst into these reproofes.

"Haue you (quoth hee) brother, passed the "Seas, entred France, and without killing of a poore "flie, or burning of a silly Sheepecote taken a shame-"full truce? Oh S. George! did Edward your noble "Ancestor euer make Armie into France, and retur-"ned without battell or Conquest? That victori-"ous Prince King Henry the fifth (as neere of kinne "vnto you as me) whose blood you haue either "rightfullie or wrongfully (God knoweth) extin-"guished and destroied, with a small puissance con-"quered Normandy, kept it, and neuer would come "to composition, till he had the whole kingdome of "France offred him, and was made heire apparant "vnto that Crowne. Contrariwise you without a-"ny thing done, proffer of battell, or gaine of honor "haue now condiscended vnto a peace as profitable "for England as is a poore peascod: haue I (thinke "you) for my particular vse drawne the English for-"ces into France (which am able of my selfe to de-"fend mine owne cause?) I tell you plainly no, but "rather to aid you, to recouer your ancient Territo-"ries wrongfully withholden: and that you shall wel "know I need not your aide, I will heare of no truce "with the French, till three moneths after your arri-"uage in England at the least; And thereupon "furiously arising, he threw downe the Chaire, "wherein he had sate and offred to depart.

K. Edwards reply to his brother of Burgundy.

(95) "Nay stay brother Charles (quoth K. Edward) "sith I with patience haue heard you speake what "you would, you shall now perforce heare from me "what you would not: First therefore for my thus "entrance into France, no man knoweth the occasion "better then your selfe: for, mauger your owne great "power you speake of; you doe remember I know, "how the French King tooke from you the faire "Towne Amiens, and the strong Pile Saint Quintins, "with diuers other peeces which you neither durst, "nor were able either to rescue or defend, since "which time he hath gotten from you, your best bo-"some friends and secret Counsellors, so as your "selfe stood in doubt (determining to besiege Nusse) "whether the losse would be greater in your absence "(the French King waiting as a fox for his pray) or "gaine more in Germany by your power and pre-"sence: and to keepe this wolfe from your fold, "was the principall cause why you so earnestly prai-"ed me, and continually sollicited me to passe ouer "the Seas, promising mountaines, but performing "not a Mole-hill, bragging a supply both of horse "and foote, but neuer sent me a hoofe, nor a lackie. "Thinke you (brother) if wee had entred this enter-"prize in our owne quarrell, we would haue expe-"cted your aide? I assure you nothing lesse, for if "we had intended any such Conquest, we would "with Souldiers fire and sword, haue so infected the "aire with the flames and staine of France, as should "haue annoied your Countreys of Flaunders and "Brabant, and giuen you leasure to sit still and tell of "our euer atchieued great victories, nothing doub-"ting but to haue gotten and kept with like man-"hood, and in as great glorie, as any of our Ance-"stors before vs had done. But the occasion of "warre being yours, and you wilfully (I will not say "cowardly) neglecting the same, I meane not to pro-"secute, for the French King neuer offended me nor "my Subiects, except in fauouring Warwicke against "me, nay I may say against you, and now offreth "such honorable ouertures of peace, which I by "Gods grace meane not to forsake, but will obserue "and keepe. God send you ioy thereof, quoth "the Duke, and so abruptly departed from the King.

Burgundy departeth displeased from King Edward.

(96) The peace thus resolued vpon, betwixt the two kings of England and France, the place appointed for conference was neere vnto Amiens, and the parties assigned for the French, were the Bastard of Bourbon Admirall of France, the Lord S. Pierre, and the Bishop of Eureux. For the English, were the Lord Howard, Sir Thomas St. Leger, and Doctor Morton Lord Chancellor of England. These meeting, presentlie fell to a conclusion of peace: the conditions whereof were: That the French King should forthwith pay to the King of England seuenty two thousand Crownes. That the Dauphin should marrie Lady Elizabeth, King Edwards eldest daughter, and that shee should haue for her maintenance the Dutchy of Guienne, or else fifty thousand Crownes yeerely to be paid in the Tower of London, for nine yeeres space. This peace was so acceptable to King Lewis, as he sent sixteene thousand Crownes to bee distributed amongst the English Souldiers, with plate and great presents to men of any sort: & indeed gaue them such entertainment in Amiens as was most bounteous, whereof if any desire further to know, let him read Comines vpon the same text.

(97) To graft which peace with a louing beginning, the two Kings were desirous to see each others, for which end Commissioners were sent to assigne the place: and lastly agreed, that the Towne Picquigny about three leagues from Amiens, seated in a bottome, through which the Riuer Some ranne, was the fittest: ouer which a strong bridge was built, and in the midst thereof, a grate made ouer-chwart with barres, no wider asunder then a man might well thrust in his Arme, couered with boords ouer head to auoid the raine, & the bridge so broad that twelue might stand in a rancke on both sides.

A.D.1475. Aug.29.

(98) The day approched, and the two Kings come to the place, hee of France came first to the Grate, accompanied with twelue personages, as was the appointment; wherof Iohn Duke of Bourbon and the Cardinall his brother were the chiefest: King Edward entring the bridge on the other end, with his brother the Duke of Clarence, the Earle of Northumberland, the Lord Hastings his Chamberlaine, and the Lord Chancellor, himselfe apparelled all in cloth of gold, with a rich Iewell of precious stones, in forme of a Flower de Luce: aduanced forward, and within fiue foote of the Grate, put off his cap, and bowed his knee within halfe a foote to the ground. King Lewis as readily doing his likely reuerence vnto Edward. Where, after imbracements through the Grate, the Chancellour of England who was Prelate and Bishop of Ely, made an eloquent and learned Oration, which done, he read the Articles of peace and demanded the Kings whether these were done with their full consents. Which granted by both: either of them laying their one hand vpon the Missall, and the other vpon the Holy-Crosse, tooke their solemne Oathes to obserue the same. And then falling into a more familiar and Courtly Complementall conference, King Lewis told K. Edward that he would one day inuite him to Paris, there to Court his faire French Ladies, with whom if hee committed any sinne, he merrily told him, that Cardinall Bourbon, should be his Confessor, whose penance would be the easier, for that Bourbon vsed to busse faire Ladies himselfe; which no sooner was spoken, or howsoeuer meant, but Edward was as forward of thankes and acceptance, and indeed so ready, that King Lewis rounding Commines his bosome seruant in his eare, told him flatly he liked not Edwards forwardnes to Paris, too many English Princes hauing beene there before: and thus the conference ended, and king Edwards busines in France, hee returned into England, and into the City of London was receiued little lesse then in triumph-wise.

A.D.1475. Sept.28.

(99) But though Edwards fortunes thus outwardly flourished, yet inward feares nipped his still troubled mind, one branch hauing sappe, whose growth hee much feared would shadow his Crowne, which was Henry Earle of Richmond, aliue and at liberty in the Duke of Britaines Court. To bring therefore his purpose to passe, hee sent D. Stillington and others, Ambassadors vnto Frances Duke of Britaine, with store of gold and good words, as that hee meant to match his eldest daughter Lady Elizabeth vnto the young Earle of Richmond, whereby all cause of dissentions might at once be cut off: the Duke thinking no danger where the water went smooth, easily consented to shippe him thereon; but ere the prey was embarked, hee had knowledge that the voyage should cost young Henry his life; wherefore in all hast hee sent his Treasurer Peter Landoys to preuent it, who secretly told Richmond what marriage-bed Edward intended; whereat the distressed Earle amazed, was put to his shifts, and for want of better, tooke Sanctuary at S. Malos, where the English his conductors lay for a wind.

Henry Earle of Richmond sought after by K. Edward.

Henry Earle of Richmond taketh Sanctuary.

(100) The Earle thus escaped, the Ambassadors complained to the Duke, imputing the fault as far as they durst vnto him, who had not dealt like a good Marchant to take their money, and to retain the wares; his answere was, the deliuery was good, but themselues negligent Factors, that made not the commodity to their best aduantage. And yet for the loue hee bare to their King, hee vndertooke that Richmund should be sure kept either in Sanctuary, or else in prison, whence as hee promised hee should not escape: And so with a flea in their eare, they returned, hauing cleared Edward of his money, and care for sure keeping of Henry, who though hee were sore displeased with Stillingtons simplicity, yet the promises that the Duke of Britaine had made, much mitigated and eased his mind.

The English Ambassador complaineth to the Duke of Britaine.

His Answere.

(101) And now the Realme quiet, no warre in hand, nor none towards (but such as no man looked should happen;) hee framed himselfe so to the peoples affections, and held their hearts not in a constrained feare, but with as louing and ready obedience as any King attaining the Crowne by his sword euer had. Nor was euer any Prince more familiar with his Subiects then this King Edward was, who now hauing his tribute truly paid from France, and all things prospering as was desired, he set heart vpon pleasure, which hetherto had beene afflicted with continuall turmoile: yea and often laid from him the state of a Prince, and would accompany and conuerse with his meane subiects: a loadstone that doth naturally attract the English hearts; among many others we of London remember this to our grace. Vnto Windsore he sent for the Lord Maior of London, the Aldermen and others, vpon no other occasion, then to hunt in his company, and himselfe to be merry with them: As also at another time he did the like in Waltham, where he gaue them most familiar intertainment, and sent to the Lady Mairesse and her sisters two harts, sixe Buckes, and a Tunne of wine, which wanne more loue then manifold their worthes.

(102) Somewhat he was giuen to Court and conuerse with faire Ladies, which fault was well noted and preuented by King Lewis, for his French dames: but in England he had liberty with very large scope, for besides the Lady Lucy and others, by whome he had issue, three concubines he kept, and those of three diuers, and seuerall dispositions, as himselfe would often confesse, one the merriest, another the wiliest, and the third the holiest harlot in his realme, as one whom no man could get out of the Church vnlesse it were to his Bed, the merriest was Shores wife, of whom hereafter we shall speake, the other two were greater Personages, but in their humility are content to bee nameless, and to forbeare the praise of those properties.

(103) This fault of the King did not greatly offend the people: for one mans pleasure could not extend to the displeasures of manie, it being done without violence, and in his latter daies lessened and well left. But a farre more greater sinne and reproach he fell into, among his other Princely disports: For being on progresse in Warwickeshire, and hunting in Arrow Parke, belonging to Thomas Burdet Esquire, with the death of much Game he slew a White Bucke greatly esteemed of the said Burdet, who vnderstanding thereof, wished his hornes in his Belly, that moued the King to kill the same Bucke, whereof he was accused and condemned of treason, his wordes being drawne, to wish the hornes in the Kings bellie: for which beheaded hee was at Tiburne, and buried in the Gray-Fryers Church at London.

(104) But a more lamentable tragedie happened vnto the land, by the death of George Duke of Clarence the Kings second brother, who being accused of high Treason, was committed to the Tower, where he soone after ended his life. His attainder was, that the said Duke had caused diuerse of his seruants to enforme the people, that Thomas Burdet his seruant likewise, was wrongfully put to death: and further laboured (through their reports) to make the world beleeue, that K. Edward wrought by Nigromancie, and vsed to poison such subiects as he hated: And also that the said Duke vpon purpose to exalt himselfe and his heires to the Regall dignitie, most falsely and vntruly published that the King was a Bastard, and therefore not capable of raigne. Moreouer that he induced diuerse of the Kings naturall subiects to be sworne vpon the blessed Sacrament, vnto him and his heires, without any other reseruations of their allegiance: for which intent (as there was alleaged) leaged) hee had gotten an exemplification vnder the great Seale of King Henry the sixt, that if the said king and his sonne Prince Edward died without issue male, the said Duke and his heires should inioy the Crowne: For these in a Parliament begun at Westminster the fifteenth of Ianuary he was attainted of high treason: but whether guiltie or guiltles, to men (saith Grafton) that haue made large inquisition, yea and of such as were of no small authority in those daies, the certaintie thereof was hid, and could not truly be disclosed, but by coniectures, which as often deceiue the imaginations of fantasticall folke, as declare truth to them in their conclusions.

(105) I am not ignorant that some haue alleaged the cause of this Noble mans death to arise from a foolish prophecie (whereof saith Comines) the Englishmen are neuer vnfurnished, & this as the Cabalists, who vsed to make an art of their letters, gaue forth forsooth that a G. should raigne after an E. which must needes be George Duke of Clarence, though Gloucester more craftie lay in winde for the game. This indeed troubled the King not a little, but the Queene and her blood much more, and therefore of both King and Queene Duke George was mistrusted, and greatly maligned in all that he did. Who now a widower (for warwicks daughter was dead) sent vnto his sister Margaret the Dutchesse of Burgundie, to worke a marriage for him with her husbands daughter the Lady Marie. Against which the Queene most earnestly interposed her selfe, and sollicited the Ladie in the behalfe of Lord Anthonie Earle Riuers her brother, whereby great discontent was ministred to the Duke, and new iealousies daily bred in the Kings breast.

(106) Iohn Serres the French Historian interlacing the life of King Lewis with the Acts of K. Edward and his brethren, saith confidently, that the English King so much affected the league and alliance with France, as that he caused his brother Clarence to be put in prison, because he intended to haue past the Seas to succour the Dowager of Burgundie Ladie Margaret his sister, vpon whose Territories King Lewis encroached, after the death of Duke Charles her husband slaine at the battell of Nancy.

(107) But howsoeuer Clarence had offended, certaine it is, that he was found guilty by the foresaid Parliament, and the eleuenth of March following, after he had offered his Masse-penny in the Tower of London, was drowned in a But of Malmesey, whose body was buried at Tewkesburie in Glocestershire, by the bodie of his Dutchesse Ladie Isabell Countesse of Warwicke, who being with Child, died of poison a little before. And although the King had consented to his death, yet no sooner was it done, but that he wished it againe vndone, and was so greeued at the remembrance, as when anie made suite for the life of a condemned, he would openly say: Oh vnfortunate brother, for whose life no man would make suite. This good Duke (for so was he called) left issue behind him, Edward Earle of Warwicke and Margaret afterwards Countesse of Salisbury, both of them infants, and followers of their fathers fortunes: he a continuall Prisoner, at foure and twentie yeeres of age vnder Henry the seauenth, was beheaded vpon the Tower-hill; and shee at sixtie two, lost hers within the Tower, and time of King Henrie the eight.

(108) But how dainty soeuer King Edward was of the breach of amitie, betwixt him and the French King, in regard whereof he suffered Mary the yong Dutchesse of Burgundy the daughter of his owne sisters husband to bee molested by intrusion of the French, and all in fauour of the contract commenced betweene the Daulphin & Lady Elizabeth his daughter, yet did Lewis for his part but dally and driue out time: For Ambassadors imploied for the full accomplishing thereof, they of France came either without commission, or those recalled, the new were sent without instructions, while indeed Lewis was working for his sonne another way: First to match him with Mary Dutches of Burgundy, but that refused, with Margaret of Flaunders daughter to Duke Maximilian sonne to Frederick the Emperor: and to hold the world from suspition, in the meane while Ladie Elizabeth the Infanta of England was in the French Court vsually called Madame the Daulphin, and all things in France so soundly carried, as Edward suspected no leake in the Caske: for now growne fat and vnable for paines, he both gloried in his nine famous victories at home atchieued, and seemed sufficientlie satisfied, that his yeerely tribute from France was so truly paied.

Lady Elizabeth called Madame the Daulphin.

(109) At the same time Iames the third of that name King of Scotland, sent his Ambassadors vnto Edward to obtaine the Lady Cicelie the Kings second daughter to be ioined in marriage with his sonne Iames the young Prince, which was well liftened vnto, by Edward and his Counsell, and least the motion should goe backe, a great summe of money lent to the Scottish King with this condition, that at a certain time appointed, it should be at K. Edwards choise, whether his daughter should match with that Prince, or else to haue the said summe againe repaid. Against which alliance and league (as Lesly reporteth,) Lewis of France much repined, and to annihilate the same sent D^r. Ireland, a certaine knight, and another religious man, to moue King Iames to make warre against England.

A.D. 1480. Io. Lesle, Lady Cicely motioned in marriage vnto Iames Prince of Scotland.

(110) These no Peace-makers for Christ, but firebrands of Belial, blew the smothered sparkes of dissention into a flame of bloody warre, which fell the more heauy vpon Scotland, for that K. Iames much wedded vnto his owne will, and altogether ruled by men of meane worth, whom himselfe had aduanced from nothing, had not only neglected by their instigations the loue of his Nobles, but also banished the Realme of Scotland, Alexander Duke of Albany his second brother; and had caused the veines of Iohn Earle of Marre his other brother, to be opened, whereby he bled to death; these and other discontents alienated his Subiects hearts from him, which laid the land more open vnto the English Inuaders; and yet to draw them more deadly against him, relying vpon his owne valor, and the assistance of France, he sent word vnto Edward, that he should not aid his owne sister of Burgundy against K. Lewis, being the Scots Allie; as also with threats of warre commanded him to deliuer to his Ambassadors, the Duke of Albanie (then residing in the English Court) and lastlie to make good and repay dammages done vpon the Scottish Borders.

Lewis King of France interposeth the contract betwixt Prince Iames and Ladie Margaret.

Iames King of Scotland much wedded to his owne will.

Alexander Duke of Albanie banished Scotland. Iohn Earle of Marre bled to death.

(111) King Edward not a little inraged at these double dealings, euen in the winter season mustered his men, prepared his artillery, and rigged his ships, that nothing should be vnready at the next Spring; which no sooner was come, but that he ordained for his Lieutenant his brother Richard Duke of Glouce-ster, who with Henrie Earle of Northumberland, Thomas Lord Stanley, the Lord Louell, Greistock and others, (the Duke of Albany marching vnto Glouceſters banner) with twenty thousand strong repaired into the North: and first besieged the strong Towne Berwick, then entring the chiefe City Edenborough, vrged K. Iames to performe his couenants, concerning the marriage betwixt Prince Iames his sonne, with Lady Cicely before agreed vpon, threatning destruction if the match went not forward. The Scottish Nobility considering the eminent danger, put to death the wicked Counsellers of their King, ordained the Duke of Albany the Vicegerent of Scotland, and promised to repay the money receiued according to Couenants; after which with the deliuery of the strong Towne Berwicke, which had beene out of the Englishs possession the space of one and twentie yeers, a generall peace was concluded betwixt the two Realmes. Whereupon not long after, Garter King at armes was sent into Scotland, with an Instrument in writing vnto the Prouost and Burgesses of Edenburgh,

K. Iames threatneth warre against England.

Richard Duke of Glocester made the Kings Lieutenant against Scotland.

The Duke of Glocester entreth Scotland.

Berwicke deliuered to the English.

burgh (who had vndertaken to diſburſe the money) to ſignifie King Edwards minde touching the marriage intended, and to demand the ſaid ſumme by a day aſſigned, which accordingly was repaide.

(112) The marriage with Scotland thus broken off, for the Lady Cicely, by K. Edward himſelfe; that with France for the Princeſſe Elizabeth, both he and his Queene greatly deſired, and daily ſought after. But Lewis the French King, finding the daughter of Auſtrich more fit for his ſonne, dallied out Edward with ſhewes of firme faith, till he had effected the thing he went about: which muſicke ſounded ſo harſhly in the Engliſh Kings eare, as in no wiſe hee would ſuffer that ſtring to be touched, but euer beleeued that the French meant him faire play, and although the yeeres of the parties themſelues might beget ſome ſuſpition, ſhee being much elder then the Daulphin, and the truth thereof confirmed by the Duke of Auſtriches Leger-Ambaſſadours reſiding in England, yet Edward would not ſo much as ſuppoſe a ſuſpect againſt the French King, and therefore ſuffered Lewis to incroach vpon thoſe parts of Picardie that ioyned to Callis, and to gaine time till it was paſt recall: for then the Lord Howard returning from France, confidently told him that hee was preſent, and ſaw the Lady Margaret of Auſtrich, daughter to Duke Maximilian, ſonne to the Emperour Frederick, receiued vnto France with great pompe & royaltie: and at Ambois contracted and eſpouſed to the Daulphin.

Phil. Comines, lib. 6. chap. 2. and 9.

King Lewis dallieth with King Edward.

King Edward would not beleeue what was confidently tolde him.

(113) Edward mightily chafed to be thus worked by Lewis, made great preparation for France; but whether with anger, griefe, or melancholy, hee fell into a dangerous and deadly ſickneſſe; ſome ſay, of a ſuperfluous ſurfeit, whereunto he was much giuen: Commines ſaith, of a Catarrhe, which weake eſtate turned his minde another way: for calling his Lords into his ſicke preſence, and raiſing his faint body vpon his Bed-Pillowes, theſe words vnto them hee laſtly ſpake:

A warre pretended againſt France.

King Edward falleth ſicke.

Them. More, King Edwards ſpeeches at his death.

"(114) My Lords, my deare Kinſmen, & Allies; "in what plight I lie, you ſee, and I feele; by which "the leſſe while I looke to liue with you, the more "deepely am I mooued to care in what caſe I leaue "you; for ſuch as I leaue you, ſuch bee my children "like to finde you. Which if they ſhould (that "God forbid) finde you at variance, might hap to "fall themſelues at warre, ere their diſcretion would "ſerue to ſet you at peace. Yee ſee their youth, of "which I reckon the only ſurety to reſt in your con-"cord. For it ſufficeth not that all you loue them, "if each of you hate other. If they were men, your "faithfulneſſe happely would ſuffice: but child-"hood muſt bee maintained by mens authoritie, "and ſlippery youth vnderpropped with elder "counſell; which neither they can haue, vnleſſe you "giue it, nor you giue it, if you agree not. For "where each laboureth to breake that which the "other maketh, and through hatred of each others "perſon impugneth each others counſel, there muſt "it needs be long, or any good concluſion goe for-"ward: And while eyther party ſtriueth to bee "chiefe, flatterie ſhall haue more play then plaine "and faithfull aduiſe, of which muſt needs inſue the "euill bringing vp of the Prince; whoſe minde in "tender youth infected, ſhall readily fall to riot and "miſchiefe, and draw downe with him his noble "Realme vnto ruine: but if grace turne him to "wiſdome: which if God ſend, then they that by e-"uill meanes before pleaſed him beſt, ſhall after fall "furtheſt out of fauour, ſo that euer at length euill "drifts draw to nought, and good plaine wayes pro-"ſper. Great variance hath there long time beene "betweene you, not alwayes for great cauſes. Som-"time a thing right well intended, our miſconſtru-"ctions turneth vnto worſe, or a ſmall diſpleaſure "done vs, either our own affections or euill tongues "agreeueth. But this wot I well, ye neuer had ſo "great cauſe of hatred, as you haue of loue. That we "be all men, that wee be Chriſtian men, this ſhall I "leaue for Preachers to tell you (and yet I wot nere "whether any Preachers words ought more to "moue you, then his, that is by and by, going to the "place that they all preach of.) But this I ſhall de-"ſire you to remember, that the one part of you is "of my bloud, the other of my Allies; and each of "you with other, either of kinred or affinitie; which "ſpirituall kindred of affinitie, if the Sacraments of "Chriſts Church beare that weight with vs, that "would to God they did, ſhould no leſſe moue vs "to charitie, then the reſpect of fleſhly conſangui-"nitie. Our Lord forbid, that you loue together the "worſe for the ſelfe cauſe, that you ought to loue "the better. And yet that happeneth, and no where "finde we ſo deadly debate, as among them, which "by nature and law ought moſt to agree together. "Such a peſtilent ſerpent is ambition, and deſire of "vaine glory and ſouerraintie which among ſtates "where it once entreth, creepeth forth ſo farre, till "with diuiſion and variance hee turneth all to miſ-"chiefe, firſt longing to be next the beſt, afterward "equall with the beſt, and at laſt chiefe and aboue "the beſt. Of which immoderate appetite of wor-"ſhip, and thereby of debate and diſſention, what "loſſe, what ſorrow, what trouble, hath within theſe "fewe yeeres growne in this Realme, I pray God as "well forget as we remember. Which things, if I "could aſwell haue foreſeen, as I haue with my more "paine then pleaſure proued, By Gods bleſſed La-"dy (that was euer his oath) I would neuer haue "won the curteſie of mens knees, with the loſſe of "ſo many heads. But ſith things paſſed cannot be "gaine-called, much ought we the more beware, by "what occaſion wee haue taken ſo great hurt afore, "that wee eft ſoones fall not into the like againe. "Now be thoſe griefes paſſed, and all is (God bee "thanked) quiet, and likely right well to proſper in "wealthful peace vnder your Coſins, my children, "if God ſend them life, and you loue. Of which "two things the leſſe loſſe were they, by whom "thogh God did his pleaſure, yet ſhould the Realme "alway finde Kings, and peraduenture as good "Kings. But if you among your ſelues in a childs "raigne fall at debate, many a good man ſhal periſh, "and happely he too, and ye too, ere this Land finde "peace againe. Wherefore in theſe laſt words that "euer I looke to ſpeake with you, I exhort, and re-"quire you al, for the loue that you haue euer borne "vnto me: for the loue that I haue euer borne vnto "you, for the loue that our Lord beareth to vs "all, from this time forward all griefes forgotten, "each of you loue others, which I verily truſt you "will, if you any thing regard, either God, or "your King, affinitie or kindred, this Realme, "your owne countrey, or your owne ſurety.

Tender youth is ſoone infected.

Great variance for ſmall cauſes.

(115) And therewithall the King no longer indu-ring to ſit vp, layd him downe on his right ſide, his face towards them, who with weeping eyes & words as fitted the time, recomfited the ſicke dying King, ioyning their hands, and outwardly forgiuing that, which inwardly they meant not to forget. The King ouer-ioyed to ſee their willing reconcilements ſpake not many wordes after, but commending his ſoule vnto God, in their preſence departed this life at his Pallace of Weſtminſter, vpō the 9. day of April, and yeere of Chriſts appearance 1483. at the age of forty one, when he had worne the royal Diademe, two and twenty yeeres, one moneth and fiue dayes: and was buried at Windſor, in the newe Chappell, whoſe foundation himſelfe had layd.

commended where he auoided, then is his manhood when he vanquished: eight or nine battels he won, wherein to his greater renowne he fought on foote, and was euer victor ouer his enemies: much giuen hee was to the lusts of youth, and in his latter time, growne somewhat corpulent, which rather adorned his grauer yeeres, then any waies disliked the eies of his beholders.

His Wife.

(117) Elizabeth the daughter of Richard Woodvill Earle Riuers by his wife Iaquelana Dutchesse of Bedford, who was the daughter of Peter Earle of S. Paul, and he the sonne of Peter de Luxembourg, was first married vnto Sir Iohn Grey slaine at S. Albans, where he was knighted the day before his death by King Henry the sixt, vnto whom shee bare two sonnes and a daughter, after whose death shee was priuately remarried vnto K. Edward the fourth, the first day of May, at his mannor of Grafton in Northamptonshire Anno 1464. and in the next yeere following vpon the sixe and twentith of May, was crowned Queen at Westminster with al due solemnities. Shee was his wife eighteene yeeres, eleuen moneths, and nine daies, no more fortunate in attaining to the height of all worldly dignity, then vnfortunate in the murther of her sonnes, and losse of her owne liberty: For in the beginning of K. Edwards raigne, shee was forced to take Sanctuary at Westminster, wherein her first sonne Prince Edward was borne; and at his death did the like in feare of the Protector, and lastly hauing all her lands and possessions seized vpon by K. Henrie the seauenth, liued in meane estate in the Monastery of Bermondsey in Southwarke, where not long after shee left the troubles of her life, and inioied a quiet portion or burying place by her last husband King Edward at Windsore.

(118) Elianor Butler, as we find it recorded vpon the Parliament Role, was contracted vnto King Edward: but how true considering the occasion, and time of the Act, we leaue for others to iudge, onely this is most certaine that this Lady Elianor was the daughter of Iohn Talbot Earle of Shrewsbury, and the wife of Sir Thomas Butler Knight, sonne and heire to Ralph Butler Baron of Sudley, which Elianor died the thirtieth of Iune, the yeere of Christ Iesus 1466. and the eight of King Edward the fourth his raigne.

His Issue.

(119) Edward the eldest sonne of K. Edward the fourth by Queene Elizabeth his wife, was borne in the Sanctuary at Westminster the fourth of November, and yeere of grace 1471. being the tenth of his fathers raigne, at that time expulsed the Realme by the powerfull Earle Warwicke; but fortune changed, and the father restored; the sonne, the first of Iuly and yeere of Christ was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall and Earle of Chester; and had not the ambitious hand of his vncle beene defiled in his innocent blood, he might haue worne the Diademe manie yeeres, whereas he bare the Title of King not many daies.

(120) Richard the second sonne of K. Edward the fourth by Elizabeth his Queen, was borne at Shrewsbury, and in his infancy was created Duke of Yorke, he was affianced vnto Anne daughter and heire to Iohn Mowbray Duke of Norfolke, by which he was intituled Duke of Norfolke, Earle-Marshall, Warren, and Nottingham, but inioying neither Title, wife, or his owne life long, was with his brother murthered in the Tower of London, and in the prison of that Tower, which vpon that most sinfull deed is euer since called the bloody Tower, their bodies as yet vnknowne where to haue buriall.

(121) George the third sonne of K. Edward the fourth, by Queene Elizabeth his wife, was also borne in Shrewsburie, and being a yong Child was created Duke of Bedford, but liued not long after, and lieth buried at Windsore.

(122) Elizabeth the first daughter of K. Edward the fourth, by Elizabeth his Queene, was borne at Westminster the eleuenth of Februarie, and fifth of her fathers raigne, being the yere of Saluation 1466. Shee was promised in marriage to Charles Dauphin of France, woed and Courted by her vncle Crouchbacke, when he had murdered her brothers, and vsurped the Crowne, but better destiny attending her, shee was reserued to ioine the vnion and marriage with the onely heire of Lancaster, which was Henrie of Richmond, afterward King of England, from whom is branched the roiall stemme that spreadeth his beauty in this North-West world, euen Iames our dread Soueraigne, and great Brittaines Monarch.

(123) Citely, the second daughter of K. Edward the fourth by Queene Elizabeth his wife, was sought vnto, by Iames the third of that name, to be ioined in marriage with Iames his sonne Prince of Scotland, and Duke of Rothsay, which match was promised vpon conditions and choise of K. Edward, who lastly brake off from further proceeding, and the Lady married vnto Iohn Vicount Wels, whom shee outliued, and was againe remarried, but by neither husband had any issue, and therefore lesse noted; her body lieth buried at Quarrena in the Isle of Wight.

(124) Anne the third daughter of K. Edward the fourth, by Queene Elizabeth his wife, was married vnto Lord Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolke, Earle Marshall, and high Treasurer of England: vnto whom shee bare two sonnes both dying without issue, and her selfe without more fruit of wombe, left her life, and lieth buried at Framingham in Norfolke.

(125) Bridget the fourth daughter of K. Edward the fourth by his wife Queene Elizabeth, was borne at Eltham in Kent, the tenth of Nouember and yeere of Grace 1480. being the twentieth of her fathers Raigne. Shee tooke the habite of Religion, and became a Nun in the Nunnery of Dartford, in the same County, founded by K. Edward the third, where shee spent her life in contemplations vnto the day of her death.

(126) Marie the fift daughter of K. Edward the fourth by Queene Elizabeth his wife, was promised in marriage vnto the King of Denmarke, but died (before it could be solemnized) in the Tower of Greenewich, the Sunday before Pentecost the twentieth two of her fathers raigne, and yeere of Grace 1482. and was buried at Windsore.

(127) Margaret the sixth daughter of K. Edward the fourth, by his wife Queene Elizabeth, died an Infant without other mention in our Authors.

(128) Katherine the seuenth daughter of King Edward the fourth, by Queene Elizabeth his wife, and the last of them both, was married vnto William Courtney Earle of Deuonshire, and Lord of Ochampton, vnto whom shee bare Lord Henrie after the death of his father Earle of Deuonshire, who by King Henrie the eight was created Marquesse of Excester in Anno 1525.

His Concubines.

(129) Elizabeth Lucie is certainly known to haue been King Edwards Concubine, though nothing so certainly mentioned, whose Ladie, or of what Parentage shee was; that shee was conceiued by him with child is before declared, but who that child was, is as obscurely laid downe; therefore in these things we must be silent, and leaue the doubts to be resolued by others. Three other concubines this king had, whereof Shores wife was not the least beloued, whose life falleth further to be ſpoken of in the Raigne of the vſurper Richard, where her ſtorie ſhall be ſhewed more at large.

His naturall Iſſue.

(150) Arthur, ſurnamed Plantagenet, the naturall ſonne of K. Edward the fourth, (whoſe mother as is ſuppoſed, was the Lady Elizabeth Lucie) was created Viſcount Liſle by King Henrie the eight at Bridewell in London, the twentie ſixth of Aprill, and yeere of Saluation 1533. which title was conferred vpon him in right of his wife Lady Elizabeth, ſiſter and heire vnto Iohn Gray Viſcount Liſle, and the late wife and then widdow of Edmund Dudley: who bare vnto this Viſcount three daughters, which were Bridget, Frances, and Elizabeth, all of them afterward married. This Arthur Lord Liſle was made Lieutenant of Callis by the ſaid K. Henry, which Towne ſome of his ſeruants intended to haue betraied to the French, for which their fact himſelfe was ſent to the Tower of London: but his truth appearing after much ſearch, the King ſent him a rich ring from his owne finger, with ſuch comfortable wordes, as at the hearing thereof a ſudden ioy ouercharged his heart, & was ſo immoderately receiued, that the ſame night it made an end of his life, whoſe body was honorably buried in the ſame Tower.

(151) Elizabeth the naturall daughter of K. Edward the fourth, was married to Sir Thomas Lumley Knight, the ſonne of George, Lord Lumley, who died before his father: ſhee bare vnto the ſaid Sir Thomas, Richard, afterward Lord Lumley, from whom the late Lord Lumley did deſcend.

EDWARD

EDVVARD THE FIFTH, KING OF ENGLAND AND FRANCE, AND LORD OF IRELAND, THE FIFTIE FIFTH MONARCH OF THIS LAND, HIS RAIGNE, AND DEATH.

Monarch 55

For the moſt part written by Sir Thomas Moore.

CHAPTER XVI II.

THe father thus dying in the ſtrength of his yeeres, and the ſonne left to rule before he was ripe, the Synders of diſſenſions which the ſicke King had lately raked vp, preſently brake forth into a more raging flame; for the king and Queenes blood that ſhould haue ſupported young Edwards eſtate, the one ſide being ſuſpicious, and the other prouoked by the execrable deſire of ſoueraignty, left the tender king (a Prince of ſuch towardnes as his age could conteine) deſtitute and vnarmed, which if either kind or kindred had holden place, muſt needes haue beene the ſureſt pillars of his defence. The raigne of this King (if we may ſo cal the ſhort time of his Soueraignty) began the ſame day that his father died, though he was neuer Crowned, nor yet commanded the affaires of the Kingdome as an abſolute Monarch, his young brothers fortunes being ballanced with his.

Aprill 19. A. D. 1483.

(2) For Richard Duke of Glouceſter, by nature their vncle, by office their Protector, to their Father beholden, to themſelues by Oath and Alleagiance bounden, all bands broken that holdeth man and man together, without any reſpect of God or the World, vnnaturally contriued to bereaue them, not onlie of their dignity, but alſo their liues. But forſomuch as the Dukes demeanour miniſtreth in effect all the whole matter whereof the raigne of this yong and fift Edward muſt intreat, it is therefore conuenient, ſomewhat to ſhew you ere we goe further, what man man this was, and from whom he descended that could find in his heart so much mischief to conceiue.

Richard Duke of Yorke.

Richard Duke of Glouceſter an vnnaturall vncle vnto the young King and his brother.

Richard Duke of Yorke was the father of Richard Duke of Gloucester.

(3) Know first then that Richard Duke of Yorke, a noble man and a mighty, beganne not by warre, but by law to challenge the Crowne; putting his claime into the Parliament; where his cause was (either for right or fauour) so farre foorth aduanced that King Henries blood (albeit he had a goodly Prince) was vtterly reiected, the Crowne by the authoritie of that high Court intailed to the Duke of Yorke, and his issue male in remainder, immediately after the death of King Henrie. But the Duke not enduring so long to tarrie, intending vnder pretext of dissention and debate arising in the Realme, to preuent his time, and to take vpon him the rule in King Henries life, was with many other Nobles slaine at Wakefield, leauing three sonnes, Edward, George, and Richard; all of them as they were great states of birth, so were they great and stately of stomacke, greedy and ambitious of authority, and impatient of partners.

(4) For Edward reuenging his fathers death depriued king Henry, and attained the Crowne; The second, George Duke of Clarence, was a goodly Noble Prince, and in all things fortunate, if either his owne ambition had not set him against his brother, or the enuie of his enemies, his brother against him. For were it by the Queen and Lords of her blood which highly maligned the Kings kindred (as women commonly, not of malice but of nature hate them whom their husbands loue) or were it a proud appetite of the Duke himselfe, intending to be King: at least-wise hainous treason was laid to his charge, and finally were he faulty, were he faultlesse, attainted he was by Parliament, and iudged to death, as we haue saide.

Women commonly maligne their husbands kindred.

The description of Richard Duke of Gloucester.

(5) Richard the third sonne, of whom we now entreat was in wit and courage equall with either of them, in body and prowesse farre vnder them both, little of stature, ill-limmed, and crook-backed, his left shoulder much higher then his right, very hard fauoured of visage, and such as in States is called warly, in other men otherwise: he was malicious, wrathfull, and enuious, yea and from afore his birth euer froward. For it is for truth reported, that the Dutchesse his mother had so much adoe in her trauaile, that shee could not be deliuered of him vncut, and that he came into the world with his feete forward, as men be borne outward, and (as the fame runneth) also not vntoothed; Whether men of hatred report aboue the truth, or else that nature changed her Course in his beginning, which in the course of his life many things vnnaturally committed.

Richard Crooke-backe a good souldier.

(6) No euill Captaine was he in the warre, as to which his disposition was more inclined then for peace; sundry victories he had, and sometimes ouerthrowes, but neuer in default as for his owne person, either of hardines, or politike order; free was he of his dispence, and somewhat aboue his power liberall: with large gifts he gate him vnstedfast friendship, for which he was forced to pill and pole in other places, which gate him stedfast hatred. He was close and secret, a deepe dissembler, lowly of countenance, arrogant of heart, outwardly familiar, where euen now he hated, and not letting to kisse whom he thought to kill: despitefull and cruell he was, not for euill-will alwaies, but oftner for ambition, and either for the surety, or increase of his estate. Friend and foe was much what indifferent; where his aduantage grew, he spared no mans death, whose life withstood his purpose. He slew with his own hands, King Henrie the sixth, being Prisoner in the Tower, as men constantlie said, and that without commandement or knowledge of the King, who vndoubtedly if he had intended his death, would haue appointed that butcherly office to some other then his owne brother.

He was the cause of Clarence his death.

(7) Some wise men also iudge, that his drift couertly conueied, lacked not in helping forth his brother Clarence to his death; which he resisted openly, howbeit somewhat (as men deemed) more faintly, then he that was hartily minded to his wealth: And they that thus iudge, thinke that long time in K. Edwards life, he forcast to be king, in case that his brother (whose life he looked that euill diet should shorten) should happen to decease (as indeed he did) while his children were young. And they deeme that for this intent he was glad of the Duke of Clarence death, whose life must needes haue hindered him so intending, (being his elder brother) whether the same Duke had kept him true to his Nephew the young king, or enterprized to be king himselfe. But of all this point, there is no certainty, and who so diuineth vpon coniectures, may aswell shoote too farre, as too short. Howbeit this haue I by credible information learned, that the same night, in which king Edward died, one Mistlebroke long ere morning, came in great haste to the house of one Pottier dwelling in Red Crosse street without Creeple-gate in London: and when he with hasty rapping, quickly was let in, he shewed vnto Pottier that K. Edward was departed. By my troth man quoth Pottier, then will my Master the Duke of Glouceſter be king: what cause he had so to thinke, hard it is to say, whether being toward him knew any such thing intended, or otherwise had any inkling thereof, for it was not likely that he spake it of no ground.

(8) But now to return to the course of this History; were it that the Duke of Glocester had of old foreminded this conclusion, & was now thereunto moued, & put in hope by the occasion of the tender age of the yong Princes his Nephewes (as oportunity & likelihood of speed, putteth a man in courage of that he neuer intended) certaine it is, that he contriued their destruction, with the vsurpation of the regall dignitie vpon himselfe, and forasmuch as he well wist, and holp to maintaine a long continued grudge and hartburning betweene the Queenes kindred, and the Kings blood, either part enuying others authority; he now thought their diuisions should be (as it was indeed) a forward beginning to the pursuite of his intent, and a sure ground for the foundation of all his building, if he might first, vnder the pretext of reuenging old displeasure, abuse the anger and ignorance of the one party, to the destruction of the other, and then winne to his purpose as many as he could, and those that could not be wonne, might be lost before they were aware; for of one thing was he certaine, that if his intent were perceiued he should soone haue made peace between both the parties with his owne blood.

(9) King Edward in his life, albeit that this dissention betweene his friends somewhat greeued him, yet in his good health he somewhat lesse regarded it, because he thought whatsoeuer busines should fall betweene them, himselfe should alwaies be able to rule both the parties. But in his last sicknes, when he perceiued his naturall strength so sore infeebled, that he dispaired all recouerie; then considering the youth of his Children, albeit he nothing lesse mistrusted then that that happened, yet well fore-seeing how many harmes might grow by their debate, while the youth of his children should lacke discretion of themselues, and good Counsell of their friends, of which either party should counsell for their owne commodity, and the rather by pleasant aduise to winne themselues fauour, then by profitable aduertisements to doe his children good, hee called some of them before him that were at variance, and in speciall the Lord Marquesse Dorset, the Queenes sonne by her first husband, and William Lord Hastings a noble-man, then Lord Chamberlaine, against whom the Queene especially grudged, for the great fauor the King bare him: and also for that shee thought him secretly familiar with the King in wanton company. Her kindred also bare him sore, aswell for that the King had made him Captaine of Calis, which office the Lord Riuers, brother to the Queene

Queene claimed of the Kings former promiſe, as for diuers other great gifts which he receiued, that they looked for. Theſe were the grudges which the king on his death bed ſought to remoue, and they in ſhew ſeemed to cancell, as we haue ſaid, though the ſparks of theſe diſpleaſures burſt afterward into a dangerous flame, which conſumed moſt of them, as afterward ſhall appeare.

(10) For aſſoone as the King was departed this life, his ſonne Prince Edward drew towards London from Ludlow in Wales, which Countrey being farre off from the law, and recourſe to iuſtice, was become to be farre out of Order, and growne wilde Robbers, Rouers walking at liberty vncorrected: for which cauſe this Prince in the life time of his father was ſent thither, to the end that the authority of his preſence ſhould refraine euill diſpoſed perſons, from the boldenes of their former outrages. To the gouernance and ordering of this young Prince at his ſending thither, was there appointed Sir Anthonie Wooduill Lord Riuers, and brother vnto the Queene, a right honorable man, as valiant of hand as politick in Counſell; adioined were there vnto him others of the ſame partie, and in effect euery one as he was neereſt of kin vnto the Queene, ſo was he planted next about the Prince.

(11) That drift of the Queene not vnwiſely deuiſed, whereby her blood might of youth be rooted in the Princes fauour, the Duke of Gloueſter turned vnto their deſtruction, and vpon that ground ſet the foundation of all his vnhappy building. For whomſoeuer he perceiued either at variance with them, or bearing himſelfe their fauour, he brake vnto them; ſome by mouth, ſome by writing and ſecret meſſengers, that it was neither reaſon, nor in any wiſe to be ſuffered, that the young King their Maſter and kinſeman, ſhould be in the hands and Cuſtody of his mothers kindred, ſequeſtred in manner from their Company and attendance, of which euery one ought him as faithfull ſeruice as they, and many of them farre more honorable part of kin then his mothers ſide: whoſe blood (quoth he) ſauing the Kings pleaſure was farre vnmeet to bee matched with his, which now to be as who ſay remoued from the king, and the leſſe noble to be left about him, is (quoth hee) neither honorable to his Maieſtie nor vnto vs, and alſo to his Grace no ſuretie, to haue the mightieſt of his friends from him, and vnto vs no little ieopardy, to ſuffer our well proued euill-willers to grow in ouer great authority with the Prince in youth, who is light of beliefe and ſoone perſwaded. Ye remember I trow K. Edward himſelfe, albeit he was a man of age and diſcretion, yet was he in many things ruled by the bend, more then ſtood either with his honor, or our profit, or with the commodity of any man elſe, except only the immoderate aduancement of themſelues. Which whether they ſorer thirſted after their owne weale, or our woe, it were hard I weene to geſſe, and if ſome folkes friendſhip had not held better place with the King, then any reſpect of kindred, they might perhaps eaſily haue intrapped and brought ſome of vs to confuſion ere this; why not as eaſily as they haue done ſome other alreadie, as neere of his roiall blood as we? But our Lord hath wrought his will, and thankes be to his grace, that perill is paſt: howbeit as great is growing, if we ſuffer this young King in our enemies hand; which without his knowledge might abuſe the name of his commandement, to any of our vndoing, which thing God and good prouiſion forbid.

(12) Of which good prouiſion none of vs hath any thing the leſſe neede, for the late made attonement, in which the Kings pleaſure had more place then the parties wils: nor none of vs, I beleeue, is ſo vnwiſe ouer ſoone to truſt a new friend made of an old foe, or to thinke that an howerly kindnes, ſodeinly contracted in one houre continued yet ſcarce a fortnight, ſhould be deeper ſetled in their ſtomackes, then a long accuſtomed malice many yeeres rooted. With theſe wordes and writings and ſuch other, the Duke of Gloueſter ſoone ſet afire them that were of themſelues apt enough to kindle, eſpecially two, Edward Duke of Buckingham, and William Lord Haſtings Chamberlaine, both men of honor and of great power. The one by long ſucceſſion from his Auncеſtry: the other by his office, and the Kings fauour. Theſe two not bearing each to other ſo much loue, as both of them hatred vnto the Queenes part, in this point accorded together, with the Duke of Gloueſter, that they would vtterly remoue from the Kings Company all his mothers friends vnder the name of their enemies.

The concluſion of his deſignes.

(13) Vpon this concluſion the Duke of Gloueſter vnderſtanding, that the Lords which at that time were about the King, intended to bring him to London to his Coronation, accompanied with ſuch power of their friends, that it ſhould be hard for him to bring his purpoſe to paſſe, without the gathering a great aſſembly of people, and in manner of open warre, whereof the end hee wiſte well was doubtfull, and in which the King being on their ſide, his part ſhould haue the face and name of a Rebellion; he ſecretly therefore by diuers meanes, cauſed the Queene to be perſwaded and brought in minde, that it neither were need, and alſo ſhould be ieopardous, the King to come vp ſtrong.

Another craftie pollicy of Duke Richard.

(14) For whereas now euery Lord loued other, and no other thing ſtudied vpon, but about the Coronation and honor of the King: if the Lords of her kindred ſhould aſſemble in the Kings name much people, they ſhould giue the Lords of the contrary faction cauſe to feare and ſuſpect, leaſt they ſhould gather this people not for the Kings ſafegard, whom no man impugned, but for their deſtruction, hauing more regard to their old variance, then their new attonement: for which cauſe they ſhould aſſemble on the other party much people againe for their defence, whoſe power ſhee wiſt well ſtretched farre: and thus ſhould all the Realme fall on an vproare: and of all the hurt that thereof ſhould inſue, which was likely not to be a little, & the moſt harme like to fall where ſhee leaſt would, all the world would put her and her kindred in the blame, and ſay that they had vnwiſely and vntrulie alſo broken the amity and peace, which the King her husband ſo prudently made betwixt his kin and hers on his death bed, and which the other party faithfully obſerued.

(15) The Queene in this wiſe perſwaded, ſent ſuch word vnto her ſonne; and vnto her brother being about the King: beſides, the Duke of Gloceſter, himſelfe and other Lords the chiefe of his bend, wrote vnto the King ſo reuerently, and to the Queenes friends there ſo louingly, that they nothing earthly miſtruſting, brought vp the King in great haſt, but not in good ſpeed, with a ſober company. Now was the King in his way to London, gone from Northampton, when the Dukes of Gloceſter and Buckingham came thither, where remained behind the Lord Riuers the Kings vncle, intending on the morrow to follow the King, and bee with him at Stony-Stratford, twelue miles thence, earely ere he departed. So was there made that night much friendlie cheare betwixt theſe two Dukes and the Lord Riuers a great while: but incontinent after that, they were openly with great curteſie departed, and the Lord Riuers lodged, the Dukes ſecretly with a few of their moſt priuy friends, ſet them down in Councell, wherein they ſpent a great part of the night: & at their riſing in the dawning of the day, they ſent out priuily to their ſeruants in their Innes and lodgings about, giuing command to make themſelues ſhortly ready, for their Lords were to horſe-ward: vpon which meſſages, many of their folke were attendant, when many of the L. Riuers ſeruants were vnready.

high-way towards Stony-Stratford, where the King lay, they had beſtowed certaine of their men, that ſhould ſend backe againe, and compell to returne any man that were gotten out of Northampton towards Stony-Stratford, till they had further order: foraſmuch as the Dukes themſelues intended for the ſhew of their diligence, to bee the firſt that ſhould that day attend vpon the Kings Highneſſe out of that Towne. Thus bare they folke in hand: but when the Lord Riuers vnderſtood the gates cloſed, the wayes beſet, neither his ſeruants, or himſelf ſuffered to goe out, conſidering well ſo great a thing without his knowledge, could not bee done for nought; and comparing this preſent manner, with his laſt nights cheare, in ſo few howres to haue ſo great a change, marueilouſly miſliked it. Howbeit ſith hee could not get away, nor keepe himſelfe cloſe hee would not, leſt hee ſhould ſeeme to hide himſelfe for ſome ſecret feare of his own fault, wherof he ſaw no ſuch cauſe in himſelfe: hee determined vpon the ſurety of his owne conſcience, to goe boldly vnto them, and to enquire what this matter might meane; whom as ſoone as they ſaw, they beganne to quarrell with, ſaying, that hee entended to ſet diſtance betweene the King and them, and to bring them to confuſion, but it ſhould not lie in his power. And when he beganne (as hee was a very well ſpoken man) in ſeemely wiſe to excuſe himſelfe, they tarried not the end of his anſwere, but ſhortly took him, & put him in ward: and that done, forthwith went to horſebacke, and tooke the way to Stony-Stratford, where they found the King with his Company, ready to leape on horſebacke, and depart forward to leaue that lodging for them, becauſe it was too ſtrait for both companies.

The L. Riuers impriſoned in Northampton.

(17) And as ſoone as they came in his preſence, they alighted downe with all their company about them; to whom the Duke of Buckingham ſaid, Go afore Gentlemen, and Yeomen keepe your rooms. In which goodly array they came to the King, and on their knees in very humble manner ſaluted his Grace, who receiued them in very ioyous and amiable manner, nothing knowing, nor miſtruſting as yet what was done. But euen by and by in his preſence, they picked a quarrell to the Lord Gray, the Kings other brother by his mother, ſaying, that he with the Lord Marqueſſe his brother, and the Lord Riuers his vncle, had compaſſed to rule the King and the realm, and to ſet variance among the States, and to ſubdue and deſtroy the noble bloud of the Realme: towards the accompliſhing whereof, they ſaid that the Lord Marqueſſe had entred into the Tower of London, & thence taken out the Kings treaſure, and had ſent men to the ſea. All which things theſe Dukes well knew were done for neceſſary and good purpoſes, by the whole Councell at London, ſauing that ſomwhat they muſt ſay.

Accuſations againſt the Queens kindred

(18) Vnto which words the King anſwered, what my brother Marqueſſe had done I cannot ſay: but in good ſooth I dare well anſwere for mine vncle Riuers, & my brother here, that they are inocent of any ſuch matter: yea my liege, quoth the Duke of Buckingham, they haue kept their dealings in theſe matters farre from the knowledge of your good Grace. And forthwith they arreſted the Lord Richard, Sir Thomas Vaughan, and Sir Richard Hawt Knights in the Kings preſence, and brought the king and all his company backe vnto Northampton, where they tooke againe further counſell. And there they ſent away from the King whome it pleaſed them, and ſet new ſeruants about him, ſuch as better liked them then him: At which dealing the king wept, and was nothing content; but it booted not: and at dinner, the Duke of Gloceſter ſent a diſh from his owne Table to the Lord Riuers, bidding him be of good cheere for all ſhould bee well. But the Lord Riuers thanking the Duke, prayed the Meſſenger to beare it to the Lord Richard, with the ſame meſſage for his comfort, as one to whom ſuch aduerſity was ſtrange, but himſelfe had beene all his dayes inured therewith, and therefore could beare it the better: but for all this comfortable courteſie of the Duke of Gloceſter, he ſent the Lord Riuers, and the Lord Richard, with Sir Thomas Vaughan into the North Country, into diuers places to priſon, and afterward all to Pomfret, where they were in concluſion beheaded.

The L. Riuers others beheaded.

(19) In this wiſe the Duke of Gloceſter tooke vpon himſelfe the Order and Gouernance of the yong King, whom with much honour and humble reuerence he conuaied towards London. But anone the tidings of this matter came haſtily to the Queene, a little before the midnight following, and that in the foreſt wiſe, that the King her ſonne was taken, her brother, her ſonne, and other friends arreſted, & ſent no man wiſt whither, to bee done with God wot what. With which tidings, the Queen in great fright & heauineſſe, bewailed her childes raigne, her friendes miſchance, and her owne miſfortune, damning the time that euer ſhee diſſwaded the gathering of power about the King, got her ſelfe in all haſt poſſible with her young ſonne, and her daughters, out of the Palace of Weſtminſter, in which ſhee then lay, into the Sanctuary, lodging her ſelfe, and company there in the Abbots place.

Queene Elizabeth taketh Sanctuary.

(20) Now came there one likewiſe, not long after night from the Lord Chamberlaine, vnto the Archbiſhoppe of Yorke then Chancellor of England, to his place not farre from Weſtminſter; and for that hee ſhewed his ſeruants, that he had tidings of great importance, that his M. gaue him in charge, not to forbeare his reſt, they letted not to awake him; nor hee to admit the Meſſenger vnto his bed ſide. Of whom hee heard that theſe Dukes were gone backe with the Kings Grace from Stony-Stratford vnto Northampton: notwithſtanding Sir (quoth he) my Lord ſendeth your Lordſhippe word, that there is no feare: for hee aſſureth you that all ſhall bee well. I aſſure him (quoth the Archbiſhoppe) bee it as well as it will, it will neuer bee ſo well as we haue ſeene it. And thereupon by and by after the meſſengers departure, hee cauſed in all haſt all his ſeruants to bee called vp, and ſo with his owne houſhold about him, euery man weaponed, hee tooke the Great Seale with him, and came yet before day vnto the Queene. About whom he found much heauineſſe, rumble, haſt and buſineſſe, carriage and conueiance of her ſtuffe into Sanctuary, cheſts, coffers, packes and fardels, truſſed all on mens backs, no man vnoccupied, ſome lading, ſome going, ſome diſcharging, ſome comming for more, ſome breaking down the wals, to bring in the next way, and ſome drew to them to helpe to carry a wrong way. The Queene her ſelfe ſate alone alow on the ruſhes, all deſolate and diſmayed, whom the Archbiſhop comforted in the beſt manner hee could, ſhewing her that hee truſted the matter was nothing ſo ſore as ſhee tooke it for, and that hee was put in good hope and out of feare, by a meſſage ſent him from the L. Chamberlaine: Ah woe worth him (quoth the Queene) hee is one of them that laboureth to deſtroy mee and my bloud.

The L. Chamberlaine ſent the newes to the L. Chancellor.

The great heauineſſe and confuſion of Queene and ſeruants.

The Archbiſhops comfort to the Queene.

(21) Madam (quoth hee) bee of good cheare; for I aſſure you, if they crowne any other King then your ſonne, whom they haue now with them, we ſhal on the morrow crown his brother, whom you haue here with you: and here is the great Seale, which in like ſort as that noble Prince your husband deliuered it vnto me, ſo here I deliuer it vnto you, to the vſe and behoofe of your ſonne, and therewith hee betooke her the Great Seale, and departed home againe, euen in the dawning of the day: by which time hee might in his Chamber window ſee all the Thames full of boates of the Duke of Gloceſters ſeruants, watching that no man ſhould goe to Sanctuary, nor none ſhould paſſe vnſearched. Then was there great commotion and murmur, aſwell in other places about, as eſpecially in the City, the people diuerſly uerſly diuining vpon this dealing. And ſome Lords, Knights and Gentlemen, eyther for fauour of the Queene, or for feare of themſelues, aſſembled in ſundry Companies, and went flocke-meale in harneſſe: and many alſo, for that they accounted this demeanour attempted, not ſo ſpecially againſt the other Lords, as againſt the King himſelf in the diſturbance of his Coronation.

(22) But then, by and by the Lords aſſembled together, towards which meeting, the Archbiſhoppe of Yorke fearing that it would bee aſcribed (as it was indeed) to his ouermuch lightneſſe, that hee ſo ſodainely had yeelded vp the great Seale to the Queene (to whom the cuſtody therof nothing appertained) without ſpeciall commandement of the King, ſecretly ſent for the Seale again, & brought it with him after the accuſtomed manner. And at this meeting, the Lord Haſtings, whoſe truth toward the King no man doubted, nor needed to doubt, perſwaded the Lords to beleeue, that the Duke of Gloceſter, was ſure and faſtly faithfull to his Prince, and that the Lord Riuers and Lord Richard, with the other knight, were for matters attempted by them againſt the Dukes of Gloceſter and Buckingham put vnder arreſt for their ſurety, not for the Kings ieopardy; and that they were alſo in ſafeguard, & there no longer ſhould remaine, then till the matter were, not by the Dukes onely, but alſo by all the other Lords of the kings Councell indifferently examined, and by other diſcretions ordered, either iudged or appeaſed. But one thing he aduiſed them beware, that they iudged not the matter too farre forth ere they knew the truth, nor turning their priuate grudges into the common hurt, irking and prouoking men vnto anger; and diſturbing the kings Coronation; towards which the Dukes were comming vp, that they might peraduenture bring the matter ſo farre out of ioynt, that it ſhould neuer bee brought in frame againe. Which ſtrife if it ſhould happen (as it were likely) to come to a field, though both parties were in all things equall, yet ſhould the authority be on that ſide where the King is himſelfe.

(23) With theſe perſwaſions of the Lord Haſtings, whereof part himſelfe beleeued, of part he wiſt the contrary, theſe commotions were ſomewhat appeaſed, but eſpecially by that, that the Dukes of Gloceſter and Buckingham were ſo neere, and came ſo ſhortly on with the King, in none other manner, with n one other voice, or any other ſemblance then to his Coronation; cauſing the fame to be blowne about; that theſe Lords and Knights which were taken, had contriued the deſtruction of the Dukes of Glouceſter and Buckingham, and of other the Noble blood of the Realme, to the end that themſelues would alone demeane and gouerne the King at their pleaſure. And for the Colourable proofe thereof, ſuch of the Dukes ſeruants as rode with the Carts of their ſtuffe that were taken (amongſt which ſtuffe no maruell though ſome were harneſſe, which at the breaking vp of the houſhold, muſt needs either be brought away, or caſt away) they ſhewed vnto the people all the way as they went; ſaying, loe here be the barrels of harneſſe, that theſe Traitors haue priuily conueied in their Carriages to deſtroy the Noble Lords withall. This deuiſe, albeit it made the matter to wiſemen more vnlikely, well perceiuing that the intenders of ſuch a purpoſe, would rather haue had their harneſſe on their backes, then to be bound vp in barrels: yet much part of the common people were therewith verie well ſatiſfied, and ſaid it were almes to hang them.

(24) When the King approched neere to the City, Edmund Shaa Goldſmith then Maior, with William White and Iohn Matthew Sheriffes, and all the other Aldermen in ſcarlet, with fiue hundred horſe of the Cittizens in violet, receiued him reuerently at Harneſey, and ryding from thence, accompanied him into the City, which he entred the fourth day of May, the firſt and laſt yeere of his Raigne. The King was lodged in the Biſhops Pallace, where was kept a great Councell, and there was ſworne to the king, the Duke of Gloucester, the Duke of Buckingham, and all the Lords. But the Duke of Gloucester, bare him in open ſight ſo reuerentlie to the Prince, with all ſemblance of lowlines, that from the great obloquie in which he was ſo late before, he was ſodeinely ſaine in ſo great truſt, that at the Councell next aſſembled, he was made the only man, choſē & thought moſt meet to be Protector of the king and his realm, ſo that (were it deſtiny, or were it folly) the lambe was betaken to the wolfe to keepe. At which Councell alſo, the Archbiſhop of Yorke Chancellour of England, which had deliuered vp the great Seale to the Queene, was thereof greatly reproued, and the Seale taken from him, and deliuered to Doctor Ruſſell Biſhop of Lincolne, a wiſe man, and of much experience, and vndoubtedly one of the beſt learned men that England had in his time: diuers Lords & Knights were appointed vnto diuers Roomes, the Lord Chamberlaine, and ſome others, keeping ſtill their offices they had before.

Richard Duke of Gloceſter made Protector of the King and Realm.

The great Seale is taken from the Archbiſhop of Yorke.

(25) Now although that the Protector, ſo ſore thirſted for the finiſhing of thoſe deſignes which he had begun, and thought euery day a yeere till they were atchieued, yet durſt he no further attempt, ſo long as he had but halfe his pray in his hand: well witting, that if he depoſed the one brother, all the Realme would fall to the other, if he either remained in Sanctuary, or ſhould be conueied to his further liberty: wherfore, incontinent at the next meeting of the Lords in Councell, he propoſed vnto them, that it was a heinous deed of the Queene, and proceeded of great malice towards the Kings Counſellers, that ſhee ſhould keepe in Sanctuary the Kings brother from him, whoſe ſpeciall pleaſure and comfort were to haue his brother with him: and that by her done, was to none other intent, but to bring all the Lords in obloquie, and murmur of the people, as though they were not to be truſted with the Kings brother, who by aſſent of the Nobles of the land, were appointed as the Kings neereſt friends, to the tuition of his owne royall perſon. The proſperity whereof ſtandeth (quoth hee) not all in keeping from enemies or ill viand, but partly alſo in recreation, and moderate pleaſure, which hee in his tender youth cannot take in the company of ancient perſons, but in the familiar conuerſation of thoſe that be neither farre vnder, nor farre aboue his age, and neuertheleſſe of eſtate conuenient to accompany his noble Maieſty; wherefore with whom rather, then with his owne brother? And if any man thinke this conſideration (which I thinke no man thinketh that loueth the King) let him conſider that ſometimes without ſmall things, greater cannot ſtand. And verily, it redoundeth greatly to the diſhonour both of the Kings Highneſſe, and of vs all that are about his Grace, to haue it runne in euery mans mouth, not in this Realme onely, but alſo in other lands, (as euill words walke farre) that the Kings brother ſhall bee faine to keepe Sanctuary; for euery man I deeme, will ſuppoſe, that there is occaſion giuen, why it ſhould ſo be: and ſuch euill opinions once faſtened in mens hearts, hardly can bee ſcrewed out againe, and may grow to more griefe then any man here can diuine. Wherefore I thinke it were not the worſt to ſend vnto the Queene for the redreſſe of this matter, ſome honourable truſty man, ſuch as both tendreth the kings weale, and the honour of this Councell, and is alſo in fauour and credence with her. For all which conſiderations, none ſeemeth to mee more meete, then is our reuerend Father here preſent, my Lord Cardinall, who may in this matter doe moſt good of any man, if it pleaſe him to take the pains, which I doubt not of his goodneſſe hee will not refuſe, for the Kings ſake and ours, and weale of the young Duke himſefe, the Kings moſt honourable brother,

The Protectors perſwaſion to take out of Sanctuary the yong Duke of Yorke.

A fine fetch to fetch out the Duke.

The Protector would haue the Queene ſent vnto, ther, and after my Soueraigne himselfe, my most deere Nephew, Considering that thereby shall be ceased the slanderous rumor and obloquie now going, and the hurts auoided that thereof might insue, and much rest and quiet grow to all the Realme. And if she be percase so obstinate, and so precisely set vpon her owne will, that neither his wise and faithfull aduertisement cannot moue her; nor any mans reason content her: then shall we by mine aduise, and by the Kings authority, fetch him out of that Prison; & bring him to his noble presence, in whose continuall company he shall be so well cherished, and so honorably intreated, that all the world shall to our honor, and her reproach perceiue, that it was only malice, frowardnes, or folly, that caused her to keepe him there: this is my minde in this matter for this time, except any of your Lordships any thing perceiue to the contrary, for neuer shall I by Gods Grace, so wed my selfe to my owne will, but that I shall be ready to change it vpon your better aduises.

If the Queene refuse to deliuer the Duke what is to be done.

(26) When the Protector had said, all the Councell affirmed that the motion was good and reasonable, and to the King and the Duke his brother honorable, and the thing that should cease great murmur in the Realme, if the mother might be by good meanes induced to deliuer him. Which thing the Archbishop of Yorke, whom they all agreed also to be thereto most conuenient, tooke vpon him to moue her, and therein to doe his vttermost endeauour: howbeit if shee could by no meanes be entreated with her good will to deliuer him, then thought he, and such other of the Clergy then present, that it were not in any wise to be attempted, to take him out against her will. For it would bee a thing that should turne to the great grudge of all men, and high displeasure of God, if the priuiledge of that holy place should now be broken, which had so manie yeeres beene kept, which both Kings and Popes so good had granted, so many had confirmed, and which holy ground was more then fiue hundred yeeres agoe, by S. Peter in his owne person, in spirite accompanied with great multitude of Angels, by night so specially hallowed and dedicated to God, (for the proofe whereof they haue yet in the Abbey, S. Peters Cope to shew) that from that time hitherward, was there neuer so vndeuout a King, that durst violate that sacred place, or so holy a Bishop, that durst presume to consecrate it; and therefore (quoth the Archbishop of Yorke) God forbid that any man should for any thing earthlie, enterprize to breake the immunity and liberty of that sacred Sanctuary, that hath beene the safegard of many a good mans life: and I trust (quoth he) with Gods grace we shall not need it. But for what need soeuer, I would not we should doe it; I trust that shee shall be with reason contented, and all things in good manner obtained, but if it happen, that I bring it not so to passe, yet shall I toward it with my best, and you shall all well perceiue, that there shall be of my indeauour no lacke, if the mothers dread, and womanish feare be not the let.

All the Counsell allow of the Protectors speech.

A great offence to breake the Sanctuary.

S. Peters owne Cope was to be seene in Westminster.

(27) Womanish feare, nay womanish frowardnes (quoth the Duke of Buckingham) for I dare take it vpon my soule, shee wel knoweth, there is no need of any feare, either for her sonne or for her selfe. For as for her, here is no man that will be at warre with a woman. Would God some of the men of her kin were women too, and then should al be soone in rest: Howbeit, there is none of her kin the lesse loued, for that they be of her kin, but for their owne euill deseruing. And nay the lesse, if we loued neither her, nor her kin, yet were there no cause to thinke, that we should hate the Kings noble brother, to whose Grace we our selues be of kin: whose honor, if shee as much desired, as our dishonor, and as much regard tooke to his wealth, as to her owne will, shee would be as loth to suffer him from the King, as any of vs bee. For, if shee haue wit, (as would God shee had as good will as shee hath shrewd wit) shee reckneth her selfe no wiser, then shee thinketh some that be here, of whose faithfull minde shee nothing doubteth, but verily beleeueth and knoweth, that they would be as sorry of his harme, as her selfe, and yet would haue him from her, if shee bide there: and we all (I thinke) content, that both be with her, if shee come thence, and bide in such place; where they may be with their honour. Now then, if shee refuse in the deliuerance of him, to follow the Counsell of them, whose wisdome shee knoweth, whose truth shee well trusteth: it is easie to perceiue, that frowardnes letteth her, and not feare. But goe to, suppose that shee feare, (as who may let her to feare her owne shadow) the more shee feareth to deliuer him, the more ought wee to feare to leaue him in her hands. For, if shee cast such fond doubts, that she feare his hurt; then will shee feare, that hee shall bee fetcht thence. For shee will soone thinke, that if men were set (which God forbid) vpon so great a mischiefe, the Sanctuary would little let them: which good men might (as I thinke) without sin, somewhat lesse regard then they doe. Then, if shee doubt, lest hee might bee fetched from her, is it not likely that shee shall send him somewhere out of the Realm? Verily, I looke for none other. And I doubt not, but shee now as sore mindeth it, as we the let thereof. And if she might happen to bring that to passe (as it were no great masterie, we letting her alone) all the world would say, that wee were a wise sort of Counsellors about a King, that suffer his brother to be cast away vnder our noses. And therefore I assure you faithfully for my mind, I will rather maugre her mind, fetch him away, then leaue him there, till her frowardnes and fond feare conuay him away. And yet will I breake no Sanctuary therefore: for verily, sith the priuiledges of that place, and other like haue beene of long continued, I am not he that wil goe about to breake them. And in good faith, if they were now to begin, I would not be he that should be about to make them. Yet will I not say nay, but that it is a deed of pitty, that such men, as the sea, or their euill debters haue brought in pouerty, should haue some place of liberty, to keepe their bodies out of the danger of their cruell Creditors. And also, if the Crowne happen (as it hath done) to come in question, while either part taketh other as Traitors, I like well there be some places of refuge for both. But as for theeues, of which these places bee full, and which neuer fa'l from the craft after they once fall thereunto; it is pitty the Sanctuary should serue them, & much more manquellers, whom God bad to take from the Altar and kill them, if their murther were wilfull. And where it is otherwise, there need wee not the Sanctuaries, that God appointed in the old Law: for if either necessity, his own defence, or misfortune draweth him to that deed, a pardon serueth, which either the law granteth of course, or the King of pitty may. Then look we now how few sanctuary men there be, whom any fauourable necessity compelled to goe thither; and then see on the other side, what a sort there be commonly therein of them, whom wilfull vnthriftinesse hath brought to naught: what rabble of theeues, murderers, and malitious hainous Traitors, and that in two places especially? the one at the elbow of the City, the other in the very bowels. I dare well auow it, weigh the good that they doe, with the hurt that commeth of them, and yee shall finde it much better to lacke both, then to haue both. And this I say, although they were not abused as they now be, and so long haue been, that I feare mee euer they will bee, while men bee afraide to set the hands to amend thē, as though God & S. Peter were the patrons of vngracious liuing. Now vnthrifts riot, and runne in debt, vpon the boldnes of these places; yea, and rich men runne thether with poore mens goods, there they build, there they spend, and bid their Creditors goe whistle. Mens wiues runne thither with their husbands plate, and say, say, they dare not abide with their husbands for beating. Theeues bring thither their stoln goods, and liue thereon riotously: there they deuise new robberies, nightly they steale out, they rob and riue, kill and come in againe, as though those places gaue them not onely a safeguard for the harme they haue done, but a licence also to do more; howbeit much of this mischiefe, if Wisemen would set their hands to it, might bee amended, with great thankes of God, and no breach of the Priuiledge. The residue, sith so long agoe, I wot neere what Pope, and what Prince more pitteous then politicke hath granted it, and other men since, of a certaine religious feare, haue not broken it; let vs therefore take paine therewith, and let it a Gods name stand in force, as farre forth as reason will, which is not fully so farre forth, as may serue to let vs of the fetching forth of this Nobleman, to his honour and wealth, out of that place, in which he neither is, nor can bee a Sanctuary man. A Sanctuary serueth alwayes to defend the body of that man that standeth in danger abroad, not of great hurt onelie, but also of lawfull hurt; for against vnlawfull harmes, neuer Pope nor King intended to priuiledge any one place, for that priuiledge hath euery place: knoweth any man any place, wherein it is lawful for one man to do another wrong? that no man vnlawfully take hurt, that liberty, the King, the Law, and very nature forbiddeth in euery place, and maketh to that regard, for euery man, euery place a Sanctuary: but where a man is by lawfull meanes in perill, there needeth hee the tuition of some speciall priuiledge, which is the onely ground and cause of all Sanctuaries: from which necessity this noble Prince is farre, whose loue to the King, nature and kindred proueth, whose innocency to all the world, his tender youth proueth, and so Sanctuary, as for him, neither none he needeth, nor none can hee haue. Men come not to Sanctuary, as they come to Baptisme, to require it by their Godfathers; hee must aske it himselfe, that must haue it; and reason, sith no man hath cause to haue it, but whose conscience of his owne fault maketh him faine need to require it: what will then hath yonder babe? which and if he had discretion to require it, if neede were, I dare say would now bee right angry with them that keepe him there: and I would thinke without any scruple of conscience, without any breach of Priuiledge, to bee somewhat more homelie with them, that be there Sanctuarie men indeed: for if one goe to Sanctuary with another mans goods, why should not the King, leauing his body at liberty, satisfie the party of his goods, euen within the Sanctuarie? for neither King nor Pope can giue any place such a priuiledge, that it shall discharge a man of his debtes, being able to pay. And with that diuers of the Clergy that were present, whether they said it for his pleasure, or as they thought, agreede plainely, that by the law of God, and of the Church, the goods of a Sanctuarie man, should bee deliuered in payment of his debts, and stolne goods to the owner, and onely liberty reserued him, to get his liuing with the labour of his hands. Verily (quoth the Duke) I thinke you say very truth; and what if a mans wife would take Sanctuary, because she list to runne from her husband? I would weene if she could alleadge none other cause, hee may lawfully without any displeasure to Saint Peter, take her out of Saint Peters Church by the arme. And if no body may be taken out of Sanctuary, that saith he will bide there, then if a child will take Sanctuary, because hee feareth to goe to schoole, his Master must let him alone. And as simple as the sample is, yet is there lesse reason in our case then in that; for therein, though it be a childish feare; yet is there at the least wise some feare, and herein is there none at all. And verily, I haue often heard of Sanctuary men, but I neuer heard earst of Sanctuary Children. And therefore; as for the Conclusion of my mind, who so may haue deserued to need it, if they thinke it for their suretie, let them keepe it; but he can be no Sanctuary man that had neither wisdome to desire it, nor malice to deserue it; whose life or libertie, can by no lawfull processe stand in ieopardie: and hee that taketh one out of the Sanctuarie to do him good, I say plainely that he breaketh no Sanctuary.

Buckinghams conclusion.

(28) When the Duke had done, the temporall men wholy, & most part of the spirituall also, thinking no hurt earthly meant towardes the young babe, condiscended in effect, that if hee were not deliuered, hee should bee fetched; howbeit they all thought it best, in the auoiding of all maner of rumor, that the Lord Cardinall should first assay to get him with her good will. And thereupon, all the Councell came vnto the Starre-Chamber at westminster, and the Lord Cardinall leauing the Protector with the Councell in the Starre-Chamber, departed into the Sanctuary to the Queen with diuers other Lords with him, were it for the respect of his honour, or that shee should by presence of so many, perceiue that this errand was not one mans mind: or were it, for that the Protector intended not in this matter, to trust any one man alone, or else, that if shee finally were determined to keepe him, some of that Company had happily secret instructions incontinent, maugre her mind to take him, and to leaue her no respite to conuey him, which shee was likely to mind, after this matter broken to her, if the time would in any wise serue her.

The generall consent of them all.

(29) When the Queene and those Lords were come together in presence, the Lord Cardinall shewed her, that it was thought vnto the Protector, and vnto the whole Councell, that her keeping of the Kings brother in that place, was the thing which highly sounded, not onely to the great rumor of the people, and their obloquie, but also to the importable griefe and displeasure of the kings royall Maiesty, to whose Grace it were a singular comfort, to haue his naturall brother in Company, as it was both his dishonour, all theirs, and hers also, to suffer him in Sanctuary, as though the one brother stood in danger and perill of the other. And hee shewed her, that the Counsell therefore had sent him to require her the deliuery of the yong Duke, that hee might bee brought vnto the Kings presence at his liberty, out of that place, which they reckoned as a prison, and there hee should bee demeaned, according to his estate: and shee in this doing should both doe great good to the Realme, pleasure to the Councell, and profite to her selfe, succour to her friends that were in distresse; and besides that (which he wist well shee specially tendred) not onely great comfort and honour to the King, but also to the young Duke himselfe, whose great wealth it were to be together, aswell for many greater causes, as also for both their disports and recreations; which thing the Lords esteemed not slight, though it seemed light; well pondering, that their youth without recreation and play, cannot endure, nor any stranger, for the coniecture of both their ages and estates, so meete in that point for any of them, as eyther of them for other.

The Cardinall doth his errand to the Queene.

(30) My Lord (quoth the Queene) I say not nay, but that it were very conuenient, that this Gentleman whom yee require, were in company of the King his Brother; and in good faith, I thinke it were as great commodity to them both, for yet a while to bee in the custody of their mother, the tender age considered of the elder of them both, but speciallie the younger, which besides his infancy, that also needeth good looking to, hath a while been so sore diseased, vexed with sickneesse, and is so newly rather a little amended, then well recouered, that I dare put no person earthly in trust with his keeping but my selfe onely, considering that there is (as Physitians say) and as wee also find, double the perill in the recidiuation, that was in the first sickneſſe, with which diſeaſe, nature being ſore laboured, forewearied and weakned, waxeth the leſſe able to beare out and ſuſtaine a new ſurfeit. And albeit there might be found other that would happily do their beſt vnto him, yet is there none that either knoweth better how to order him, then I that ſo long haue kept him, or is more like tenderly to cheriſh him then his owne mother that bare him.

(31) No man denieth good Madam (quoth the Cardinall) but that your Grace were of all others moſt neceſſary about your children, and ſo would all the Councell not onely bee content, but glad that you were, if it might ſtand with your pleaſure, to bee in ſuch place as might ſtand with their honor: but if you doe appoint your ſelfe to tarry here, then they thinke it were more conuenient that the Duke of Yorke were with the King, honourably at his liberty, to the comfort of them both, rather then here as a Sanctuary man, to both their diſhonour and obloquie, ſith there is not alwayes ſo great a neceſſity to haue the child with his mother, but that occaſion may ſometimes bee ſuch, that it ſhould bee more expedient to keepe him elſewhere, which well appeareth in this, that at ſuch time as your deareſt ſonne then Prince, and now King, ſhould for his honor, and good order of the Country, keepe his reſidence in Wales, farre out of your Company, your Grace was well contented therwith your ſelfe.

(32) Not very well contented (quoth the Queen) and yet the caſe is not like, for the one was then in health, and the other is now ſicke: in which caſe I maruaile greatly, that my Lord Protector is ſo deſirous to haue him in his keeping, where if the Child in his ſickneſſe miſcarrie by nature, yet might hee runne into ſlander and ſuſpition of fraud. And where they call it a thing ſo ſore againſt my Childes honour, and theirs alſo, that hee abideth in this place: it is all their honours there to ſuffer him abide, where no man doubteth hee ſhall be beſt kept, and that is here, while I am here, which as yet intend not to come forth, and ieopard my ſelfe after other of my friends, which would God were rather here in ſurety with mee, then I there in ieopardy with them.

(33) Why Madame (quoth another Lord) know you any thing why they ſhould bee in ieopardy? Nay verily (quoth ſhee) nor why they ſhould bee in priſon, as now they bee. But it is I trow no great maruaile though I feare, leſt thoſe that haue not letted to put them in durance without colour, will let as little to procure their deſtruction without cauſe: The Cardinall made a countenance to the other Lord, that hee ſhould harpe no more vpon that ſtring, and then ſaid hee to the Queen, that he nothing doubted, but that thoſe Lords of her honourable kinne, which as yet remained vnder arreſt, ſhould vpon the matter examined doe well inough, and as towards her noble perſon, neither was, neither could be any ieopardy.

(34) Whereby ſhould I truſt that (quoth the Queene?) in that I am guiltleſſe? as though they were guilty: in that I am with their enemies better loued then they? when they hate them for my ſake; in that I am ſo neere a kin to the King? and how farre they be off, if that would helpe, as God grant it hurt not, and therefore as for me, I purpoſe not as yet, to depart hence. And as for this gentleman my ſonne, I minde that he ſhall be where I am, till I ſee further: for I aſſure you, for that I ſee ſome men ſo greedy, without any ſubſtantiall cauſe to haue him, makes me much more fearefull to deliuer him. Truly Madame (quoth he) the more vnwilling that you be to deliuer him, the more vnwilling other men be to ſuffer you to keepe him, leaſt your cauſeleſſe feare might cauſe you farther to conuey him: and many there be that thinke he can haue no priuiledge in this place, which neither can haue will to aske it, nor malice to deſerue it, and therefore, they reckon no priuiledge broken, though they fetch him out, which if you finally refuſe to deliuer him, I verily think they will: ſo much dreadhath my Lord his vncle, for the tender loue he beareth him, leſt your grace ſhould hope to ſend him away.

(35) Ah ſir (quoth the Queene) hath the Protector ſo tender zeale that he feareth nothing, but leaſt he ſhould eſcape him? thinketh he that I would ſend him hence, which is not in plight to ſend out, and in what place could I account him ſure, if he be not ſure in the Sanctuary? which there was neuer Tyrant yet ſo diueliſh, that durſt preſume to breake. And I truſt God is as ſtrong now to withſtand his aduerſaries, as euer he was. But my ſonne can deſerue no Sanctuary, and therefore he cannot haue it. Forſooth he hath found out a goodly gloſſe, by which that place that may defend a thiefe, may not ſaue an innocēt: but he is in no ieopardy, nor hath no need thereof: would God he had not. Thinketh the Protector, (I pray God hee may proue a Protector) thinketh hee, that I perceiue not whereunto his painted Proceſſe draweth? It is not honorable that the Duke abide here: It were comfortable for them both, that he were with his brother, becauſe the King lacketh a play fellow forſooth. I pray God ſend them both better playfellows then him, that maketh ſo high a matter, vpō ſo trifling pretext, as though there could none be found to play with the King, but his brother, (that hath no liſt to play for ſicknes) come out of Sanctuary, out of his ſafegard to play with him. As though Princes, as yong as they be, could not play but with their Peeres, or Children could not play but with their kindred, with whom for the moſt part they agree much worſe then with ſtrangers. But the Childe cannot require the priuiledge: who tolde him ſo? he ſhall heare him aske it, if he will. Howbeit, this is a gay matter, ſuppoſe hee coulde not aske it, ſuppoſe hee woulde not aske it, ſuppoſe hee woulde aske to goe out, if I ſay hee ſhall not: if I aske the priuiledge but for my ſelfe, I ſay he that taketh him out againſt my will, breaketh the Sanctuarie. Serueth this liberty for my perſon onely, or for my goods alſo? you may not take hence my horſe from me: and may you take my child from me? He alſo is my ward: for as my learned Councell ſheweth me, ſith he hath nothing by diſcent holden by Knights ſeruice, the law maketh his mother his Gardian. Then may no man I ſuppoſe, take my ward from me out of Sanctuary, without the breach of Sanctuary. And if my priuiledge could not ſerue him, nor he aske it for himſelfe, yet ſith the law committeth to me the cuſtodie of him, I may require it for him, except the law giue a child a Gardian only for his goods and lands, diſcharging him of the cure and ſafe-keeping of his body, for which only both lands and goods ſerue. And if examples be ſufficient, to obtaine priuiledge for my child, I need not farre to ſeeke them, for in this place in which now we be (and which is now in queſtion, whether my child may take benefit of it) mine other ſonne now King, was borne, kept in his Cradle, and preſerued to a more proſperous fortune, which I pray God long to continue. And as you all know, this is not the firſt time that I haue taken Sanctuary. For when my Lord my husband was baniſhed, and thruſt out of his Kingdome, I fled hither, being great with Child: and here I bare the Prince: and when my Lord my husband returned ſafe againe, and had the victory, then went I hence, to welcome him home, and from hence I brought my babe the Prince vnto his father, when hee firſt tooke him in his armes. And I pray God that my ſonnes Pallace may be as great a ſafegard vnto him now raigning, as this place was ſometime to the Kings enemie. In which place I intend to keepe his brother, ſince mans law ſerueth the Gardian to keepe the Infant. The law of nature wils the mother to keepe her her child, Gods law priuiledgeth the Sanctuary, and the Sanctuary my ſonne, ſith I feare to put him in the Protectors hands, who hath his brother already, and were (if both failed) inheritour to the Crowne: and the cauſe of my feare, hath no man to doe to examine. But yet I feare no further then the law feareth, which as learned men tell me, forbiddeth euerie man, the cuſtody of them by whoſe death hee may inherit leſſe land then a Kingdome. I can no more: but whoſoeuer he be that breaketh this holy Sanctuary, I pray God ſhortly ſend him need of a Sanctuary when hee may not come to it, for taken out of Sanctuary I would not that my mortall enemy were.

(36) The Lord Cardinall perceiuing that the Queene waxed euer the longer the further off, & alſo that ſhee beganne to kindle and chafe, and ſpeake more biting words againſt the Protector, and ſuch as he neuer beleeued, and was alſo loath to heare, hee ſaid to her for a finall concluſion, that he no longer would diſpute the matter, but if ſhee were content to deliuer the Duke to him, and to the other Lords preſent, he durſt lay his body and ſoule both in pledge, not onely for his ſurety, but alſo for his eſtate; And if ſhe would giue a reſolute anſwere to the contrary, he would forthwith depart therewithall, and ſhift who ſo would with this buſineſſe afterward, for he neuer intended more to moue her in that matter, in which ſhee thought that hee and all others alſo ſaue herſelfe, lacked either witte or truth; wit, if they were ſo dull that they could perceiue nothing what the Protector intended: truth, if they ſhould procure her ſonne to be deliuered into his hands, in whom they ſhould perceiue towards the Child any euill intended.

(37) The Queene with theſe wordes ſtood a good while in a deepe ſtudy. And for as much as her ſeemed the Cardinal ready to depart, and the Protector himſelfe readie at hand, ſo as ſhee verily thought ſhe could not keepe him there, but that he ſhould incontinent be taken thence, and to conuey him elſewhere, neither had ſhee time to ſerue her, nor place determined, nor perſons appointed, all things vnready, this meſſage came on her ſo ſuddainly, nothing leſſe looked for, then to haue him fetcht out of Sanctuarie, which ſhe thought to be now beſet in ſuch places about, that he could not be conueyed out vntaken, and partly (as ſhee thought) it might fortune her feare to be falſe, ſo well ſhee wiſt it was either needleſſe or bootleſſe: Wherefore, if ſhee muſt needs go frō him, ſhe deemed it beſt to deliuer him, & beſides the Cardinals faith, ſhe nothing doubted, neither ſome other Lords, whom ſhe ſaw there preſent, which as ſhe feared leſt they might be deceiued, ſo was ſhe wel aſſured they would not be corrupted: and thought it would make thē the more warily to looke to him, and the more circumſpectly to ſee to his ſurety, if with her owne hands ſhee betooke him to them of truſt. And laſtly taking the young Duke by the hand ſaid vnto the Lords.

(38) My Lords, and all my Lords; I neither am ſo vnwiſe to miſtruſt your wits, nor ſo ſuſpitious to miſtruſt your truths: of which thing I purpoſe to make you ſuch a proofe, as if either of both lacked in you, might both turne mee to great ſorrow, the Realme to much harme, & you all to great reproch. For loe, here is (quoth ſhe) this Gentleman, whom I doubt not, but I could heere keepe ſafe if I would, whatſoeuer any man ſay: and I doubt not alſo, but there bee ſome abroad ſo deadly enemies vnto my blood, that if they wiſt where any of it lay in their owne bodies, they would let it out. We haue alſo experience, that the deſire of a kingdome knoweth no kindred: the brother hath beene the brothers bane: and may the Nephewes be ſure of their Vncle? Each of theſe children is the others defence, whileſt they are aſunder, and each of their liues lieth in the others body: keepe one ſafe and both be ſure, and nothing for them both more perillous then to be in one place. For what wiſe Merchant aduentureth all his goods in one ſhip? All this notwithſtanding, I deliuer him, and his brother in him, to keep, into your hands, of whom I ſhall aske both, before God and the world. Faithfull ye be, that wot I well, and I know well you be wiſe, power and ſtrength to keepe him, if yee liſt, neither lack yee of your ſelfe, nor lack helpe in this caſe. And if you cannot elſewhere, then may you leaue him heere: but onely one thing, I beſeech you, for the truſt that his father euer put in you, and for the truſt I now put you in, that as fatre as you thinke I feare too much, bee you well wary that you feare not too little: and therewithall ſhee ſayd vnto the child, Farewell mine owne ſweet ſon, God ſend you good keeping: let me kiſſe you yet once, ere you go; for God knoweth when wee ſhall kiſſe together againe. And therwithal ſhe kiſſed him, and bleſſed him, turned her back and wept, and went her way, leauing the child weeping as faſte. When the Lord Cardinal, and thoſe other Lords with him, had receiued the yong Duke, they brought him into the Star-chamber, where the protector tooke him in his armes, and kiſſed him with theſe words: Now welcome my Lord, euen with all my heart: In which ſaying, it is like hee ſpake as he thought. Thereupon foorthwith they brought him vnto the King his brother, into the Biſhops Pallace at Paules; and from thence both of them through the Citie of London honourably attended into the Tower, out of which after that day they neuer came againe.

A Iudas kiſſe.

(39) The protector hauing both the children now in his hands, opened himſelf more boldly, both to certaine other men, & alſo chiefly to the Duke of Buckingham. Although I know that many thought that this Duke was priuy to all the protectors counſell, euen from the beginning, and ſome of the protectors friends ſayd, that the Duke was the firſt mouer of the protector to this matter, ſending a priuie meſſenger vnto him ſtreight after King Edwards death. But others againe, which knew better the ſubtill wit of the protector, deny that he euer opened his enterpriſe to the Duke, vntil he had brought to paſſe the things before rehearſed. But when hee had impriſoned the Queenes kindred, and gotten both her ſonnes into his owne hands; then he opened the reſt of his purpoſe with leſſe feare to them whom he thought meet for the matter, and eſpecially to the Duke, who being wonne to his deſignes, he held his ſtrength more then halfe increaſed. The matter was broken vnto the Duke by ſubtil perſons, and ſuch as were their crafts maſters in the handling of ſuch wicked deuiſes: who declared vnto him that the young King was offended with him, for his kinſfolkes ſakes, and if he were euer able he would reuenge them: who would prick him forward thereunto if they eſcaped (for they would remember their impriſonment) or elſe if they were put to death, without doubt the yong King would be careful for their deaths, whoſe impriſonments was grieuous vnto him. And that with repenting the Duke ſhould nothing auaile, for there was no way left to redeeme his offence by benefits, but he ſhould ſooner deſtroy himſelfe then ſaue the King, who with his brother, and his kinſfolkes he ſawe in ſuch places impriſoned, as the protector might with a beck deſtroy them all: and without all doubt would doe it indeed, if there were any new enterpriſe attempted. And that it was likely as the Protector had prouided priuie gard for himſelf, ſo had he ſpials for the Duke and traines to haue caught him, if he ſhould bee againſt him, & that peraduenture from them, whom he leaſt ſuſpected. For the ſtate of things, & the diſpoſitions of men were then ſuch that a man could not well tell whom hee might truſt, or whom hee might feare. Theſe things and ſuch like, being beaten into the Dukes minde, brought him to that point, that where he had repented thē way that hee had entred, yet would he goe forward in the ſame, and ſince hee had once begunne, hee would ſtoutly goe through. And therefore to this wicked enterpriſe which hee beleeued

Suſpicion without cauſe.

beleeued could not be auoyded, hee bent himselfe, determining, sith the common mischiefe could not be amended, he would turne it as much as he might to his owne commoditie.

The couenants betwixt the Protector and the Duke of Buckingham.

(40) Then was it agreed, that the Protector should haue the Dukes aide to make him King, and that the Protectors only lawfull sonne should marry the Dukes daughter; and that the Protector should grant him the quiet possession of the Earldome of Hertford, which he claimed as his inheritance, and could neuer obtaine it in King Edwards time. Besides these requests of the Duke, the Protector of his owne accord, promised him a great quantitie of the Kings treasurie, and of his houshold stuffe. And when they were thus at a point betwixt themselues, they went about to prepare for the Coronation of the yong king as they would haue it seeme. And that they might turne both the eyes & minds of men frō perceiuing of their drifts otherwhere, the Lords were sent for from all parts of the Realme, and came flocking vnto the solemnitie. But the Protector and Duke after they had sent the Lord Cardinall Archbishop of Yorke, then L. Chancellor, the Bishop of Ely, the Lords Stanley & Hastings, then Lord Chamberlaine, with many other Noblemen, to conferre and deuise about the Coronation in one place, as fast they were in another place contriuing the contrary, to make the Protector king: to which counsel, albeit there were adhibited very few, and they very secret; yet began here and there, some muttering among the people, as though all should not long be wel, though they neither knew what they feared, nor wherefore: were it that before such great things, mens hearts of a secret instinct of nature misgiue them, as the Sea without winde swelleth of himselfe sometime before a tempest; or were it that some one man happily somewhat perceiuing, filled many men with suspition, though hee shewed fewe men what hee knew. Howbeit somewhat the dealing it selfe made men to muse on the matter, though the counsell were close. For by little and little, all men withdrewe from the Tower, and repaired to Crosbies in Bishopsgate streete, where the Protector kept his house in great state. So that the Protector had the resort, and the King left in a manner desolate. And whilest some for their businesse made suite to such as were in office for the King, some were secretly by their friends warned, that it might happely doe them no good, to be too much attendant about the king without the Protectors appointment, who then began to remoue many of the Princes old seruants, and in their stead to place about him new.

Two counsels to diuers ends.

The mistrust of the times.

All flocke to the Protector.

(41) Thus many things meeting together, partly by purpose, & partly by chance, caused at length not onely the common people that moue with the winde, but wisemen also, and some Lords likewise, to marke and muse at the matter; insomuch, that the Lord Stanley, who was after Earle of Darby, said to the Lord Hastings, that he much misliked these two seuerall counsels. For while we (quoth he) talke of one matter in the one place, little wot we, whereof they talke in the other place. My Lord (quoth the Lord Hastings) of my life neuer doubt you: for while * one man is there, which is neuer thence, neuer can things be moued that should sound amisse against me, but it shall be in mine eares ere it be well out of their mouths: this ment he by Catesby, which was of his neere counsell, and whom hee very familiarly vsed, and in his most waighty matters put no man in so speciall trust, nor no man so much beholden vnto him as Catesby was. A man indeed well learned in the Lawes of this Land, and by speciall fauour of the Lord Chamberlaine, in good authoritie, and bare much rule in Leicestershire, where the Lord Hastings power chiefly lay. But surely great pittie it was, that he had not had either more truth, or lesse wit. For his dissimulation onely kept all that mischiefe vp: in whom if the Lord Hastings had not put so special trust, the Lord Stanley and hee had departed with diuers other Lords, and had broken all the dance, for many ill signes that he saw, which he now construes all to the best. So surely thought he that there could bee no harme towards him intended, in that counsell where Catesby was. And of truth, the Protector and Duke of Buckingham, made very good semblance vnto the Lord Hastings, whom vndoubtedly the Protector loued well, and loth was to haue lost him, but for feare, least his life should haue quailed their purpose; for which cause hee moued Catesby to proue with some words, cast out a farre off, whether hee could thinke it possible to winne the L. Chamberlaine to their part. But Catesby whether hee assayed him, or assayed him not, reported vnto them, as hee found him so fast, and heard him speake so terrible words, that hee durst no further breake. True it is, that the Lord Chamberlaine, of very trust shewed vnto Catesby, the distrust that others began to haue in the matter: & therfore Catesby fearing as he affirmed, least their motion might with the Lord Hastings diminish his credence, whereunto only all the matter leaned; hee counselled and procured the Protector hastily to rid him. And much the rather, for that he trusted by his death, to obtaine much of the rule that the Lord Hastings bare in his Countrey: the onely desire whereof, was the allectiue that induced him to be partner, and one speciall contriuer of all this horrible treason.

Lord Stanleyes speach to the Lord Chamberlain.

* Catesby.

Catesby the cause of much mischiefe.

(42) Soone after this, vpon Friday the thirteenth day of June, many Lords assembled in the Tower, and there sate in counsel, deuising the honorable solemnitie of the Kings Coronation; of the which the time appointed was so neere, that the Pageants and subtilties were in making day and night at Westminster, and much victuall killed, that afterward was cast away. These Lords sitting together communing of this matter, the Protector came in amongst them about nine of the clocke, saluting them courteously, and excusing himselfe, that he had beene from them so long, saying merrily, I haue bin a sleeper this day. And after a little talke with them, he said to the Bishop of Ely, My Lord, you haue verie good Strawburies at your Garden in Holborne, I pray you let vs haue a messe of them: Gladly my Lord, said the Bishop, would God I had some better thing as ready to pleasure you as that: and therewith in all haste hee sent his seruaunt for a messe of Strawburies. Whereupon the Protector setting the Lords fast in conference, prayed them to spare him for a little while, and departed thence. But soone after, betwixt ten and eleuen, hee returned into the counsell Chamber amongst them, with a wonderfull sowre and angry countenance, knitting the browes, frowning and fretting, and gnawing on his lippes, sate him downe in his place, all the Lords much dismayed, sore maruelling of this his suddaine change, and what thing should him aile: He sitting thus a while, began thus to speake, what are they worthy to haue, that compasse and imagine the destruction of mee, being so neere of blood vnto the King, and Protector of his royall person and his Realme? At which question, all the Lords sate sore astonied, musing much by whom this question should be meant, of which euery man knew himselfe cleare.

(43) Then the Lord Chamberlaine, as hee that for the loue betwixt them, thought he might bee bouldest with him, answered & said, That they were worthy to be punished as haynous traitors whatsoeuer they were: and the same all the other Lords affirmed. That is (quoth the Protector) yonder sorceresse my brothers wife, meaning the Queene, and others with her: at these words many of the Lords that fauoured her, were greatly abashed: but the L. Hastings was in his minde better content, that it was moued by her, then by any other whom hee loued better: howbeit, his heart somewhat grudged, that he was not afore made of counsell in this matter, as he hee was of the taking of her kindred, & of their putting to death, which were by his assent before deuised to bee beheaded at Pomfret the selfe same day, in which hee was not aware, how it was by other deuised, that himselfe should bee beheaded the same day at London. Then said the Protector, yee shall all see in what wise that Sorceresse, and that other witch of her counsel, Shores wife, with their affinity, haue by their sorcerie and witchcraft wasted my body. And therewith he plucked vppe his doublet sleeue to the elbow vpon his left arme, where he shewed a wearish withered arme, and small, as it was neuer other.

(44) And thereupon euery mans mind sore misgaue them, well perceiuing that this matter was but a quarrell. For they well knew, that the Queen was too wise to go about any such folly; & if she would, yet would shee of all others, not make Shores wife of counsell, whom of all women shee most hated; as that Concubine whom the King her husband had most loued. And also no man there present, but knew well enough, that his arme was euer such since his birth. Neuertheless the Lord Chamberlaine, (which from the death of King Edward kept Shores wife, on whom hee somewhat doated in the Kings life, sauing as it is said, that hee forbare her for reuerence towards the King, or else of a certain kind of fidelity to his friend) answered and said: Certainely my Lord, if they haue so heinously done, they bee worthy of hainous punishment. What (quoth the Protector) thou seruest mee I ween with ifs and with ands, I tell thee they haue so done, and that I will make good on thy bodie Traitor. And therewith as in a great anger, hee clapped his fist vpon the board a great rap: at which token giuen, one without the Chamber cryed, treason, wherewith a dore clapped, and in came rushing men in harnesse, as many as the Chamber might hold, and anone the Protector said to the Lord Hastings, I arrest thee Traitor: What mee my Lord quoth hee? yea thee Traitor quoth the Protector; and another let flie at the Lord Stanley, who shrunke at the stroke vnder the Table, or else his head had beene cleft to the teeth: for as swiftly as hee shrunke, yet came the bloud about his eares. Then were they all quickly bestowed in diuers Chambers, excepting onely the Lord Chamberlaine, whom the Protector bad speede and shriue him apace, for by S. Paul said hee, I will not to dinner till I see thy head off. It booted him not to aske why, but heauily tooke a Priest at aduenture, and made a short shrift, for a longer would not be suffered: The Protector made so much haste to dinner, which hee might not goe to, till this was done for sauing of his oath. So was hee brought forth vnto the greene, before the Chappell within the Tower, and his head laid down vpon a long logge of timber, and there strucke off, and afterward his body with the head, was enterred at Windsor, beside the body of K. Edward.

(45) A marualous case it is to heare, either of the warnings that hee should haue voided, or the tokens of that hee could not auoid: for the self night before his death, the Lord Stanley sent a trusty secret Messenger vnto him at Midnight in all the hast, requiring him to rise, and ride away with him, for he was vtterly disposed no longer to abide, hee had so fearefull a dreame: in which he thought, that a Bore with his tuskes, so razed them both by the heades, that the bloud ranne about both their shoulders. And forasmuch as the Protector gaue the Bore for his cognizance, this dreame made so fearefull an impression in his heart, that hee was throughly determined no longer to tarry, but had his horse ready, if the Lord Hastings would goe with him, to ride yet so farre the same night, that they would be out of danger before it was day. Ah good Lord (quoth the Lord Hastings to the Messenger) leaneth my Lord thy Master so much to such trifles, and hath faith in dreames, which either his owne feare fantasieth, or doe rise in the nights rest, by reason of the dayes thoughts? Tell him it is plaine Witchcraft, to beleeue in such dreames, which if they were tokens of things to come, why thinketh hee not, that wee might be as likely to make them true, by our going, if we were caught and brought back (as friends faile flyers) for then had the Bore a cause likely to raise vs with his tuskes, as men that fled for some falshood: wherefore, either there is no peril, nor none there is indeed, or if any be, it is rather in going then abiding. And if wee must needs fall in perill, one way or other, yet had I rather, that men should see, it were by other mens falshood, then thinke it our fault or faint-heart. And therefore goe to thy Master man, and commend me to him; and pray him to bee merry and haue no feare; for I assure him, I am as sure of the man that he wotteth of, as I am of mine owne hand. God send Grace Sir (said the Messenger) and went his way.

The L. Hastings answere to the L. Stanleyes message.

(46) Certaine it is also, that in riding towards the Tower the same morning in which hee was beheaded, his horse twice or thrice stumbled with him, almost to the falling; which thing, albeit each man knoweth daily hapneth, to them to whom no such mischance is toward, yet hath it beene of an olde rite and custome obserued, as a token oftentimes, notably foregoing some great misfortune: Now this that followeth was no warning, but an enuious scorne. The same morning before he was vp, came a Knight vnto him, as it were of curtesie, to accompany him to the Counsell; but of truth sent by the Protector, to haste him thitherwards, with whom he was of secret confederacy in that purpose, a meane man at that time, but now of great authority. This Knight, when it hapned the Lord Chamberlain by the way to stay his horse, and commune a while with a Priest whom hee met in Towerstreet, brake his tale, and said merily to him; what my Lord, I pray you come on, wherto talke you so long with a Priest, you haue no need of a Priest yet, and therewith laughed vpon him, as though hee would say, yee shall haue soone. But so little wist the other what hee meant, and so little mistrusted his present perill, as hee neuer was merrier, nor neuer so full of good hope in his life, which selfe thing is often seene a signe of change; but I shall rather let any thing passe me, then the vaine surety of mans mind so neere his death. Vpon the very Tower-wharfe, so neere the place where his head was strooke off soone after, there met he with one Hastings, a Pursuant of his owne name. And of their meeting in that place, hee was put in remembrance of another time, in which it had happened them before, to meet in the like manner together in the same place. At which other time the L. Chamberlaine had been accused vnto King Edward by the Lord Riuers the Queenes brother, in such wise as hee was for the while, (but it lasted not long) farre fallen into the Kings indignation, and stood in great feare of himselfe. And forasmuch as hee now mette this Pursuant in the same place, that ieopardy so well passed, it gaue him great pleasure to talke with him thereof; with whom hee had before talked therof in the same place, while he was therein. And therefore he said, ah Hastings, art thou remembred that I met thee once here with a heauy heart? yea my Lord (quoth hee) that remembret I well, and thanked bee God, they got no good, nor you no great harme. Thou wouldest say so (quoth he) if thou knew so much as I know, which few know else as yet, and more shall shortly. That ment hee by the Lords of the Queenes kindred, which were taken before, and should that same day bee beheaded at Pomfret: which hee well wist, but was nothing aware, that the axe hung ouer his owne head; In faith man (quoth he) I was neuer so sorry, nor neuer stood in so great dread of my life, as I did when thou and I met here. And loe, how the world is changed, now stand my enemies in the danger (as thou maist hap to heare more hereafter) and I neuer in my life so merry, nor neuer in so great suretie. Oh good God, the blindnes of our mortall nature, when he most feared he was in good suretie, when he reckened himselfe surest, he lost his life, and that within two houres after. Thus ended this honorable man, a good Knight and a gentle, of great authority with his Prince, of liuing somewhat dissolute, plaine and open to his enemies, and secret to his friends, easie to be beguiled, as he that of good heart & courage forestudied no perils; a louing man, a passing well beloued: very faithful, and trusty enough, trusting indeed too much. Now flew the fame of this Lords death swiftly through the Citie, and from thence further, like a winde in euery mans eare.

Predictions towards the Lord Hastings.

The Lord Hastings speech to a Pursuant.

The vaine and suddain state of man.

The description of the Lord Hastings.

Citizens sent for into the Tower to the Protector.

(47) But the Protector immediately after dinner, intending to set some colour vpon the matter, sent in all haste for many substantiall men, out of the City into the Tower, at whose comming thither, himselfe with the Duke of Buckingham, stood harnessed in olde rusty briganders, such as no more, man should weene, that they would vouchsafe to haue put on their backes, except that some suddain necessity, had constrained them thereto. And then the Protector shewed them, that the Lord Chamberlaine, and others of his conspiracy, had contriued to haue suddainly destroied him and the Duke there the same day in Counsell. And what they intended further, was not yet well knowne. Of which their treason he neuer had knowledge, before ten of the clocke, the same forenoone, which suddain feare droue them to put on for their defence, such harnesse as came next to hand: and so had God holpen them, that the mischiefe returned vpon them that would haue done it: and this he required them to report.

The fained feare of the Lord Protector.

(48) Euerie man answered him faire, as though no man mistrusted the matter, which of truth no man beleeued; yet for the further appeasing of the peoples minde, he sent immediately after dinner, in all haste, an Herauld of Armes, with a Proclamation to be made through the City in the Kings name, conteining that the Lord Hastings with diuers others of his traiterous purpose, had before conspired the same day, to haue slaine the Lord Protector, and Duke of Buckingham, sitting in the Councell, and after to haue taken vpon them, to rule the King and the Realme, at their owne pleasures; thereby to pill and spoile, whom they listed vncontrolled. And much matter there was in that Proclamation, deuised to the slander of the Lord Chamberlaine, as that he was an euill Counseller to the Kings father, entising him to many things, highly redounding to his great dishonour, and to the vniuersall hurt of his Realme, by his euill company, sinister procuring, & vngratious example aswell in many other things, as in the vicious liuing, and inordinate abusion of his body, both with many others, and especially with Shores wife, who was one also of his most secret Counsell, in this hainous treason, with whom hee lay nightly, and namely, the night last past, before his death, so that it was the lesse maruell, if vngracious liuing brought him to an vnhappy ending, which he was now put vnto, by the most dread commandement of the Kings highnesse, and of his honorable and faithfull Counsell, both for his demerits, being so openly taken in his falsely conceiued treason, as also least the delaying of his execution, might haue encouraged other mischieuous persons partners of his conspiracy, to gather and assemble themselues together in making some great commotion for his deliuerance, whose hope being now by his wel-deserued death politickely represled, all the Realme should by Gods grace, rest in good quiet and peace.

A Proclamation made to publish the Lord Hastings treasons.

The Protectors subtilty further knowne by his Proclamation.

(49) Now was this Proclamation made within two houres, after that he was beheaded, and was so curiously indited, and so faire written in parchment, in so well a set hand, and therewith of it selfe so long a processe, as euery child might perceiue, that it was prepared before. For all the time between his death, and the proclaiming, could scant haue suffised vnto the bare writing alone; had it beene but in paper, and scribled forth in haste at aduenture. So that vpon the proclaiming thereof, one that was Schoole-master of Paules, of chance standing by, and comparing the shortnes of the time, with the length of the matter, said vnto them that stood about him; Here is a gay goodly cast, foule cast away for hast: and a Merchant answered him, that it was written by Prophecie. Now then by and by, as it were for anger, not for couetousnesse, the Protector sent the Sheriffes of London, into the house of Shores wife (for her husband dwelled not with her) and spoiled her of all that shee had, aboue the value of three thousand markes, carrying her through London vnto the Tower, and there left her Prisoner, where (for fashion sake) he laid to her charge, that shee went about to bewitch him, and that shee was of Counsell with the Lord Chamberlaine to destroy him: in conclusion, when no colour could fasten vpon these matters, then laid hee hainously vnto her charge, the thing that her selfe could not deny, that all the world wist was true, and that neithlesse euery man laughed at, to heare it then so suddainly, so highly taken, that shee was nought of her body. And for that cause (as a good continent Prince, cleare and faultlesse himselfe, sent out of heauen into this vitious world for the amendment of mens manners) after shee had laine Prisoner in Ludgate, he caused the Bishop of London to put her to open penance, going before the Crosse in procession vpon a sunday, with a taper in her hand. In which shee went in countenance and pace demure so womanly, and albeit shee were out of all array saue her kirtle only, yet went shee so faire and louely, namely while the wondering of the people cast a comly rud in her cheekes (of which before shee had most mist) that her great shame, wan her much praise, among those that were more amorous of her body, then curious of her soule. And many good folke also that hated her liuing, and glad to see sinne so corrected, yet pitied the more her penance, then reioiced therein, when they considered that the Protector procured it more of a corrupt intent, then any vertuous affection.

(50) This woman was borne in London, worshipfully friended, honestly brought vp, and very well married, sauing somewhat too soone; her husband an honest Citizen, young, and goodly, and of good substance. But for asmuch as they were coupled ere shee were well ripe, shee not very feruently loued, for whom shee neuer longed; which was haply the thing that the more made her incline vnto the Kings appetite, when he required her. Howbeit the respect of his roialty, the hope of gay apparell, ease, pleasure, and other wanton wealth, was able soone to pierce a soft tender heart. But when the King had abused her, anone her husband (as he was an honest man, and one that could his good, not presuming to touch a Kings concubine) left her vp to him altogether. When the King died, the Lord Chamberlaine tooke her, which in the Kings daies, albeit he was sore enamoured vpon her, yet he forbare her, either for reuerence, or for a certaine friendly faithfulnes: proper shee was, and faire; nothing in her body that you could haue changed, vnlesse you would haue wished her somewhat higher. Thus they say that knew her in her youth. Albeit some that now see her (for as yet shee liueth) deeme her neuer to haue beene well visaged, whose iudgement seemeth to me somewhat like, as though we could gesse the beauty of one long before departed, by her scalpe taken out of the Charnell house: for now shee is olde, leane, withered, and dried vp, nothing left but riueled skinne, and hard bone; and yet being euen such, who so well aduise her visage, might gesse and deuise, which parts how filled, would make it a faire face.

face. Yet delighted not men, ſo much in her beauty, as in her pleaſant behauiour, for a proper wit ſhee had, and could both reade well and write, merry in company, ready and quicke of anſwere, neither mute nor full of babble, ſometime taunting without diſpleaſure, and not without diſport: in whom King Edward tooke ſpeciall pleaſure, whoſe fauour to ſay the truth (for ſinne it were to belie the Diuel) ſhe neuer abuſed to any mans hurt, but to many a mans comfort and reliefe, when the King took diſpleaſure, ſhee would mitigate and appeaſe his mind; where men were out of fauour, ſhee would bring them in his grace, for many that highly offended ſhee obtained pardon. Of great forfeytures ſhee gate them remiſſion. And finally, in many weighty ſuites ſhee ſtood many men in great ſtead, either for none, or very ſmall rewards, and thoſe rather gay then rich, either for that ſhe was content with the deed it ſelfe well done, or for that ſhe delighted to bee ſued vnto, and to ſhew what ſhee was able to do with the King, or for that wanton women and wealthy, bee not alwaies couetous. I doubt not ſome ſhall thinke this woman too ſlight a thing to be written of, and ſet among the remembrances of great matters: which they ſhall ſpecially thinke, that happily ſhall eſteeme her onely by that they now ſee her. But to my ſeeming, the chance is ſo much the more worthy to be remembred, in how much ſhe is now in the more beggerly condition, vnfriended, and worne out of acquaintance, after good ſubſtance, after ſo great fauour with a Prince, after ſo great ſuit, and ſeeking to, of all thoſe, that in thoſe dayes had buſineſſe to ſpeede, as many other men were in their times, which bee now famous onely by the infamy of their ill deedes: her doings were not much leſſe, albeit they bee much leſſe remembred, becauſe they were not ſo euill: for men vſe, if they receiue an euill turne, to write it in marble: and who ſo doth vs a good turne, we write it in the duſt; which is not worſt proued by her: for at this day ſhee beggeth of many, at this day liuing, that at this day had begged if ſhee had not been.

(51) Now it was ſo deuiſed by the Protector and his Councell, that the ſelfe ſame day in which the L. Chamberlaine was beheaded in the Tower of London, and about the ſelfe ſame howre was then (not without his aſſent) beheaded at Pomfrait, the foreremembred Lords and Knights, that were taken from the King at Northampton and Stony-Stratford; which thing was done in the preſence, and by the order of Sir Richard Ratcliffe Knight, whoſe ſeruice the Protector ſpecially vſed in that counſell, and in the execution of ſuch lawleſſe enterpriſes, as a man that had beene long ſecret with him, hauing experience of the world, and a ſhrewd witte, ſhort and rude in ſpeech, rough and boiſterous of behauiour, bolde in miſchiefe, as farre from pitty, as from all feare of God. This Knight bringing them out of priſon to the Scaffold, and ſhewing to the people preſent, that they were Traitors, not ſuffering them to ſpeake, or declare their innocency, leſt their wordes might haue inclined men to pitty them, and to hate the Protector and his part; cauſed them haſtily without Iudgement, proceſſe or manner of order to bee beheaded, and without all guilt, but onely that they were good men, too true to the King, and too nigh to the Queene.

(52) Now when the Lord Chamberlaine, and thoſe other Lords and Knights were thus beheaded and ridde out of the way: then thought the Protector, that while men muſed what the matter meant, while the Lords of the Realme were about him out of their owne ſtrengthes, while no man wiſt what to thinke, nor whom to truſt, before they ſhould haue ſpace to diſpute, and digeſt the matter, and make parties, it were beſt haſtily to purſue his purpoſe, and put himſelfe in poſſeſſion of the Crown, ere men could haue time to deuiſe how to reſiſt. But now was all the ſtudy, by what meanes the matter being of it ſelfe ſo hainous, might be firſt broken to the people in ſuch wiſe as it might bee well taken: To this counſell they tooke diuers, ſuch as they thought meet to bee truſted, likely to bee induced to that part, and able to ſtand them in ſtead, eyther by power or policy: Among whom they made of counſell Edmond Shaa Knight, then Maior of London, who vpon truſt of his owne aduancement, wherof he was of a proud heart, highly deſirous, ſhould frame the City to their appetite. Of Spirituall men they tooke ſuch as had wit, and were in authoritie among the people, for opinion of their learning, and had no ſcrupulous conſcience. Among theſe had they Iohn Shaa Clerke brother to the Maior, and Fryer Pinker Prouinciall of the Auguſtine Friers, both of them Doctors in Diuinity, both great Preachers, both of more learning then vertue, and of more fame then learning: for they were before greatly eſteemed of the common people; but after that neuer. Of theſe two, the one made a Sermon in prayſe of the Protector before the Coronation; the other after, both ſo full of tedious flattery, as no mans eare could abide them.

The Maior of London made of the Protectors counſell.

Shaa and Pinker two flattring Preachers.

(53) Pinker in his Sermon ſo loſt his voice, that he was forced to leaue off, and came downe in the middeſt. Doctor Shaa by his ſermon loſt his honeſty, and ſoone after his life, for very ſhame of the world, into which he durſt neuer after come abroad. But the Fryer forced for no ſhame, and ſo it harmed him the leſſe. Howbeit ſome doubt, and many thinke, that Pinker was not of counſell in the matter before the Coronation, but after the common manner, fell to flattery after: namely, ſith his ſermon was not incontinent vpon it, but at S. Maries Hoſpitall in the Eaſter weeke following. But certaine it is, that Doctor Shaa was of counſell in the beginning, ſo farre forth as they determined that he ſhould firſt breake the matter in a Sermon at Paules Croſſe, in which hee ſhould by the authority of his preaching, incline the people to the Protectors ghoſtly purpoſe. But now was all the labour and ſtudy, in the deuiſe of ſome conuenient pretext; for which the people ſhould bee content to depoſe the Prince, and accept the Protector for King. In which diuers things they deuiſed: but the chiefe thing and the weightieſt of all, the inuention reſted in this, that they ſhould alleadge baſtardy, either in K. Edward himſelf, or in his children, or both. So that hee ſhould ſeeme diſabled to inherite the Crowne, by the Duke of Yorke, and the Prince by him. To lay baſtardie in King Edward, ſounded openly to the rebuke of the Protectors owne mother, who was mother to them both: for in that point could bee none other colour, but to pretend that his own mother was an adultreſſe, which notwithſtanding to further the purpoſe hee letted not: but yet, hee would that point ſhould bee leſſe, and more fauourably handled, not fully plaine and directly, but that the matter ſhould be touched aſlope, and craftily, as though men ſpared in that point to ſpeake all the truth for feare of his diſpleaſure. But the other point, concerning the baſtardie that they deuiſed to ſurmiſe in K. Edwards children, that would hee ſhould bee openly declared, and enforced to the vttermoſt. The colour and pretext whereof, was a contract pretended to bee made by King Edward vnto the Lady Lucy, whereof we haue ſpoken in the raigne of the ſaid King: which inuention how ſimple ſoeuer, yet it liked them, to whom it ſufficed to haue ſomewhat to ſay, while they were ſure to be compelled to no larger proof then themſelues liſt to make.

Pinker preached at S. Marie Hoſpitall, and Doctor Shaa at Paules Croſſe.

The plot and deuice how to entitle the Protector to the Crowne.

The ſonne maketh the mother an adultreſſe.

K. Edward and his children made baſtards.

(54) Now then it was by the Protector and his Councell concluded, that Doctor Shaa ſhould ſignifie in his ſermon aforeſaid, that neither King Edward himſelfe, nor the Duke of Clarence were lawfully begot, nor were the very Children of the Duke of Yorke, but begot vnlawfully by other perſons, by adulterie of the Dutches their mother. And alſo that that dame Elizabeth Lucy was verily the wife of K. Edward, and so the Prince and all his other children begot by the Queene, were all of them bastards. And according to this deuise Doctor Shaw vpon Sunday the nineteenth of Iune at Pauls Crosse in a frequent assembly, took for the theme of his sermō this saying, Spuria vitulamina non agent radices altas : Bastard slips shall neuer take deepe root. Whereupon, when he had shewed the great grace that God giueth, and secretly infundeth in right generation after the lawes of Matrimonie, then declared he, that commonly those children lacked that grace, and for the punishment of their parents, were for the more part vnhappy, which were begot in base, but specially in adultery. Of which though some by the ignorance of the world, and the truth hid from knowledge inherite for the time other mens lands, yet God alwaies so prouideth, that it continueth not in their blood long, but the truth comming to light, the rightfull inheritors be restored, and the bastards slip pulled vp ere it can take any deepe roote. And when he had laid for the proofe and confirmation of this sentence certaine examples taken out of the old testament, and other ancient histories, then he began to descend into the praise of the Lord Richard, late Duke of Yorke, calling him the father to the Lord Protector, and declared the title of his heires vnto the Crowne, to whom it was after the death of King Henry the sixt, entailed by authority of Parliament. Then shewed he, that the verie right heire of his body lawfully begotten, was only the Lord Protector. For he declared then that King Edward was neuer lawfully married vnto the Queene, but was before God, husband vnto Dame Elizabeth Lucy, and so his children bastards. And besides that, neither King Edward himselfe, nor the Duke of Clarence, among those that were secret in the household, were reckoned very certainly for the children of the Noble Duke, as those that by their features, resembled other knowne men, more then him from whose vertuous conditions, he said also, that King Edward was farre off. But the Lord Protector he said, the very Noble Prince, the speciall patterne of Knightly prowesse, aswell in all Princely behauiour, as in the lineaments and fauour of his visage, representing the very face of the noble Duke his father: This is he (quoth he) the fathers owne figure, this is his owne countenance, the verie print of his visage, the very vndoubted Image, and plaine expresse likenesse of that noble Duke.

(55) Now it was before deuised, that in the speaking of these words, the Protector should haue come in among the people to the sermon ward, to the end that those words meeting with his presence, might haue beene taken among the hearers, as though the holy Ghost had put them in the Preachers mouth, and should haue moued the people euen then to crie, King Richard, King Richard, that it might haue beene after said, that he was specially chosen by God, and in manner by miracle. But this deuise quailed, either by the Protectors negligence, or by the Preachers ouer much diligence, for while the Protector found by the way tarrying, lest he should preuent those wordes, and the Doctor fearing least he should come ere his sermon could come to these wordes, hasted his matter thereto, who was come to them and past them, and had entred into other matter ere the Protector came. Whom when hee beheld comming, he suddainly left the matter with which he was in hand, and without anie deduction thereunto, out of all order, and out of all frame, began to repeate those wordes againe: This is the verie Noble Prince, the speciall paterne of Knightly prowesse, which aswell in all Princely behauiour, as in the lineaments and fauour of his visage, representeth the very face of the Noble Duke of Yorke his father: this is the fathers owne figure, this is his owne countenance, the very print of his visage, the sure vndoubted Image, the plaine expresse likenesse of the noble Duke, whose remembrance can neuer die while he liueth. While these wordes were in speaking, the Protector accompanied with the Duke of Buckingham, went through the people, into the place where the Doctors commonly stand in an vpper story, where he stood to heare the sermon. But the people were so farre from crying King Richard, that they stood as if they had beene turned into stones, for wonder of this shamefull sermon. After which once ended, the Preacher got him home, and neuer after durst looke out for shame, but kept himselfe out of sight like an Owle. And when he once asked one, that had beene his old friend, what the people talked of him, albeit that his own conscience well shewed him that they talked no good, yet when the other answered him, that there was in euery mans mouth spoken of him much shame, it so strucke him to the heart, that within few daies after, he withered and consumed away.

(56) On the tuesday following this sermon, there came into the Guild-hall in London the Duke of Buckingham, accompanied with diuers Lords & Knights, more perchance then knew the message which they brought. And there in the East end of the Hall, where the Maior keepeth the hustings, the Maior, and Aldermen being assembled about him, and all the commons of the City gathered before him: after silence commanded in the Protectors name vpon great paine, the Duke stood vp, and (as he was neither vnlearned, and of nature maruellously well spoken) hee said vnto the people with a cleare and loud "voice in this manner. Friends, for the zeale and "harty fauour that we beare you, we be come to "breake vnto you, a matter of great weight, and no "lesse weighty, then pleasing to God, and profita-"ble to all the Realme: nor to no part of the Realme "more profitable then to you the Citizens of this "noble City. For why, the thing that we wot well "you haue long time lacked, and so longed for, that "you would haue giuen great good for, that you "would haue gone farre to fetch, that thing we be "come hither to bring you, without your labour, "paine, cost, aduenture or ieopardie. What thing is "that? The Londoners are mute and aſtoniſhed at Buckinghams Oration. (57) When the Duke had ſayd, & looked that the people whō he hoped the Maior had framed before, ſhould after this propoſition made, haue cryed, King Richard, King Richard; all was huſht and mute, and not a word anſwered thereunto: wherewith the Duke was maruailouſly abaſhed, & taking the Maior neerer to him, with other that were about him priuie to that matter, ſaid vnto him ſoftly, What meaneth this, that the people bee ſo ſilent? Sir (quoth the Maior) perchance they perceiue you not well; that Buckingham goeth ouer his leſſon againe. ſhall we mend (quoth hee) if that will helpe. And by and by ſomewhat lowder, hee rehearſed them the ſame matter againe, in other order and other words, ſo well and ornately, ſo euidently and plaine, with voice, geſture, & countenance ſo comely, that euery man much maruailed that heard him, and thought they neuer had in their hearing, ſo euill a tale ſo well

But were it for wonder or feare, or that each man lookt that other ſpeake firſt; not a word was there anſwered of all the people that ſtood before, but was as ſtill as the midnight, not ſo much as rowning among themſelues, by which they might ſeeme to commune what was beſt to doe. When the Lord Maior ſaw this, hee with the other partners of that counſell drew about the Duke, and ſayd, That the people had not beene accuſtomed there to bee ſpoken vnto, but by the Recorder; who is the mouth of

With that the Recorder called Fitz-William, a ſad man and an honeſt, who was ſo newly come into that office, that hee neuer had ſpoken to the people before, and loth was with that matter to beginne; notwithſtanding, thereunto commanded by the Maior, he made rehearſal to the cōmons, of that the Duke had twice rehearſed to them himſelfe. But the Re-

But all this noting, no change made in the people, which ſtood gazing at the bench as men altogether amaſed. Whereupon the Duke rowned vnto the Maior, and ſaid, This is maruailous obſtinate ſilence, and therewith hee turned vnto the people againe
The Duke ſpeaketh once more. with theſe wordes: Deare friends, wee come to moue you to that thing which peraduenture we not ſo greatly needed, but that the Lords of this Realme and the Commons of other parts might haue ſufficed, ſauing that wee beare you ſuch loue, and ſo much ſet by your friendſhip, that wee would not willingly do without you the thing which is for our honour and your wealth, which as it ſeemeth, either you ſee not, or wey not; wherefore we require you, giue vs anſwere, whether ye be minded as all the nobles of the Realme bee, to haue this noble Prince now Protector, to be your King or not.

(58) At which words the people beganne to whiſper among themſelues ſecretly, that the voyce was neithe loud nor diſtinct, but as it were the ſound of a ſwarme of Bees, till at the laſt, in the nether end of the hall, a buſhment of the Dukes ſeruants, and Naſhfields, and of others belonging to the Protector, with ſome prentiſes and laddes that thruſt into the hall among the preſſe, beganne ſodainely at mens backes to cry out as loud as their throats would giue, King Richard, King Richard, & threw vp their caps in token of ioy. But they that ſtood before, caſt backe their heades, maruelling thereat, yet nothing they ſaid. And when the Duke and Mayor ſaw this manner, they wiſely turned it to their purpoſe, and ſaid it was a goodly cry, and a ioyfull, to heare euery man with one voice, no man ſaying nay: wherefore friends (quoth the Duke) ſince that wee well perceiue that it is all your whole minds to haue this noble man for your King, whereof we ſhall make to his Grace ſo effectuall report, that we doubt not, but it ſhall redound vnto your great wealth, and commodity: we require that to morrow you goe with vs, and wee with you vnto his Noble Grace, to make our humble requeſt vnto him in manner before remembred. And therwith the Lords came downe, and the aſſembly diſſolued for the moſt part ſad, ſome with glad ſemblances, and yet not very merry, yea and ſome that came with the Duke, not able to diſſemble their ſorrow, were faine at his backe to turne their face to the wal, while the dolour of their heart burſt out of their eyes.

(59) On the next morrow, the Mayor with all the Aldermen, and chiefe Commoners of the City in their beſt array, aſſembling themſelues together, reſorted vnto Baynards Caſtle in Thames ſtreet, where the Protector lay. To which place repayred alſo according to their appointment, the Duke of Buckingham, with diuers noble men with him, beſide many Knights and other Gentlemen. And thereupon the Duke ſent word vnto the Lord Protector, of the being there of a great and honourable company, to moue a great matter vnto his Grace: wherupon the Protector made difficultie to come out vnto them, but if hee firſt knew ſome part of their errand, as though he doubted, and partly diſtruſted the comming of ſuch a number vnto him ſo ſodainly, without any warning, or knowledge whether they came for good or harme; then the Duke when hee had ſhewed this vnto the Maior and other, that they might thereby ſee, how little the Protector looked for this matter; they then ſent vnto him by the Meſſenger ſuch louing meſſage againe, and therwith ſo humbly beſought him to vouchſafe, that they might reſort to his preſence, to propoſe their intent, which they would not impart to any other perſon; that at the laſt hee came out of his chamber, and yet not down vnto them, but ſtood aboue in a gallery ouer them, where they might ſee him & ſpeake to him, as though hee would not yet come too neere them, till he vnderſtood what they meant. And thereupon the Duke of Buckingham firſt made humble petition vnto him on the behalfe of them all, that his Grace would pardon them, and licence them to propoſe vnto his Grace, the intent of their comming without his diſpleaſure, without which pardon obtained, they durſt not be ſo bold to moue him in their ſuite. In which albeit they meant as much honour to his Grace, as wealth to all the Realm beſide; yet were they not ſure how his Grace would take it, whom they would in no wiſe offend. Then the Protector (as he was very gentle of himſelfe selfe, and also longed sore to know what they meant) gaue him leaue to propose what him liked, verily trusting for the good mind that he bare them all, none of them would intend any thing to himward, wherewith hee ought to be grieued.

(60) When the Duke had this leaue and pardon to speake, then waxed hee bold to shew him their entent and purpose, with all the causes mouing them thereunto, as you haue heard before: and finally, to beseech his Grace, that it would like him of his accustomed goodnes and zeale vnto the realm now with his eye of pitty, to behold the long continued distresse, and decay of the same, and to set his gratious hands to redresse an amendment thereof, by taking vpon him the Crowne and gouernment of the land, according to his right and title lawfully descended vnto him, and to the law of God, profit of the Realme, and vnto his grace so much the more honour, and lesse paine, in that, that neuer Prince raigned ouer any people that were so glad to liue vnder his obeisance, as the people of this land vnder his.

(61) When the Protector had heard the proposition, he looked very strangely thereat, and answered: That albeit it were, he partly knew the things by them alleaged to be true, yet such intire loue he bare vnto King Edward and his children, that so much more he regarded his honour in other Realmes about, then the Crowne of any one, of which he was neuer desirous, that he could not finde in his heart in this point to incline to their desire. For in all other Nations where the truth was not well knowne, it would peraduenture be thought, that it was his own ambitious minde and deuise, to depose the Prince, and to take himselfe the Crowne, with which infamie he would not haue his honour stained for anie Crowne, in which he had euer perceiued much more labour and paine, then pleasure to him that would so vse it, as he that would not, were not worthy to haue it. Notwithstanding he not only pardoned them the motion that they made him, but also thanked them for the loue and harty fauour they bare him, praying them for his sake to giue and beare the same to the Prince, vnder whom hee was, and would be content to liue, and with his labour and counsell, as farre as should like the King to vse him, he would doe his vttermost endeuour to set the Realme in good state, which was already in this little time of his Protectorship (the praise be giuen to God) well begun, in that the malice of such as were before, occasion of the contrary, and of new intended to be, were now partly by good pollicy, partly more by Gods speciall prouidence, then mans prouision represssed.

(62) Vpon this answere giuen, the Duke by the Protectors licence, a little rowned, aswell with other noble men about him, as with the Maior and Recorder of London. And after that, vpon like pardon desired and obtained, he shewed aloude vnto the Protector for a finall conclusion, that the Realme was at a point, King Edwards line should not any longer raigne ouer them, both for that they had so farre gone, as it was now no surety to retreat, as for that they thought it was for the weale vniuersall to take that way, although they had not yet begun it. Wherefore if it would like his grace to take the Crowne vpon him, they would humbly beseech him thereunto; if he would giue them a resolute answere to the contrary, which they would be loth to heare, then must they needes seeke, and would not faile to finde some other noble man that would.

These words much moued the Protector, which else as euery man may know, would neuer of likelihood haue inclined thereunto But when he saw there was none other way, but that either he must take it, or else he, and his both goe from it, he said vnto the Lords and commons.

(63) Sith wee well perceiue that all the Realme is so set, whereof we be very sorry, that they will not suffer in any wise King Edwards line to gouerne them, whom no earthly man can gouerne against their wils, and well we also perceiue, that no man there is to whom the Crowne can by iust title appertaine, as to our selfe, as very right heire lawfully begotten of the body of our most deare father Richard late Duke of Yorke, to which title is now ioined your election, the Nobles and Commons of this Realme, which we of all title possible take for the most effectuall: we be content, and agree fauourably to incline to your petition and requeft, and according to the same, we here take vpon vs the roiall estate, preheminence, and kingdome of the two noble realmes, England and France, the one from this day forward, by vs and our heires, to rule, gouerne, and defend; the other by Gods grace, and your good helpe, to get againe and subdue, and establish for euer in due obedience vnto this Realm of England, the aduancement whereof we neuer aske of God longer to liue, then we intend to procure. With this there was a great shout, crying King Richard, King Richard. And then the Lords went vp to the King (for so was he from that time called) and the people departed, talking diuersely of the matter, euery man as his fantasie gaue him.

The Protector fauourably accepteth the Crowne.

(64) Much was talked, and maruelled at the manner of this dealing, that the matter was made so strange vnto both parties, as though they neuer had communed either with others before, when as themselues wist there was no man so dull that heard them, but perceiued well inough, that all the matter was so made betweene them. Howbeit, some excused that againe, and said all must be done in good order: And men must sometimes for manners sake, not be acknown what they know: for at the consecration of a Bishop, euery man wotteth well, by the paying for his bulles, that he purposeth to be one, and though he pay for nothing else, and yet must he twice be asked, whether he will be a Bishop or no, and hee must twice say nay, and at the third time take it, as compelled thereunto by his owne will. And in a Stage-play the people know right well, that he who plaieth the Sowdaine, is percase a sowter, yet if one should know so little good, to shew out of season what acquaintance he hath with him, and call him by his owne name, while he standeth in his maiesty, one of his tormentors might hap to breake his head worthily for marring of the plaie.

Diuers opinions of the people.

(65) The raigne of this yong King may well be accounted an interregnum without King, aswell for his minoritie being vnder the rule of a Protector himselfe, as for the short time wherein he continued the name of a King; which onlie was two monthes and sixteene daies, and in them also he sate vncrowned without Scepter or ball, all which Richard aimed at, and perfidiously got, before they could come to his head; or into his hands. His age at the death of his father and entrance into his throne was eleuen yeeres fiue monthes and fiue daies, and within three monthes after, was with his brother smothered to death in the Tower of London, as shall be shewed in his Raigne, of whom we are now by order of succession to write.

Richard, the third ſonne of Richard Duke of Yorke, born at Fotheringhay Caſtle in the County of Northampton, was firſt honoured with the title of Gloceſter, being the third Duke of that number, & conſequently by vſurpation crowned King of England, the third of that name, a name indeed noted to the Kings ſo called, to bee euer ominous; and the title of Gloceſter to thoſe Dukes euer fatall, all of them both, dying violent and vntimely deathes, which ought to haue beene the more fearefull vnto Richard, now hauing poſſeſſion and intereſt in them both. But that not regarded, or deſtiny enforcing, his aſpiring mind gaue him no reſt, till his reſtleſſe body found it laſtly in the graue. For his brother deceaſed when his life was moſt deſired, no man in ſhew tooke his death ſo heauily as himſelfe, or tendered the young King with a more honourable reſpect, when as (God knowes) his mind ranne vpon deepe reaches, how to compaſſe the wreath for his owne head; which the better to faſhion, hee withdrew a while into the North, and at Yorke in moſt ſad and ſolemne manner obſerued the Funerals of the dead King: but howſoeuer the Maske couered this ſubtle Dukes face from the eie of the multitude; yet Buckingham well knew the ambitious deſire of his aſpiring heart, and indeed was the Dedalus that made him the wings, wherwith he mounted ſo neere vnto the Sun, as that the wax melting (like the high-minded young Icarus) he caught his laſt fall.
